TO THE AUTHOR OF CLARISSA.

O MASTER of the heart! whoſe magic ſkill
The cloſe receſſes of the ſoul can find,
Can rouze, becalm, and terrify the mind,
Now melt with pity, now with anguiſh thrill;

Thy moral page while virtuous precepts fill,
Warm from the heart, to mend the age deſign'd,
Wit, ſtrength, truth, decency, are all combin'd
To lead our youth to good, and guard from ill.

O long enjoy that thou ſo well haſt won,
The grateful tribute of each honeſt heart,
Sincere, nor hackney'd in the ways of men;
At each diſtreſsful ſtroke their true tears run;
And Nature, unſophiſticate by art,
Owns and applauds the labours of thy pen.

PREFACE.

THE following Hiſtory is given in a Series of Letters, written principally in a double yet ſeparate correſpondence;

Between two young ladies of virtue and honour, bearing an inviolable friendſhip for each other, and writing not merely for amuſement, but upon the moſt intereſting ſubjects; in which every private family, more or leſs, may find itſelf concerned: And,

Between two gentlemen of free lives; one of them glorying in his talents for ſtratagem and invention, and communicating to the other, in confidence, all the ſecret purpoſes of an intriguing head and reſolute heart.

But here it will be proper to obſerve, for the ſake of ſuch as may apprehend hurt to the morals of youth, from the more freely written letters, that the gentlemen, though profeſſed libertines as to the female ſex, and making it one of their maxims to keep no faith with any of the individuals of it who are thrown into their power, are not, however, either infidels or ſcoffers; nor yet ſuch as think themſelves freed from the obſervance of thoſe other moral duties which bind man to man.

On the contrary, it will be found in the progreſs of the work, that they very often make ſuch reflections upon each other, and each upon himſelf and his own actions, as reaſonable beings muſt make, who diſbelieve not a future ſtate of rewards and puniſhments, and who one day propoſe to reform—One of them actually reforming, and by that means giving an opportunity to cenſure the freedoms which fall from the gayer pen and lighter heart of the other.

And yet that other, although in unboſoming himſelf to a ſelect friend, he diſcover wickedneſs enough to entitle him to general deteſtation, preſerves a decency, as well in his images as in his language, which is not always to be found in the works of ſome of the moſt celebrated modern writers, whoſe ſubjects and characters have leſs warranted the liberties they have taken.

In the letters of the two young ladies, it is preſumed, will be found not only the higheſt exerciſe of a reaſonable and practicable friendſhip, between minds endowed with the nobleſt principles of virtue and religion, but, occaſionally interſperſed, ſuch delicacy of ſentiments, particularly with regard to the other ſex; ſuch inſtances of impartiality, each freely, as a fundamental principle of their friendſhip, blaming, praiſing, and ſetting right, the other, as are ſtrongly to be recommended to the obſervation of the younger part (more eſpecially) of female readers.

The principal of theſe two young ladies is propoſed as an exemplar to her ſex: nor is it any objection to her being ſo, that ſhe is not in all reſpects a perfect character. It was not only natural, but it was neceſſary, that ſhe ſhould have ſome faults, were it only to ſhew the reader how laudably ſhe could miſtruſt and blame herſelf, and carry to her own heart, diveſted of ſelf-partiality, the cenſure which aroſe from her own convictions, and that even to the acquittal of thoſe, becauſe revered characters, whom no one elſe would acquit, and to whoſe much greater faults her errors were owing, and not to a weak or reproachable heart. As far as is conſiſtent with human frailty, and as far as ſhe could be perfect, conſidering the people ſhe had to deal with, and thoſe with whom ſhe was inſeparably connected, ſhe is perfect. To have been impeccable, muſt have left nothing for the Divine Grace and a purified ſtate to do, and carried our idea of her from woman to angel. As ſuch is ſhe often eſteemed by the man whoſe heart was ſo corrupt, that he could hardly believe human nature capable of the purity which, on every trial or temptation, ſhone out in hers.

Beſides the four principal perſons, ſeveral others are introduced, whoſe letters are characteriſtick: and it is preſumed that there will be found in ſome of them, but more eſpecially in thoſe of the chief character among the men, and the ſecond character among the women, ſuch ſtrokes of gaiety, fancy, and humour, as will entertain and divert, and at the ſame time both warn and inſtruct.

All the letters are written whilſt the hearts of the writers muſt be ſuppoſed to be wholly engaged in their ſubjects, (the events at the time generally dubious;) ſo that they abound not only with critical ſituations, but with what may be called inſtantaneous deſcriptions and reflections, (proper to be brought home to the breaſt of the youthful reader;) as alſo with affecting converſations; many of them written in the dialogue or dramatick way.

'Much more lively and affecting,' ſays one of the principal characters, (Vol. VII.) 'muſt be the ſtile of thoſe who write in the height of a preſent 'diſtreſs, the mind tortured by the pangs of uncertainty, (the events then hid-'den in the womb of fate;) than the dry, narrative, unanimated ſtile of a 'perſon relating difficulties and dangers ſurmounted, can be; the relater per-'fectly at eaſe; and if himſelf unmoved by his own ſtory, not likely greatly to 'affect the reader.'

What will be found to be more particularly aimed at in the following work, is—To warn the inconſiderate and thoughtleſs of the one ſex againſt the baſe arts and ſpecious contrivers of the other—To caution parents againſt the undue exerciſe of their natural authority over their children in the great article of marriage—To warn children againſt preferring a man of pleaſure to a man of probity, upon that dangerous but too commonly received notion, that a reformed rake makes the beſt huſband—But, above all, to inveſtigate the higheſt and moſt important doctrines not only of morality, but of chriſtianity, by ſhewing them thrown into action in the conduct of the worthy characters; while the unworthy, who ſet thoſe doctrines at defiance, are condignly, and, as may be ſaid, conſequentially, puniſhed.

From what has been ſaid, conſiderate readers will not enter upon the peruſal of the piece before them, as if it were deſigned only to divert and amuſe. It will probably be thought tedious to ſuch as dip into it, expecting a light Novel, or tranſitory Romance; and look upon ſtory in it (intereſting as that is generally allowed to be) as it's ſole end, rather than as a vehicle to the inſtruction.

THE HISTORY OF CLARISSA HARLOWE.

VOLUME THE FIRST.

LETTER I.

MISS ANNA HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

JAN. 10.

I Am extremely concerned, my deareſt friend, for the diſturbances that have happened in your family. I know how it muſt hurt you to become the ſubject of the publick talk: and yet, upon an occaſion ſo generally known, it is impoſſible but that whatever relates to a young lady, whoſe diſtinguiſhed merits have made her the publick care, ſhould engage every-body's attention. I long to have the particulars from yourſelf; and of the uſage I am told you receive upon an accident you could not help; and in which, as far as I can learn, the ſufferer was the aggreſſor.

Mr. Diggs the ſurgeon, whom I ſent for at the firſt hearing of the rencounter, to enquire, for your ſake, how your brother was, told me that there was no danger from the wound, if there were none from the fever; which, it ſeems, has been increaſed by the perturbation of his ſpirits.

Mr. Wyerley drank tea with us yeſterday; and though he is far from being partial to Mr. Lovelace, as it may be well ſuppoſed, yet both he and Mr. Symmes blame your family for the treatment they gave him when he went in perſon to enquire after your brother's health, and to expreſs his concern for what had happened.

They ſay, That Mr. Lovelace could not avoid drawing his ſword; and that either your brother's unſkilfulneſs or paſſion left him from the very firſt paſs entirely in his power.

This, I am told, was what Mr. Lovelace ſaid upon it, retreating as he ſpoke: 'Have a care, Mr. Harlowe!—Your 'violence puts you out of your de- 'fence—you give me too much advan- 'tage. For your ſiſter's ſake, I will 'paſs by every thing—if—'

But this the more provoked his raſhneſs, to lay himſelf open to the advantage of his adverſary; who, after a ſlight wound given him in the arm, took away his ſword.

There are people who love not your brother, becauſe of his natural imperiouſneſs and fierce and uncontroulable temper: theſe ſay, That the young gentleman's paſſion was abated on ſeeing his blood guſh plentifully down his arm; and that he received the generous offices of his adverſary (who helped him off with his coat and waiſtcoat, and bound up his arm till the ſurgeon could come) with ſuch patience, as was far from making a viſit afterwards from that adverſary to enquire after his health, appear either inſulting or improper.

Be this as it may, every-body pities you. So ſteady, ſo uniform, in your conduct; ſo deſirous, as you always ſaid, of ſliding through life to the end of it unnoted; and, as I may add, not wiſhing to be obſerved even for your ſilent benevolence; ſufficiently happy in the noble conſciouſneſs which attends it; rather uſeful than glaring, your deſerved motto; though now, to your regret, puſhed into blaze,, as I may ſay; and yet blamed at home for the faults of others—How muſt ſuch a virtue ſuffer on every hand!—Yet, it muſt be allowed that your preſent trial is but proportioned to your prudence.

As all your friends without doors are apprehenſive

apprehenſive that ſome other unhappy event may reſult from ſo violent a contention, in which, it ſeems, the families on both ſides are now engaged, I muſt deſire you to enable me, on the authority of your own information, to do you occaſional juſtice.

My mother, and all of us, like the reſt of the world, talk of nobody but you on this occaſion, and of the conſequences which may follow from the reſentments of a man of Mr. Lovelace's ſpirit; who, as he gives out, has been treated with high indignity by your uncles. My mother will have it, that you cannot now, with any decency, either ſee him, or correſpond with him: ſhe is a good deal prepoſſeſſed by your uncle Antony; who occaſionally calls upon us, as you know; and, on this rencounter, has repreſented to her the crime which it would be in a ſiſter to encourage a man who is to wade into her favour (this was his expreſſion) through the blood of her brother.

Write to me, therefore, my dear, the whole of your ſtory from the time that Mr. Lovelace was firſt introduced into your family; and particularly an account of all that paſſed between him and your ſiſter, about which there are different reports; ſome people ſcrupling not to inſinuate that the younger ſiſter has ſtolen a lover from the elder: and, pray, write in ſo full a manner as may ſatisfy thoſe who know not ſo much of your affairs as I do. If any-thing unhappy ſhould fall out from the violence of ſuch ſpirits as you have to deal with, your account of all things previous to it will be your beſt juſtification.

You ſee what you draw upon yourſelf by excelling all your ſex: every individual of it who knows you, or has heard of you, ſeems to think you anſwerable to her for your conduct in points ſo very delicate and concerning.

Every eye, in ſhort, is upon you with the expectation of an example. I wiſh to Heaven you were at liberty to purſue your own methods; all would then, I dare ſay, be eaſy, and honourably ended: but I dread your directors and directreſſes; for your mother, admirably well qualified as ſhe is to lead, muſt ſubmit to be led. Your ſiſter and brother will certainly put you out of your courſe.

But this is a point you will not permit me to expatiate upon: pardon me, therefore, and I have done. Yet, why ſhould I ſay pardon me, when your concerns are my concerns—when your honour is my honour—when I love you as never woman loved another—and when you have allowed of that concern and of that love, and have for years, which in perſons ſo young may be called many, ranked in the firſt claſs of your friends, your ever grateful and affectionate,

ANNA HOWE.

Will you oblige me with a copy of the preamble to the clauſes in your grandfather's will in your favour, and allow me to ſend it to my aunt Harman? She is very deſirous to ſee it: yet your character has ſo charmed her, that, though a ſtranger to you perſonally, ſhe aſſents to the preference given you in that will, before ſhe knows the teſtator's reaſons for giving you that preference.

LETTER II.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

HARLOWE-PLACE, JAN. 13.

HOW you oppreſs me, my deareſt friend, with your politeneſs! I cannot doubt your ſincerity; but you ſhould take care, that you give me not reaſon, from your kind partiality, to call in queſtion your judgment. You do not diſtinguiſh that I take many admirable hints from you, and have the art to paſs them upon you for my own: for in all you do, in all you ſay, nay, in your very looks (ſo animated!) you give leſſons to one who loves you and obſerves you as I love and obſerve you, without knowing that you do—So, pray, my dear, be more ſparing of your praiſe for the future, leſt after this confeſſion we ſhould ſuſpect that you ſecretly intend to praiſe yourſelf while you would be thought only to commend another.

Our family has indeed been ſtrangely diſcompoſed.—Diſcompoſed!—It has been in tumults ever-ſince the unhappy tranſaction; and I have borne all the blame; yet ſhould have had too much concern for myſelf, had I been more juſtly ſpared by every one elſe.

For, whether it be owing to a faulty impatience, having been too indulgently treated to be enured to blame, or to the regret I have to hear thoſe cenſured on my account whom it is my duty to vindicate; I have ſometimes wiſhed, that it had pleaſed God to have taken me in my laſt fever, when I had every-body's love and good opinion; but oftener that I had never been diſtinguiſhed by my grandfather as I was: ſince that diſtinction has eſtranged from me my brother's brother's and ſiſter's affections; at leaſt, has raiſed a jealouſy with regard to the apprehended favour of my two uncles, that now-and-then overſhadows their love.

My brother being happily recovered of his fever, and his wound in a hopeful way, although he has not yet ventured abroad, I will be as particular as you deſire in the hiſtory you demand of me. But Heaven forbid that any-thing ſhould happen which may require it to be produced for the purpoſe you mention!

I will begin, as you command, with Mr. Lovelace's addreſs to my ſiſter; and be as brief as poſſible. I will recite facts only; and leave you to judge of the truth of the report raiſed, that the younger ſiſter has robbed the elder.

It was in purſuance of a conference between Lord M. and my uncle Antony, that Mr. Lovelace [my father and mother not forbidding] paid his reſpects to my ſiſter Arabella. My brother was then in Scotland, buſying himſelf in viewing the condition of the conſiderable eſtate which was left him there by his generous godmother, together with one as conſiderable in Yorkſhire. I was alſo abſent at my Dairy Houſe *, as it is called, buſied in the accounts relating to the eſtate which my grandfather had the goodneſs to deviſe to me; and which once a year was left to my inſpection, although I have given the whole into my father's power.

My ſiſter made me a viſit there the day after Mr. Lovelace had been introduced; and ſeemed highly pleaſed with the gentleman. His birth, his fortune in poſſeſſion, a clear 2000l. a year, as Lord M. had aſſured my uncle; preſumptive-heir to that nobleman's large eſtate: his great expectations from Lady Sarah Sadlier and Lady Betty Lawrance; who with his uncle intereſted themſelves very warmly (he being the laſt of his line) to ſee him married.

So handſome a man!—O her beloved Clary! for then ſhe was ready to love me dearly, from the overflowings of her good-humour on his account!) He was but too handſome a man for her!—Were ſhe but as amiable as ſomebody, there would be a probability of holding his affections!—For he was wild, ſhe heard; very wild, very gay; loved intrigue—But he was young; a man of ſenſe: would ſee his error, could ſhe but have patience with his faults, if his faults were not cured by marriage.

Thus ſhe ran on; and then wanted me to ſee the charming man, as ſhe called him.—Again concerned, that ſhe was not handſome enough for him; with, a ſad thing that the man ſhould have the advantage of the woman in that particular!—But then, ſtepping to the glaſs, ſhe complimented herſelf, that ſhe was very well: that there were many women deemed paſſable who were inferior to herſelf; that ſhe was always thought comely; and comelineſs, let her tell me, having not ſo much to loſe as beauty had, would hold, when that would evaporate or fly off. Nay, for that matter, [and again ſhe turned to the glaſs] her features were not irregular; her eyes not at all amiſs. And I remember they were more than uſually brilliant at that time. Nothing, in ſhort, to be found fault with, though nothing very engaging ſhe doubted—Was there, Clary?

Excuſe me, my dear, I never was thus particular before; no, not to you. Nor would I now have written thus freely of a ſiſter, but that ſhe makes a merit to my brother of diſowning that ſhe ever liked him; as I ſhall mention hereafter; and then you will always have me give you minute deſcriptions, nor ſuffer me to paſs by the air and manner in which things are ſpoken that are to be taken notice of; rightly obſerving, that air and manner often expreſs more than the accompanying words.

I congratulated her upon her proſpects. She received my compliments with a great deal of ſelf-complacency.

She liked the gentleman ſtill more at his next viſit; and yet he made no particular addreſs to her, although an opportunity was given him for it. This was wondered at, as my uncle had introduced him into our family declaredly as a viſiter to my ſiſter. But as we are ever ready to make excuſes when in good-humour with ourſelves, for the perhaps not unwilful ſlights of thoſe whoſe approbation we wiſh to engage; ſo my ſiſter found out a reaſon much to Mr. Lovelace's advantage for his not improving the opportunity that was given him.—It was baſhfulneſs, truly, in him. [Baſhfulneſs in Mr. Lovelace, my dear!]—Indeed, gay and lively as he is, he has

* Her grandfather, in order to invite her to him as often as her other friends would ſpare her, indulged her in erecting and fitting up a dairy-houſe in her own taſte. When finiſhed it was ſo much admired for it's elegant ſimplicity and convenience, that the whole ſeat (before, of old time, from it's ſituation, called The Grove, was generally known by the name of The Dairy Houſe. Her grandfather in particular was fond of having it ſo called.

not the look of an impudent man. But I fancy it is many, many years ago since he was bashful.

Thus, however, could my sister make it out—Upon her word, she believed Mr. Lovelace deserved not the bad character he had as to women.—He was really, to her thinking, a modest man. He would have spoken out, she believed; but once or twice as he seemed to intend to do so, he was under so agreeable a confusion! Such a profound respect he seemed to shew her! A perfect reverence, she thought: she loved dearly that a man in courtship should shew a reverence to his mistress. So, indeed, we all do, I believe: and with reason; since, if I may judge from what I have seen in many families, there is little enough of it shewn afterwards. And she told my aunt Hervey, that she would be a little less upon the reserve next time he came; she was not one of those flirts, not she, who would give pain to a person that deserved to be well-treated; and the more pain for the greatness of his value for her.—I wish she had not somebody whom I love in her eye.

In his third visit, Bella governed herself by this kind and considerate principle: so that, according to her own account of the matter, the man might have spoken out.—But he was still bashful: he was not able to overcome this unseasonable reverence. So this visit went off as the former.

But now she began to be dissatisfied with him. She compared his general character with this his particular behaviour to her; and having never been courted before, owned herself puzzled how to deal with so odd a lover. What did the man mean, she wondered? Had not her uncle brought him declaredly as a suitor to her.—It could not be bashfulness, (now she thought of it) since he might have opened his mind to her uncle, if he wanted courage to speak directly to her.—Not that she cared much for the man neither: but it was right, surely, that a woman should be put out of doubt early as to a man's intentions in such a case as this, from his own mouth.—But, truly, she had begun to think, that he was more solicitous to cultivate her mamma's good opinion than hers!—Everybody, she owned, admired her mother's conversation; but he was mistaken if he thought respect to her mother only would do with her. And then, for his own sake, surely he should put it into her power to be complaisant to him, if he gave her reason to approve of him. This distant behaviour, she must take upon her to say, was the more extraordinary, as he continued his visits, and declared himself extremely desirous to cultivate a friendship with the whole family; and as he could have no doubt about her sense, if she might take upon her to join her own with the general opinion; he having taken great notice of, and admired many of her good things as they fell from her lips. Reserves were painful, she must needs say, to open and free spirits, like hers: and yet she must tell my aunt, (to whom all this was directed) that she should never forget what she owed to her sex, and to herself, were Mr. Lovelace as unexceptionable in his morals as in his figure, and were he to urge his suit ever so warmly.

I was not of her council. I was still absent. And it was agreed upon between my aunt Hervey and her, that she was to be quite solemn and shy in his next visit, if there were not a peculiarity in his address to her.

But my sister, it seems, had not considered the matter well. This was not the way, as it proved, to be taken, for matters of mere omission, with a man of Mr. Lovelace's penetration. Nor with any man; since if love has not taken root deep enough to cause it to shoot out into declaration, if an opportunity be fairly given for it, there is little room to expect, that the blighting winds of anger or resentment will bring it forward. Then my poor sister is not naturally good-humoured. This is too well known a truth for me to endeavour to conceal it, especially from you. She must therefore, I doubt, have appeared to great disadvantages when she aimed to be worse-tempered than ordinary.

How they managed it in their next conversation I know not. One would be tempted to think by the issue, that Mr. Lovelace was ungenerous enough to seek the occasion given*, and to improve it. Yet he thought fit to put the question too:—but, she says, it was not till, by some means or other, (she knew not how) he had wrought her up to such a pitch of displeasure with him, that it was impossible for her to recover herself at the instant. Nevertheless, he re-urged his question, as expecting a definitive answer, without waiting for the return of her temper, or endeavouring to mollify her; so that she was under a necessity of persisting in her denial: yet gave him reason to think she did not dislike his address, only the manner of it; his court being rather made to her mother than to herself, as if he was sure of her consent at any time.

A good encouraging denial, I must own:—as was the rest of her plea; to wit, a disinclination to change her state.—Exceedingly happy as she was: she never could be happier! and such like consenting negatives, as I may call them, and yet not intend a reflection upon my sister: for what can any young creature in the like circumstances say, when she is not sure but a too ready consent may subject her to the slights of a sex that generally values a blessing either more or less as it is obtained with difficulty or ease? Miss Biddulph's answer to a copy of verses from a gentleman, reproaching our sex as acting in disguise, is not a bad one, although you perhaps may think it too acknowledging for the female character.

'Ungenerous sex! to scorn us, if we're kind;
'And yet upbraid us, if we seem severe!
'Do you, t'encourage us to tell our mind,
'Yourselves put off disguise, and be sincere.
'You talk of coquetry! Your own false hearts
'Compel our sex to act dissembling parts.'

Here I am obliged to lay down my pen. I will soon resume it.

LETTER III.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

JAN. 13, 14.

AND thus, as Mr. Lovelace thought fit to take it, had he his answer from my sister. It was with very great regret, as he pretended, [I doubt the man is an hypocrite, my dear] that he acquiesced in it. So much determinedness; such a noble firmness in my sister; that there was no hope of prevailing upon her to alter sentiments she had adopted on full consideration. He sighed, as Bella told us, when he took his leave of her: profoundly sighed; grasped her hand, and kissed it with such an ardor—withdrew with such an air of solemn respect—she had him then before her.—She could almost find in her heart, although he had vexed her, to pity him. A good intentional preparative to love, this pity; since, at the time, she little thought that he would not renew his offer.

He waited on my mother after he had taken leave of Bella, and reported his ill success in so respectful a manner, as well with regard to my sister, as to the whole family, and with so much concern that he was not accepted as a relation to it, that it left upon them all (my brother being then, as I have said, in Scotland) impressions in his favour, and a belief that this matter would certainly be brought on again. But Mr. Lovelace going up directly to town, where he staid a whole fortnight, and meeting there with my uncle Antony, to whom he regretted his niece's cruel resolution not to change her state; it was seen that there was a total end of the affair.

My sister was not wanting to herself on this occasion. She made a virtue of necessity; and the man was quite another man with her.—A vain creature! too well knowing his advantages: yet those not what she had conceived them to be!—Cool and warm by fits and starts; an ague-like lover. A steady man, a man of virtue, a man of morals, was worth a thousand of such gay flutterers. Her sister Clary might think it worth her while perhaps to try to engage such a man. She had patience: she was mistress of persuasion; and, indeed, to do the girl justice, had something of a person; but as for her, she would not have a man of whose heart she could not be sure for one moment; no, not for the world: and most sincerely glad was she that she had rejected him.

But when Mr. Lovelace returned into the country, he thought fit to visit my father and mother; hoping, as he told them, that, however unhappy he had been in the rejection of the wished-for alliance, he might be allowed to keep up an acquaintance and friendship with a family which he should always respect. And then, unhappily as I may say, was I at home and present.

It was immediately observed, that his attention was fixed on me. My sister, as soon as he was gone, in a spirit of bravery, seemed desirous to promote his address, should it be tendered.

My aunt Hervey was there, and was pleased to say, we should make the finest couple in England—if my sister had no objection. 'No, indeed!' with a haughty toss, was my sister's reply—it would be strange if she had, after the denial she had given him upon full deliberation.

My mother declared, That her only dislike of his alliance with either daughter, was on account of his reputed faulty morals.

My uncle Harlowe, That his daughter Clary, as he delighted to call me from child-childhood, would reform him if any woman in the world could.

My uncle Antony gave his approbation in high terms; but referred, as my aunt had done, to my ſiſter.

She repeated her contempt of him; and declared, that were there not another man in England, ſhe would not have him. She was ready, on the contrary, ſhe could aſſure them, to reſign her pretenſions under hand and ſeal, if Miſs Clary were taken with his tinſel; and if every one elſe approved of his addreſſes to the girl.

My father, indeed, after a long ſilence, being urged by my uncle Antony to ſpeak his mind, ſaid, that he had a letter from his ſon, on his hearing of Mr. Lovelace's viſits to his daughter Arabella, which he had not ſhewn to any-body but my mother, that treaty being at an end when he received it; that in this letter he expreſſed great diſlike to an alliance with Mr. Lovelace on the ſcore of his immoralities; that he knew, indeed, there was an old grudge between them; but that, being deſirous to prevent all occaſion of diſunion and animoſity in his family, he would ſuſpend the declaration of his own mind till his ſon arrived, and till he had heard his farther objections: that he was the more inclined to make his ſon this compliment, as Mr. Lovelace's general character gave but too much ground for his ſon's diſlike of him; adding, that he had heard (ſo he ſuppoſed had every one) that he was a very extravagant man; that he had contracted debts in his travels: and, indeed, he was pleaſed to ſay, that he had the air of a ſpendthrift.

Theſe particulars I had partly from my aunt Hervey, and partly from my ſiſter; for I was called out as ſoon as the ſubject was entered upon. When I returned, my uncle Antony aſked me how I ſhould like Mr. Lovelace: every body ſaw, he was pleaſed to ſay, that I had made a conqueſt.

I immediately anſwered, that I did not like him at all: he ſeemed to have too good an opinion both of his perſon and parts, to have any great regard to his wife, let him marry whom he would.

My ſiſter particularly was pleaſed with this anſwer, and confirmed it to be juſt; with a compliment to my judgment—for it was hers.

But the very next day Lord M. came to Harlowe Place; [I was then abſent] and, in his nephew's name, made a propoſal in form; declaring, that it was the ambition of all his family to be related to ours: and he hoped his kinſman would not have ſuch an anſwer on the part of the younger ſiſter, as he had on that of the elder.

In ſhort, Mr. Lovelace's viſits were admitted as thoſe of a man who had not deſerved diſreſpect from our family; but as to his addreſs to me, with a reſervation, as above, on my father's part, that he would determine nothing without his ſon. My diſcretion, as to the reſt, was confided in; for ſtill I had the ſame objections as to the man: nor would I, when we were better acquainted, hear any thing but general talk from him; giving him no opportunity of converſing with me in private.

He bore this with a reſignation little expected from his natural temper, which is generally reported to be quick and haſty, unuſed, it ſeems, from childhood, to check or controul. A caſe too common in conſiderable families where there is an only ſon: and his mother never had any other child. But, as I have heretofore told you, I could perceive, notwithſtanding this reſignation, that he had ſo good an opinion of himſelf as not to doubt that his perſon and accompliſhments would inſenſibly engage me; and, could that be once done, he told my aunt Hervey he ſhould hope, from ſo ſteady a temper, that his hold in my affections would be durable; while my ſiſter accounted for his patience in another manner, which would perhaps have had more force if it had come from a perſon leſs prejudiced: that the man was not fond of marrying at all; that he might perhaps have half a ſcore miſtreſſes; and that delay might be as convenient for his roving, as for my well-acted indifference. That was her kind expreſſion.

Whatever was his motive for a patience ſo generally believed to be out of his uſual character, and where the object of his addreſs was ſuppoſed to be of fortune conſiderable enough to engage his warmeſt attention, he certainly eſcaped many mortifications by it; for while my father ſuſpended his approbation till my brother's arrival, Mr. Lovelace received from every one thoſe civilities which were due to his birth: and although we heard from time to time reports to his diſadvantage with regard to morals, yet could we not queſtion him upon them without giving him greater advantages in his own opinion than the ſituation he was in with us would juſtify to prudence? ſince it was much more likely likely that his addreſs would not be allowed of, than that it would.

And thus was he admitted to converſe with our family almoſt upon his own terms; for, while my friends ſaw nothing in his behaviour but what was extremely reſpectful, and obſerved in him no violent importunity, they ſeemed to have taken a great liking to his converſation: while I conſidered him only as a common gueſt when he came, and thought myſelf no more concerned in his viſits, nor at his entrance and departure, than any other of the family.

But this indifference on my ſide was the means of procuring him one very great advantage; ſince upon it was grounded that correſpondence by letters which ſucceeded; and which, had it been to be begun when the family animoſity broke out, would never have been entered into on my part. The occaſion was this.

My uncle Hervey has a young gentleman entruſted to his care, whom he has thoughts of ſending abroad a year or two hence, to make the grand tour, as it is called; and, finding Mr. Lovelace could give a good account of every thing neceſſary for a young traveller to obſerve upon ſuch an occaſion, he deſired him to write down a deſcription of the courts and countries he had viſited, and what was moſt worthy of curioſity in them.

He conſented, on condition that I would direct his ſubjects, as he called it: and, as every one had heard his manner of writing commended, and thought his narratives might be agreeable amuſements in winter evenings, and that he could have no opportunity particularly to addreſs me in them, ſince they were to be read in full aſſembly before they were given to the young gentleman, I made the leſs ſcruple to write, and to make obſervations, and put queſtions for our farther information—ſtill the leſs perhaps as I love writing; and thoſe who do, are fond, you know, of occaſions to uſe the pen. And then, having every one's conſent, and my uncle Hervey's deſire that I would write, I thought that if I had been the only ſcrupulous perſon, it would have ſhewn a particularity that a vain man might conſtrue to his advantage, and which my ſiſter would not fail to animadvert upon.

You have ſeen ſome of theſe letters, and have been pleaſed with his account of perſons, places and things; and we have both agreed, that he was no common obſerver upon what he had ſeen.

My ſiſter herſelf allowed that the man had a tolerable knack of writing and deſcribing: and my father, who had been abroad in his youth, ſaid, that his remarks were curious, and ſhewed him to be a perſon of reading, judgment, and taſte.

Thus was a kind of correſpondence begun between him and me, with general approbation; while every one wondered at, and was pleaſed with, his patient veneration of me, for ſo they called it. However, it was not doubted but he would ſoon be more importunate, ſince his viſits were more frequent, and he acknowledged to my aunt Hervey a paſſion for me, accompanied with an awe that he had never known before; to which he attributed what he called his but ſeeming acquieſcence with my father's pleaſure, and the diſtance I kept him at. And yet, my dear, this may be his uſual manner of behaviour to our ſex; for had not my ſiſter at firſt all his reverence?

Mean time, my father, expecting his importunity, kept in readineſs the reports he had heard in his diſfavour, to charge them upon him then, as ſo many objections to his addreſs. And it was highly agreeable to me that he did ſo: it would have been ſtrange if it were not; ſince the perſon who could reject Mr. Wyerley's addreſs for the ſake of his free opinions, muſt have been inexcuſable, had ſhe not rejected another's for his freer practices.

But I ſhould own, that in the letters he ſent me upon the general ſubject, he more than once encloſed a particular one, declaring his paſſionate regards for me, and complaining, with fervour enough, of my reſerves: but of theſe I took not the leaſt notice; for, as I had not written to him at all, but upon a ſubject ſo general, I thought it was but right to let what he wrote upon one ſo particular paſs off as if I had never ſeen it; and the rather, as I was not then at liberty (from the approbation his letters met with) to break off the correſpondence, unleſs I had aſſigned the true reaſon for doing ſo. Beſides, with all his reſpectful aſſiduities, it was eaſy to obſerve (if it had not been his general character) that his temper is naturally haughty and violent; and I had ſeen too much of that untractable ſpirit in my brother to like it in one who hoped to be ſtill more nearly related to me.

I had a little ſpecimen of this temper of his upon the very occaſion I have mentioned: for, after he had ſent me a third particular letter with the general one, he aſked me, the next time he came to Harlowe Place, if I had not received ſuch a one from him. I told him I ſhould never anſwer one ſo ſent; and that I had waited for ſuch an occaſion as he had now given me to tell him ſo: I deſired him therefore not to write again on the ſubject; aſſuring him, that if he did, I would return both, and never write another line to him.

You cannot imagine how faucily the man looked; as if, in ſhort, he was diſappointed that he had not made a more ſenſible impreſſion upon me: nor, when he recollected himſelf, (as he did immediately) what a viſible ſtruggle it coſt him to change his haughty airs for more placid ones. But I took no notice of either; for I thought it beſt to convince him, by the coolneſs and indifference with which I repulſed his forward hopes, (at the ſame time intending to avoid the affectation of pride or vanity) that he was not conſiderable enough in my eyes to make me take over-ready offence at what he ſaid, or at his haughty looks: in other words, that I had not value enough for him to treat him with peculiarity either by ſmiles or frowns. Indeed, he had cunning enough to give me, undeſignedly, a piece of inſtruction which taught me this caution; for he had ſaid in converſation once, that if a man could not make a woman in courtſhip own herſelf pleaſed with him, it was as much and oftentimes more to his purpoſe to make her angry with him.

I muſt break off here. But will continue the ſubject the very firſt opportunity. Mean time, I am your moſt affectionate friend and ſervant,

CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER IV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

JAN. 15.

SUCH, my dear, was the ſituation Mr. Lovelace and I were in when my brother arrived from Scotland.

The moment Mr. Lovelace's viſits were mentioned to him, he, without either heſitation or apology, expreſſed his diſapprobation of them. He found great flaws in his character, and took the liberty to ſay, in ſo many words, that he wondered how it came into the heads of his uncles to encourage ſuch a man for either of his ſiſters: at the ſame time returning his thanks to my father for declining his conſent till he arrived, in ſuch a manner, I thought, as a ſuperior would do, when he commended an inferior for having well performed his duty in his abſence.

He juſtified his avowed inveteracy by common fame, and by what he had known of him at college; declaring, that he had ever hated him; ever ſhould hate him; and would never own him for a brother, or me for a ſiſter, if I married him.

That early antipathy I have heard accounted for in this manner.

Mr. Lovelace was always noted for his vivacity and courage; and no leſs, it ſeems, for the ſwift and ſurpriſing progreſs he made in all parts of literature: for diligence in his ſtudies, in the hours of ſtudy, he had hardly his equal. This, it ſeems, was his general character at the univerſity; and it gained him many friends among the more learned; while thoſe who did not love him, feared him, by reaſon of the offence his vivacity made him too ready to give, and of the courage he ſhewed in ſupporting the offence when given; which procured him as many followers as he pleaſed among the miſchievous ſort.—No very amiable character, you will ſay, upon the whole.

But my brother's temper was not more happy. His native haughtineſs could not bear a ſuperiority ſo viſible; and whom we fear more than love, we are not far from hating: and having leſs command of his paſſions than the other, he was evermore the ſubject of his perhaps indecent ridicule; ſo that they never met without quarrelling. And every-body, either from love or fear, ſiding with his antagoniſt, he had a moſt uneaſy time of it while both continued in the ſame college. It was the leſs wonder, therefore, that a young man who is not noted for the gentleneſs of his temper, ſhould reſume an antipathy early begun, and ſo deeply rooted.

He found my ſiſter, who waited but for the occaſion, ready to join him in his reſentments againſt the man he hated. She utterly diſclaimed all manner of regard for him: never liked him at all; his eſtate was certainly much incumbered; it was impoſſible it ſhould be otherwiſe, ſo entirely devoted as he was to his pleaſures. He kept no houſe; had no equipage: nobody pretended that he wanted pride; the reaſon therefore was eaſy to be gueſſed at. And then did ſhe boaſt of, and my brother praiſe her for, refuſing him: and both joined, on all occaſions, to depre-depreciate him, and not ſeldom made the occaſions; their diſpleaſure againſt him cauſing every ſubject to run into this, if it began not with it.

I was not ſolicitous to vindicate him when I was not joined in their reflections. I told them, I did not value him enough to make a difference in the family on his account: and as he was ſuppoſed to have given too much cauſe for their ill opinion of him, I thought he ought to take the conſequence of his own faults.

Now and then, indeed, when I obſerved that their vehemence carried them beyond all bounds of probability in their charges againſt him, I thought it but juſtice to put in a word for him. But this only ſubjected me to reproach, as having a prepoſſeſſion in his favour which I would not own.—So that, when I could not change the ſubject, I uſed to retire either to my muſick, or to my cloſet.

Their behaviour to him when they could not help ſeeing him, was very cold and diſobliging; but as yet not directly affrontive. For they were in hopes of prevailing upon my father to forbid his viſits. But, as there was nothing in his behaviour that might warrant ſuch a treatment of a man of his birth and fortune, they ſucceeded not: and then they were very earneſt with me to forbid them. I aſked, what authority I had to take ſuch a ſtep in my father's houſe; and when my behaviour to him was ſo diſtant that he ſeemed to be as much the gueſt of any other perſon of the family, themſelves excepted, as mine? In revenge, they told me, that it was cunning management between us; and that we both underſtood one another better than we pretended to do. And at laſt they gave ſuch a looſe to their paſſions, all of a ſudden *, as I may ſay, that inſtead of withdrawing, as they uſed to do when he came, they threw themſelves in his way purpoſely to affront him.

Mr. Lovelace, you may believe, very ill-brooked this: but nevertheleſs contented himſelf to complain of it to me; in high terms, however, telling me that, but for my ſake, my brother's treatment of him was not to be borne.

I was ſorry for the merit this gave him in his own opinion with me; and the more, as ſome of the affronts he received were too flagrant to be excuſed: but I told him that I was determined not to fall out with my brother, if I could help it, whatever faults he had; and, ſince they could not ſee one another with temper, ſhould be glad that he would not throw himſelf in my brother's way; and I was ſure my brother would not ſeek him.

He was very much nettled at this anſwer: but ſaid, he muſt bear his affronts if I would have it ſo. He had been accuſed himſelf of violence in his temper; but he hoped to ſhew on this occaſion that he had a command of his paſſions which few young men, ſo highly provoked, would be able to ſhew; and doubted not but it would be attributed to a proper motive by a perſon of my generoſity and penetration.

My brother had juſt before, with the approbation of my uncles, employed a perſon, related to a diſcharged bailiff or ſteward of Lord M. who had had the management of ſome part of Mr. Lovelace's affairs, (from which he was alſo diſmiſſed by him) to enquire into his debts, after his companions, into his amours, and the like.

My aunt Hervey, in confidence, gave me the following particulars of what the man ſaid of him.

That he was a generous landlord; that he ſpared nothing for ſolid and laſting improvements upon his eſtate; and that he looked into his own affairs, and underſtood them: that he had been very expenſive when abroad, and contracted a large debt; (for he made no ſecret of his affairs) yet choſe to limit himſelf to an annual ſum, and to decline equipage, in order to avoid being obliged to his uncle and aunts, from whom he might have what money he pleaſed; but that he was very jealous of their controul; had often quarrels with them; and treated them ſo freely, that they were all afraid of him. However, that his eſtate was never mortgaged, as my brother had heard it was; his credit was always high; and the man believed he was, by this time, near upon, if not quite, clear of the world.

He was a ſad gentleman, he ſaid, as to women:—if his tenants had pretty daughters they choſe to keep them out of his ſight. He believed he kept no particular miſtreſs; for he had heard newelty, (that was the man's word) was every thing with him. But for his uncle's and aunt's teazings, the man fancied he would not think of marriage. He was never known to be diſguiſed with liquor; but was a great plotter, and a greater writer, that he lived a wild life in town, by what he had heard; had ſix or ſeven companions as bad as himſelf, whom, now-and-then, he brought down with him; and the country was always glad when they went up again. He would have it that, although paſſionate, he was good-humoured; loved as well to take a jeſt as to give one; and would rally himſelf, upon occaſion, the freeſt of any man he ever knew.

This was his character from an enemy; for, as my aunt obſerved, every thing the man ſaid commendably of him came grudgingly, with a Muſt needs ſay —To do him juſtice, &c. while the contrary was delivered with a free good-will. And this character, as a worſe was expected, though this was bad enough, not anſwering the end of enquiring after it, my brother and ſiſter were more apprehenſive than before, that his addreſs would be encouraged, ſince the worſt part of it was known, or ſuppoſed, when he was firſt introduced to my ſiſter.

But, with regard to myſelf, I muſt obſerve in his diſfavour, that, notwithſtanding the merit he wanted to make with me for his patience upon my brother's ill treatment of him, I owed him no compliments for trying to conciliate with him. Not that I believe it would have ſignified any thing if he had made ever ſuch court either to him or to my ſiſter; yet one might have expected from a man of his politeneſs, and from his pretenſions, you know, that he would have been willing to try: inſtead of which, he ſhewed ſuch a contempt both of my brother and ſiſter, eſpecially my brother, as was conſtrued into a defiance of them; and for me to have hinted at an alteration in his behaviour to my brother, was an advantage I knew he would have been proud of; and which, therefore, I had no mind to give him. But I doubted not that, having ſo very little encouragement from any body, his pride would ſoon take fire, and he would of himſelf diſcontinue his viſits, or go to town; where, till he came acquainted with our family, he uſed chiefly to reſide: and in this latter caſe he had no reaſon to expect that I would receive, much leſs anſwer, his letters; the occaſion which had led me to receive any of his being by this time over.

But my brother's antipathy would not permit him to wait for ſuch an event; and after ſeveral exceſſes which Mr. Lovelace ſtill returned with contempt, and a haughtineſs too much like that of the aggreſſor, my brother took upon himſelf to fill up the door way once when he came, as if to oppoſe his entrance: and, upon his aſking for me, demanded what his buſineſs was with his ſiſter.

The other, with a challenging air, as my brother ſays, told him he would anſwer a gentleman any queſtion; but he wiſhed that Mr. James Harlowe, who had of late given himſelf high airs, would remember that he was not now at college.

Juſt then the good Doctor Lewen, who frequently honours me with a viſit of converſation, as he is pleaſed to call it, and had parted with me in my own parlour, came to the door; and hearing the words, interpoſed, both having their hands upon their ſwords: and telling Mr. Lovelace where I was, he burſt by my brother to come to me; leaving him chafing, he ſaid, like a hunted boar at bay.

This alarmed us all. My father was pleaſed to hint to Mr. Lovelace, that he wiſhed he would diſcontinue his viſits, for the peace-ſake of the family: and I, by his command, ſpoke a great deal plainer.

But Mr. Lovelace is a man not eaſily brought to give up his purpoſe, eſpecially in a point wherein he pretends his heart is ſo much engaged: and no abſolute prohibition having been given, things went on for a little while as before; for I ſaw plainly that to have denied myſelf to his viſits, (which, however, I declined receiving as often as I could) was to bring forward ſome deſperate iſſue between the two; ſince the offence ſo readily given on one ſide was brooked by the other only out of conſideration to me.

And thus did my brother's raſhneſs lay me under an obligation where I would leaſt have owed it.

The intermediate propoſals of Mr. Symmes and Mr. Mullins, both (in turn) encouraged by my brother, induced him to be more patient for a while, as nobody thought me over-forward in Mr. Lovelace's favour; for he hoped that he ſhould engage my father and uncles to approve of the one or the other in oppoſition to the man he hated. But when he found that I had intereſt enough to diſengage myſelf from the addreſſes dreſſes of thoſe gentlemen, as I had (before he went to Scotland, and before Mr. Lovelace viſited here) of Mr. Wyerley's, he then kept no meaſures: and firſt ſet himſelf to upbraid me for a ſuppoſed prepoſſeſſion, which he treated as if it were criminal; and then to inſult Mr. Lovelace in perſon, at Mr. Edward Symmes's, the brother of the other Symmes, two miles off; and no good Doctor Lewen being there to interpoſe, the unhappy rencounter followed. My brother was diſarmed, as you have heard; and on being brought home, and giving us ground to ſuppoſe he was much worſe hurt than he really was, and a fever enſuing, every one flamed out; and all was laid at my door.

Mr. Lovelace for three days together ſent twice each day to enquire after my brother's health; and although he received rude and even ſhocking returns, he thought fit on the fourth day to make in perſon the ſame enquiries; and received ſtill greater incivilities from my two uncles, who happened to be both there. My father alſo was held by force from going to him with his ſword in his hand, although he had the gout upon him.

I fainted away with terror, ſeeing every one ſo violent, and hearing Mr. Lovelace ſwear that he would not depart till he had made my uncles aſk his pardon for the indignities he had received at their hands; a door being held faſt locked between him and them. My mother all the time was praying and ſtruggling to withold my father in the great parlour. Meanwhile, my ſiſter, who had treated Mr. Lovelace with virulence, came in to me, and inſulted me as faſt as I recovered. But when Mr. Lovelace was told how ill I was, he departed; nevertheleſs vowing revenge.

He was ever a favourite with our domeſticks. His bounty to them, and having always ſomething facetious to ſay to each, had made them all of his party: and on this occaſion they privately blamed every-body elſe, and reported his calm and gentlemanly behaviour (till the provocations given him ran very high) in ſuch favourable terms, that thoſe reports, and my apprehenſions of the conſequence of this treatment, induced me to read a letter he ſent me that night; and, it being written in the moſt reſpectful terms, (offering to ſubmit the whole to my deciſion, and to govern himſelf entirely by my will) to anſwer it ſome days after.

To this unhappy neceſſity was owing our renewed correſpondence, as I may call it: yet I did not write till I had informed myſelf from Mr. Symmes's brother, that he was really inſulted into the act of drawing his ſword by my brother's repeatedly threatening (upon his excuſing himſelf out of regard to me) to brand him if he did not; and, by all the enquiry I could make, that he was again the ſufferer from my uncles in a more violent manner than I have related.

The ſame circumſtances were related to my father and other relations by Mr. Symmes; but they had gone too far in making themſelves parties to the quarrel either to retract or forgive; and I was forbidden to correſpond with him, or to be ſeen a moment in his company.

One thing, however, I can ſay, but that in confidence, becauſe my mother commanded me not to mention it: that, expreſſing her apprehenſion of the conſequences of the indignities offered to Mr. Lovelace, ſhe told me ſhe would leave it to my prudence to do all I could to prevent the impending miſchief on one ſide.

I am obliged to break off. But I believe I have written enough to anſwer very fully all that you have required of me. It is not for a child to ſeek to clear her own character, or to juſtify her actions, at the expence of the moſt revered ones: yet, as I know that the account of all thoſe farther proceedings by which I may be affected, will be intereſting to ſo dear a friend, (who will communicate to others no more than what is fitting) I will continue to write, as I have opportunity, as minutely as we are uſed to write to each other. Indeed, I have no delight, as I have often told you, equal to that which I take in converſing with you—by letter, when I cannot in perſon.

Mean time, I cannot help ſaying, that I am exceedingly concerned to find that I am become ſo much the publick talk as you tell me I am. Your kind, your precautionary, regard for my fame, and the opportunity you have given me to tell my own ſtory previous to any new accident, (which Heaven avert!) is ſo like the warm friend I have ever found in my dear Miſs Howe, that, with redoubled obligation, you bind me to be your ever-grateful and affectionate,

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER V.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

JAN. 20.

I Have been hindered from prosecuting my intention. Neither nights nor mornings have been my own. My mother has been very ill, and would have no other nurse but me. I have not stirred from her bed-side, (for she kept her bed;) and two nights I had the honour of sharing it with her.

Her disorder was a very violent colick. The contentions of these fierce, these masculine spirits, and the apprehension of mischiefs that may arise from the increasing animosity which all here have against Mr. Lovelace, and his too-well known resenting and intrepid character, she cannot bear. Then the foundations laid, as she dreads, for jealousy and heart burnings in her own family, late so happy and so united, afflict exceedingly a gentle and sensible mind, which has from the beginning, on all occasions, sacrificed it's own inward satisfaction to outward peace. My brother and sister, who used very often to jar, are now so intirely one, and are so much together, (cabalting was the word that dropped from my mother's lips, as if at unawares) that she is very fearful of the consequences that may follow. To my prejudice, perhaps, is her kind concern; since she sees that they behave to me every hour with more and more shyness and reserve: yet, would she but exert that authority which the superiority of her fine talents gives her, all these family feuds might, perhaps, be extinguished in their but yet beginnings; especially as she may be assured that all fitting concessions shall be made by me, not only as my brother and sister are my elders, but for the sake of so excellent and so indulgent a mother.

For, if I may say to you, my dear, what I would not to any other person living, it is my opinion that, had she been of a temper that would have borne less, she would have had ten times less to bear than she has had. No commendation, you you will say, of the generosity of those spirits which can turn to it's own disquiet so much condescending goodness.

Upon my word I am sometimes tempted to think that we may make the world allow for and respect us as we please, if we can but be sturdy in our wills and set out accordingly. It is but being the less beloved for it, that is all: and if we have power to oblige those we have to do with, it will not appear to us that we are. Our flatterers will tell us any thing sooner than our faults, or what they know we do not like to hear.

Were there not truth in this observation, is it possible that my brother and sister could make their very failings, their vehemences, of such importance to all the family? 'How will my son, how 'will my nephew, take this or that mea-'sure? What will he say to it? Let us 'consult him about it;' are references always previous to every resolution taken by his superiors, whose will ought to be his. Well may he expect to be treated with this deference by every other person, when my father himself, generally so absolute, constantly pays it to him; and the more since his godmother's bounty has given independence to a spirit that was before under too little restraint. But whither may these reflections lead me! I know you do not love any of us but my mother and me; and, being above all disguises, make me sensible that you do not oftener than I wish. Ought I then to add force to your dislikes of those whom I wish you to like? —of my father especially; for he, alas! has some excuse for his impatience of contradiction. He is not naturally an ill-tempered man; and in his person and air, and in his conversation too, when not under the torture of a gouty paroxysm, every-body distinguishes the gentleman born and educated.

Our sex perhaps must expect to bear a little—uncourtliness shall I call it?—from the husband whom as the lover they let know the preference their hearts gave him to all other men. Say what they will of generosity being a manly virtue; but upon my word, my dear, I have ever yet observed, that it is not to be met with in that sex one time in ten that it is to be found in ours. But my father was soured by the cruel distemper I have named; which seized him all at once in the very prime of life, in so violent a manner as to take from the most active of minds, as his was, all power of activity, and that in all appearance for life. —It imprisoned, as I may say, his lively spirits in himself, and turned the edge of them against his own peace; his extraordinary prosperity adding to his impatiency. Those, I believe, who want the fewest earthly blessings, most regret that they want any.

But my brother! what excuse can be made for his haughty and morose temper? He is really, my dear, I am sorry to have occasion to say it, an ill-tempered young man; and treats my mother sometimes—Indeed he is not dutiful.—But, possessing every thing, he has the vice of age mingled with the ambition of youth, and enjoys nothing—but his own haughtiness and ill-temper, I was going to say.—Yet again am I adding force to your dislikes of some of us.—Once, my dear, it was perhaps in your power to have moulded him as you pleased.—Could you have been my sister!—Then had I had a friend in a sister. But no wonder that he does not love you now; who could nip in the bud, and that with a disdain, let me say, too much of a kin to his haughtiness, a passion that would not have wanted a fervor worthy of the object; and which possibly would have made him worthy.

But no more of this. I will prosecute my former intention in my next; which I will sit down to as soon as breakfast is over; dispatching this by the messenger whom you have so kindly sent to enquire after us on my silence. Mean time, I am, your most affectionate and obliged friend and servant, CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER VI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

HARLOWE PLACE, JAN. 20.

I Will now resume my narrative of proceedings here. My brother being in a good way, although you may be sure that his resentments are rather heightened than abated by the galling disgrace he has received, my friends (my father and uncles, however, if not my brother and sister) begin to think that I have been treated unkindly. My mother has been so good as to tell me this since I sent away my last.

Nevertheless I believe they all think that I receive letters from Mr. Lovelace. But Lord M. being inclined rather to support than to blame his nephew, they seem to be so much afraid of Mr. Lovelace, that they do not put it to me whether I do or not; conniving on the contrary, as it should seem, at the only method left to allay the vehemence of a spirit which they have ſo much provoked: for he ſtill inſiſts upon ſatisfaction from myuncles; and this poſſibly (for he wants not art) as the beſt way to be introduced again with ſome advantage into our family. And, indeed, my aunt Hervey has put it to my mother, whether it were not beſt to prevail upon my brother to take a turn to his Yorkſhire eſtate, (which he was intending to do before) and to ſtay there till all is blown over.

But this is very far from being his intention: for he has already began to hint again that he ſhall never be eaſy or ſatisfied till I am married; and, finding neither Mr. Symmes nor Mr. Mullins will be accepted, has propoſed Mr. Wyerley once more, on the ſcore of his great paſſion for me. This I have again rejected; and but yeſterday he mentioned one who has applied to him by letter, making high offers. This is Mr. Solmes; Rich Solmes you know they call him. But this application has not met with the attention of one ſingle ſoul.

If none of his ſchemes of getting me married take effect, he has thoughts, I am told, of propoſing to me to go to Scotland, that, as the compliment is, I may put his houſe there in ſuch order as our own is in. But this my mother intends to oppoſe for her own ſake; becauſe, having relieved her, as ſhe is pleaſed to ſay, of the houſhold cares, (for which my ſiſter, you know, has no turn) they muſt again devolve upon her if I go. And if ſhe did not oppoſe it, I ſhould; for, believe me, I have no mind to be his houſekeeper; and I am ſure, were I to go with him, I ſhould be treated rather as a ſervant, than a ſiſter —perhaps, not the better becauſe I am his ſiſter. And if Mr. Lovelace ſhould follow me, things might be worſe than they are now.

But I have beſought my mother, who is apprehenſive of Mr. Lovelace's viſits, and for fear of whom my uncles never ſtir out without arms and armed ſervants, (my brother alſo being near well enough to go abroad) to procure me permiſſion to be your gueſt for a fortnight or ſo.—Will your mother, think you, my dear, give me leave?

I dare not aſk to go to my Dairy Houſe, as my good grandfather would call it; for I am now afraid of being thought to have a wiſh to enjoy that independence to which his will has intitled me: and as matters are ſituated, ſuch a wiſh would be imputed to my regard to the man to whom they have now ſo great an antipathy. And, indeed, could I be as eaſy and happy here as I uſed to be, I would defy that man and all his ſex; and never repent that I have given the power of my fortune into my father's hands.

JUST now, my mother has rejoiced me with the news that my requeſted permiſſion is granted. Every one thinks it beſt that I ſhould go to you, except my brother. But he was told, that he muſt not expect to rule in every thing. I am to be ſent for into the great parlour, where are my two uncles and my aunt Hervey, and to be acquainted with this conceſſion in form.

You know, my dear, that there is a good deal of ſolemnity among us. But never was there a family more united in it's different branches than ours. Our uncles conſider us as their own children, and declare, that it is for our ſakes they live ſingle. So that they are adviſed with upon every article relating to us, or that may affect us. It is therefore the leſs wonder, at a time when they underſtand that Mr. Lovelace is determined to pay us an amicable viſit, as he calls it, (but which I am ſure cannot end amicably) that they ſhould both be conſulted upon the permiſſion I had deſired to attend you.

I WILL acquaint you with what paſſed at the general leave given me to be your gueſt. And yet I know that you will not love my brother the better for my communication. But I am angry with him myſelf, and cannot help it. And beſides, it is proper to let you know the terms I go upon, and their motives for permitting me to go.

'Clary,' ſaid my mother, as ſoon as I entered the great parlour, 'your re-
'queſt to go to Miſs Howe's for a few 'days has been taken into conſideration,
'and granted—'

'Much againſt my liking. I aſſure
'you,' ſaid my brother, rudely interrupting her.

'Son James!' ſaid my father, and knit his brows.

He was not daunted. His arm is in a ſling. He often has the mean art to look upon that, when any thing is hinted that may be ſuppoſed to lead towards the leaſt favour to or reconciliation with Mr. Lovelace.—'Let the girl, then,' [I am often the girl with him] 'be pro'hibited ſeeing that vile libertine.'

Nobody ſpoke.

'Do you hear, ſiſter Clary?' taking their ſilence for approbation of what he had dictated; 'you are not to receive
'viſits from Lord M.'s nephew.'

Every one ſtill remained ſilent.

'Do

'Do you so understand the licence 'you have, Miss?' interrogated he.

'I would be glad, Sir,' said I, 'to 'understand that you are my brother— 'and that you would understand that 'you are only my brother.'

'O the fond, fond heart!' with a sneer of insult, lifting up his hands.

'Sir,' said I to my father, 'to your 'justice I appeal: if I have deserved 'reflection, let me not be spared. But 'if I am to be answerable for the rash- 'ness—'

'No more!—No more of either side,' said my father. 'You are not to receive 'the visits of that Lovelace, though— 'Nor are you, Jon James, to reflect up- 'on your sister. She is a worthy child.'

'Sir, I have done' replied he—'and 'yet I have her honour at heart, as 'much as the honour of the rest of the 'family.'

'And hence, Sir,' retorted I, 'your 'unbrotherly reflections upon me?'

'Well, but you observe, Miss,' said he, 'that it is not I, but your father, 'that tells you, that you are not to re- 'ceive the visits of that Lovelace.'

'Cousin Harlowe,' said my aunt Hervey, 'allow me to say, that my cousin 'Clary's prudence may be confided in.'

'I am convinced it may,' joined my mother.

'But, aunt—but, Madam,' (put in my sister)—'there is no hurt, I presume, 'in letting my sister know the condition 'she goes to Miss Howe upon; since, if 'he gets a knack of visiting her there—'

'You may be sure,' interrupted my uncle Harlowe, 'he will endeavour to 'see her there.'

'So would such an impudent man 'here,' said my uncle Antony: 'and 'tis better there than here.'

'Better no where,' said my father.— 'I command you,' (turning to me) on 'pain of displeasure, that you see him 'not at all.'

'I will not, Sir, in any way of encou- 'ragement, I do assure you: nor at all 'if I can properly avoid it.'

'You know with what indifference,' said my mother, 'she has hitherto seen 'him.—Her prudence may be trusted to, 'as my sister Hervey says.'

'With what appa—rent indifference!' drolled my brother.

'Son James!' said my father sternly.

'I have done, Sir,' said he. But again, in a provoking manner, he reminded me of the prohibition.

Thus ended this conference.

Will you engage, my dear, that the hated man shall not come near your house?—But what an inconsistence is this, when they consent to my going, thinking his visits here no otherwise to be avoided!—But if he does come, I charge you never leave us alone together.

As I have no reason to doubt a welcome from your good mother, I will put every thing in order here, and be with you in two or three days.

Mean time, I am your most affectionate and obliged, CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER VII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

[AFTER HER RETURN FROM HER.]

HARLOWE-PLACE, FEB. 20.

I Beg your excuse for not writing sooner. Alas, my dear, I have sad prospects before me! My brother and sister have succeeded in all their views. They have found out another lover for me; an hideous one!—Yet he is encouraged by every-body. No wonder that I was ordered home so suddenly. At an hour's warning!—No other notice, you know, than what was brought with the chariot that was to carry me back.—It was for fear, as I have been informed, [an unworthy fear!] that I should have entered into any concert with Mr. Lovelace had I known their motive for commanding me home; apprehending, it is evident, that I should dislike the man they had to propose to me.

And well might they apprehend so: for who do you think he is?—No other than that Solmes!——Could you have believed it?—And they are all determined too: my mother with the rest!—Dear, dear excellence! how could she be thus brought over, when I am assured, that on his first being proposed she was pleased to say, that had Mr. Solmes the Indies in possession, and would endow me with them, she should not think him deserving of her Clarissa!

The reception I met with at my return, so different from what I used to meet with on every little absence, [and now I had been from them three weeks] convinced me that I was to suffer for the happiness I had had in your company and conversation for that most agreeable period. I will give you an account of it.

My brother met me at the door, and gave me his hand when I stepped out of the chariot. He bowed very low; 'Pray, 'Miss, favour me.'—I thought it in good-humour; but found it afterwards mock-respect: and so he led me in great form, I prattling all the way, enquiring of every body's health. (although I was so soon to see them, and there was hardly time for answers) into the great parlour; where were my father, mother, my two uncles, and sister.

I was struck all of a heap as soon as I entered, to see a solemnity which I had been so little used to on the like occasions in the countenance of every dear relation. They all kept their seats. I ran to my father, and kneeled; then to my mother; and met from both a cold salute; from my father a blessing but half pronounced; my mother, indeed, called me child, but embraced me not with her usual indulgent ardor.

After I had paid my duty to my uncles, and my compliments to my sister, which she received with solemn and stiff form, I was bid to sit down. But my heart was full: and I said it became me to stand, if I could stand, upon a reception so awful and unusual. I was forced to turn my face from them, and pull out my handkerchief.

My unbrotherly accuser hereupon flood forth, and charged me with having received no less than five or six visits at Miss Howe's from the man they had all so much reason to hate; [that was the expression] notwithstanding the commands I had had to the contrary. And he bid me deny it if I could.

I had never been used, I said, to deny the truth, nor would I now. I owned I had in the three weeks past seen the person I presumed he meant oftener than five or six times. [' Pray hear me, bro-' ther,' said I; for he was going to flame out.] ' But he always asked for ' Mrs. or Miss Howe, when he came.'

I proceeded, That I had reason to believe, that both Mrs. Howe and Miss, as matters stood, would much rather have excused his visits; but they had more than once apologized, That having not the same reason my papa had to forbid him their house, his rank and fortune entitled him to civility.

You see, my dear, I made not the pleas I might have made.

My brother seemed ready to give a loose to his passion: my father put on the countenance which always portends a gatherings storm; my uncles mutteringly whispered; and my sister aggravatingly held up her hands. While I begged to be heard out;—and my mother said, ' Let the child,' that was her kind word, ' be heard.'

I hoped, I said, there was no harm done; that it became not me to prescribe to Mrs. or Miss Howe who should be their visiters; that Mrs. Howe was always diverted with the raillery that passed between Miss and him; that I had no reason to challenge her guest for my visiter, as I should seem to have done had I refused to go into their company when he was with them; that I had never seen him out of the presence of one or both of those ladies; and had signified to him once, on his urging for a few moments private conversation with me, that unless a reconciliation were effected between my family and his, he must not expect that I would countenance his visits, much less give him an opportunity of that sort.

I told them further, That Miss Howe so well understood my mind, that she never left me a moment while Mr. Lovelace was there: that when he came, if I was not below in the parlour, I would not suffer myself to be called to him; although I thought it would be an affectation which would give him advantage rather than the contrary, if I had left company when he came in; or refused to enter into it when I found he would stay any time.

My brother heard me out with such a kind of impatience as shewed he was resolved to be dissatisfied with me, say what I would. The rest, as the event has proved, behaved as if they would have been satisfied, had they not farther points to carry by intimidating me. All this made it evident, as I mentioned above, that they themselves expected not my voluntary compliance; and was a tacit confession of the disagreeableness of the person they had to propose.

I was no sooner silent than my brother swore, although in my father's presence, (swore, unchecked either by eye or countenance) That for his part, he would never be reconciled to that libertine: and that he would renounce me for a sister, if I encouraged the addresses of a man so obnoxious to them all.

A man who had like to have been my brother's murderer, my sister said, with a face even bursting with restraint of passion.

The poor Bella has, you know, a plump high-fed face, if I may be allowed the expression. You, I know, will forgive me for this liberty of speech sooner than I can forgive myself: yet how can one be such a reptile as not to turn when trampled upon!

My father, with vehemence both of action and voice, [my father has, you know, a terrible voice when he is angry!] told me that I had met with too much indulindulgence in being allowed to refuse this gentleman, and the other gentleman; and it was now his turn to be obeyed.

Very true, my mother said:—and hoped his will would not now be disputed by a child so favoured.

To shew they were all of a sentiment, my uncle Harlowe said, he hoped his beloved niece only wanted to know her father's will, to obey it.

And my uncle Antony, in his rougher manner, added, That surely I would not give them reason to apprehend, that I thought my grandfather's favour to me had made me independent of them all. —If I did, he would tell me, the will could be set aside, and should.

I was astonished, you must needs think. —'Whose addresses now,' thought I, 'is this treatment preparative to?— 'Mr. Wyerley's again?—or whose?' And then, as high comparisons, where self is concerned, sooner than low, come into young people's heads; be it for whom it will, this is wooing as the English did for the heiress of Scotland in the time of Edward the Sixth. But that it could be for Solmes, how should it enter into my head?

I did not know, I said, that I had given occasion for this harshness. I hoped I should always have a just sense of every one's favour to me, superadded to the duty I owed as a daughter and a niece: but that I was so much surprized at a reception so unusual and unexpected, that I hoped my papa and mamma would give me leave to retire, in order to recollect myself.

No one gainsaying, I made my silent compliments, and withdrew—leaving my brother and sister, as I thought, pleased; and as if they wanted to congratulate each other on having occasioned so severe a beginning to be made with me.

I went up to my chamber, and there with my faithful Hannah deplored the determined face which the new proposal it was plain they had to make me wore.

I had not recovered myself when I was sent for down to tea. I begged by my maid to be excused attending: but on the repeated command, went down with as much cheerfulness as I could assume; and had a new fault to clear myself of: for my brother, so pregnant a thing is determined ill-will, by intimations equally rude and intelligible, charged my desire of being excused coming down, to sullens, because a certain person had been spoken against, upon whom, as he supposed, my fancy ran.

'I could easily answer you, Sir,' said I, 'as such a reflection deserves: but 'I forbear. If I do not find a brother 'in you, you shall have a sister in me.'

'Pretty meekness!' Bella whisperingly said; looking at my brother, and lifting up her lip in contempt.

He, with an imperious air, bid me deserve his love, and I should be sure to have it.

As we sat, my mother, in her admirable manner, expatiated upon brotherly and sisterly love; indulgently blamed my brother and sister for having taken up displeasure too lightly against me; and politically, if I may so say, answered for my obedience to my father's will. —Then it would be all well, my father was pleased to say: Then they should doat upon me, was my brother's expression: Love me as well as ever, was my sister's; and my uncles, That I then should be the pride of their hearts.—But, alas! what a forfeiture of all these must I make!

This was the reception I had on my return from you.

Mr. Solmes came in before we had done tea. My uncle Antony presented him to me, as a gentleman he had a particular friendship for. My uncle Harlowe in terms equally favourable for him. My father said, 'Mr. Solmes is my friend. Clarissa Harlowe.' My mother looked at him, and looked at me, now-and-then, as he sat near me, I thought with concern.—I at her, with eyes appealing for pity. At him, when I could glance at him, with disgust little short of affrightment. While my brother and sister Mr. Solmes'd him, and Sir'd him up, at every word. So caressed, in short, by all—yet such a wretch!—But I will at present only add, My humble thanks and duty to your honoured mother; (to whom I will particularly write, to express the grateful sense I have of her goodness to me) and that I am your ever obliged

CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER VIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

FEB. 24.

THEY drive on here at a furious rate. The man lives here, I think. He courts them, and is more and more a favourite. 'Such terms! such settle- 'ments!' That's the cry.

O my dear, that I had not reason to deplore the family-fault, immensely rich as they all are! But this I may the more unreservedly say to you, as we have joined in the same concern: I, for a father and uncles; you, for a mother; in every other reſpect faultleſs.

Hitherto, I ſeem to be delivered over to my brother, who pretends as great love to me as ever.

You may believe, I have been very ſincere with him. But he affects to rally me, and not to believe it poſſible, that one ſo dutiful and ſo diſcreet as his ſiſter Clary can reſolve to diſoblige all her friends.

Indeed, I tremble at the proſpect before me; for it is evident that they are ſtrangely determined.

My father and mother induſtriouſly avoid giving me opportunity of ſpeaking to them alone. They aſk not for my approbation, intending, as it ſhould ſeem, to ſuppoſe me into their will. And with them I ſhall hope to prevail, or with nobody. They have not the intereſt in compelling me, as my brother and ſiſter have: I ſay leſs therefore to them, reſerving my whole force for an audience of my father, if he will permit me a patient ear. How difficult is it, my dear, to give a negative where both duty and inclination join to make one wiſh to oblige!

I have already ſtood the ſhock of three of this man's particular viſits, beſides my ſhare in his more general ones; and it is impoſſible I ſhould ever endure him. He has but a very ordinary ſhare of underſtanding; is very illiterate; knows nothing but the value of eſtates, and how to improve them, and what belongs to land-jobbing and huſbandry. Yet am I as one ſtupid, I think. They have begun ſo cruelly with me, that I have not ſpirit enough to aſſert my own negative.

They had endeavoured it ſeems to influence my good Mrs. Norton before I came home—ſo intent are they to carry their point! And her opinion not being to their liking, ſhe has been told that ſhe would do well to decline viſiting here for the preſent: yet ſhe is the perſon of all the world, next to my mother, the moſt likely to prevail upon me, were the meaſures they are engaged in reaſonable meaſures, or ſuch as ſhe could think ſo.

My aunt likewiſe, having ſaid that ſhe did not think her niece could ever be brought to like Mr. Solmes, has been obliged to learn another leſſon.

I am to have a viſit from her to-morrow. And, ſince I have refuſed ſo much as to hear from my brother and ſiſter what the noble ſettlements are to be, ſhe is to acquaint me with the particulars; and to receive from me my determination: for my father, I am told, will not have patience but to ſuppoſe that I ſhall ſtand in oppoſition to his will.

Mean time, it has been ſignified to me, that it will be acceptable if I do not think of going to church next Sunday.

The ſame ſignification was made me for laſt Sunday; and I obeyed. They are apprehenſive that Mr. Lovelace will be there with deſign to come home with me.

Help me, dear Miſs Howe, to a little of your charming ſpirit: I never more wanted it.

The man, this Solmes, you may ſuppoſe, has no reaſon to boaſt of his progreſs with me. He has not the ſenſe to ſay any thing to the purpoſe. His courtſhip indeed is to them; and my brother pretends to court me as his proxy, truly! —I utterly to my brother reject his addreſs; but thinking a perſon ſo well received and recommended by all my family, entitled to good manners, all I ſay againſt him is affectedly attributed to coynets: and he, not being ſenſible of his own imperfections, believes that my avoiding him when I can, and the reſerves I expreſs, are owing to nothing elſe: for, as I ſaid, all his courtſhip is to them; and I have no opportunity of ſaying, 'No!' to one who aſks me not the queſtion. And ſo, with an air of manniſh ſuperiority, he ſeems rather to pity the baſhful girl, than to apprehend that he ſhall not ſucceed.

I HAVE had the expected conference with my aunt.

I have been obliged to hear the man's propoſals from her; and have been alſo told what their motives are for eſpouſing his intereſt with ſo much warmth. I am even loth to mention how equally unjuſt it is for him to make ſuch offers, or for thoſe I am bound to reverence to accept of them. I hate him more than before. One great eſtate is already obtained at the expence of the relations to it, though diſtant relations; my brother's, I mean, by his godmother: and this has given the hope, however chimerical that hope, of procuring others, and that my own at leaſt may revert to the family. And yet, in my opinion, the world is but one great family. Originally it was ſo. What, then, is this narrow ſelfiſhneſs that reigns in us, but relationſhip remembered againſt relationſhip f~~orgot~~?

But here, upon my abſolute refuſal of him upon any terms, have I had a ſignification made me that wounds me to the heart. How can I tell it you? Yet

Yet I muſt. It is my dear, that I muſt not for a month to come, or till licence obtained, correſpond with any-body out of the houſe.

My brother, upon my aunt's report, (made, however, as I am informed, in the gentleſt manner, and even giving remote hopes, which ſhe had no commiſſion from me to give) brought me, in authoritative terms, the prohibition.

'Not to Miſs Howe?' ſaid I.

'No, not to Miſs Howe, Madam,' tauntingly: 'for have you not acknow-'ledged that Lovelace is a favourite 'there?'

See, my dear Miſs Howe!—

'And do you think, brother, this is 'the way—'

'Do you look to that.—But your let-'ters will be ſtopped, I can tell you.' —And away he flung.

My ſiſter came to me ſoon after.—'Siſter Clary, you are going on in a 'fine way, I underſtand. But as there 'are people who are ſuppoſed to harden 'you againſt your duty, I am to tell 'you, that it will be taken well if you 'avoid viſits or viſiting for a week or 'two till farther order.'

'Can this be from thoſe who have 'authority—'

'Aſk them; aſk them, child!' with a twirl of her finger.—'I have delivered 'my meſſage. Your father will be 'obeyed. He is willing to hope you 'to be all obedience, and would pre-'vent all incitements to refractorineſs.'

'I know my duty,' ſaid I; 'and hope 'I ſhall not find impoſſible conditions 'annexed to it.'

A pert young creature, vain and conceited, ſhe called me. I was the only judge, in my own wiſe opinion, of what was right and fit. She, for her part, had long ſeen into my ſpecious ways: and now I ſhould ſhew every-body what I was at bottom.

'Dear Bella!' ſaid I, hands and eyes lifted up, 'why all this?—Dear, 'dear Bella, why—'

'None of your dear, dear Bella's to 'me.—I tell you, I ſee through your 'witchcrafts,' [That was her ſtrange word.] And away ſhe flung; adding, as ſhe went, 'And ſo will every-body 'elſe very quickly, I dare ſay.'

'Bleſs me,' ſaid I to myſelf, 'what a 'ſiſter have I! How have I deſerved this?'

Then I again regretted my grandfather's too diſtinguiſhing goodneſs to me.

FEB. 25. IN THE EVENING.

WHAT my brother and ſiſter have ſaid againſt me I cannot tell: but I am in heavy diſgrace with my father.

I was ſent for down to tea. I went with a very cheerful aſpect: but had occaſion ſoon to change it.

Such a ſolemnity in every-body's countenance!—My mother's eyes were fixed upon the tea-cups; and when ſhe looked up, it was heavily, as if her eyelids had weights upon them; and then not to me. My father ſat half-aſide in his elbow-chair, that his head might be turned from me; his hands claſped, and waving, as it were, up and down; his fingers, poor dear gentleman! in motion, as if angry to the very ends of them. My ſiſter ſat ſwelling. My brother looked at me with ſcorn, having meaſured me, as I may ſay, with his eyes as I entered, from head to foot. My aunt was there, and looked upon me as if with kindneſs reſtrained, bending coldly to my compliment to her as ſhe ſat; and then caſt an eye firſt on my brother, then on my ſiſter, as if to give the reaſon [ſo I am willing to conſtrue it] of her unuſual ſtiffneſs.—Bleſs me, my dear! that they ſhould chuſe to intimidate rather than invite a mind, till now, not thought either unperſuadable or ungenerous!

I took my ſeat. 'Shall I make tea, 'Madam?' to my mother.—I always uſed, you know, my dear, to make tea.

'No!' a very ſhort ſentence, in one very ſhort word, was the expreſſive anſwer. And ſhe was pleaſed to take the canniſter in her own hand.

My brother bid the footman who attended, leave the room; 'I,' ſaid he, 'will pour out the water.'

My heart was up at my mouth. I did not know what to do with myſelf. 'What is to follow?' thought I.

Juſt after the ſecond diſh, out ſtepped my mother.—'A word with you, ſiſter 'Hervey!' taking her in her hand. Preſently my ſiſter dropped away. Then my brother. So I was left alone with my father.

He looked ſo very ſternly, that my heart failed me, as twice or thrice I would have addreſſed myſelf to him: nothing but ſolemn ſilence on all hands having paſſed before.

At laſt, I aſked, If it were his pleaſure that I ſhould pour him out another diſh.

He anſwered me with the ſame angry monoſyllable which I had received from my mother before; and then aroſe, and walked about the room. I aroſe too, with intent to throw myſelf at his feet; but but was too much over-awed by his ſternneſs, even to make ſuch an expreſſion of my duty to him as my heart overflowed with.

At laſt, as he ſupported himſelf, becauſe of his gout, on the back of a chair, I took a little more courage; and approaching him, beſought him to acquaint me in what I had offended him.

He turned from me, and in a ſtrong voice, 'Clariſſa Harlowe,' ſaid he, 'know that I will be obeyed.'

'God forbid, Sir, that you ſhould 'not!—I have never yet oppoſed your 'will—'

'Nor I your whimſies, Clariſſa Har'lowe,' interrupted he.—'Don't let me 'run the fate of all who ſhew indul'gence to your ſex; to be the more 'contradicted for mine to you.'

My father, you know, my dear, has not (any more than my brother) a kind opinion of our ſex; although there is not a more condeſcending wife in the world than my mother.

I was going to make proteſtations of duty—'No proteſtations, girl! No 'words! I will not be prated to! I will 'be obeyed! I have no child, I will have 'no child, but an obedient one.'

'Sir, you never had reaſon, I hope—'

'Tell me not what I never had, but 'what I have, and what I ſhall have.'

'Good Sir, be pleaſed to hear me—'my brother and my ſiſter, I fear—'

'Your brother and ſiſter ſhall not be 'ſpoken againſt, girl!—They have a 'juſt concern for the honour of my fa'mily.'

'And I hope, Sir—'

'Hope nothing.—Tell me not of 'hopes, but of facts. I aſk nothing of 'you but what is in your power to com'ply with, and what it is your duty to 'comply with.'

'Then, Sir, I will comply with it—'but yet I hope from your goodneſs—'

'No expoſtulations! No but's, girl! 'No qualifyings! I will be obeyed, I 'tell you; and cheerfully too!—or you 'are no child of mine!'

I wept.

'Let me beſeech you, my dear and 'ever-honoured papa,' (and I dropped down on my knees) 'that I may have 'only yours and my mamma's will, and 'not my brother's, to obey.'

I was going on; but he was pleaſed to withdraw, leaving me on the floor; ſaying, That he would not hear me thus by ſubtilty and cunning aiming to diſtinguiſh away my duty; repeating, that he would be obeyed.

My heart is too full—ſo full, that it may endanger my duty, were I to try to unburden it to you on this occaſion: ſo I will lay down my pen—but can—Yet, poſitively, I will lay down my pen!—

LETTER IX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

FEB. 26. IN THE MORNING.

MY aunt, who ſtaid here laſt night, made me a viſit this morning as ſoon as it was light. She tells me, that I was left alone with my father yeſterday on purpoſe that he might talk with me on my expected obedience; but that he owned he was put beſide his purpoſe by reflecting on ſomething my brother had told him in my diſfavour, and by his impatience but to ſuppoſe, that ſuch a gentle ſpirit as mine had hitherto ſeemed to be, ſhould preſume to diſpute his will in a point where the advantage of the whole family was to be ſo greatly promoted by my compliance.

I find, by a few words which dropped unawares from my aunt, that they have all an abſolute dependence upon what they ſuppoſe to be meekneſs in my temper. But in this they may be miſtaken; for I verily think, upon a ſtrict examination of myſelf, that I have almoſt as much in me of my father's as of my mother's family.

My uncle Harlowe, it ſeems, is againſt driving me upon extremities; but my brother has engaged, that the regard I have for my reputation, and my principles, will bring me round to my duty—that's the expreſſion. Perhaps I ſhall have reaſon to wiſh I had not known this.

My aunt adviſes me to ſubmit, for the preſent, to the interdicts they have laid me under; and, indeed, to encourage Mr. Solmes's addreſs. I have abſolutely refuſed the latter let what will (as I have told her) be the conſequence. The viſiting-prohibition I will conform to: but as to that of not correſponding with you, nothing but the menace that our letters ſhall be intercepted can engage my obſervation of it.

She believes that this order is from my father, and that my mother has not been conſulted upon it: ſhe ſays that it is given, as ſhe has reaſon to think, purely in conſideration to me, leſt I ſhould mortally offend him; and this from the incitements of other people, (meaning you and Miſs Lloyd, I make no doubt) rather than by my own will.

For

For ſtill, as ſhe tells me, he ſpeaks kind and praiſeful things of me.

Here is clemency!—here is indulgence! And ſo it is to prevent a headſtrong child, as a good prince would wiſh to deter diſaffected ſubjects, from running into rebellion, and ſo forfeiting every thing! But this is all owing to the young man's wiſdom of my brother—a plotter without a head, and a brother without a heart!

How happy might I have been with any other brother in the world but James Harlowe; and with any other ſiſter but his ſiſter! Wonder not, my dear, that I who uſed to chide you for theſe ſort of liberties with my relations, now am more undutiful than you ever was unkind. I cannot bear the thought of being deprived of the principal pleaſure of my life; for ſuch is your converſation by perſon and by letter. And who, beſides, can bear to be made the dupe of ſuch low cunning, operating with ſuch high and arrogant paſſions?

But can you, my dear Miſs Howe, condeſcend to carry on a private correſpondence with me?—If you can, there is one way I have thought of by which it may be done.

You muſt remember the Green Lane, as we call it, that runs by the ſide of the wood-houſe and poultry-yard where I keep my bantams, pheaſants, and pea-hens, which generally engage my notice twice a day; the more my favourites becauſe they were my grandfather's, and recommended to my care by him; and therefore brought hither from my dairy-houſe ſince his death.

The lane is lower than the floor of the wood-houſe; and in the ſide of the wood-houſe the boards are rotted away down to the floor for half an ell together in ſeveral places. Hannah can ſtep into the lane, and make a mark with chalk where a letter or parcel may be puſhed in under ſome ſticks; which may be ſo managed as to be an unſuſpected cover for the written depoſits from either.

I HAVE been juſt now to look at the place, and find it will anſwer: ſo your faithful Robert may, without coming near the houſe, and as only paſſing through the Green Lane, which leads to two or three farm-houſes, [out of livery if you pleaſe] very eaſily take from thence my letters, and depoſit yours.

This place is the more convenient, becauſe it is ſeldom reſorted to but by myſelf or Hannah, on the above-mentioned account; for it is the general ſtorehouſe for firing; the wood for conſtant uſe being nearer the houſe.

One corner of this being ſeparated off for the rooſting-place of my little poultry, either ſhe or I ſhall never want a pretence to go thither.

Try, my dear, the ſucceſs of a letter this way; and give me your opinion and advice what to do in this diſgraceful ſituation, as I cannot but call it; and what you think of my proſpects, and what you would do in my caſe.

But, before-hand, I will tell you that your advice muſt not run in favour of this Solmes: and yet, it is very likely, they will endeavour to engage your mother, in order to induce you, who have ſuch an influence over me, to favour him.

Yet, on ſecond thoughts, if you incline to that ſide of the queſtion, I would have you write your whole mind. Determined as I think I am, and cannot help it, I would at leaſt give a patient hearing to what may be ſaid on the other ſide. For my regards are not ſo much engaged [upon my word they are not; I know not myſelf if they be] to another perſon as ſome of my friends ſuppoſe; and as you, giving way to your lively vein, upon his laſt viſits, affected to ſuppoſe. What preferable favour I may have for him to any other perſon, is owing more to the uſage he has received, and for my ſake borne, than to any perſonal conſideration.

I write a few lines of grateful acknowledgment to your good mother for her favours to me in the late happy period. I fear I ſhall never know ſuch another. I hope ſhe will forgive me that I did not write ſooner.

The bearer, if ſuſpected and examined, is to produce that as the only one he carries.

How do needleſs watchfulneſs and undue reſtraint produce artifice and contrivance! I ſhould abhor theſe clandeſtine correſpondences, were they not forced upon me. They have ſo mean, ſo low an appearance to myſelf, that I think I ought not to expect that you ſhould take part in them.

But why (as I have alſo expoſtulated with my aunt) muſt I be puſhed into a ſtate which I have no wiſh to enter into, although I reverence it? Why ſhould not my brother, ſo many years older, and ſo earneſt to ſee me engaged, be firſt engaged? And why ſhould not my ſiſter be firſt provided for?

But here I conclude theſe unavailing expoſtulations, with the aſſurance that I am, and ever will be, your affectionate

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER X.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

FEB. 27.

WHAT odd heads ſome people have!—Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe to be ſacrificed in marriage to Mr. Roger Solmes!—Aſtoniſhing!

I muſt not, you ſay, give my advice in favour of this man!—You now convince me, my dear, that you are nearer of kin than I thought you to the family that could think of ſo prepoſterous a match, or you would never have had the leaſt notion of my adviſing in his favour.

Aſk for his picture. You know I have a good hand at drawing an ugly likeneſs. But I'll ſee a little further firſt; for who knows what may happen, ſince matters are in ſuch a train, and ſince you have not the courage to oppoſe ſo overwhelming a torrent?

You aſk me to help you to a little of my ſpirit.—Are you in earneſt? But it will not now I doubt do you ſervice—it will not ſit naturally upon you. You are your mother's girl, think what you will; and have violent ſpirits to contend with. Alas! my dear, you ſhould have borrowed ſome of mine a little ſooner—that is to ſay, before you had given the management of your eſtate into the hands of thoſe who think they have a prior claim to it. What though a father's!—Has not that father two elder children? And do they not both bear more of his ſtamp and image than you do?—Pray, my dear, call me not to account for this free queſtion; leſt your application of my meaning, on examination, prove to be as ſevere as that.

Now I have launched out a little, indulge me one word more in the ſame ſtrain—I will be decent, I promiſe you. I think you might have known that AVARICE and ENVY are two paſſions that are not to be ſatisfied; the one by giving, the other by the envied perſon's continuing to deſerve and excel.—Fuel, fuel both, all the world over, to flames inſatiate and devouring.

But ſince you aſk for my opinion, you muſt tell me all you know or ſurmiſe of their inducements. And if you will not forbid me to make extracts from your letters for the entertainment of my aunt and couſin in the little iſland, who long to hear more of your affairs, it will be very obliging.

But you are ſo tender of ſome people who have no tenderneſs for any-body but themſelves, that I muſt conjure you to ſpeak out. Remember, that a friendſhip like ours admits of no reſerves. You may truſt my impartiality. It would be an affront to your own judgment, if you did not: for do you not aſk my advice? And have you not taught me that friendſhip ſhould never give a bias againſt juſtice?—Juſtify them, therefore, if you can. Let us ſee if there be any ſenſe, whether ſufficient reaſon or not, in their choice. At preſent I cannot (and yet I know a good deal of your family) have any conception how all of them, your mother and your aunt Hervey in particular, can join with the reſt againſt judgments given. As to ſome of the others, I cannot wonder at any thing they do, or attempt to do, where ſelf is concerned.

You aſk, why may not your brother be firſt engaged in wedlock? I'll tell you why: his temper and his arrogance are too well known to induce women he would aſpire to, to receive his addreſſes, notwithſtanding his great independent acquiſitions, and ſtill greater proſpects. Let me tell you, my dear, thoſe acquiſitions have given him more pride than reputation. To me he is the moſt intolerable creature that I ever converſed with. The treatment you blame, he merited from one whom he addreſſed with the air of a perſon who preſumes that he is about to confer a favour, rather than to receive one. I ever loved to mortify proud and inſolent ſpirits. What, think you, makes me bear Hickman near me, but that the man is humble, and knows and keeps his diſtance?

As to your queſtion, Why your elder ſiſter may not be firſt provided for? I anſwer, Becauſe ſhe muſt have no man, but one who has a great and clear eſtate; that's one thing. Another is, Becauſe ſhe has a younger ſiſter. Pray, my dear, be ſo good as to tell me, What man of a great and clear eſtate would think of that elder ſiſter, while the younger were ſingle?

You are all too rich to be happy, child. For muſt not each of you, by the conſtitutions of your family, marry to be ſtill richer? People who know in what their main excellence conſiſts, are not to be blamed (are they?) for cultivating and improving what they think moſt valuable?—Is true happineſs any part of your family view?—So far from it, that none of your family but yourſelf could be happy were they not rich. So let them them fret on, grumble and grudge, and accumulate; and wondering what ails them that they have not happineſs when they have riches, think the cauſe is want of more; and ſo go on heaping up, till Death, as greedy an accumulator as themſelves, gathers them into his garner.

Well, then, once more I ſay, do you, my dear, tell me what you know of their avowed and general motives; and I will tell you more than you will tell me of their ſeelings! Your aunt Hervey, you ſay, has told you: Why muſt I aſk you to let me know them, when you condeſcend to aſk my advice on the occaſion?

That they prohibit your correſpondence with me, is a wiſdom I neither wonder at, nor blame them for; ſince it is an evidence to me that they know their own folly: and if they do, is it ſtrange that they ſhould be afraid to truſt another's judgment upon it?

I am glad you have found out a way to correſpond with me. I approve it much. I ſhall more, if this firſt trial of it prove ſucceſsful. But ſhould it not, and ſhould it fall into their hands, it would not concern me but for your ſake.

We have heard before you wrote, that all was not right between your relations and you at your coming home: that Mr. Solmes viſited you, and that with a proſpect of ſucceſs. But I concluded the miſtake lay in the perſon; and that his addreſs was to Miſs Arabella. And had ſhe been as good-natured as your plump ones generally are, I ſhould have thought her too good for him. 'This 'muſt certainly be the thing,' thought I; 'and my beloved friend is ſent for 'to adviſe and aſſiſt in her nuptial pre-'parations. Who knows,' ſaid I to my mother, 'but that when the man has 'thrown aſide his yellow full-buckled 'peruke, and his broad-brimmed bea-'ver,' (both of which, I ſuppoſe, were Sir Oliver's beſt of long ſtanding) 'he 'may cut a tolerable figure dangling to 'church with Miſs Bell!'—The woman, as ſhe obſerves, ſhould excel the man in features: and where can ſhe match ſo well for a foil?

I indulged this ſurmize againſt rumour, becauſe I could not believe that the abſurdeſt people in England could be ſo very abſurd as to think of this man for you.

We heard, moreover, that you received no viſiters. I could aſſign no reaſon for this; except that the preparations for your ſiſter were to be private, and the ceremony ſudden, for fear this man ſhould, as another man did, change his mind. Miſs Lloyd and Miſs Biddulph were with me to enquire what I knew of this; and of your not being at church, either morning or afternoon, the Sunday after your return from us; to the diſappointment of a little hundred of your admirers, to uſe their words. It was eaſy for me to gueſs the reaſon to be what you confirm—Their apprehenſions that Lovelace would be there, and attempt to wait on you home.

My mother takes very kindly your compliments in your letter to her. Her words upon relating it were; 'Miſs Cla-'riſſa Harlowe is an admirable young 'lady: wherever ſhe goes, ſhe confers 'a favour; whomever ſhe leaves, ſhe 'fills with regret.'—And then a little comparative reflection; 'O my Nancy, 'that you had a little of her ſweet oblig-'ingneſs!'

No matter. The praiſe was yours. You are me; and I enjoyed it. The more enjoyed it, becauſe—Shall I tell you the truth?—Becauſe I think myſelf as well as I am—Were it but for this reaſon; That had I twenty brother James's, and twenty ſiſter Bell's, not one of them, nor all of them joined together, would dare to treat me as your's preſume to treat you. The perſon who will bear much ſhall have much to bear, all the world through: it is your own ſentiment, grounded upon the ſtrongeſt inſtance that can be given in your own family; though you have ſo little improved by it.

The reſult is this, That I am fitter for this world than you: you for the next than me—that's the difference.—But long, long, for my ſake, and for hundreds of ſakes, may it be before you quit us for company more congenial to you, and more worthy of you!

I communicated to my mother the account you give of your ſtrange reception; alſo what a horrid wretch they have found out for you; and the compulſory treatment they give you. It only ſet her on magnifying her lenity to me on my tyrannical behaviour, as the will call it, [mothers muſt have their way, you know, my dear] to the man whom ſhe ſo warmly recommends, againſt whom it ſeems there can be no juſt exception: and expatiating upon the complaiſance I owe her for her indulgence. So I believe I muſt communicate to her nothing farther—eſpecially as I know ſhe would condemn the correſpondence between us, and that between you and Lovelace, as clandeſtine and undutiful proceedings, and divulge our ſecret beſides: for duty implicit is her

ery. And moreover she lends a pretty open ear to the preachments of that starch old batchelor your uncle Antony; and for an example to her daughter would be more careful how she takes your part, be the cause ever so just.

Yet is not this right policy neither. For people who allow nothing will be granted nothing: in other words, those who aim at carrying too many points will not be able to carry any.

But can you divine, my dear, what that old preachment-making plump-hearted soul your uncle Antony means by his frequent amblings hither?—There is such smirking and smiling between my mother and him! Such mutual praises of œconomy; and, 'That is my way!'—and 'This I do!'—and 'I am glad it 'has your approbation, Sir!'—and 'You 'look into every thing, Madam!'—'Nothing would be done, if I did not'—Such exclamations against servants! Such exaltings of self! And dear-heart, and good-lack!—and 'las a-day!—And now-and-then their conversation sinking into a whispering accent, if I come cross them!—I'll tell you, my dear, I don't above half like it.

Only that these old batchelors usually take as many years to resolve upon matrimony as they can reasonably expect to live, or I should be ready to fire upon his visits; and to recommend Mr. Hickman to my mother's acceptance, as a much more eligible man: for what he wants in years, he makes up in gravity: and if you will not chide me, I will say, That there is a primness in both (especially when the man has presumed too much with me upon my mother's favour for him, and is under discipline on that account) as makes them seem near of kin: and then in contemplation of my saucinesss, and what they both bear from it, they sigh away!—and seem so mightily to compassionate each other, that if pity be but one remove from love, I am in no danger, while they are both in a great deal, and don't know it.

Now, my dear, I know you will be upon me with your grave airs: so in for the lamb, as the saying is, in for the sheep; and do you yourself look about you: for I'll have a pull with you by way of being aforehand. Hannibal, we read, always advised to attack the Romans upon their own territories.

You are pleased to say, and upon your word too! That your regards (a mighty quaint word for affections) are not so much engaged, as some of your friends suppose, to another person. What need you give one to imagine, my dear, that the last month or two has been a period extremely favourable to that other person; whom it has made an obliger of the niece for his patience with the uncles.

But, to pass that by—So much engaged!—How much, my dear?—Shall I infer? Some of your friends suppose a great deal. You seem to own a little.

Don't be angry. It is all fair: because you have not acknowledged to me that little. People, I have heard you say, who affect secrets, always excite curiosity.

But you proceed with a kind of draw-back upon your averment, as if recollection had given you a doubt—You know not yourself, if they be [so much engaged.] was it necessary to say this to me?—and to say it upon your word too?—But you know best.—Yet you don't neither, I believe. For a beginning love is acted by a subtle spirit; and oftentimes discovers itself to a by-stander, when the person possessed (why should I not call possessed?) knows not it has such a demon.

But further you say, What PREFERABLE favour you may have for him to any other person, is owing more to the usage he has received, and for your sake borne, than to any personal consideration.

This is generously said. It is in character. But, O my friend, depend upon it, you are in danger. Depend upon it, whether you know it or not, you are a little in for it. Your native generosity and greatness of mind endanger you: all your friends, by fighting against him with impolitick violence, fight for him. And Lovelace, my life for your's, notwithstanding all his veneration and assiduities, (so well calculated to your meridian) will let him own he has seen—Has seen, in short, that his work is doing for him more effectually than he could do it for himself. And have you not before now said, That nothing is so penetrating as the eye of a lover who has vanity? And who says Lovelace wants vanity?

In short, my dear, it is my opinion, and that from the easiness of his heart and behaviour, that he has seen more than I have seen; more than you think could be seen—more than I believe you yourself know, or else you would let me know it.

Already, in order to restrain him from resenting the indignities he has received, and which are daily offered him, he has prevailed upon you to correspond with him privately. I know he has nothing to boast of from what you have written: but is not his inducing you to receive his letters, and to answer them, a great point gained? By your insisting that he should ſhould keep this correſpondence private, it appears that there is one ſecret which you do not wiſh the world ſhould know: and he is maſter of that ſecret. He is indeed himſelf, as I may ſay, that ſecret! What an intimacy does this beget for the lover! How is it diſtancing the parent!

Yet who, as things are ſituated, can blame you!—Your condeſcenſion has no doubt hitherto prevented great miſchiefs. It muſt be continued, for the ſame reaſons, while the cauſe remains. You are drawn in by a perverſe fate againſt inclination: but cuſtom, with ſuch laudable purpoſes, will reconcile the inconveniency, and make an inclination.—And I would adviſe you (as you would wiſh to manage on an occaſion ſo critical with that prudence which governs all your actions) not to be afraid of entering upon a cloſe examination into the true ſprings and grounds of this your generoſity to that happy man.

It is my humble opinion, I tell you frankly, that on enquiry it will come out to be LOVE—Don't ſtart, my dear!—Has not your man himſelf had natural philoſophy enough to obſerve already to your aunt Hervey, that love takes the deepeſt root in the ſteadieſt minds! The deuce take his ſly penetration, I was going to ſay; for this was ſix or ſeven weeks ago.

I have been tinctured, you know. Nor on the cooleſt reflection, could I account how and when the jaundice began: but had been over head and ears, as the ſaying is, but for ſome of that advice from you which I now return you. Yet my man was not half ſo—So what, my dear—To be ſure Lovelace is a charming fellow. And were he only—But I will not make you glow, as you read—Upon my word I will not.—Yet, my dear, don't you find at your heart ſomewhat unuſual make it go throb, throb, throb, as you read juſt here?—If you do, don't be aſhamed to own it—It is your generoſity, my love! that's all.—But, as the Roman augur ſaid, 'Cæſar, 'beware of the ides of March!'

Adieu, my deareſt friend.—Forgive, and very ſpeedily, by the new-found expedient, tell me, that you forgive, your ever-affectionate ANNA HOWE.

LETTER IX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 1.

YOU both nettled and alarmed me, my deareſt Miſs Howe, by the concluding part of your laſt. At firſt reading it, 'I did not think it neceſſary,' ſaid I to myſelf, 'to guard againſt a 'critick, when I was writing to ſo dear 'a friend.' But then recollecting myſelf, 'Is there not more in it,' ſaid I, 'than the reſult of a vein ſo naturally 'lively? Surely I muſt have been guilty 'of an inadvertence. Let me enter into 'the cloſe examination of myſelf which 'my beloved friend adviſes.'

I do ſo; and cannot own any of the glow, any of the throbs you mention.—Upon my word I will repeat I cannot. And yet the paſſages in my letter upon which you are ſo humorouſly ſevere, lay me fairly open to your agreeable raillery. I own they do. And I cannot tell what turn my mind had taken to dictate ſo oddly to my pen.

But, pray now—Is it ſaying ſo much, when one, who has no very particular regard to any man, ſays, There are ſome who are preferable to others? And is it blameable to ſay, They are the preferable, who are not well uſed by one's relations; yet diſpenſe with that uſage out of regard to one's ſelf which they would otherwiſe reſent? Mr. Lovelace, for inſtance, I may be allowed to ſay, is a man to be preferred to Mr. Solmes; and that I do prefer him to that man: but, ſurely, this may be ſaid without it's being a neceſſary conſequence that I muſt be in love with him.

Indeed I would not be in love with him, as it is called, for the world: firſt, becauſe I have no opinion of his morals; and think it a fault in which our whole family (my brother excepted) has had a ſhare, that he was permitted to viſit us with a hope; which, however, being diſtant, did not, as I have obſerved heretofore, entitle any of us to call him to account for ſuch of his immoralities as came to our ears. Next, becauſe I think him to be a vain man, capable of triumphing (ſecretly at leaſt) over a perſon whoſe heart he thinks he has engaged. And, thirdly, becauſe the aſſiduities and veneration which you impute to him, ſeem to carry an haughtineſs in them, as if he thought his addreſs had a merit in it, that would be more than an equivalent to a woman's love. In ſhort, his very politeneſs, notwithſtanding the advantages he muſt have had from his birth and education, appear to me to be conſtrained; and, with the moſt remarkably eaſy and genteel perſon, ſomething, at times, ſeems to be behind in his manner that is too ſtudiouſly kept in. Then, good humoured as he is thought to be in the main to other people's ple's ſervants, and this even to familiarity, (although, as you have obſerved, a familiarity that has dignity in it not unbecoming a man of quality) he is apt ſometimes to break out into a paſſion with his own: an oath or a curſe follows; and ſuch looks from thoſe ſervants as plainly ſhew terror; and that they ſhould have fared worſe had they not been in my hearing: with a confirmation in the maſter's looks of a ſurmize too well juſtified.

Indeed, my dear, THIS man is not THE man. I have great objections to him. My heart throbs not after him. I glow not, but with indignation againſt myſelf for having given room for ſuch an imputation.—But you muſt not, my deareſt friend, conſtrue common gratitude into love. I cannot bear that you ſhould. But if ever I ſhould have the misfortune to think it love, I promiſe you upon my word, which is the ſame as upon my honour, that I will acquaint you with it.

You bid me to tell you very ſpeedily, and by the new-found expedient, that I am not diſpleaſed with you for your agreeable railliery: I diſpatch this therefore immediately; poſtponing to my next the account of the inducements which my friends have to promote with ſo much earneſtneſs the addreſs of Mr. Solmes.

Be ſatisfied, my dear, mean time, that I am not diſpleaſed with you: indeed I am not. On the contrary, I give you my hearty thanks for your friendly premonitions. And I charge you, (as I have often done) that if you obſerve any-thing in me ſo very faulty as would require from you to others in my behalf the palliation of friendly and partial love, you acquaint me with it: for methinks I would ſo conduct myſelf as not to give reaſon even for an adverſary to cenſure me; and how ſhall ſo weak and ſo young a creature avoid the cenſure of ſuch, if my friend will not hold a looking-glaſs before me to let me ſee my imperfections?

Judge me, then, my dear, as any indifferent perſon (knowing what you know of me) would do. I may at firſt be a little pained; may glow a little perhaps to be found leſs worthy of your friendſhip than I wiſh to be; but aſſure yourſelf, that your kind correction will give me reflection that ſhall amend me. If it do not, you will have a fault to accuſe me of, that will be utter inexcuſable: a fault, let me add, that ſhould you not accuſe me of it, (if in your opinion I am guilty) you will not be ſo much, ſo warmly, my friend as I am yours; ſince I have never ſpared you on the like occaſions.

Here I break off; to begin another letter to you; with the aſſurance, mean time, that I am, and ever will be, your equally affectionate and grateful

CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XII.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

THURSDAY MORN. MARCH 2.

INDEED you would not be in love with him for the world!—Your ſervant, my dear. Nor would I have you. For I think, with all the advantages of perſon, fortune, and family, he is not by any means worthy of you. And this opinion I give as well from the reaſons you mention, (which I cannot but confirm) as from what I have heard of him but a few hours ago from Mrs. Forteſcue, a favourite of Lady Betty Lawrance, who knows him well—But let me congratulate you, however, on your being the firſt of our ſex that ever I heard of, who has been able to turn that lion Love, at her own pleaſure into a lap-dog.

Well but, if you have not the throbs and the glows, you have not: and are not in love; good reaſon why, becauſe you would not be in love; and there's no more to be ſaid.—Only, my dear, I ſhall keep a good look-out upon you; and ſo I hope you will upon yourſelf: for it is no manner of argument, that becauſe you would not be in love, you therefore are not.—But before I part entirely with this ſubject, a word in your ear, my charming friend—It is only by way of caution, and in purſuance of the general obſervation, that a ſtander-by is often a better judge of the game than thoſe at play.—May it not be, that you have had, and have, ſuch croſs creatures and ſuch odd heads to deal with, as have not allowed you to attend to the throbs? —Or, if you had them a little now-and-then, whether, having had two accounts to place them to, you have not by miſtake put them to the wrong one?

But whether you have a value for Lovelace or not, I know you will be impatient to hear what Mrs. Forteſcue has ſaid of him. Nor will I keep you longer in ſuſpence.

An hundred wild ſtories ſhe tells of him, from childhood to manhood: for, as ſhe obſerves, having never been ſubject to contradiction, he was always as miſchievous as a monkey. But I ſhall paſs over theſe whole hundred of his puerile rogueries (although indicative ones, as I may ſay) to take notice as well of ſome things you are not quite ignorant of, as of others you know not; and to make a few obſervations upon him and his ways.

Mrs. Forteſcue owns, what everybody knows, that he is notoriouſly, nay, avowedly, a man of pleaſure; yet ſays, that in any thing he ſets his heart upon or undertakes, he is the moſt induſtrious and perſevering mortal under the ſun. He reſts, it ſeems, not above ſix hours in the twenty-four—any more than you. He delights in writing. Whether at Lord M.'s, or at Lady Betty's, or Lady Sarah's, he has always a pen in his fingers when he retires. One of his companions (confirming his love of writing) has told her, that his thoughts flow rapidly to his pen: and you and I, my dear, have obſerved on more occaſions than one, that though he writes even a fine hand, he is one of the readieſt and quickeſt of writers. He muſt indeed have had early a very docile genius; ſince a perſon of his pleaſureable turn and active ſpirit, could never have ſubmitted to take long or great pains in attaining the qualifications he is maſter of; qualifications ſo ſeldom attained by youth of quality and fortune; by ſuch eſpecially of thoſe of either, who, like him, have never known what it was to be controuled.

He had once it ſeems the vanity, upon being complimented on theſe talents, (and on his ſurprizing diligence, for a man of pleaſure) to compare himſelf to Julius Cæſar; who performed great actions by day, and wrote them down at night: and valued himſelf, that he only wanted Cæſar's out-ſetting, to make a figure among his cotemporaries.

He ſpoke this indeed, ſhe ſays, with an air of pleaſantry: for ſhe obſerved, and ſo have we, that he has the art of acknowledging his vanity with ſo much humour, that it ſets him above the contempt which is due to vanity and ſelf-opinion; and at the ſame time half-perſuades thoſe who hear him, that he really deſerves the exaltation he gives himſelf.

But ſuppoſing it to be true that all his vacant nightly hours are employed in writing, what can be his ſubjects? If, like Cæſar, his own actions, he muſt undoubtedly be a very enterpriſing and very wicked man; ſince nobody ſuſpects him to have a ſerious turn: and, decent as he is in his converſation with us, his writings are not probably ſuch as would redound either to his own honour, or to the benefit of others were they to be read. He muſt be conſcious of this, ſince Mrs. Forteſcue ſays, that in the great correſpondence by letters which he holds, he is as ſecret and as careful as if it were of a treaſonable nature—yet troubles not his head with politicks, though nobody knows the intereſts of princes and courts better than he is ſaid to do.

That you and I, my dear, ſhould love to write, is no wonder. We have always, from the time each could hold a pen, delighted in epiſtolary correſpondences. Our employments are domeſtick and ſedentary; and we can ſcribble upon twenty innocent ſubjects, and take delight in them becauſe they are innocent; though were they to be ſeen, they might not much profit or pleaſe others. But that ſuch a gay, lively young fellow as this, who rides, hunts, travels, frequents the public entertainments, and has means to purſue his pleaſures, ſhould be able to ſet himſelf down to write for hours together, as you and I have heard him ſay he frequently does, that is the ſtrange thing.

Mrs. Forteſcue ſays, that he is a complete maſter of ſhort hand writing. By the way, what inducements could ſuch a ſwift writer as he have to learn ſhorthand!

She ſays (and we know it as well as ſhe) that he has a ſurprizing memory; and a very lively imagination.

Whatever his other vices are, all the world, as well as Mrs. Forteſcue, ſays he is a ſober man. And among all his bad qualities, gaming, that great waſter of time as well as fortune, is not his vice: ſo that he muſt have his head as cool, and his reaſon as clear, as the prime of youth and his natural gaiety will permit; and by his early morning hours, a great portion of time upon his hands, to employ in writing, or worſe.

Mrs. Forteſcue ſays, he has one gentleman who is more his intimate and correſpondent than any of the reſt. You remember what his diſmiſſed bailiff ſaid of him and of his aſſociates. I don't find but that man's character of him was in general pretty juſt. Mrs. Forteſcue confirms this part of it, that all his relations are afraid of him; and that his pride ſets him above owing obligations to them. She believes he is clear of the world; and that he will continue ſo: no doubt from the ſame motive that makes makes him avoid being obliged to his relations.

A perſon willing to think favourably of him would hope, that a brave, a learned, and a diligent man, cannot be naturally a bad man.—But if he be better than his enemies ſay he is, (and if worſe, he is bad indeed) he is guilty of an inexcuſable fault in being ſo careleſs of his reputation. I think a man can but be ſo but from one of theſe two reaſons: either that he is conſcious he deſerves the ill ſpoken of him; or, that he takes a pride in being thought worſe than he is. Both very bad and threatening indications; ſince the firſt muſt ſhew him to be utterly abandoned; and it is but natural to conclude from the other, that what a man is not aſhamed to have imputed to him, he will not ſcruple to be guilty of whenever he has an opportunity.

Upon the whole, and upon all I could gather from Mrs. Forteſcue, Mr. Lovelace is a very faulty man. You and I have thought him too gay, too inconſiderate, too raſh, too little an hypocrite, to be deep. You ſee he never would diſguiſe his natural temper (haughty as it certainly is) with reſpect to your brother's behaviour to him. Where he thinks a contempt due, he pays it to the uttermoſt. Nor has he complaiſance enough to ſpare your uncles.

But were he deep, and ever ſo deep, you would ſoon penetrate him, if they would leave you to yourſelf. His vanity would be your clue. Never man had more: yet, as Mrs. Forteſcue obſerved, never did man carry it off ſo happily. There is a ſtrange mixture in it of humorous vivacity: ſince but for one half of what he ſays of himſelf, when he is in the vein, any other man would be inſufferable.

TALK of the devil, is an old ſaying. The lively wretch has made me a viſit, and is but juſt gone away. He is all impatience and reſentment at the treatment you meet with; and full of apprehenſions too, that they will carry their point with you.

I told him my opinion, that you will never be brought to think of ſuch a man as Solmes; but that it will probably end in a compoſition, never to have either.

No man, he ſaid, whoſe fortunes and alliances are ſo conſiderrble, ever had ſo little favour from a woman for whoſe ſake he had borne ſo much.

I told him my mind as freely as I uſed to do. But who ever was in fault, ſelf being judge? He complained of ſpies being ſet upon his conduct, and to pry into his life and morals, and this by your brother and uncles.

I told him, that this was very hard upon him; and the more ſo, as neither his life nor morals perhaps would ſtand a fair enquiry.

He ſmiled, and called himſelf my ſervant.—The occaſion was too fair, he ſaid, for Miſs Howe, who never ſpared him, to let it paſs. But Lord help the ſhallow ſouls of the Harlowes! Would I believe it? they were for turning plotters upon him. They had beſt take care he did not pay them in their own coin. Their hearts were better turned for ſuch works than their heads.

I aſked him, if he valued himſelf upon having a head better turned than theirs for ſuch works, as he called them?

He drew off: and then ran into the higheſt profeſſions of reverence and affection for you.

The object ſo meritorious, who can doubt the reality of his profeſſions?

Adieu, my deareſt, my noble friend! —I love and admire you for the generous concluſion of your laſt more than I can expreſs. Though I began this letter with impertinent raillery, knowing that you always loved to indulge my mad vein, yet never was there a heart that more glowed with friendly love, than that of your own ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

WEDN. MARCH 1.

I Now take up my pen, to lay before you the inducements and motives which my friends have to eſpouſe ſo earneſtly the addreſs of this Mr. Solmes.

In order to ſet this matter in a clear light, it is neceſſary to go a little back, and even perhaps to mention ſome things which you already know: and ſo you may look upon what I am going to relate, as a kind of ſupplement to my letters of the 15th and 20th of January laſt.

In thoſe letters, of which I have kept memorandums, I gave you an account of my brother's and ſiſter's antipathy to Mr. Lovelace; and the methods they took (ſo far as they had then come to my knowledge) to ruin him in the opinion of my other friends. And I told you, that after a very cold, yet not a directly affrontive behaviour to him, they all of a ſudden became more violent; which brought on at laſt the unhappy rencounter between my brother and him.

Now you muſt know, that from the laſt laſt converſation that paſſed between my aunt and me, it comes out, that this ſudden vehemence on my brother's and ſiſter's parts, was owing to ſtronger reaſons than to the college-begun antipathy on his ſide, or to ſlighted love on hers; to wit, to an apprehenſion that my uncles intended to follow my grandfather's example in my favour; at leaſt in a higher degree than they with they ſhould. An apprehenſion founded it ſeems on a converſation between my two uncles and my brother and ſiſter; which my aunt communicated to me in confidence, as an argument to prevail upon me to accept of Mr. Solmes's noble ſettlements; urging, that ſuch a ſeaſonable compliance would fruſtrate my brother's and ſiſter's views, and eſtabliſh me for ever in the love of my father and uncles.

I will give you the ſubſtance of this communicated converſation, after I have made a brief introductory obſervation or two: which however I hardly need to make to you who are ſo well acquainted with us all, did not the ſeries or thread of the ſtory require it.

I have more than once mentioned to you the darling view ſome of us have long had of raiſing a family, as it is called: a reflection, as I have often thought, upon our own; which is no inconſiderable or upſtart one on either ſide; on my mother's eſpecially.—A view too frequently it ſeems entertained by families which, having great ſubſtance, cannot be ſatisfied without rank and title.

My uncles had once extended this view to each of us three children; urging, that as they themſelves intended not to marry, we each of us might be ſo portioned, and ſo advantageouſly matched, as that our poſterity, if not ourſelves, might make a firſt figure in our country—while my brother, as the only ſon, thought the two girls might be very well provided for by ten or fifteen thouſand pounds apiece: and that all the real eſtates in the family, to wit, my grandfather's, father's, and two uncles, and the remainder of their reſpective perſonal eſtates, together with what he had an expectation of from his godmother, would make ſuch a noble fortune, and give him ſuch an intereſt, as might intitle him to hope for a peerage. Nothing leſs would ſatisfy his ambition.

With this view he gave himſelf airs very early; That his grandfather and uncles were his ſtewards; that no man ever had better; that daughters were but incumbrances and drawbacks upon a family. And this low and familiar expreſſion was often in his mouth, and uttered always with the ſelf-complaiſance which an imagined happy thought can be ſuppoſed to give the ſpeaker; to wit, That a man who has ſons brings up chickens for his own table, [though once I made his compariſon ſtagger with him, by aſking him, If the ſons, to make it hold, were to have their necks wrung off?] whereas daughters are chickens brought up for the tables of other men. This, accompanied with the equally polite reflection, That, to induce people to take them off their hands, the family-ſtock muſt be impaired into the bargain, uſed to put my ſiſter out of all patience: and although ſhe now ſeems to think a younger ſiſter only can be an incumbrance, ſhe was then often propoſing to me to make a party in our own favour againſt my brother's rapacious views, as ſhe uſed to call them; while I was for conſidering the liberties he took of this ſort as the effect of a temporary pleaſantry: which in a young man not naturally good-humoured, I was glad to ſee; or as a foible that deſerved raillery, but no other notice.

But when my grandfather's will (of the purport of which in my particular favour, until it was opened, I was as ignorant as they) had lopped off one branch of my brother's expectation, he was extremely diſſatisfied with me. Nobody indeed was pleaſed: for although every-one loved me, yet being the youngeſt child, father, uncles, brother, ſiſter, all thought themſelves poſtponed, as to matter of right and power. [Who loves not power?] And my father himſelf could not bear that I ſhould be made ſole, as I may call it, and independent; for ſuch the will, as to that eſtate and the powers it gave, (unaccountably as they all ſaid) made me.

To obviate therefore every one's jealouſy, I gave up to my father's management, as you know, not only the eſtate, but the money bequeathed me; (which was a moiety of what my grandfather had by him at his death; the other moiety being bequeathed to my ſiſter) contenting myſelf to take as from his bounty what he was pleaſed to allow me, without deſiring the leaſt addition to my annual ſtipend. And then I hoped I had laid all envy aſleep: but ſtill my brother and ſiſter (jealous, as now is evident, of my two uncles favour for me, and of the pleaſure I had given my father and them by this act of duty) were every now-and-then occaſionally doing me covert ill offices; of which, however, I took the leſs notice, when I was told of them, as I thought I had removed the cauſe of their envy; and I imputed every-thing of that ſort to the petulance they are both pretty much noted for.

My brother's acquiſition then took place. This made us all very happy; and he went down to take poſſeſſion of it: and his abſence (on ſo good an account too) made us ſtill happier. Then followed Lord M 's propoſal for my ſiſter: and this was an additional felicity for the time. I have told you how exceedingly good-humoured it made my ſiſter.

You know how that went off: you know what came on in it's place.

My brother then returned; and we were all wrong again: and Bella, as I obſerved in my letters above-mentioned, had an opportunity to give herſelf the credit of having refuſed Mr. Lovelace, on the ſcore of his reputed faulty morals. This united my brother and ſiſter in one cauſe. They ſet themſelves on all occaſions to depreciate Mr. Lovelace, and his family too, (a family which deſerves nothing but reſpect:) and this gave riſe to the converſation I am leading to between my uncles and them; of which I now come to give the particulars; after I have obſerved, that it happened before the rencounter, and ſoon after the enquiry made into Mr. Lovelace's affairs had come out better than my brother and ſiſter hoped it would.

They were bitterly inveighing againſt him, in their uſual way, ſtrengthening their invectives with ſome new ſtories in his diſfavour; when my uncle Antony, having given them a patient hearing, declared, That he thought the gentleman behaved like a gentleman; his niece Clary with prudence; and that a more honourable alliance for the family, as he had often told them, could not be wiſhed for: ſince Mr. Lovelace had a very good paternal eſtate; and that, by the evidence of an enemy, all clear. Nor did it appear, that he was ſo bad a man as he had been repreſented to be: wild indeed; but it was at a gay time of life. He was a man of ſenſe: and he was ſure that his niece would not have him, if ſhe had not good reaſon to think him reformed, or that there was a likelihood that ſhe could reform him by her example.

My uncle then gave one inſtance, my aunt told me, as a proof of a generoſity in Mr. Lovelace's ſpirit, which convinced him, that he was not a bad man in nature; and that he was of a temper, he was pleaſed to ſay, like my own: which was, That when he (my uncle) had repreſented to him, that he might, if he pleaſed, make three or four hundred pounds a year of his paternal eſtate, more than he did, he anſwered, That his tenants paid their rents well; that it was a maxim with his family, from which he would by no means depart, never to rack-rent old tenants or their deſcendants; and that it was a pleaſure to him, to ſee all his tenants look fat, ſleek, and contented.

I indeed had once occaſionally heard him ſay ſomething like this; and thought he never looked ſo well as at the time —except once; and that was in an inſtance given by him on the following incident.

An unhappy tenant of my uncle Antony came petitioning to my uncle for forbearance, in Mr. Lovelace's preſence. When he had fruitleſsly withdrawn, Mr. Lovelace pleaded his cauſe ſo well, that the man was called in again, and had his ſuit granted. And Mr. Lovelace privately followed him out, and gave him two guineas, for preſent relief; the man having declared, that, at the time, he had not five ſhillings in the world.

On this occaſion, he told my uncle, (but without any airs of oſtentation) That he had once obſerved an old tenant and his wife in a very mean habit at church; and queſtioning them about it next day, as he knew they had no hard bargain in their farm, the man ſaid, He had done ſome very fooliſh things with a good intention, which had put him behind-hand, and could not have paid his rent, and appear better. He aſked him how long it would take him to retrieve the fooliſh ſtep he acknowledged he had made. He ſaid, 'Perhaps, two or three 'years,'—'Well, then,' ſaid he, 'I will 'abate you five pounds a year for ſeven 'years, provided you will lay it out upon 'your wife and ſelf, that you may make 'a Sunday-appearance like MY tenants. 'Mean time, take this,' (putting his hand in his pocket, and giving him five guineas) 'to put yourſelves in preſent 'plight; and let me ſee you next Sun-'day at church, hand in hand, like an 'honeſt and loving couple; and I be-'ſpeak you to dine with me afterwards.'

Although this pleaſed me when I heard it, as giving an inſtance of generoſity and prudence at the ſame time, not leſſening (as my uncle took notice) the yearly value of the farm, yet, my dear, I had no throbs, no glows upon it!

—Upon

—Upon my word. I had not. Nevertheleſs, I own to you, that I could not help ſaying to myſelf on the occaſion, Were it ever to be my lot to have this man, he would not hinder me from purſuing the methods I ſo much delight to take—with, A pity, that ſuch a man were not uniformly good.

Forgive me this digreſſion.

My uncle went on, (as my aunt told me) That, beſides his paternal eſtate, he was the immediate heir to very ſplendid fortunes: that when he was in treaty for his niece Arabella, Lord M. told him (my uncle) what great things he and his two half-ſiſters intended to do for him, in order to qualify him for the title, which would be extinct at his lordſhip's death, and which they hoped to procure for him, or a ſtill higher, that of thoſe ladies father, which had been for ſome time extinct on failure of heirs male. That it was with this view that his relations were all ſo earneſt for his marrying: that as he ſaw not where Mr. Lovelace could better himſelf, ſo, truly, he thought there was wealth enough in their own family to build up three conſiderable ones; that therefore he muſt needs ſay, he was the more deſirous of this alliance as there was a great probability, not only from Mr. Lovelace's deſcent, but from his fortunes, that his niece Clariſſa might one day be a peereſs of Great Britain. And upon that proſpect [Here was the mortifying ſtroke] he ſhould, for his own part, think it not wrong to make ſuch diſpoſitions as ſhould contribute to the better ſupport of the dignity.

My uncle Harlowe, it ſeems, far from diſapproving of what his brother had ſaid, declared, That there was but one objection to an alliance with Mr. Lovelace; to wit, his faulty morals: eſpecially as ſo much could be done for Miſs Bella, and for my brother too, by my father; and as my brother was actually poſſeſſed of a conſiderable eſtate by virtue of the deed of gift and will of his godmother Lovell.

Had I known this before, I ſhould the leſs have wondered at many things I have been unable to account for in my brother's and ſiſter's behaviour to me; and been more on my guard than I imagined there was a neceſſity to be.

You may eaſily gueſs how much this converſation affected my brother at the time. He could not, you know, but be very uneaſy to hear two of his ſtewards talk at this rate to his face.

He had from early days, by his violent temper, made himſelf both feared and courted by the whole family. My father himſelf, as I have lately mentioned, very often (long before my brother's acquiſitions had made him ſtill more aſſuming) gave way to him as to an only ſon who was to build up the name, and augment the honour of it. Little inducement therefore had my brother to correct a temper which gave him ſo much conſideration with everybody.

'See, ſiſter Bella,' ſaid he, in an indecent paſſion before my uncles, on this occaſion I have mentioned—'ſee 'how it is!—You and I ought to look 'about us!—This little ſyren is in a fair 'way to out-uncle, as ſhe has already 'cut-grandfather'd us both!'

From this time (as I now find it plain upon recollection) did my brother and ſiſter behave to me, as to one who ſtood in their way; and to each other, as having but one intereſt: and were reſolved, therefore, to bend all their force to hinder an alliance from taking effect, which they believed was likely to oblige them to contract their views.

And how was this to be done, after ſuch a declaration from both my uncles?

My brother found out the way. My ſiſter (as I have ſaid) went hand in hand with him. Between them, the family-union was broken, and everyone was made uneaſy. Mr. Lovelace was received more and more coldly by all: but not being to be put out of his courſe by ſlights only, perſonal affronts ſucceeded; defiances next, then the rencounter: that, as you have heard, did the buſineſs; and now, if I do not oblige them, my grandfather's eſtate is to be litigated with me; and I, who never deſigned to take advantage of the independency bequeathed me, am to be as dependent upon my father's will, as a daughter ought to be who knows not what is good for herſelf. This is the language of the family now.

But if I will ſuffer myſelf to be prevailed upon, how happy (as they lay it out) ſhall we all be!—Such preſents am I to have, ſuch jewels, and I cannot tell what, from every one of the family! Then Mr. Solmes's fortunes are ſo great, and his propoſals ſo very advantageous, (no relation whom he values) that there will be abundant room to raiſe mine upon them, were the high-intended favours of my own relations to be quite out of the queſtion. Moreover it is now, with this view, found out, that I have qualifications which of themſelves will be a full equivalent to Mr. Solmes for the ſettlements he is to make; and ſtill leave him under an obligation to me for my compliance. He himſelf thinks ſo, I am told —So very poor a creature is he, even in his own eyes, as well as in theirs.

Theſe deſirable views anſwered, how rich, how ſplendid, ſhall we all three be! And I—what obligations ſhall I lay upon them all!—and that only by doing an act of duty ſo ſuitable to my character, and manner of thinking; if indeed I am the generous as well as dutiful creature I have hitherto made them believe I am.

This is the bright ſide that is turned to my father and uncles to captivate them: but I am afraid that my brother's and ſiſter's deſign is to ruin me with them at any rate. Were it otherwiſe, would they not, on my return from you, have rather fought to court than frighten me into meaſures which their hearts are ſo much bent to carry? A method they have followed ever ſince.

Mean time, orders are given to all the ſervants to ſhew the higheſt reſpect to Mr. Solmes; the generous Mr. Solmes is now his character with ſome of our family! But are not theſe orders a tacit confeſſion, that they think his own merit will not procure him reſpect? He is accordingly, in every viſit he makes, not only highly careſſed by the principals of our family, but obſequiouſly attended and cringed to by the menials.—And the noble ſettlements are echoed from every mouth.

Noble is the word uſed to enforce the offers of a man who is mean enough avowedly to have, and wicked enough to propoſe to rob of their juſt expectations his own family, (every one of which at the ſame time ſtands in too much need of his favour) in order to ſettle all he is worth upon me; and if I die without children, and he has none by any other marriage, upon a family which already abounds. Such are his propoſals.

But were there no other motive to induce me to deſpiſe this upſtart man, is not this unjuſt one to his family enough? —The upſtart man, I repeat; for he was not born to the immenſe riches he is poſſeſſed of: riches left by one niggard to another, in injury to the next heir, becauſe that other is a niggard. And ſhould I not be as culpable, do you think, in my acceptance of ſuch unjuſt ſettlements, as he is in the offer of them, if I could perſuade myſelf to be a ſharer in them, or ſuffer a reverſionary expectation of poſſeſſing them to influence my choice?

Indeed it concerns me not a little, that my friends could be brought to encourage ſuch offers on ſuch motives as I think a perſon of conſcience ſhould not preſume to begin the world with.

But this it ſeems is the only method that can be taken to diſappoint Mr. Lovelace; and at the ſame time to anſwer all my relations have to wiſh for each of us. And ſurely I will not ſtand againſt ſuch an acceſſion to the family as may happen from marrying Mr. Solmes: ſince now a poſſibility is diſcovered (which ſuch a graſping mind as my brother's can eaſily turn into a probability) that my grandfather's eſtate will revert to it, with a much more conſiderable one of the man's own. Inſtances of eſtates falling in, in caſes far more unlikely than this, are inſiſted upon; and my ſiſter ſays, in the words of an old Saw, It is good to be related to an eſtate.

While Solmes, ſmiling no doubt to himſelf at a hope ſo remote, by offers only, obtains all their intereſts; and doubts not to join to his own the eſtate I am envied for: which, for the conveniency of it's ſituation between two of his, will, it ſeems, be of twice the value to him that it would be of to any other perſon; and is therefore, I doubt not, a ſtronger motive with him than the wife.

Theſe, my dear, ſeem to me the principal inducements of my relations to eſpouſe ſo vehemently as they do this man's ſuit. And here, once more, muſt I deplore the family-faults which gives thoſe inducements ſuch a force as it will be difficult to reſiſt.

And thus far, let matters with regard to Mr. Solmes and me come out as they will, my brother has ſucceeded in his views; that is to ſay, he has, in the firſt place, got my FATHER to make the cauſe his own, and to inſiſt upon my compliance as an act of duty.

My MOTHER has never thought fit to oppoſe my father's will, when once he has declared himſelf determined.

My UNCLES, ſtiff, unbroken, highly-proſperous batchelors, give me leave to ſay, (though very worthy perſons in the main) have as high notions of a child's duty, as of a wife's obedience; in the laſt of which, my mother's meekneſs has confirmed them, and given them greater reaſon to expect the firſt.

My aunt HERVEY (not extremely happy in her own nuptials, and perhaps under ſome little obligation) is got over, and chuſes not to open her lips in my favour againſt the wills of a father and uncles ſo determined.

This

This paſſiveneſs in my mother and in my aunt, in a point ſo contrary to their own firſt judgments, is too ſtrong a proof that my father is abſolutely reſolved.

Their treatment of my worthy Mrs. NORTON is a ſad confirmation of it: a woman deſerving of all conſideration for her wiſdom; and every body thinking ſo; but who, not being wealthy enough to have due weight in a point againſt which ſhe has given her opinion, and which they ſeem bent upon carrying, is reſtrained from viſiting here, and even from correſponding with me, as I am this very day informed.

Hatred to Lovelace, family aggrandizement, and this great motive, paternal authority!—What a force united muſt they be ſuppoſed to have, when ſingly each conſideration is ſufficient to carry all before it!

This is the formidable appearance which the addreſs of this diſagreeable man wears at preſent.

My BROTHER and my SISTER triumph.—They have got me down, as Hannah over-heard them exult. And ſo they have, (yet I never knew that I was inſolently up;) for now my brother will either lay me under an obligation to comply to my own unhappineſs, and ſo make me an inſtrument of his revenge upon Lovelace; or, if I refuſe, will throw me into diſgrace with my whole family.

Who will wonder at the intrigues and plots carried on by undermining courtiers againſt one another, when a private family, but three of which can poſſibly have claſhing intereſts, and one of them (as ſhe preſumes to think) above ſuch low motives, cannot be free from them?

What at preſent moſt concerns me, is, the peace of my mother's mind! How can the huſband of ſuch a wife (a good man too!—But, oh! this prerogative of manhood!) be ſo poſitive, ſo unperſuadable, to one who has brought into the family, means, which they know ſo well the value of, that methinks they ſhould value her the more for their ſake?

They do indeed value her; but, I am ſorry to ſay, ſhe has purchaſed that value by her compliances: yet has merit for which ſhe ought to be venerated; prudence which ought of itſelf to be conformed to in every thing.

But whither roves my pen? How dare a perverſe girl take theſe liberties with relations ſo very reſpectable, and whom ſhe highly reſpects? What an unhappy ſituation is that which obliges her, in her own defence, as it were, to expoſe their failings?

But you, who know how much I love and reverence my mother, will judge what a difficulty I am under, to be obliged to oppoſe a ſcheme which ſhe has engaged in. Yet I muſt oppoſe it, (to comply is impoſſible;) and muſt without delay declare my oppoſition, or my difficulties will increaſe; ſince, as I am juſt now informed, a lawyer has been this very day conſulted [Would you have believed it?] in relation to ſettlements.

Were ours a Roman Catholick family, how much happier for me that they thought a nunnery would anſwer all their views!—How happy, had not a certain perſon ſlighted ſomebody! All then would have been probably concluded on between them before my brother had arrived to thwart the match: then had I had a huſband; which now I have not; and two brothers—both aſpiring; poſſibly both titled. while I ſhould only have valued that in either which is above title, that which is truly noble in both!

But by what a long-reaching ſelfiſhneſs is my brother governed! By what remote, exceedingly remote views! Views, which it is in the power of the ſlighteſt accident, of a fever, for inſtance, (the ſeeds of which are always vegetating, as I may ſay, and ready to burſt forth, in his own impetuous temper) or of the provoked weapon of an adverſary, to blow up and deſtroy!

I will break off here. Let me write ever ſo freely of my friends, I am ſure of your kind conſtruction: and I confide in your diſcretion, that you will avoid reading to or tranſcribing for others, ſuch paſſages as may have the appearance of treating too freely the parental or even the fraternal character, or induce others to cenſure for a ſuppoſed failure in duty to the one, or decency to the other, your truly affectionate

CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XIV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

THURSDAY EVENING, MARCH 2.

ON Hannah's depoſiting my long letter, (begun yeſterday, but by reaſon of ſeveral interruptions not finiſhed till within this hour) ſhe found and brought me yours of this day. I thank you, my dear, for this kind expedition. Theſe few lines will perhaps be time enough depoſited to be taken away by your ſervant with the other letter: yet they they are only to thank you, and to tell you my increaſing apprehenſions.

I muſt take or ſeek the occaſion to apply to my mother for her mediation; for I am in danger of having a day fixed and antipathy taken for baſhfulneſs.—Should not ſiſters be ſiſters to each other? Should they not make a common cauſe of it, as I may ſay, a cauſe of ſex, on ſuch occaſions as the preſent? Yet mine, in ſupport of my brother's ſelfiſhneſs, and, no doubt, in concert with him, has been urging in full aſſembly, it ſeems, (and that with an earneſtneſs peculiar to herſelf when ſhe ſets upon any thing) that an abſolute day be given me; and if I comply not, to be told, that it ſhall be to the forfeiture of all my fortunes, and of all their love.

She need not be ſo officious: my brother's intereſt, without hers, is ſtrong enough; for he has found means to confederate all the family againſt me. Upon ſome freſh provocation, or new intelligence concerning Mr. Lovelace, (I know not what it is) they have bound themſelves, or are to bind themſelves, by a ſigned paper, to one another, [the Lord bleſs me, my dear, what ſhall I do!] to carry their point in favour of Mr. Solmes, in ſupport of my father's authority, as it is called, and againſt Mr. Lovelace, as a libertine, and an enemy to the family: and if ſo, I am ſure, I may ſay againſt me.—How impolitick in them all, to join two people in one intereſt, whom they wiſh for ever to keep aſunder!

What the diſcharged ſteward reported of him is ſurely bad enough: what Mrs. Forteſcue ſaid, not only confirms that bad, but gives room to think him ſtill worſe:—and yet the ſomething further which my friends have come at, is of ſo heinous a nature, (as Betty Barnes tells Hannah) that it proves him to be the worſt of men.—But, hang the man, I had almoſt ſaid—what is he to me? What would he be—were not this Mr. Sol——O my dear, how I hate the man in the light he is propoſed to me!

All of them at the ſame time are afraid of Mr. Lovelace; yet not afraid to provoke him!—How am I entangled!—to be obliged to go on correſponding with him for their ſakes—Heaven forbid that their perſiſted-in violence ſhould ſo drive me as to make it neceſſary for my own!

But ſurely they will yield—Indeed I cannot.

I believe the gentleſt ſpirits, when provoked, (cauſeleſsly and cruelly provoked) are the moſt determined. The reaſon may be, That not taking up reſolutions lightly—their very deliberation makes them the more immoveable.—And then, when a point is clear and ſelf-evident, how can one with patience think of entering into an argument or contention upon it?

An interruption obliges me to conclude myſelf, in ſome hurry, as well as fright, what I muſt ever be, yours more than my own, CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XV.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

FRIDAY, MARCH 3.

I Have both your letters at once. It is very unhappy, my dear, ſince your friends will have you marry, that a perſon of your merit ſhould be addreſſed by a ſucceſſion of worthleſs creatures, who have nothing but their preſumption for their excuſe.

That theſe preſumers appear not in this very unworthy light to ſome of your friends, is, becauſe their defects are not ſo ſtriking to them as to others.—And why? Shall I venture to tell you?—Becauſe they are nearer their own ſtandard—Modeſty, after all, perhaps has a concern in it; for how ſhould they think that a niece or ſiſter of theirs [I will not go higher, for fear of incurring your diſpleaſure] ſhould be an angel?

But where, indeed, is the man to be found (who has the leaſt ſhare of due diffidence) that dares to look up to Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe with hope, or with any-thing but wiſhes? Thus the bold and forward, not being ſenſible of their defects, aſpire: while the modeſty of the really worthy fills them with too much reverence to permit them to explain themſelves. Hence your Symmes's, your Byron's, your Mullins's, your Wyerley's, (the beſt of the herd) and your Solmes's, in turn, invade you—Wretches, that, looking upon the reſt of your family, need of deſpair of ſucceeding in an alliance with it—But, to you, what an inexcuſable preſumption!

Yet I am afraid all oppoſition will be in vain. You muſt, you will, I doubt, be ſacrificed to this odious man. I know your family. There will be no reſiſting ſuch baits as he has thrown out. O my dear, my beloved friend! and are ſuch charming qualities, is ſuch exalted merit, to be ſunk in ſuch a marriage!—You muſt not, your uncle tells my mother, diſpute their authority. AUTHORITY! what a full word is that in the mouth of a narrow-minded perſon, who happened happened to be born thirty years before one!—Of your uncles I ſpeak; for as to the parental authority, that ought to be ſacred.—But ſhould not parents have reaſon for what they do!

Wonder not, however, at your Bell's un-ſiſterly behaviour in this affair: I have a particular to add to the inducements your inſolent brother is governed by, which will account for all her driving. You have already owned, that her outward eye was from the firſt ſtruck with the figure and addreſs of the man whom ſhe pretends to deſpiſe, and who, it is certain, thoroughly deſpiſes her: but you have not told me, that ſtill ſhe loves him of all men. Bell has a meanneſs in her very pride; that meanneſs riſes with her pride; and goes hand in hand with it; and no one is ſo proud as Bell. She has owned her love, her uneaſy days, and ſleepleſs nights, and her revenge grafted upon her love, to her favourite Betty Barnes—To lay herſelf in the power of a ſervant's tongue! Poor creature!—But LIKE little ſouls will find one another out, and mingle, as well as LIKE great ones. This, however, ſhe told the wench in ſtrict confidence: and thus, by way of the female round-about, as Lovelace had the ſaucineſs on ſuch another occaſion, in ridicule of our ſex, to call it, Betty (pleaſed to be thought worthy of a ſecret, and to have an opportunity of inveighing againſt Lovelace's perfidy, as ſhe would have it to be) told it to one of her confidantes: that confidante, with like injunctions of ſecreſy, to Miſs Lloyd's Harriot—Harriot to Miſs Lloyd—Miſs Lloyd to me—I to you—with leave to make what you pleaſe of it.

And now you will not wonder to find Miſs Bell an implacable rival, rather than an affectionate ſiſter; and will be able to account for the words witchcraft, fyren, and ſuch-like, thrown out againſt you; and for her driving on for a fixed day for ſacrificing you to Solmes: in ſhort, for her rudeneſs and violence of every kind.

What a ſweet revenge will ſhe take, as well upon Lovelace as upon you, if ſhe can procure her rival ſiſter to be married to the man that ſiſter hates; and ſo prevent her having the man whom ſhe herſelf loves, (whether ſhe have hope of him or not) and whom ſhe ſuſpects her ſiſter loves!

Poiſons and poinards have often been ſet to work by minds inflamed by diſappointed love, and actuated by revenge—Will you wonder then, that the ties of relationſhip in ſuch a caſe have no force, and that a ſiſter forgets to be a ſiſter?

Now I know this to be her ſecret motive, (the more grating to her, as her pride is concerned to make her diſavow it) and can conſider it as joined with her former envy, and as ſtrengthened by a brother, who has ſuch an aſcendant over the whole family; and whoſe intereſt (ſlave to it as he always was) engaged him to ruin you with every-one: both poſſeſſed of the ears of all your family, and having it as much in their power as in their will to miſrepreſent all you ſay, all you do; ſuch ſubjects alſo as the rencounter, and Lovelace's want of morals, to expatiate upon: your whole family likewiſe avowedly attached to the odious man by means of the captivating propoſals he has made them—when I conſider all theſe things, I am full of apprehenſions for you.—O my dear, how will you be able to maintain your ground: I am ſure, (alas! I am too ſure) that they will ſubdue ſuch a fine ſpirit as yours, unuſed to oppoſition; and (tell it not in Gath) you muſt be Mrs. Solmes!

Mean time, it is now eaſy, as you will obſerve, to gueſs from what quarter the report I mentioned to you in one of my former, came. That the younger ſiſter has robbed the elder of her lover: for Betty whiſpered it, at the time ſhe whiſpered the reſt, that neither Lovelace nor you had done honourably by her young miſtreſs—How cruel, my dear, in you, to rob the poor Bella of the only lover ſhe ever had!—At the inſtant too that ſhe was priding herſelf, that now at laſt ſhe ſhould have it in her power not only to gratify her own ſuſceptibilities, but to give an example to the flirts of her ſex, (my worſhip's ſelf in her eye) how to govern their man with a ſilken rein, and without a kerb-bridle!

Upon the whole, I have now no doubt of their perſevering in favour of the deſpicable Solmes; and of their dependence upon the gentleneſs of your temper, and the regard you have for their favour, and for your own reputation. And now I am more than ever convinced of the propriety of the advice I formerly gave you, to keep in your own hands the eſtate bequeathed to you by your grandfather.—Had you done ſo, it would have procured you at leaſt an outward reſpect from your brother and ſiſter, which would have made them conceal the envy and ill-will that now are bursting upon you from hearts so narrow.

I must harp a little more upon this string—Do not you observe, how much your brother's influence has overtopped yours, since he has got into fortunes so considerable, and since you have given some of them an appetite to continue in themselves the possession of your estate, unless you comply with their terms?

I know your dutiful, your laudable motives; and one would have thought, that you might have trusted to a father who so dearly loved you. But had you been actually in possession of that estate, and living up to it, and upon it, (your youth protected from blighting tongues by the company of your prudent Norton, as you had proposed) do you think that your brother, grudging it to you at the time as he did, and looking upon it as his right as an only son, would have been practising about it, and aiming at it? I told you some time ago, that I thought your trials but proportioned to your prudence: but you will be more than woman, if you can extricate yourself with honour, having such violent spirits and sordid minds in some, and such tyrannical and despotick wills in others, to deal with. Indeed, all may be done, and the world be taught further to admire you for your blind duty and will-less resignation, if you can persuade yourself to be Mrs. Solmes.

I am pleased with the instances you give me of Mr. Lovelace's benevolence to his own tenants, and with his little gift to your uncle's. Mrs. Fortescue allows him to be the best of landlords: I might have told you that, had I thought it necessary to put you into some little conceit of him. He has qualities, in short, that may make him a tolerable creature on the other side of fifty: but God help the poor woman to whose lot he shall fall till then! Women, I should say, perhaps; since he may break half a dozen hearts before that time.—But to the point I was upon—Shall we not have reason to commend the tenant's grateful honesty, if we are told, that with joy the poor man called out your uncle; and on the spot paid him in part of his debt those two guineas?—But what shall we say of that landlord, who, though he knew the poor man to be quite destitute, could take it; and saying nothing while Mr. Lovelace staid, as soon as he was gone, tell of it in praise of the poor fellow's honesty?—Were this so, and were not that landlord related to my dearest friend, how should I despise such a wretch?—But perhaps the story is aggravated. Covetous people have every-one's ill-word: and so indeed they ought; because they are only solicitous to keep that which they prefer to every-one's good one.—Covetous indeed would they be who deserved neither, yet expected both!

I long for your next letter. Continue to be as particular as possible. I can think of no other subject but what relates to you and to your affairs: for I am, and ever will be, most affectionately, your own,

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XVI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

[HER PRECEDING NOT AT THAT TIME RECEIVED.]

FRIDAY, MARCH 3.

O My dear friend, I have had a sad conflict! Trial upon trial; conference upon conference!—But what law, what ceremony, can give a man a right to a heart which abhors him more than it does any living creature!

I hope my mother will be able to prevail for me.—But I will recount all, though I sit up the whole night to do it; for I have a vast deal to write; and will be as minute as you wish me to be.

I concluded my last in a fright. It was occasioned by a conversation that passed between my mother and my aunt, part of which Hannah overheard. I need not give you the particulars; since what I have to relate to you from different conversations that have passed between my mother and me in the space of a very few hours, will include them all. I will begin then.

I went down this morning when breakfast was ready with a very uneasy heart, from what Hannah had informed me of yesterday afternoon; wishing for an opportunity, however, to appeal to my mother, in hopes to engage her interest in my behalf, and purposing to try to find one when she retired to her own apartment after breakfast: but, unluckily, there was the odious Solmes sitting aquat between my mother and sister, with so much assurance in his looks!—But you know, my dear, that those we love not, cannot do any thing to please us.

Had the wretch kept his seat, it might have been well enough: but the bent and

and broad-ſhouldered creature muſt needs riſe, and ſtalk towards a chair; which was juſt by that which was ſet for me.

I removed it to a diſtance, as if to make way to my own; and down I ſat, abruptly I believe; what I had heard all in my head.

But this was not enough to daunt him. The man is a very confident, he is a very bold, ſtaring man!—Indeed, my dear, the man is very confident!

He took the removed chair, and drew it ſo near mine, ſquatting in it with his ugly weight, that he preſſed upon my hoop.—I was ſo offended (all I had heard, as I ſaid, in my head) that I removed to another chair. I own I had too little command of myſelf. It gave my brother and ſiſter too much advantage. I dare ſay they took it. But I did it involuntarily, I think. I could not help it.—I knew not what I did.

I ſaw that my father was exceſſively diſpleaſed. When angry, no man's countenance ever ſhews it ſo much as my father's. 'Clariſſa Harlowe!' ſaid he with a big voice—and there he ſtopped.—'Sir,' ſaid I, trembling and curtſeying, (for I had not then ſat down again:) and put my chair nearer the wretch, and ſat down—my face, as I could feel, all in a glow.

'Make tea, child,' ſaid my kind mamma: 'ſit by me, love; and make tea.'

I removed with pleaſure to the ſeat the man had quitted; and being thus indulgently put in employment, ſoon recovered myſelf; and in the courſe of the breakfaſting officiouſly aſked two or three queſtions of Mr. Solmes which I would not have done, but to make up with my father.—'Proud ſpirits may be brought to!' whiſperingly ſpoke my ſiſter to me, over her ſhoulder, with an air of triumph and ſcorn: but I did not mind her.

My mother was all kindneſs and condeſcenſion. I aſked her once if ſhe were pleaſed with the tea? She ſaid ſoftly, (and again called me dear) ſhe was pleaſed with all I did. I was very proud of this encouraging goodneſs: and all blew over, as I hoped, between my father and me; for he alſo ſpoke kindly to me two or three times.

Small accidents theſe, my dear, to trouble you with; only as they lead to greater, as you ſhall hear.

Before the uſual breakfaſt-time was over, my father withdrew with my mother, telling her he wanted to ſpeak to her. Then my ſiſter, and next my aunt, (who was with us) dropt away.

My brother gave himſelf ſome airs of inſult, which I underſtood well enough; but which Mr. Solmes could make nothing of: and at laſt he aroſe from his ſeat—'Siſter,' ſaid he, 'I have a curioſity to ſhew you. I will fetch it.' And away he went; ſhutting the door cloſe after him.

I ſaw what all this was for. I aroſe; the man hemming up for a ſpeech, riſing, and beginning to ſet his ſplay-feet [indeed, my dear, the man in all his ways is hateful to me] in an approaching poſture.—'I will ſave my brother the trouble of bringing to me his curioſity,' ſaid I. I curtſeyed—'Your ſervant, Sir.'—The man cried, 'Madam, Madam,' twice, and looked like a fool.—But away I went—to find my brother, to ſave my word.—But my brother, indifferent as the weather was, was gone to walk in the garden with my ſiſter. A plain caſe, that he had left his curioſity with me, and deſigned to ſhew me no other.

I had but juſt got into my own apartment, and began to think of ſending Hannah to beg an audience of my mother, (the more encouraged by her condeſcending goodneſs at breakfaſt) when Shorey her woman brought me her commands to attend her in her cloſet.

My father, Hannah told me, was juſt gone out of it with a poſitive angry countenance. Then I as much dreaded the audience as I had wiſhed for it before.

I went down however; but, apprehending the ſubject ſhe intended to talk to me upon, approached her trembling, and my heart in viſible palpitations.

She ſaw my concern. Holding out her kind arms, as ſhe ſat, 'Come kiſs me, my dear,' ſaid ſhe, with a ſmile like a ſun-beam breaking through the cloud that overſhadowed her naturally benign aſpect. 'Why flutters my jewel ſo?'

This preparative ſweetneſs, with her goodneſs juſt before, confirmed my apprehenſions. My mother ſaw the bitter pill wanted gilding.

'O my mamma!' was all I could ſay; and I claſped my arms round her neck, and my face ſunk into her boſom.

'My child! my child! reſtrain,' ſaid ſhe, 'your powers of moving! I dare not elſe truſt myſelf with you.'—And my tears trickled down her boſom, as her's bedewed my neck.

O the words of kindneſs, all to be expreſſed in vain, that flowed from her lips!

'Lift up your ſweet face, my beſt child, my own Clariſſa Harlowe!—O my

'my daughter, beſt-beloved of my heart, 'lift up a face ſo ever-amiable to me!— 'Why theſe ſobs?—Is an apprehended 'duty ſo affecting a thing, that before I 'can ſpeak—But I am glad, my love, 'you can gueſs at what I have to ſay to 'you. I am ſpared the pains of break- 'ing to you what was a taſk upon me 'reluctantly enough undertaken to break 'to you.'

Then riſing, ſhe drew a chair near her own, and made me ſit down by her, overwhelmed as I was with tears of apprehenſion of what ſhe had to ſay, and of gratitude for her truly maternal goodneſs to me—Sobs ſtill my only language.

And drawing her chair ſtill nearer to mine, ſhe put her arms round my neck, and my glowing cheek wet with my tears, cloſe to her own: 'Let me talk 'to you, my child. Since ſilence is 'your choice, hearken to me, and be 'ſilent.

'You know, my dear, what I every 'day forego, and undergo, for the ſake 'of peace. Your papa is a very good 'man, and means well; but he will not 'be controuled; nor yet perſuaded. 'You have ſometimes ſeemed to pity me, 'that I am obliged to give up every 'point. Poor man! his reputation the 'leſs for it; mine the greater: yet would 'I not have this credit, if I could help 'it, at ſo dear a rate to him and to myſelf. 'You are a dutiful, a prudent, and a 'wiſe child,' ſhe was pleaſed to ſay, in hope, no doubt, to make me ſo: 'you 'would not add, I am ſure, to my trou- 'ble; you would not wilfully break that 'peace which coſts your mother ſo much 'to preſerve. Obedience is better than 'ſacrifice. O my Clary Harlowe, re- 'joice my heart, by telling me I have 'apprehended too much!—I ſee your 'concern! I ſee your perplexity! I ſee 'your conflict,' [looſing her arm, and riſing, not willing I ſhould ſee how much ſhe herſelf was affected.] 'I will leave 'you a moment.—Anſwer me not: [For I was eſſaying to ſpeak, and had, as ſoon as ſhe took her dear cheek from mine dropt down on my knees, my hands claſped, and lifted up in a ſupplicating manner.] 'I am 'not prepared for your irreſiſtible expoſ- 'tulation,' ſhe was pleaſed to ſay. 'I will 'leave you to recollection: and I charge 'you, on my bleſſing, that all this my 'truly maternal tenderneſs be not thrown 'away upon you.'

And then ſhe withdrew into the next apartment.

She ſoon returned, having recovered more ſtedineſs.

'Look up to me, my Clary Harlowe —'No ſullenneſs, I hope!'

'No, indeed, my ever-to-be-revered 'mamma.'—And I aroſe. I bent my knee.

She raiſed me. 'No kneeling to me, 'but with knees of duty and compliance. 'Your heart, not your knees, muſt bend. 'It is abſolutely determined—Prepare 'yourſelf therefore to receive your fa- 'ther, when he viſits you by and by, as 'he would wiſh to receive you. But on 'this one quarter of an hour depends 'the peace of my future life, the ſatiſ- 'faction of all the family, and your own 'ſecurity from a man of violence: and 'I charge you beſides, on my bleſſing, 'that you think of being Mrs. Solmes.'

There went the dagger to my heart, and down I ſunk: and when I recovered, found myſelf in the arms of my Hannah, my ſiſter's Betty holding open my reluctantly-opened palm, my laces cut, my linen ſcented with hartſhorn; and my mother gone. Had I been leſs kindly treated, the hated name ſtill forborne to be mentioned, or mentioned with a little more preparation and reſerve, I had ſtood the horrid ſound with leſs viſible emotion—But to be bid, on the bleſſing of a mother ſo dearly beloved, ſo truly reverenced, to think of being Mrs. SOLMES—what a denunciation was that!

Shorey came in with a meſſage, (delivered in her ſolemn way,) 'Your mam- 'ma, Miſs, is concerned for your diſ- 'order: ſhe expects you down again in 'an hour; and bid me ſay, that ſhe then 'hopes every thing from your duty.'

I made no reply; for what could I ſay? And leaning upon my Hannah's arm, withdrew to my own apartment. There you will gueſs how the greateſt part of the hour was employed.

Within that time, my mother came up to me.

'I love,' ſhe was pleaſed to ſay, 'to 'come into this apartment!—No emo- 'tions, child! No flutters!—Am I not 'your mother?—Am I not your fond, 'your indulgent mother?—Do not diſ- 'compoſe me by diſcompoſing yourſelf! 'Do not occaſion me uneaſineſs, when 'I would give you nothing but pleaſure. 'Come, my dear, we will go into your 'cloſet.'

She took my hand, led the way, and made me ſit down by her: and after ſhe had enquired how I did, ſhe began in a ſtrain as if ſhe had ſuppoſed I had made uſe of the intervening ſpace to overcome all my objections.

She was pleaſed to tell me, that my father father and she, in order to spare my natural modesty, had taken the whole affair upon themselves—

'Hear me out; and then speak;' for I was going to expostulate. 'You are 'no stranger to the end of Mr. Solmes's 'visits—'

'O Madam!'

'Hear me out; and then speak.—He 'is not indeed every thing I wish him 'to be: but he is a man of probity, and 'has no vices—'

'No vices, Madam!'

'Hear me out, child—You have not 'behaved much amiss to him: we have 'seen with pleasure that you have not—'

'O Madam, must I not now speak!'

'I shall have done presently — A 'young creature of your virtuous and 'pious turn,' she was pleased to say, 'cannot surely love a profligate: you love 'your brother too well, to wish to marry 'one who had like to have killed him, 'and who threatened your uncles, and 'defies us all. You have had your own 'way six or seven times: we want to secure you against a man so vile. Tell 'me (I have a right to know) whether 'you prefer this man to all others?—'Yet God forbid that I should know 'you do! for such a declaration would 'make us all miserable. Yet tell me, 'are your affections engaged to this 'man?'

I knew what the inference would be, if I had said they were not.

'You hesitate—you answer me not—'you cannot answer me.'—Rising.—Never more will I look upon you with an 'eye of favour!'

'O Madam, Madam! Kill me not 'with your displeasure—I would not. 'I need not, hesitate one moment, did 'I not dread the inference, if I answer 'you as you wish.—Yet, be that inference what it will, your threatened 'displeasure will make me speak. And 'I declare to you, that I know not my 'own heart, if it be not absolutely free. 'And pray, let me ask my dearest mamma, in what has my conduct been 'faulty, that, like a giddy creature, I 'must be forced to marry, to save me 'from—From what? Let me beseech 'you, Madam, to be the guardian of 'my reputation—let not your Clarissa 'be precipitated into a state she wishes 'not to enter into with any man! And 'this upon a supposition that otherwise 'she shall marry herself, and disgrace 'her whole family.'

'Well, then, Clary,' [passing over the force of my plea] 'if your heart be 'free—'

'O my beloved mamma, let the usual 'generosity of your dear heart operate 'in my favour. Urge not upon me the 'inference that made me hesitate.'

'I won't be interrupted, Clary—You 'have seen in my behaviour to you, on 'this occasion, a truly maternal tenderness; you have observed that I have 'undertaken this task with some reluctance, because the man is not everything: and because I know you carry 'your notions of perfection in a man 'too high—'

'Dearest Madam, this one time excuse me!—Is there then any danger 'that I should be guilty of an imprudent thing for the man's sake you hint 'at?'

'Again interrupted!—Am I to be 'questioned, and argued with? You 'know this won't do somewhere else. 'You know it won't. What reason 'then, ungenerous girl, can you have 'for arguing with me thus, but because 'you think from my indulgence to you, 'you may?'

'What can I say? What can I do? 'What must that cause be that will not 'bear being argued upon?'

'Again! Clary Harlowe!'

'Dearest Madam, forgive me: it was 'always my pride and my pleasure to 'obey you. But look upon that man '—see but the disagreeableness of his 'person.'

'Now, Clary, do I see whose person 'you have in your eye!—Now is Mr. 'Solmes, I see, but comparatively disagreeable; disagreeable only as another 'man has a much more specious person.'

'But, Madam, are not his manners 'equally so?—Is not his person the true 'representative of his mind?—That 'other man is not, shall not be anything to me, release me but from this 'one man, whom my heart, unbidden, 'resists.'

'Condition thus with your father. 'Will he bear, do you think, to be thus 'dialogued with? Have I not conjured 'you, as you value my peace—What is 'it that I do not give up?—This very 'task, because I apprehended you would 'not be easily persuaded, is a task indeed 'upon me. And will you give up nothing? Have you not refused as many 'as have been offered to you? If you 'would not have us guess for whom, 'comply; for comply you must, or be 'looked upon as in a state of defiance 'with your whole family.'

And saying this, she arose, and went from me. But at the chamber-door stopped; and turned back: 'I will not 'say below in what a disposition I leave 'you. Consider of every-thing. The 'matter is resolved upon. As you va-'lue your father's blessing and mine, and 'the satisfaction of all the family, re-'solve to comply. I will leave you for 'a few moments. I will come up to you 'again. See that I find you as I wish to 'find you; and since your heart is free, 'let your duty govern it.'

In about half an hour, my mother returned. She found me in tears. She took my hand: 'It is my part ever-'more,' said she, 'to be of the acknow-'ledging side. I believe I have need-'lessly exposed myself to your opposi-'tion, by the method I have taken with 'you. I first began as if I expected a 'denial, and by my indulgence brought 'it upon myself.'

'Do not, my dearest mamma! do 'not say so!'

'Were the occasion for this debate,' proceeded she, 'to have risen from my-'self; were it in my power to dispense 'with your compliance; you too well 'know what you can do with me.'

Would any-body, my dear Miss Howe, wish to marry, who sees a wife of such a temper, and blessed with such an under-standing as my mother is noted for, not only deprived of all power, but obliged to be even active in bringing to bear points of high importance, which she thinks ought not to be insisted upon?

'When I came to you a second time,' proceeded she, 'knowing that your op-'position would avail you nothing, I re-'fused to hear your reasons: and in this 'I was wrong too, because a young 'creature who loves to reason, and used 'to love to be convinced by reason, 'ought to have all her objections heard. 'I now therefore, this third time, see 'you; and am come resolved to hear all 'you have to say: and let me, my dear, 'by my patience engage your gratitude; 'your generosity, I will call it; because 'it is to you I speak, who used to have 'a mind wholly generous.—Let me, if 'your heart be really free, let me see 'what it will induce you to do to oblige 'me: and so as you permit your usual 'discretion to govern you, I will hear 'all you have to say; but with this inti-'mation, that say what you will, it will 'be of no avail elsewhere.'

'What a dreadful saying is that! But 'could I engage your pity, Madam, it 'would be somewhat.'

'You have as much of my pity, as of 'my love. But what is person, Clary, 'with one of your prudence, and your 'heart disengaged?'

'Should the eye be disgusted, when 'the heart is to be engaged?—O Ma-'dam, who can think of marrying when 'the heart is shocked at the first appear-'ance, and where the disgust must be 'confirmed by every conversation after-'wards?'

'This, Clary, is owing to your pre-'possession. Let me not have cause to 'regret that noble firmness of mind in so 'young a creature which I thought your 'glory, and which was my boast in your 'character. In this instance it would be 'obstinacy, and want of duty.—Have 'you not made objections to several—'

'That was to their minds, to their 'principles, Madam.—But this man—'

'Is an honest man, Clary Harlowe. 'He has a good mind. He is a virtuous 'man.'

'He an honest man? His a good mind, 'Madam? He a virtuous man!'

'Nobody denies him these qualities.'

'Can he be an honest man who offers 'terms that will rob all his own relations 'of their just expectations — Can his 'mind be good?'

'You, Clary Harlowe, for whose 'sake he offers so much, are the last 'person that should make this observa-'tion.'

'Give me leave to say, Madam, that 'a person preferring happiness to for-'tune, as I do; that want not even what 'I have, and can give up the use of that, 'as an instance of duty—'

'No more, no more of your merits! 'You know you will be a gainer by that 'cheerful instance of your duty; not a 'loser. You know you have but cast 'your bread upon the waters—so no more 'of that!—For it is not understood as a 'merit by every-body, I assure you; 'though I think it a high one; and so 'did your father and uncles at the time.'

'At the time, Madam!—How un-'worthily do my brother and sister, who 'are afraid that the favour I was so 'lately in—'

'I hear nothing against your brother 'and sister—What family-feuds have I 'in prospect, at a time when I hoped 'most comfort from you all?'

'God bless my brother and sister in 'all their worthy views! You shall have 'no family-feuds, if I can prevent 'them. You yourself, Madam, shall 'tell me what I shall bear from them, 'and I will bear it: but let my actions, 'not their misrepresentations, (as I am 'sure by the disgraceful prohibitions I 'have met with has been the case) speak 'for me.'

Just then, up came my father, with a ſternneſs in his looks that made me tremble.—He took two or three turns about my chamber, though pained by his gout.—And then ſaid to my mother, who was ſilent as ſoon as ſhe ſaw him—

'My dear, you are long abſent.—'Dinner is near ready. What you had 'to ſay, lay in a very little compaſs. 'Surely, you have nothing to do but to 'declare your will, and my will—But 'perhaps you may be talking of the pre-'parations—Let us have you ſoon down '—Your daughter in your hand, if 'worthy of the name.'

And down he went, caſting his eye upon me with a look ſo ſtern, that I was unable to ſay one word to him, or even for a few minutes to my mother.

Was not this very intimidating, my dear?

My mother, ſeeing my concern, ſeemed to pity me. She called me her good child, and kiſſed me; and told me that my father ſhould not know I had made ſuch oppoſition. 'He has 'kindly furniſhed us with an excuſe 'for being ſo long together,' ſaid ſhe. 'Come, my dear—dinner will be upon 'table preſently—Shall we go down?' And took my hand.

This made me ſtart. 'What, Ma-'dam, go down to let it be ſuppoſed we 'were talking of preparations!—O my 'beloved mamma, command me not 'down upon ſuch a ſuppoſition.'

'You ſee, child, that to ſtay longer 'together, will be owning that you are 'debating about an abſolute duty: and 'that will not be borne. Did not your 'father himſelf ſome days ago tell you, 'he would be obeyed? I will a third 'time leave you. I muſt ſay ſomething 'by way of excuſe for you: and that 'you deſire not to go down to dinner '—That your modeſty on the occa-'ſion—'

'O Madam! ſay not my modeſty on 'ſuch an occaſion: for that will be to 'give hope—'

'And deſign you not to give hope? '—Perverſe girl!'—Riſing, and flinging from me. 'Take more time for conſi-'deration!—Since it is neceſſary, take 'more time—And when I ſee you next, 'let me know what blame I have to caſt 'upon myſelf, or to bear from your fa-'ther, for my indulgence to you.'

She made, however, a little ſtop at the chamber-door; and ſeemed to expect that I would have beſought her to make the gentleſt conſtruction for me; for, heſitating, ſhe was pleaſed to ſay, 'I 'ſuppoſe you would not have me make a report—'

'O Madam,' interrupted I, 'whoſe 'favour can I hope for, if I loſe my 'mamma's?'

To have deſired a favourable report, you know, my dear, would have been qualifying upon a point that I was too much determined upon to give room for any of my friends to think I have the leaſt heſitation about it. And ſo my mother went down ſtairs.

I will depoſit thus far; and, as I know you will not think me too minute in my relation of particulars ſo very intereſting to one you honour with your love, proceed in the ſame way. As matters ſtand, I don't care to have papers ſo freely written about me.

Pray let Robert call every day, if you can ſpare him, whether I have any-thing ready or not.

I ſhould be glad you would not ſend him empty-handed. What a generoſity will it be in you, to write as frequently from friendſhip, as I am forced to do from misfortune! The letters being taken away will be an aſſurance that you have them. As I ſhall write and depoſit as I have opportunity, the formality of ſuper and ſub-ſcription will be excuſed. For I need not ſay how much I am your ſincere and ever-affectionate,

CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XVII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

MY mother on her return, which was as ſoon as ſhe had dined, was pleaſed to inform me, that ſhe had told my father, on his queſtioning her about my cheerful compliance, (for it ſeems the cheerful was all that was doubted) that ſhe was willing, on ſo material a point, to give a child whom ſhe had ſo much reaſon to love, (as ſhe condeſcended to acknowledge were her words) liberty to ſay all that was in her heart to ſay, that her compliance might be the freer: letting him know, that when he came up, ſhe was attending to my pleas; for that ſhe found I had rather not marry at all.

She told me, that to this my father angrily ſaid, 'Let her take care—let her 'take care—that ſhe give me not ground 'to ſuſpect her of a preference ſome-'where elſe. But, if it be to eaſe her 'heart, and not to diſpute my will, you 'may hear her out.'

'So Clary,' ſaid my mother, 'I am 'returned in a temper accordingly: and 'I hope you will not again, by your 'peremptorineſs, ſhew me, how I ought 'to treat you.'

'Indeed,

'Indeed, Madam, you did me juſtice, 'to ſay I have no inclination to marry at 'all. I have not, I hope, made myſelf 'ſo very unuſeful in my papa's family, 'as—'

'No more of your merits, Clary! 'You have been a good child. You 'have eaſed me of all the family-cares: 'but do not now give more than ever 'you relieved me from. You have 'been amply repaid in the reputation 'your ſkill and management have given 'you: but now there is ſoon to be a 'period to all thoſe aſſiſtances from you. 'If you marry, there will be a natural, 'and, if to pleaſe us, a deſirable pe-'riod; becauſe your own family will 'employ all your talents in that way: if 'you do not, there will be a period like-'wiſe, but not a natural one—You un-'derſtand me, child.'

I wept.

'I have made enquiry already after a 'houſekeeper. I would have had your 'good Norton; but I ſuppoſe you will 'yourſelf wiſh to have the worthy wo-'man with you. If you deſire it, that 'ſhall be agreed upon for you.'

'But why, deareſt Madam, why am 'I, the youngeſt, to be precipitated into 'a ſtate, that I am very far from wiſh-'ing to enter into with any-body?'

'You are going to queſtion me, I 'ſuppoſe, why your ſiſter is not thought 'of for Mr Solmes?'

'I hope, Madam, it will not diſpleaſe 'you, if I were?'

'I might refer you for an anſwer to 'your father.—Mr. Solmes has reaſons 'for preferring you.'

'And I have reaſons, Madam, for 'diſliking him.—And why am I—'

'This quickneſs upon me,' interrupt-ed my mother, 'is not to be borne! I 'am gone, and your father comes, if I 'can do no good with you.'

I wept for vexation. 'This is all, 'all, my brother's doings—his graſping 'views!'

'No reflections upon your brother: 'he has entirely the honour of the fa-'mily at heart.'

'I would no more diſhonour my fa-'mily, Madam, than my brother would.'

'I believe it: but I hope you will 'allow your father, and me, and your 'uncles, to judge what will do it ho-'nour, what diſhonour.'

I then offered to live ſingle; never to marry at all; or never but with their full approbation.

'If you mean to ſhew your duty, and 'your obedience, Clary, you muſt ſhew 'it in our way, not in your own.'

'I hope, Madam, that I have not ſo 'behaved hitherto, as to render ſuch a 'trial of my obedience neceſſary.'

'Yes, Clary, I cannot but ſay that 'you have hitherto behaved extremely 'well: but you have had no trials till 'now; and I hope, that now you are 'called to one, you will not fail in it. 'Parents,' proceeded ſhe, 'when 'children are young, are pleaſed with 'every-thing they do. You have been 'a good child upon the whole: but we 'have hitherto rather complied with 'you, than you with us. Now that you 'are grown up to marriageable years, is 'the teſt; eſpecially as your grandfather 'has made you independent, as we may 'ſay, in preference to thoſe who had 'prior expectations upon that eſtate.'

'Madam, my grandfather knew, and 'expreſsly mentioned in his will his de-'ſire, that my father will more than 'make it up to my ſiſter. I did nothing 'but what I thought my duty to pro-'cure his favour. It was rather a mark 'of his affection, than any advantage 'to me: for, do I either ſeek or wiſh to 'be independent? Were I to be queen 'of the univerſe, that dignity ſhould 'not abſolve me from my duty to you 'and to my father. I would kneel for 'your bleſſings, were it in the preſence 'of millions—So that—'

'I am loth to interrupt you, Clary; 'though you could more than once 'break in upon me. You are young 'and unbroken: but, with all this 'oſtentation of your duty, I deſire you 'to ſhew a little more deference to me 'when I am ſpeaking.'

'I beg your pardon, dear Madam, 'and your patience with me on ſuch an 'occaſion as this. If I did not ſpeak 'with earneſtneſs upon it, I ſhould be 'ſuppoſed to have only maidenly objec-'tions againſt a man I never can endure.'

'Clary Harlowe!'

'Deareſt, deareſt Madam, permit 'me to ſpeak what I have to ſay, this 'once—It is hard, it is very hard, to be 'forbidden to enter into the cauſe of 'all theſe miſunderſtandings, becauſe I 'muſt not ſpeak diſreſpectfully of one 'who ſuppoſes me in the way of his 'ambition, and treats me like a ſlave—'

'Whither, whither, Clary!'

'My deareſt mamma!—My duty will 'not permit me ſo far to ſuppoſe my 'father arbitrary, as to make a plea of 'that arbitrarineſs to you.'

'How now, Clary!—O girl!'

'Your patience, my deareſt mamma: '—you were pleaſed to ſay, you would 'hear me with patience.—PERSON in 'a man

'a man is nothing, becauſe I am ſuppoſed to be prudent: ſo my eye is to be diſguſted, and my reaſon not convinced.'

'Girl, girl!'

'Thus are my imputed good qualities to be made my puniſhment; and I am to be wedded to a monſter—'

'[Aſtoniſhing!—Can this, Clariſſa, be from you?'

'The man, Madam, perſon and mind, is a monſter in my eye.]—And that I may be induced to bear this treatment, I am to be complimented with being indifferent to all men: yet, at other times, and to ſerve other purpoſes, be thought prepoſſeſſed in favour of a man againſt whoſe moral character lie juſt objections.—Confined, as if, like the giddieſt of creatures, I would run away with this man, and diſgrace my whole family!—O my deareſt mamma! who can be patient under ſuch treatment?'

'Now Clary, I ſuppoſe you will allow me to ſpeak. I think I have had patience indeed with you. Could I have thought—But I will put all upon a ſhort iſſue. Your mother, Clariſſa, ſhall ſhew you an example of that patience you ſo boldly claim from her, without having any yourſelf.'

'O my dear, how my mother's condeſcenſion diſtreſſed me at the time!—Infinitely more diſtreſſed me, than rigour could have done. But ſhe knew, ſhe was to be ſure aware, that ſhe was put upon a harſh, upon an unreaſonable ſervice, let me ſay, or ſhe would not, ſhe could not, have had ſo much patience with me.

'Let me tell you then,' proceeded ſhe, 'that all lies in a ſmall compaſs, as your father ſaid.—You have been hitherto, as you are pretty ready to plead, a dutiful child. You have indeed had no cauſe to be otherwiſe. No child was ever more favoured. Whether you will diſcredit all your paſt behaviour; whether, at a time and upon an occaſion, that the higheſt inſtance of duty is expected from you; (an inſtance that is to crown all) and when you declare that your heart is free—you will give that inſtance; or whether, having a view to the independence you may claim, (for ſo, Clary, whatever be your motive, it will be judged) and which any man you favour can aſſert for you againſt us all; or rather for himſelf in ſpite of us—whether, I ſay, you will break with us all, and ſtand in defiance of a jealous father, needleſsly jealous, I will venture to ſay, of the prerogatives of his ſex, as to me, and ſtill ten times more jealous of the authority of a father—this is now the point with us. You know your father has made it a point; and did he ever give up one he thought he had a right to carry?'

'Too true!' thought I to myſelf. 'And now my brother has engaged my father, his fine ſcheme will walk alone, without needing his leading-ſtrings; and it is become my father's will that I oppoſe: not my brother's graſping views.'

I was ſilent. To ſay the truth, I was juſt then ſullenly ſilent. My heart was too big. I thought it was hard to be thus given up by my mother, and that ſhe ſhould make a will ſo uncontroulable as my brother's, her will.—My mother, my dear, though I muſt not ſay ſo, was not obliged to marry againſt her liking. My mother loved my father.

My ſilence availed me ſtill leſs.

'I ſee, my dear,' ſaid ſhe, 'that you are convinced. Now, my good child, now, my Clary, do I love you! It ſhall not be known, that you have argued with me at all. All ſhall be imputed to that modeſty which has ever ſo much diſtinguiſhed you. You ſhall have the full merit of you reſignation.'

I wept.

She tenderly wiped the tears from my eyes, and kiſſed my cheek.—'Your father expects you down with a cheerful countenance—but I will excuſe your going. All your ſcruples, you ſee, have met with an indulgence truly maternal from me. I rejoice in the hope that you are convinced. This indeed ſeems to be a proof of the truth of your agreeable declaration, that your heart is free.

Did not this ſeem to border upon cruelty, my dear, in ſo indulgent a mother?—It would be wicked [Would it not?] to ſuppoſe my mother capable of art—but ſhe is put upon it; and obliged to take methods to which her heart is naturally above ſtooping; and all intended for my good, becauſe ſhe ſees that no arguing will be admitted anywhere elſe!

'I will go down,' proceeded ſhe, 'and excuſe your attendance, at afternoon-tea, as I did to dinner: for I know you will have ſome little reluctances to ſubdue. I will allow you thoſe; and alſo ſome little natural ſhyneſſes—And ſo you ſhall not come down, if

'if you chuſe not to come down—Only, 'my dear, do not diſgrace my report 'when you come to ſupper. And be 'ſure behave as you uſed to do to your 'brother and ſiſter; for your behaviour 'to them will be one teſt of your cheer-'ful obedience to us. I adviſe as a 'friend, you ſee, rather than command 'as a mother—So adieu, my love.' And again ſhe kiſſed me; and was going.

'O my dear mamma,' ſaid I, 'for-'give me!—But ſurely you cannot be-'lieve I can ever think of having that 'man!'

She was very angry, and ſeemed to be greatly diſappointed. She threatened to turn me over to my father and my uncles:—ſhe, however, bid me (generouſly bid me) conſider what a handle I gave to my brother and ſiſter, if I thought they had views to ſerve by making my uncles diſſatisfied with me.

'I,' ſaid ſhe, in a milder accent, 'have early ſaid all that I thought could 'be ſaid againſt the preſent propoſal, on 'a ſuppoſition that you, who have re-'fuſed ſeveral others, (whom I own to 'be preferable as to perſon) would not 'approve of it; and could I have ſuc-'ceeded, you, Clary, had never heard 'of it. But if I could not, how can you 'expect to prevail? My great ends, in 'the taſk I have undertaken, are the 'preſervation of the family-peace, ſo 'likely to be overturned; to reinſtate 'you in the affections of your father 'and uncles: and to preſerve you from 'a man of violence.—Your father, you 'muſt needs think, will flame out, upon 'your refuſal to comply: your uncles 'are ſo thoroughly convinced of the 'conſiſtency of the meaſure with their 'favourite views of aggrandizing the 'family, that they are as much deter-'mined as your father—Your aunt 'Hervey and your uncle Hervey are of 'the ſame party. And it is hard, if a 'father and mother, and uncles, and 'aunt, all conjoined, cannot be allowed 'to direct your choice.—Surely, my 'dear girl,' proceeded ſhe, [for I was 'ſilent all this time] 'it cannot be, that 'you are the more averſe, becauſe the 'family views will be promoted by the 'match—This, I aſſure you, is what 'every-body muſt think, if you com-'ply not. Nor, while the man ſo ob-'noxious to us all, remains unmarried, 'and buzzes about you, will the ſtrong-'eſt aſſeverations you can make of your 'reſolution and wiſhes to live ſingle, be 'in the leaſt regarded. And well you 'know, that were Mr. Lovelace an 'angel, and your father had made it a 'point that you ſhould not have him, 'it would be in vain to diſpute his will. 'As to the prohibition laid upon you, '(much as I will own againſt my liking) 'that is owing to the belief that you 'correſpond by Miſs Howe's means 'with that man; nor do I doubt that 'you did ſo.'

I anſwered to every article, in ſuch a manner, as I am ſure would have ſatisfied her, could ſhe have been permitted to judge for herſelf; and I then inveighed with bitterneſs againſt the diſgraceful prohibitions laid upon me.

They would ſerve to ſhew me, ſhe was pleaſed to ſay, how much in earneſt my father was. They might be taken off, whenever I thought fit, and no harm done, nor diſgrace received. But if I were to be contumacious, I might thank myſelf for all that would follow.

I ſighed. I wept. I was ſilent.

'Shall I, Clary,' ſaid ſhe, 'ſhall I 'tell your father that theſe prohibitions 'are as unneceſſary as I hoped they 'would be? That you know your duty, 'and will not offer to controvert his 'will? What ſay you, my love?'

'O Madam! what can I ſay to queſ-'tions ſo indulgently put?—I do in-'deed know my duty: no creature in 'the world is more willing to practiſe 'it: but, pardon me, deareſt Madam, 'if I ſay that I muſt bear theſe prohi-'bitions, if I am to pay ſo dear to have 'them taken off.'

Determined and perverſe, my dear mamma called me: and after walking twice or thrice in anger about the room, ſhe turned to me—'Your heart free, 'Clariſſa! How can you tell me your 'heart is free? Such extraordinary an-'tipathies to a particular perſon muſt 'be owing to extraordinary prepoſſeſ-'ſions in another's favour!—Tell me, 'Clary; and tell me truly—Do you 'not continue to correſpond with Mr. 'Lovelace?'

'Deareſt Madam,' replied I, 'you 'know my motives: to prevent miſ-'chief, I anſwered his letters. The 'reaſons for our apprehenſions of this 'ſort are not over.'

'I own to you, Clary, (although now 'I would not have it known) that I 'once thought a little qualifying among 'ſuch violent ſpirits was not amiſs. I 'did not know but all things would 'come round again by the mediation of 'Lord M. and his two ſiſters: but as 'they all three think proper to reſent 'for their nephew; and as their ne-

'phew thinks fit to deny us all; and as 'terms are offered on the other hand, 'that could not be aſked, which will 'very pobably prevent your grandfa- 'ther's eſtate going out of the family, 'and may be a means to bring ſtill 'greater into it; I ſee not that the con- 'tinuance of your correſpondence with 'him either can or ought to be permit- 'ted. I therefore now forbid it to you, 'as you value my favour.'

'Be pleaſed, Madam, only to adviſe 'me how to break it off with ſafety to 'my brother and uncles; and it is all 'I wiſh for. Would to Heaven, the 'man ſo hated had not the pretence 'make of having been too violently 'treated, when he meant peace and re- 'conciliation! It would always have 'been in my own power to have broke 'with him. His reputed immoralities 'would have given me a juſt pretence 'at any time to do ſo—But, Madam, 'as my uncles and my brother will keep 'no meaſures; as he has heard what 'the view is; and as I have reaſon to 'think that he is only reſtrained by his 'regard for me from reſenting their 'violent treatment of him and his fa- 'mily; what can I do? Would you 'have me, Madam, make him deſpe- 'rate?

'The law will protect us, child! 'Offended magiſtracy will aſſert itſelf.'

'But, Madam, may not ſome dread- 'ful miſchief firſt happen?—The law 'aſſerts not itſelf, till it is offended.'

'You have made offers, Clary, if you 'might be obliged in the point in queſ- 'tion—Are you really in earneſt, were 'you to be complied with, to break off 'all correſpondence with Mr. Lovelace? '—Let me know this.'

'Indeed I am; and I will. You, 'Madam, ſhall ſee all the letters that 'have paſſed between us. You ſhall ſee 'I have given him no encouragement 'independent of my duty. And when 'you have ſeen them, you will be bet- 'ter able to direct me how, on the con- 'dition I have offered, to break entire- 'ly with him.'

'I take you at your word, Clariſſa— 'Give me his letters; and the copies of 'yours.'

'I am ſure, Madam, you will keep 'the knowledge that I write, and what 'I write.'

'No conditions with your mother— 'Surely my prudence may be truſted to.'

I begged her pardon; and beſought her to take the key of the private drawer in my eſcritoire, where they lay, that ſhe herſelf might ſee that I had no reſerves to my mother.

She did; and took all his letters, and the copies of mine.—'Unconditioned 'with,' ſhe was pleaſed to ſay, 'they 'ſhall be yours again, unſeen by any- 'body elſe.'

I thanked her; and ſhe withdrew to read them; ſaying, She would return them, when ſhe had.

You, my dear, have ſeen all the letters that paſſed between Mr. Lovelace and me, till my laſt return from you. You have acknowledged that he has nothing to boaſt of from them. Three others I have received ſince, by the private conveyance I told you of: the laſt I have not yet anſwered.

In theſe three, as in thoſe you have ſeen, after having beſought my favour, and in the moſt earneſt manner profeſſed the ardour of his paſſion for me; and ſet forth the indignities done him; the defiances my brother throws out againſt him in all companies, the menaces, and hoſtile appearances of my uncles wherever they go; and the methods they take to defame him; he declares, That neither his own honour, nor the honour of his family, (involved as that is in the undiſtinguiſhing reflections caſt upon him for an unhappy affair which he would have ſhunned, but could not) permit him to bear theſe confirmed indignities: that as my inclinations, if not favourable to him, cannot be, nor are, to ſuch a man as the newly-introduced Solmes, he is intereſted the more to reſent my brother's behaviour, who to every-body avows his rancour and malice; and glories in the probability he has, through the addreſs of this Solmes, of mortifying me, and avenging himſelf on him: that it is impoſſible he ſhould not think himſelf concerned to fruſtrate a meaſure ſo directly levelled at him, had he not a ſtill higher motive for hoping to fruſtrate it: that I muſt forgive him, if he enter into conference with Solmes upon it. He earneſtly inſiſts (upon what he has ſo often propoſed) that I will give him leave, in company with Lord M. to wait upon my uncles, and even upon my father—And he promiſes patience, if new provocations, abſolutely beneath a man to bear, be not given: which by the way I am far from being able to engage for.

In my anſwer, I abſolutely declare, as I tell him I have often done, That he is to expect no favour from me, againſt the approbation of my friends: that I am sure their consents for his visiting any of them will never be obtained: that I will not be either so undutiful, or so indiscreet, as to suffer my interests to be separated from the interests of my family, for any man upon earth: that I do not think myself obliged to him for the forbearance I desire one flaming spirit to have with others: that in this desire I require nothing of him, but what prudence, justice, and the laws of his country, require: that if he has any expectations of favour from me, on that account, he deceives himself: that I have no inclination, as I have often told him, to change my condition: that I cannot allow myself to correspond with him any longer in this clandestine manner: it is mean, low, undutiful, I tell him; and has a giddy appearance, which cannot be excused: that therefore he is not to expect that I will continue it.

To this, in his last, among other things, he replies, That if I am actually determined to break off all correspondence with him, he must conclude, that it is with a view to become the wife of a man, whom no woman of honour and fortune can think tolerable. And in that case, I must excuse him for saying, that he shall neither be able to bear the thoughts of losing for ever a person in whom all his present and all his future hopes are centred; nor support himself with patience under the insolent triumphs of my brother upon it. But that, nevertheless, he will not threaten either his own life, or that of any other man. He must take his resolutions as such a dreaded event shall impel him, at the time. If he shall know that it will have my consent, he must endeavour to resign to his destiny: but if it be brought about by compulsion, he shall not be able to answer for the consequence.

I will send you these letters for your perusal in a few days. I would inclose them; but that it is possible something may happen, which may make my mother require to re-peruse them.—When you see them, you will observe how he endeavours to hold me to this correspondence.

In about an hour my mother returned. 'Take your letters, Clary: I have nothing,' she was pleased to say, 'to tax your discretion with, as to the wording of your's to him: you have even kept up a proper dignity, as well as observed all the rules of decorum; and you have resented, as you ought to resent, his menacing invectives. In a word, I see not that he can form the least expectations from what you have written, that you will encourage the passion he avows for you. But does he not avow his passion? Have you the least doubt about what must be the issue of this correspondence, if continued? And do you yourself think, when you know the declared defiances of the other, that this can be, that it ought to be, a match?'

'By no means it can, Madam; you will be pleased to observe, that I have said as much to him. But now, Madam, that the whole correspondence is before you, I beg your commands what to do in a situation so very disagreeable.'

'One thing I will tell you, Clary—But I charge you, as you would not have me question the generosity of your spirit, to take no advantage of it, either mentally or verbally; that I am so much pleased with the offer of your keys to me, made in so cheerful and unreserved a manner, and in the prudence you have shewn in your letters, that were it practicable to bring every one, or your father only, into my opinion, I should readily leave all the rest to your discretion, reserving only to myself the direction or approbation of your future letters: and to see that you broke off the correspondence as soon as possible. But as it is not, and as I know your father would have no patience with you, should it be acknowledged that you correspond with Mr. Lovelace, or that you have corresponded with him since the time he prohibited you so to do; I forbid you to continue such a liberty—Yet, as the case is difficult, let me ask you, What you yourself can propose? Your heart, you say, is free: you own, that you cannot think, as matters are circumstanced, that a match with a man so obnoxious as he now is to us all, is proper to be thought of: what do you propose to do?—What, Clary, are your own thoughts of the matter?'

Without hesitation thus I answered—'What I humbly propose is this:—That I will write to Mr. Lovelace, (for I have not answered his last) that he has nothing to do between my father and me: that I neither ask his advice, nor need it: but that since he thinks he has some pretence for interfering, because of my brother's avowal of the interest of Mr. Solmes in displeasure to him, I will assure him (without giving him any reason to impute the assurance to 'be in the leaſt favourable to himſelf) 'that I never will be that man's. And 'if,' proceeded I, 'I may be permitted 'to give him this aſſurance; and Mr. 'Solmes, in conſequence of it, be diſ-'couraged from proſecuting his addreſs; 'let Mr. Lovelace be ſatisfied or diſſa-'tisfied, I will go no farther; nor write 'another line to him nor ever ſee him 'more, if I can avoid it, and I ſhall 'have a good excuſe for it: without 'bringing in any of my family.'

'Ah, my Love!—But what ſhall we 'do about the terms Mr. Solmes offers? 'Thoſe are the inducements with every-'body. He has even given hopes to 'your brother that he will make ex-'changes of eſtates; or at leaſt, that he 'will purchaſe the northern one: for 'you know it muſt be entirely conſiſtent 'with the family-views, that we increaſe 'our intereſt in this county. Your 'brother, in ſhort, has given in a plan 'that captivates us all: and a family ſo 'rich in all it's branches, and that has 'it's views to honour, muſt be pleaſed 'to ſee a very great probability of tak-'ing rank one day among the principal 'in the kingdom.'

'And for the ſake of theſe views, for 'the ſake of this plan of my brother's, 'am I, Madam, to be given in mar-'riage to a man I never can endure!— 'O my dear mamma, ſave me, ſave me, 'if you can, from this heavy evil!—I 'had rather be buried alive, indeed I 'had, than have that man!'

She chid me for my vehemence; but was ſo good as to tell me, That ſhe would ſound my uncle Harlowe, who was then below; and if he encouraged her, (or would engage to ſecond her) ſhe would venture to talk to my father herſelf; and I ſhould hear further in the morning.

She went down to tea, and kindly undertook to excuſe my attendance at ſupper.

But is it not a ſad thing, I repeat, to be obliged to ſtand in oppoſition to the will of ſuch a mother? 'Why,' as I often ſay to myſelf, 'was ſuch a man as this 'Solmes fixed upon? The only man in 'the world, ſurely, that could offer ſo 'much, and deſerve ſo little!'

Little, indeed, does he deſerve!—Why, my dear, the man has the moſt indifferent of characters. Every mouth is opened againſt him for his ſordid ways—A fooliſh man, to be ſo baſe-minded!—When the difference between the obtaining of a fame for generoſity, and incurring the cenſure of being a miſer, will not, prudently managed, coſt fifty pounds a year.

What a name have you got, at a little expence? And what an opportunity had he of obtaining credit at a very ſmall one, ſucceeding ſuch a wretched creature as Sir Oliver, in fortune, ſo vaſt?—Yet has he ſo behaved, that the common phraſe is applied to him. That Sir Oliver will never be dead while Mr. Solmes lives.

The world, as I have often thought, ill-natured as it is ſaid to be, is generally more juſt in characters (ſpeaking by what it feels) than is uſually apprehended: and thoſe who complain moſt of it's cenſorioufneſs, perhaps ſhould look inwardly for the occaſion oftener than they do.

My heart is a little at eaſe, on the hopes that my mother will be able to procure favour for me, and a deliverance from this man; and ſo I have leiſure to moralize. But if I had not, I ſhould not forbear to intermingle occaſionally theſe ſort of remarks, becauſe you command me never to omit them when they occur to my mind: and not to be able to make them, even in a more affecting ſituation, when one ſits down to write, would ſhew one's ſelf more engaged to ſelf, and to one's own concerns than attentive to the wiſhes of a friend. If it be ſaid that it is natural ſo to be, what makes that nature, on occaſions where a friend may be obliged, or reminded of a piece of inſtruction, which (writing down) one's ſelf may be the better for, but a fault; which it would ſet a perſon above nature to ſubdue?

LETTER XVIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SAT. MAR. 4.

WOULD you not have thought that ſomething might have been obtained in my favour, from an offer ſo reaſonable, from an expedient ſo proper, as I imagine, to put a tolerable end, as from myſelf, to a correſpondence I hardly know how otherwiſe, with ſafety to ſome of my family, to get rid of?—But my brother's plan (which my mother ſpoke of, and of which I have in vain endeavoured to procure a copy, with a deſign to take it to pieces, and expoſe it, as I queſtion not there is room to do) joined with my father's impatience of contradiction, are irreſiſtible.

I have not been in bed all night; nor am I in the leaſt drowſy. Expectation, and hope, and doubt, (an uneaſy ſtate!)

kept me ſufficiently wakeful. I ſtepped down at my uſual time, that it might not be known I had not been in bed; and gave directions in the family-way.

About eight o'clock Shorey came to me from my mother with orders to attend her in her chamber.

My mother had been weeping. I ſaw by her eyes: but her aſpect ſeemed to be leſs tender, and leſs affectionate, than the day before; and this, as ſoon as I entered into her preſence, ſtruck me with an awe, which gave a great damp to my ſpirits.

'Sit down, Clary Harlowe; I ſhall 'talk to you by-and-by:' and continued looking into a drawer among laces and linen, in a way neither buſy nor unbuſy.

I believe it was a quarter of an hour before ſhe ſpoke to me, my heart throbbing with the ſuſpenſe all the time;) and then ſhe aſked me coldly, What directions I had given for the day?

I ſhewed her the bill of fare for this day, and to-morrow, if, I ſaid, it pleaſed her to approve of it.

She made a ſmall alteration in it; but with an air ſo cold and ſo ſolemn, as added to my emotions.

'Mr. Harlowe talks of dining out 'to-day, I think, at my brother Anto-'ny's—'

'Mr. Harlowe!—Not my father!—'Have I not then a father!'—thought I.

'Sit down when I bid you.'

I ſat down.

'You look very ſullen, Clary.'

'I hope not, Madam.'

'If children would always be children '—parents—' And there ſhe ſtopped.

She then went to her toilette, and looked in the glaſs, and gave half a ſigh—The other half, as if ſhe would not have ſighed could ſhe have helped it, ſhe gently hemmed away.

'I don't love to ſee the girl look ſo 'ſullen.'

'Indeed, Madam, I am not ſullen.'—And I aroſe, and, turning from her, drew out my handkerchief; for the tears ran down my cheeks.

I thought, by the glaſs before me, I ſaw the mother in her ſoftened eye caſt towards me: but her words confirmed not the hoped-for tenderneſs.

'One of the moſt provoking things in 'the world is, to have people cry for 'what they can help!'

'I wiſh to Heaven I could, Madam!'—And I ſobbed again.

'Tears of penitence and ſobs of per-'verſeneſs are mighty well ſuited!—You 'may go up to your chamber. I ſhall 'talk with you by-and-by.'

I curtſeyed with reverence.

'Mock me not with outward geſtures 'of reſpect. The heart, Clary, is what 'I want.'

'Indeed, Madam, you have it. It is 'not ſo much mine as my mamma's.

'Fine talking!—As ſomebody ſays, 'If words were to paſs for duty, Cla-'riſſa Harlowe would be the dutifulleſt 'child breathing'

'God bleſs that ſomebody!—Be it 'whom it will. God bleſs that ſomebo-'dy!'—And I curtſeyed, and, purſuant to her laſt command, was going.

She ſeemed ſtruck; but was to be angry with me.

So turning from me, ſhe ſpoke with quickneſs, 'Whither now, Clary Har-'lowe?'

'You commanded me, Madam, to go 'to my chamber.'

'I ſee you are very ready to go out of 'my preſence.—Is your compliance the 'effect of ſullenneſs, or obedience?—'You are very ready to leave me.'

I could hold no longer; but threw myſelf at her feet: 'O my deareſt mam-'ma! Let me know all I am to ſuffer: 'let me know what I am to be!—I will 'bear it, if I can bear it: but your diſ-'pleaſure I cannot bear!'

'Leave me, leave me, Clary Har-'lowe!—No kneeling!—Limbs ſo ſup-'ple; will ſo ſtubborn!—Riſe, I tell 'you.'

'I cannot riſe! I will diſobey my 'mamma, when ſhe bids me leave her 'without being reconciled to me! No 'ſullens, my mamma; no perverſeneſs; 'but, worſe than either; this is direct 'diſobedience!—Yet tear not yourſelf 'from me!' [wrapping my arms about her as I kneeled; ſhe ſtruggling to get from me; my face lifted up to hers, with eyes running over, that ſpoke not my heart if they were not all humility and reverence] 'You muſt not, muſt not, 'tear yourſelf from me!' [for ſtill the dear lady ſtruggled, and looked this way and that, in a ſweet diſorder, as if ſhe knew not what to do]—'I will ne-'ver riſe, nor leave you, nor let you 'go, till you ſay you are not angry with 'me.'

'O thou ever-moving child of my 'heart!' [folding her dear arms about my neck, as mine embraced her knees] 'Why was this taſk—But leave me!—'You have diſcompoſed me beyond ex-'preſſion! Leave me, my dear!—I 'won't be angry with you—if I can help 'it—if you'll be good.'

I aroſe trembling, and hardly knowing what I did, or how I ſtood or walked, ed, withdrew to my chamber. My Hannah followed me as ſoon as ſhe heard me quit my mother's preſence, and with ſalts and ſpring-water, juſt kept me from fainting; and that was as much as ſhe could do. It was near two hours before I could ſo far recover myſelf as to take up my pen, to write to you how unhappily my hopes have ended.

My mother went down to breakfaſt. I was not fit to appear: but if I had been better, I ſuppoſe I ſhould not have been ſent for; ſince the permiſſion for my attending her down, was given by my father (when in my chamber) only on condition that ſhe found me worthy of the name of daughter. That, I doubt, I never ſhall be in his opinion, if he be not brought to change his mind as to this Mr. Solmes.

LETTER XIX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

[IN ANSWER TO LETTER XV.]

SAT. MARCH 4, 12 O'CLOCK.

HANNAH has juſt now brought me from the uſual place your favour of yeſterday. The contents of it have made me very thoughtful; and you will have an anſwer in my graveſt ſtyle.—I to have that Mr. Solmes!—No indeed!—I will ſooner—But I will write firſt to thoſe paſſages in your letter which are leſs concerning, that I may touch upon this part with more patience.

As to what you mention of my ſiſter's value for Mr. Lovelace, I am not very much ſurprized at it. She takes ſuch officious pains, and it is ſo much her ſubject, to have it thought that ſhe never did, and never could like him, that ſhe gives but too much room to ſuſpect that ſhe does. She never tells the ſtory of their parting, and of her refuſal of him, but her colour riſes, ſhe looks with diſdain upon me, and mingles anger with the airs ſhe gives herſelf—anger as well as airs, demonſtrating, that ſhe refuſed a man whom ſhe thought worth accepting: where elſe is the reaſon either for anger or boaſt?—Poor Bella! She is to be pitied—She cannot either like or diſlike with temper!—Would to Heaven ſhe had been miſtreſs of all her wiſhes!—Would to Heaven ſhe had!

As to what you ſay of my giving up to my father's controul the eſtate deviſed me, my motives at the time, as you acknowledge, were not blameable. Your advice to me on the ſubject was grounded, as I remember, on your good opinion of me; believing that I ſhould not make a bad uſe of the power willed me: neither you nor I, my dear, although you now aſſume the air of a diviner, [pardon me] could have believed that would have happened which has happened, as to my father's part particularly. You were indeed jealous of my brother's views againſt me; or rather of his predominant love of himſelf; but I did not think ſo hardly of my brother and ſiſter as you always did. You never loved them; and ill-will has eyes ever open to the faulty ſide; as good-will or love is blind even to real imperfections. I will briefly recollect my motives.

I found jealouſies and uneaſineſs riſing in every breaſt, where all before was unity and love: the honoured teſtator was reflected upon; a ſecond childhood was attributed to him; and I was cenſured, as having taken advantage of it. 'All young creatures,' thought I, 'more or leſs, covet independency; 'but thoſe who wiſh moſt for it, are 'ſeldom the fitteſt to be truſted either 'with the government of themſelves, 'or with power over others. This is 'certainly a very high and unuſual de'vice to ſo young a creature. We 'ſhould not aim at all we have power 'to do. To take all that good-nature, 'or indulgence, or good opinion con'fers, ſhews a want of moderation, and 'a graſpingneſs that is unworthy of that 'indulgence; and are bad indications of 'the uſe that may be made of the power 'bequeathed. It is true,' thought I, 'that I have formed agreeable ſchemes 'of making others as happy as myſelf, 'by the proper diſcharge of the ſteward'ſhip entruſted to me.' [Are not all eſtates ſtewardſhips, my dear?] 'But let me 'examine myſelf: is not vanity, or ſe'cret love of praiſe, a principal motive 'with me at the bottom?—Ought I not 'to ſuſpect my own heart? If I ſet up 'for myſelf, puffed up with every one's 'good opinion, may I not be left to my'ſelf?—Every one's eyes are upon the 'conduct, upon the viſits, upon the vi'ſitors, of a young creature of our ſex, 'made independent: and are not ſuch 'ſubjected, more than any others, to 'the attempts of enterprizers and for'tune ſeekers?—And then, left to my'ſelf, ſhould I take a wrong ſtep, though 'with ever ſo good an intention, how 'many ſhould I have to triumph over 'me, how few to pity me!—The more 'of the one, and the fewer of the other, 'for having aimed at excelling.'

Theſe

Theſe were ſome of my reflections at the time: and I have no doubt, but that in the ſame ſituation I ſhould do the very ſame thing; and that upon the matureſt deliberation. Who can command or foreſee events? To act up to our beſt judgments at the time, is all we can do. If I have erred, it is to worldly wiſdom only that I have erred. If we ſuffer by an act of duty, or even by an act of generoſity, is it not pleaſurable on reflection, that the fault is in others, rather than in ourſelves?—I had much rather have reaſon to think others unkind, than that they ſhould have any to think me undutiful.

And ſo, my dear, I am ſure had you.

And now for the moſt concerning part of your letter.

You think I muſt of neceſſity, as matters are circumſtanced, be Solmes's wife. I will not be very raſh, my dear, in proteſting to the contrary: but I think it never can, and, what is ſtill more, never ought to be!—My temper, I know, is depended upon. But I have heretofore ſaid, that I have ſomething in me of my father's family, as well as of my mother's. And have I any encouragement to follow too implicitly the example which my mother ſets of meekneſs, and reſignedneſs to the wills of others? Is ſhe not for ever obliged (as ſhe was pleaſed to hint to me) to be of the forbearing ſide? In my mother's caſe, your obſervation I muſt own is verified, that thoſe who will bear much, ſhall have much to bear. What is it, as ſhe ſays, that ſhe has not ſacrificed to peace?—Yet has ſhe by her ſacrifices always found the peace ſhe has deſerved to find? Indeed no!—I am afraid the very contrary. And often and often have I had reaſon (on her account) to reflect, that we poor mortals, by our over-ſolicitude to preſerve undiſturbed the qualities we are conſtitutionally fond of, frequently loſe the benefits we propoſe to ourſelves from them: ſince the deſigning and encroaching (finding out what we moſt fear to forfeit) direct their batteries againſt theſe our weaker places, and, making an artillery (if I may ſo phraſe it) of our hopes and fears, play it upon us at their pleaſure.

Steadineſs of mind, (a quality which the ill-bred and cenſorious deny to any of our ſex) when we are abſolutely convinced of being in the right, [otherwiſe it is not ſteadineſs, but obſtinacy] and when it is exerted in material caſes, is a quality, which, as my good Dr. Lewen was wont to ſay, brings great credit to the poſſeſſor of it; at the ſame time that it uſually when tried and known, raiſes ſuch above the attempts of the meanly machinating. He uſed therefore to inculcate upon me this ſteadineſs, upon laudable convictions. And why may I not think that I am now put upon a proper exerciſe of it?

I ſaid above, that I never can be, that I never ought to be, Mrs. Solmes.—I repeat that I ought not. for ſurely, my dear, I ſhould not give up to my brother's ambition the happineſs of my future life. Surely I ought not to be the inſtrument of depriving Mr. Solmes's relations of their natural rights and reverſionary proſpects, for the ſake of further aggrandizing a family (although that I am of) which already lives in great affluence and ſplendor; and which might be as juſtly diſſatisfied, were all that ſome of it aim at, to be obtained, that they were not princes, as now they are, that they are not peers. [For when ever was an ambitious mind, as you obſerve in the caſe of avarice, ſatisfied by acquiſition?] The leſs, ſurely, ought I to give into theſe graſping views of my brother, as I myſelf heartily deſpiſe the end aimed at; as I wiſh not either to change my ſtate, or better my fortunes; and as I am fully perſuaded, that happineſs and riches are two things, and very ſeldom meet together.

Yet I dread, I exceedingly dread, the conflicts I know I muſt encounter with. It is poſſible, that I may be more unhappy from the due obſervation of the good doctor's general precept, than were I to yield to the point; ſince what I call ſteadineſs is deemed ſtubbornneſs, obſtinacy, prepoſſeſſion, by thoſe who have a right to put what interpretation they pleaſe upon my conduct.

So, my dear, were we perfect (which no one can be) we could not be happy in this life, unleſs thoſe with whom we have to deal (thoſe more eſpecially who have any controul upon us) were governed by the ſame principles. But then does not the good doctor's concluſion recur—That we have nothing to do, but to chuſe what is right; to be ſteady in the purſuit of it; and to leave the iſſue to Providence?

This, if you approve of my motives, (and if you don't, pray inform me) muſt be my aim in the preſent caſe.

But what then can I plead for a palliation to myſelf of my mother's ſufferings on my account? Perhaps this conſideration will carry ſome force with it—that her difficulties cannot laſt long; only till this great ſtruggle ſhall be one way or other other determined—Whereas my unhappineſs, if I comply, will (from an averſion not to be overcome) be for life. To which let me add, that as I have reaſon to think that the preſent meaſures are not entered upon with her own natural liking, ſhe will have the leſs pain, ſhould they want the ſucceſs which I think in my heart they ought to want.

I have run a great length in a very little time. The ſubject touched me to the quick. My reflections upon it will give you reaſon to expect from me a perhaps too ſteady a behaviour in a new conference, which, I find, I muſt have with my mother. My father and brother, as ſhe was pleaſed to tell me, dine at my uncle Antony's; and that, as I have reaſon to believe, on purpoſe to give an opportunity for it.

Hannah informs me, that ſhe heard my father high and angry with my mother, at taking leave of her: I ſuppoſe, for being too favourable to me; for Hannah heard her ſay, as in tears, 'Indeed, Mr. Harlowe, you greatly diſtreſs me!—The poor girl does not deſerve—' Hannah heard no more, but that he ſaid, he would break ſomebody's heart—Mine I ſuppoſe—not my mother's, I hope.

As only my ſiſter dines with my mother, I thought I ſhould have been commanded down: but ſhe ſent me up a plate from her table. I continued my writing. I could not touch a morſel. I ordered Hannah however to eat it, that I might not be thought ſullen.

Before I conclude this, I will ſee whether any-thing offers from either of my private correſpondences that will make it proper to add to it; and will take a turn in the wood-yard and garden for that purpoſe.

I AM ſtopped. Hannah ſhall depoſit this. She was ordered by my mother (who aſked where I was) to tell me, that ſhe would come up and talk with me in my own cloſet.—She is coming! Adieu, my dear.

LETTER XX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SAT. AFTERNOON.

THE expected conference is over: but my difficulties are increaſed. This, as my mother was pleaſed to tell me, being the laſt perſuaſory effort that is to be attempted, I will be as particular in the account of it as my head and heart will allow me to be.

'I have made,' ſaid ſhe, as ſhe entered my room, 'a ſhort as well as early 'dinner, on purpoſe to confer with 'you: and I do aſſure you, that it will 'be the laſt conference I ſhall either be 'permitted or inclined to hold with you 'on the ſubject, if you ſhould prove as 'refractory as it is imagined you will 'prove by ſome, who are of opinion, 'that I have not the weight with you 'which my indulgence deſerves. But 'I hope you will convince as well them 'as me of the contrary.

'Your father both dines and ſups at 'your uncle's, on purpoſe to give us 'this opportunity; and according to the 'report I ſhall make on his return, '(which I have promiſed ſhall be a very 'faithful one) he will take his meaſures 'with you.'

I was offering to ſpeak—'Hear, Clariſſa, what I have to tell you,' ſaid ſhe, 'before you ſpeak, unleſs what 'you have to ſay will ſignify to me your 'compliance—Say—Will it?—If it will, 'you may ſpeak.'

I was ſilent.

She looked with concern and anger upon me—'No compliance, I find!—'Such a dutiful young creature hitherto!—Will you not, can you not, ſpeak 'as I would have you ſpeak?—Then,' [rejecting me as it were with her hand] 'continue ſilent.—I, no more than your 'father, will bear your avowed contradiction.'

She pauſed, with a look of expectation, as if ſhe waited for my conſenting anſwer.

I was ſtill ſilent; looking down; the tears in my eyes.

'O thou determined girl!—But ſay—'Speak out—Are you reſolved to ſtand 'in oppoſition to us all, in a point our 'hearts are ſet upon?'

'May I, Madam, be permitted to expoſtulate?'

'To what purpoſe expoſtulate with 'me, Clariſſa? Your father is determined. Have I not told you there is 'no receding; that the honour as well 'as the intereſt of the family is concerned? Be ingenuous; you uſed to be ſo, 'even occaſionally againſt yourſelf:—'who at the long run muſt ſubmit—all of 'us to you; or you to all of us?—If you 'intend to yield at laſt if you find you 'cannot conquer, yield now, and with 'a grace—for yield you muſt, or be none 'of our child.'

I wept. I knew not what to ſay; or rather how to expreſs what I had to ſay.

'Take notice, that there are flaws in 'your

'your grandfather's will: not a shilling 'of that estate will be yours, if you do 'not yield. Your grandfather left it to 'you, as a reward of your duty to him 'and to us—You will justly forfeit it, if—

'Permit me, good Madam, to say, 'that if it were unjustly bequeathed me, 'I ought not to wish to have it. But I 'hope Mr. Solmes will be apprized of 'these flaws.'

'This is very pertly said, Clarissa! 'but reflect, that the forfeiture of that 'estate through your opposition, will 'be attended with the total loss of your 'father's favour: and then how destitute 'tute must you be; how unable to support yourself; and how many benevolent designs and good actions must you 'give up!'

'I must accommodate myself, Madam, in the latter case, to my circumstances: much only is required where 'much is given. It becomes me to be 'thankful for what I have had. I have 'reason to bless you, Madam, and my 'good Mrs. Norton, for bringing me up 'to be satisfied with little; but much 'less, I will venture to say, than my 'father's indulgence annually confers 'upon me.'—And then I thought of the old Roman and his lentils.

'What perverseness!' said my mother—'But if you depend upon the favour of either or both of your uncles, 'vain will be that dependence: they 'will give you up, I do assure you, if 'your father does, and absolutely renounce you.'

'I am sorry, Madam, that I have 'had so little merit to have made no 'deeper impressions of favour for me 'in their hearts: but I will love and 'honour them as long as I live.'

'All this, Clarissa, makes your prepossession in a certain man's favour 'the more evident. Indeed your brother and sister cannot go any-whither, but they hear of these prepossessions.'

'It is a great grief to me, Madam, 'to be made the subject of the publick 'talk: but I hope you will have the 'goodness to excuse me for observing, 'that the authors of my disgrace within doors, the talkers of my prepossession without, and the reporters of 'it from abroad, are originally the same 'persons.'

She severely chid me for this.

I received her rebukes in silence.

'You are sullen, Clarissa: I see you 'are sullen.'—And she walked about the room in anger. Then turning to me—

'You can hear the imputation of sullenness, I see!—You have no concern to 'clear yourself of it. I was afraid of 'telling you all I was enjoined to tell 'you, in case you were to be unpersuadable: but I find that I had a greater 'opinion of your delicacy, of your gentleness, than I needed to have—It cannot discompose so steady, so inflexible 'a young creature, to be told as I now 'tell you, that the settlements are actually drawn; and that you will be 'called down in a very few days to hear 'them read, and to sign them: for it is 'impossible, if your heart be free, that 'you can make the least objection to 'them; except it will be an objection 'with you, that they are so much in 'your favour, and in the favour of all 'our family.'

I was speechless, absolutely speechless. Although my heart was ready to burst, yet could I neither weep nor speak.

'I am sorry,' said she, 'for your averseness to this match:' [Match she was pleased to call it!] 'but there is 'no help. The honour and interest of 'the family, as your aunt has told you, 'and as I have told you, are concerned; 'and you must comply.'

I was still speechless.

She folded the warm statue, as she was pleased to call me, in her arms; and entreated me, for Heaven's sake, and for her sake, to comply.

Speech and tears were lent me at the same time.—'You have given me life, 'Madam,' said I, clasping my unlifted hands together, and falling on one knee; 'a happy one, till now, has your good'ness, and my papa's, made it! O do 'not, do not, make all the remainder 'of it miserable!'

'Your father,' replied she, 'is resolved not to see you, till he sees you 'as obedient a child as you used to be. 'You have never been put to a test till 'now, that deserved to be called a test. 'This is, this must be, my last effort 'with you. Give me hope, my dear 'child: my peace is concerned; I will 'compound with you but for hope. And 'yet your father will not be satisfied 'without an implicit, and even a cheerful obedience—Give me but hope, my 'child!'

'To give you hope, my dearest, my 'most indulgent mamma, is to give 'you every-thing. Can I be honest, 'if I give a hope that I cannot confirm?'

She was very angry. She again called me me perverſe: ſhe upbraided me with regarding only my own prepoſſeſſions, and reſpecting not either her peace of mind, or my own duty.—'It is a grating thing, ſaid ſhe, 'for the parents 'of a child, who delighted in her in all 'the time of her helpleſs infancy, and 'throughout every ſtage of her childhood; and in every part of her education to womanhood, becauſe of the 'promiſes ſhe gave of proving the moſt 'grateful and dutiful of children; to find, juſt when the time arrived which 'ſhould crown their wiſhes, 'hat child 'ſtand in the way of her own happineſs, 'and her parents comfort, and, refuſing 'an excellent offer, and noble ſettlements, give ſuſpicions to her anxious 'friends, that ſhe would become the 'property of a vile rake and libertine, 'who (be the occaſion what it will) 'defies her family, and has actually 'embrued his hands in her brother's 'blood.

'I have had a very hard time of it,' ſaid ſhe, 'between your father and you; 'for, ſeeing your diſlike, I have more 'than once pleaded for you: but all to 'no purpoſe. I am only treated as a 'too fond mother, who, from motives 'of a blameable indulgence, encourage 'a child to ſtand in oppoſition to a father's will. I am charged with dividing the family into two parts; I and 'my youngeſt daughter ſtanding againſt 'my huſband, his two brothers, my 'ſon, my eldeſt daughter, and my ſiſter 'Hervey. I have been told, that I 'muſt be convinced of the fitneſs as well 'as advantage to the whole (your brother 'and Mr. Lovelace out of the queſtion) 'of carrying the contract with Mr. 'Solmes, on which ſo many contracts depend, into execution.

'Your father's heart, I tell you once 'more, is in it: he has declared, that 'he had rather have no daughter in 'you, than one he cannot diſpoſe of for 'your own good; eſpecially as you have 'owned, that your heart is free; and as 'the general good of his whole family 'is to be promoted by your obedience. 'He has pleaded, poor man! that his 'frequent gouty paroxyſms (every fit 'more threatening than the former) give 'him no extraordinary proſpects, either 'of worldly happineſs, or of long days: 'and he hopes, that you, who have been 'ſuppoſed to have contributed to the 'lengthening of your grandfather's life, 'will not, by your diſobedience, ſhorten 'your father's.'

This was a moſt affecting plea, my dear. I wept in ſilence upon it. I could not ſpeak to it. And my mother proceeded. 'What therefore can be 'his motives, Clary Harlowe, in the 'earneſt deſire he has to ſee this treaty 'perfected, but the welfare and aggrandizement of his family; which 'already having fortunes to become the 'higheſt condition, cannot but aſpire 'to greater diſtinctions? However ſlight 'ſuch views as theſe may appear to you, 'Clary, you know, that they are not 'ſlight ones to any other of the family: 'and your father will be his own judge 'of what is and what is not likely to 'promote the good of his children. 'Your abſtractedneſs, child, (affectation 'of abſtractedneſs ſome call it) favours, 'let me tell you, of greater particularity, than what we aim to carry. Modeſty and humility therefore will oblige 'you rather to miſtruſt yourſelf of peculiarity, than cenſure views which 'all the world purſues, as opportunity offers.'

I was ſtill ſilent; and ſhe proceeded—'It is owing to the good opinion, Clary, which your father has of you, and 'of your prudence, duty, and gratitude, that he engaged for your compliance, in your abſence; (before you 'returned from Miſs Howe) and that 'he built and finiſhed contracts upon 'it, which cannot be made void, or 'cancelled.'

'But why, then,' thought I, 'did they 'receive me, on my return from Miſs 'Howe, with ſo much intimidating ſolemnity?'—To be ſure, my dear, this argument, as well as the reſt, was obtruded upon my mother.

She went on, 'Your father has declared, that your unexpected oppoſition,' [Unexpected ſhe was pleaſed to call it] 'and Mr. Lovelace's continued 'menaces and inſults, more and more 'convince him, that a ſhort day is neceſſary in order to put an end to all 'that man's hopes, and to his own apprehenſions reſulting from the diſobedience of a child ſo favoured. He has 'therefore actually ordered patterns of 'the richeſt ſilks to be ſent for from 'London.'

I ſtarted—I was out of breath—I gaſped, at this frightful precipitance—I was going to open with warmth againſt it. I knew whoſe the happy expedient muſt be: female minds, I once heard my brother ſay, that could but be brought to balance on the change of their ſtate, might eaſily be determined by the glare and ſplendor of the nuptial nuptial preparations, and the pride of becoming the miſtreſs of a family.—But ſhe was pleaſed to hurry on, that I might not have time to expreſs my diſguſts at ſuch a communication—to this effect.

'Your father therefore, my Clary, 'cannot, either for your ſake, or his 'own, labour under a ſuſpence ſo af-'fecting to his repoſe. He has even 'thought fit to acquaint me, on my 'pleading for you, that it becomes me, 'as I value my own peace,' [How harſh to ſuch a wife!] 'and as I wiſh, that he 'do not ſuſpect that I ſecretly favour 'the addreſs of a vile rake, (a charac-'ter which all the ſex, he is pleaſed to 'ſay, virtuous and vicious, are but too 'fond of!) to exert my authority over 'you: and that this I may the leſs ſcru-'pulouſly do, as you have owned,' [The old ſtring!] 'that your heart is free.'

Unworthy reflection in my mother's caſe, ſurely, this of our ſex's valuing a libertine; ſince ſhe made choice of my father in preference to ſeveral ſuitors of equal fortune, becauſe they were of inferior reputation for morals!

'Your father,' added ſhe, 'at his go-'ing out, told me what he expected from 'me, in caſe I found that I had not the 'requiſite influence upon you—It was 'this—That I ſhould directly ſeparate 'myſelf from you, and leave you ſingly 'to take the conſequence of your double 'diſobedience—I therefore entreat you, 'my dear Clariſſa,' concluded ſhe, and that in the moſt earneſt and condeſcend-ing manner, 'to ſignify to your father, 'on his return, your ready obedience; 'and this as well for my ſake as for your 'own.'

Affected by my mother's goodneſs to me, and by that part of her argument which related to her own peace, and to the ſuſpicions they had of her ſecretly inclining to prefer the man ſo hated by them, to the man ſo much my averſion, I could not but wiſh it were poſſible for me to obey. I therefore pauſed, heſitated, conſidered, and was ſilent for ſome time. I could ſee, that my mother hoped that the reſult of this heſitation would be favourable to her arguments. But then recollecting, that all was owing to the inſtigations of a brother and ſiſter, wholly actuated by ſelfiſh and envious views; that I had not deſerved the treatment I had of late met with; that my diſgrace was already become the public talk; that the man was Mr. Solmes; and that my averſion to him was too generally known, to make my compliance either creditable to myſelf or to them: that it would give my brother and ſiſter a triumph over me, and over Mr. Lovelace, which they would not fail to glory in; and which although it concerned me but little to regard on his account, yet might be attended with fatal miſchiefs—And then Mr. Solmes's diſagreeable perſon; his ſtill more diſa-greeable manners, his low underſtanding—Underſtanding! the glory of a man, ſo little to be diſpenſed with in the head and director of a family, in order to pre-ſerve to him that reſpect which a good wife (and that for the juſtification of her own choice) ſhould pay him herſelf, and wiſh every-body to pay him—And as Mr. Solmes's inferiority in this reſpectable fa-culty of the human mind [I muſt be al-lowed to ſay this to you, and no great ſelf-aſſumption neither] would proclaim to all future, as well as to all preſent ob-ſervers, what muſt have been my mean in-ducement—All theſe reflections crowd-ing upon my remembrance; 'I would, 'Madam,' ſaid I, folding my hands, with an earneſtneſs in which my whole heart was engaged, 'bear the cruelleſt tor-'tures, bear loſs of limb, and even of 'life, to give you peace. But this man, 'every moment I would, at your com-'mand, think of him with favour, is the 'more my averſion. You cannot, in-'deed you cannot, think, how my whole 'ſoul reſiſts him!—And to talk of con-'tracts concluded upon; of patterns; 'of a ſhort day!—Save me, ſave me, O 'my deareſt mamma, ſave your child, 'from this heavy, from this inſupport-'able evil!'

Never was there a countenance that expreſſed ſo ſignificantly, as my mother's did, an anguiſh, which ſhe ſtruggled to hide, under an anger ſhe was compelled to aſſume—till the latter overcoming the former, ſhe turned from me with an uplifted eye; and ſtamping—'Strange 'perverſeneſs!' were the only words I heard of a ſentence that ſhe angrily pro-nounced; and was going. I then, half-frantickly I believe, laid hold of her gown—'Have patience with me, deareſt 'Madam!' ſaid I.—'Do not you re-'nounce me totally!—If you muſt ſepa-'rate yourſelf from your child, let it 'not be with abſolute reprobation on 'your own part!—My uncles may be 'hard-hearted—my father may be im-'moveable—I may ſuffer from my bro-'ther's ambition, and from my ſiſter's 'envy!—But let me not loſe my mam-'ma's love; at leaſt, her pity.'

She turned to me with benigner rays —'You have my love! You have my pity!

'But,

'But, O my dearest girl—I have not 'yours.'

'Indeed, indeed, Madam, you have: 'and all my reverence, all my grati- 'tude, you have!—But in this one point '—Cannot I be this once obliged?—Will 'no expedient be accepted? Have I not 'made a very fair proposal, as to Mr. 'Lovelace?'

'I wish, for both our sakes, my dear 'unpersuadable girl, that the decision 'of this point lay with me. But why, 'when you know it does not, why should 'you thus perplex and urge me?—To 'renounce Mr. Lovelace is now but half 'what is aimed at. Nor will any-body 'else believe you in earnest in the offer, 'if I would. While you remain single, 'Mr. Lovelace will have hopes—and 'you, in the opinions of others, incli- 'nations.'

'Permit me, dearest Madam, to say, 'that your goodness to me, your patience, 'your peace, weigh more with me, than 'all the rest put together: for although 'I am to be treated by my brother, and, 'through his instigations, by my father, 'as a slave in this point, and not as a 'daughter, yet my mind is not that of a 'slave. You have not brought me up 'to be mean.'

'So, Clary! you are already at defi- 'ance with your father! I have had too 'much cause before to apprehend as much '—What will this come to?—I' and then my dear mamma sighed—'I am 'forced to put up with many humours.'

'That you are, my ever honoured 'mamma, is my grief. And can it be 'thought, that this very consideration, 'and the apprehension of what may re- 'sult from a much worse tempered man, '(a man, who has not half the sense of 'my father) has not made an impression 'upon me to the disadvantage of the 'married life? Yet it is something of 'an alleviation, if one must bear undue 'control, to bear it from a man of sense. 'My father, I have heard you say, Ma- 'dam, was for years a very good-hu- 'moured gentleman—Unobjectible in 'person and manners—But the man pro- 'posed to me—'

'Forbear reflecting upon your father: [Did I, my dear, in what I have repeat- ed, and I think they are the very words, reflect upon my father?] 'it is not possi- 'ble, I must say again, and again, were 'all men equally indifferent to you, that 'you should be thus sturdy in your will. 'I am tired out with your obstinacy— 'The most unpersuadable girl—You for- 'get, that I must separate myself from 'you, if you will not comply. You do 'not remember that your father will 'take you up, where I leave you. Once 'more, however, I will put it to you— 'Are you determined to brave your fa- 'ther's displeasure?—Are you deter- 'mined to defy your uncles?—Do you 'chuse to break with us all, rather than 'encourage Mr. Solmes?—Rather than 'give me hope?'

'Dreadful alternative—But is not my 'sincerity, is not the integrity of my 'heart, concerned in my answer? May 'not my everlasting happiness be the sa- 'crifice? Will not the least shadow of 'the hope you just now demanded from 'me, be driven into absolute and sud- 'den certainty? Is it not sought to en- 'snare, to entangle me in my own desire 'of obeying, if I could give answers 'that might be construed into hope?— 'Forgive me, Madam: bear with your 'child's boldness in such a cause as this! '—Settlements drawn!—Patterns sent 'for!—An early day!—Dear, dear Ma- 'dam, how can I give hope, and not in- 'tend to be this man's?'

'Ah, girl, never say your heart is free! 'You deceive yourself if you think it is.'

'Thus to be driven' [and I wrung my hands through impatience] 'by the in- 'stigations of a designing, an ambitious 'brother, and by a sister, that—'

'How often, Clary, must I forbid 'your unsisterly reflections?—Does not 'your father, do not your uncles, does 'not every body, patronize Mr. Solmes? 'And let me tell you, ungrateful girl, 'and unmoveable as ungrateful, let me 'repeatedly tell you, that it is evident to 'me, that nothing but a love unworthy 'of your prudence can make a creature 'late so dutiful, now so sturdy. You 'may guess what your father's first ques- 'tion on his return will be. He must 'know, that I can do nothing with you. 'I have done my part. Seek me, if your 'mind change before he comes back: 'you have yet a little more time, as he 'stays supper. I will no more seek you, 'nor to you.'—And away she flung.

What could I do but weep?

I am extremely affected on my mo- ther's account—more, I must needs say, than on my own. And indeed all things considered; and especially, that the mea- sure she is engaged in, is (as I dare say it is) against her own judgment; she deserves more compassion than myself.—Excel- lent woman! What pity, that meekness and condescension should not be attended with the due rewards of those charming graces!—Yet had she not let violent spirits (as I have elſewhere obſerved with no ſmall regret) find their power over hers, it could not have been thus.

But here, run away with by my pen, I ſuffer my mother to be angry with me on her own account. She hinted to me, indeed, that I muſt ſeek her, if my mind changed; which is a condition that amounts to a prohibition of attending her: but, as ſhe left me in diſpleaſure, will it not have a very obſtinate appearance, and look like a kind of renunciation of her mediation in my favour, if I go not down before my father returns, to ſupplicate her pity, and her kind report to him?

I will attend her. I had rather all the world ſhould be angry with me than my mamma!

Mean time, to clear my hands from papers of ſuch a nature, Hannah ſhall depoſit this. If two or three letters reach you together, they will but expreſs, from one period to another, the anxieties and difficulties which the mind of your unhappy but ever affectionate friend labours under.

LETTER XXI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SAT. NIGHT.

I Have been down. I am to be unlucky in all I do, I think, be my intentions ever ſo good. I have made matters worſe inſtead of better: as I ſhall now tell you.

I found my mother and ſiſter together in my ſiſter's parlour. My mother, I fear, by the glow in her fine face, (and as the browner, ſullener glow in my ſiſter's confirmed) had been expreſſing herſelf with warmth, againſt her unhappier child: perhaps giving ſuch an account of what had paſſed, as ſhould clear herſelf, and convince Bella, and through her, my brother and uncles, of the ſincere pains ſhe had taken with me.

I entered like a dejected criminal; and beſought the favour of a private audience. My mother's return, both looks and words, gave me too much reaſon for my above ſurmize.

'You have,' ſaid ſhe, [looking at me with a ſternneſs that never ſits well on her ſweet features] 'rather a requeſting 'than a conceding countenance, Clariſſa 'Harlowe: if I am miſtaken, tell me ſo; 'and I will withdraw with you wherever 'you will.—Yet whether ſo or not, you 'may ſay what you have to ſay before 'your ſiſter.'

My mother, I thought, might have withdrawn with me, as ſhe knows that I have not a friend in my ſiſter.

'I come down, Madam,' ſaid I, 'to 'beg of you to forgive me for any thing 'you may have taken amiſs in what paſſ-'ed above reſpecting your honoured 'ſelf; and that you will be pleaſed to 'uſe your endeavours to ſoften my pa-'pa's diſpleaſure againſt me on his re-'turn.'

Such aggravating looks; ſuch lifting up of hands and eyes; ſuch a furrowed forehead, in my ſiſter!

My mother was angry enough without all that; and aſk'd me to what purpoſe I came down, if I were ſtill ſo untractable.

She had hardly ſpoken the words, when Shorey came in to tell her that Mr. Solmes was in the hall, and deſired admittance.

Ugly creature! What, at the cloſe of day, quite dark, brought him hither?—But, on ſecond thoughts, I believe it was contrived that he ſhould be here at ſupper, to know the reſult of the conference between my mother and me, and that my father on his return, might find us together.

I was hurrying away, but my mother commanded me (ſince I had come down only, as ſhe ſaid, to mock her) not to ſtir; and at the ſame time ſee if I could behave ſo to Mr. Solmes, as might encourage her to make the favourable report to my father which I had beſought her to make.

My ſiſter triumphed. I was vexed to be ſo caught, and to have ſuch an angry and cutting rebuke given me, with an aſpect more like the taunting ſiſter than the indulgent mother, if I may preſume to ſay ſo: for ſhe herſelf ſeemed to enjoy the ſurprize upon me.

The man ſtalked in. His uſual walk is by pauſes, as if (from the ſame vacuity of thought which made Dryden's Clown whiſtle) he was telling his ſteps: and firſt paid his clumſy reſpects to my mother; then to my ſiſter; next to me, as if I were already his wife, and therefore to be laſt in his notice; and ſitting down by me, told us in general what weather it was. Very cold he made it; but I was warm enough. Then addreſſing himſelf to me; 'And how do you 'find it, Miſs?' was his queſtion; and would have taken my hand.

I withdrew it, I believe, with diſdain enough. My mother frowned. My ſiſter bit her lip.

I could not contain myſelf: I was never ſo bold in my life; for I went on with with my plea, as if Mr. Solmes had not been there.

My mother coloured, and looked at him, at my ſiſter, and at me. My ſiſter's eyes were opener and bigger than ever I ſaw them before.

The man underſtood me. He hemmed, and removed from one chair to another.

I went on, ſupplicating for my mother's favourable report: 'Nothing but 'invincible diſlike,' ſaid I—

'What would the girl be at?' interrupted my mother. 'Why, Clary! Is 'this a ſubject!—Is this!—Is this!—'Is this a time—' And again ſhe looked upon Mr. Solmes.

I am ſorry, on reflection, that I put my mamma into ſo much confuſion—To be ſure it was very fancy in me.

'I beg pardon, Madam,' ſaid I. 'But 'my papa will ſoon return. And ſince I 'am not permitted to withdraw, it is not 'neceſſary, I humbly preſume, that Mr. 'Solmes's preſence ſhould deprive me 'of this opportunity to implore your fa'vourable report; and at the ſame time, 'if he ſtill viſit on my account,' [looking at him] 'to convince him, that it can'not poſſibly be to any purpoſe.'

'Is the girl mad?' ſaid my mother, interrupting me.

My ſiſter, with the affectation of a whiſper to my mother—'This is—This is 'ſpite, Madam,' [very ſpitefully ſhe ſpoke the word] 'becauſe you commanded 'her to ſtay.'

I only looked at her, and turning to my mother, 'Permit me, Madam,' ſaid I, 'to repeat my requeſt. I have no 'brother, no ſiſter!—If I loſe my mam'ma's favour, I am loſt for ever!'

Mr. Solmes removed to his firſt ſeat, and fell to gnawing the head of his hazel; a carved head, almoſt as ugly as his own—I did not think the man was ſo ſenſible.

My ſiſter roſe, with a face all over ſcarlet; and ſtepping to the table, where lay a fan, ſhe took it up; and, although Mr. Solmes had obſerved that the weather was cold, fanned herſelf very violently.

My mother came to me, and angrily taking my hand, led me out of that parlour into my own; which, you know, is next to it.—'Is not this behaviour 'very bold, very provoking, think you, 'Clary?'

'I beg your pardon, Madam, if it 'has that appearance to you. But, in'deed, my dear mamma, there ſeem to 'be ſnares laying for me. Too well I 'know my brother's drift. With a 'good word he ſhall have my conſent 'for all he wiſhes to worm me out of—'Neither he, nor my ſiſter, ſhall need to 'take half this pains—'

My mother was about to leave me in high diſpleaſure.

I beſought her to ſtay: 'One favour, 'but one favour, deareſt Madam,' ſaid I, 'give me leave to beg of you—'

'What would the girl?'

'I ſee how every-thing is working 'about—I never, never can think of Mr. 'Solmes. My papa will be in tumults 'when he is told that I cannot. They 'will judge of the tenderneſs of your 'heart to a poor child who ſeems de'voted by every-one elſe, from the wil'lingneſs you have already ſhewn to 'hearken to my prayers. There will 'be endeavours uſed to confine me, and 'keep me out of your preſence, and 'out of the preſence of every one who 'uſed to love me.' [This, my dear Miſs Howe, is threatened.] 'If this be effect'ed; if it be put out of my power to 'plead my own cauſe, and to appeal to 'you, and to my uncle Harlowe, of 'whom only I have hope; then will 'every ear be opened againſt me, and 'every tale encouraged.—It is, there'fore, my humble requeſt, That, added 'to the diſgraceful prohibitions I now 'ſuffer under, you will not, if you can 'help it, give way to my being denied 'your ear.'

'Your liſtening Hannah has given 'you this intelligence, as ſhe does many 'others.'

'My Hannah, Madam, liſtens not—'My Hannah—'

'No more in Hannah's behalf—Han'nah is known to make miſchief—Han'nah is known—But no more of that 'bold intermeddler—It is true, your 'father threatened to confine you to 'your chamber, if you complied not, 'in order the more aſſuredly to deprive 'you of the opportunity of correſpond'ing with thoſe who harden your heart 'againſt his will. He bid me tell you 'ſo, when he went out, if I found you 'refractory. But I was loth to deliver 'ſo harſh a declaration; being ſtill in 'hope that you would come down to us 'in a compliant temper. Hannah has 'over-heard this, I ſuppoſe; and has 'told you of it; as alſo, that he declared 'he would break your heart, rather 'than you ſhould break his. And I now 'aſſure you, that you will be confined, 'and prohibited making teazing ap'peals to any of us: and we ſhall ſee

'who is to submit, you to us, or every-'body to you.'

Again I offered to clear Hannah, and to lay the latter part of the intelligence to my ſiſter's echo, Betty Barnes, who had boaſted of it to another ſervant: but I was again bid to be ſilent on that head. I ſhould ſoon find, my mother was pleaſed to ſay, that others could be as determined as I was obſtinate: and, once for all, would add, that ſince ſhe ſaw that I built upon her indulgence, and was indifferent about involving her in contentions with my father, and his brothers, and with her other children, ſhe would now aſſure me, that ſhe was as much determined againſt Mr. Lovelace, and for Mr. Solmes and the family-ſchemes, as any-body; and would not refuſe her conſent to any meaſures that ſhould be thought neceſſary to reduce a ſtubborn child to her duty.

I was ready to ſink. She was ſo good as to lend me her arm to ſupport me.

'And this,' ſaid I, 'is all I have to 'hope for from my mamma?'

'It is. But, Clary, this one further 'opportunity I give you—Go in again 'to Mr. Solmes, and behave diſcreetly 'to him; and let your father find you 'together, upon civil terms at leaſt.'

My feet moved [of themſelves, I think] farther from the parlour where he was, and towards the ſtairs; and there I ſtopped and pauſed.

'If,' proceeded ſhe, 'you are deter-'mined to ſtand in defiance of us all—'then, indeed, may you go up to your 'chamber, (as you are ready to do)—'And God help you!'

'God help me, indeed! for I cannot 'give hope of what I cannot intend—'But let me have your prayers, my dear 'mamma!—Thoſe ſhall have mine, who 'have brought me into all this diſtreſs.

I was moving to go up—

'And will you go up, Clary?

I turned my face to her; my officious tears would needs plead for me; I could not juſt then ſpeak, and ſtood ſtill.

'Good girl, diſtreſs me not thus! 'Dear, good girl, do not thus diſtreſs 'me!' holding out her hand; but ſtanding ſtill likewiſe.

'What can I do, Madam?—What 'can I do?'

'Go in again, my child—Go in again, 'my dear child!' repeated ſhe; 'and let 'your father find you together.'

'What, Madam, to give him hope? 'to give hope to Mr. Solmes?

'Obſtinate, perverſe, undutiful Cla-'riſſa!' with a rejecting hand and angry aſpect; 'then take your own way, 'and go up!—But ſtir not down again, 'I charge you, without leave, or till 'your father's pleaſure be known con-'cerning you.'

She flung from me with high indignation: and I went up with a very heavy heart; and feet as ſlow as my heart was heavy.

My father is come home, and my brother with him. Late as it is, they are all ſhut up together. Not a door opens; not a ſoul ſtirs. Hannah, as ſhe moves up and down is ſhunned as a perſon infected.

The angry aſſembly is broken up. My two uncles, and my aunt Hervey are ſent for, it ſeems, to be here in the morning to breakfaſt. I ſhall then, I ſuppoſe, know my doom. It is paſt eleven, and I am ordered not to go to bed.

TWELVE O'CLOCK.

This moment the keys of everything are taken from me. It was propoſed to ſend for me down: but my father ſaid he could not bear to look upon me.—Strange alteration in a few weeks!—Shorey was the meſſenger. The tears ſtood in her eyes when ſhe delivered her meſſage.

You, my dear, are happy—May you always be ſo!—And then I can never be wholly miſerable. Adieu, my beloved friend! Cl. Harlowe.

LETTER XXII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 5.

Hannah has juſt brought me, from the private place in the garden-wall, a letter from Mr. Lovelace, depoſited laſt night, ſigned alſo by Lord M.

He tells me in it, That Mr. Solmes makes it his boaſt that he is to be married in a few days to one of the ſhyeſt women in England: that my brother explains his meaning; this ſhy creature, he ſays, is me; and he aſſures every one, that his youngeſt ſiſter is very ſoon to be Mr. Solmes's wife. He tells me of the patterns beſpoken which my mother mentioned to me.

Not one thing eſcapes him that is done or ſaid in this houſe.

My ſiſter, he ſays, reports the ſame things; and that with ſuch particular aggravations of inſult upon him, that he cannot but be extremely piqued, as well at the manner, as from the occaſion; and expreſſes himſelf with great violence upon it.

He knows not, he ſays, what my relations inducements can be, to prefer ſuch a man as Solmes to him. If advantageous ſettlements be the motive, Solmes ſhall not offer what he will refuſe to comply with.

As to his eſtate, and family; the firſt cannot be excepted againſt: and for the ſecond, he will not diſgrace himſelf by a compariſon ſo odious. He appeals to Lord M. for the regularity of his life and manners ever ſince he has made his addreſſes to me, or had hope of my favour.

I ſuppoſe he would have his lordſhip's ſigning to this letter to be taken as a voucher for him.

He deſires my leave (in company with my lord, in a pacifick manner) to attend my father and uncles, in order to make propoſals that muſt be accepted, if they will but ſee him, and hear what they are: and tells me that he will ſubmit to any meaſures that I ſhall preſcribe, in order to bring about a reconciliation.

He preſumes to be very earneſt with me, to give him a private meeting ſome night, in my father's garden, attended by whom I pleaſe.

Really, my dear, were you to ſee his letter, you would think I had given him great encouragement, and that I am in direct treaty with him; or that he is ſure that my friends will drive me into a foreign protection; for he has the boldneſs to offer, in my lord's name, an aſylum to me, ſhould I be tyrannically treated in Solmes's behalf.

I ſuppoſe it is the way of this ſex to endeavour to entangle the thoughtleſs of ours by bold ſuppoſals and offers, in hopes that we ſhall be too complaiſant or baſhful to quarrel with them; and, if not checked, to reckon upon our ſilence, as aſſents voluntary given, or conceſſions made in their favour.

There are other particulars in this letter which I ought to mention to you: but I will take an opportunity to ſend you the letter itſelf, or a copy of it.

For my own part I am very uneaſy to think how I have been drawn on one hand, and driven on the other, into a clandeſtine, in ſhort, into a mere lover-like correſpondence, which my heart condemns.

It is eaſy to ſee, if I do not break it off, that Mr. Lovelace's advantages, by reaſon of my unhappy ſituation, will every day increaſe, and I ſhall be more and more entangled. Yet if I do put an end to it, without making it a condition of being freed from Mr. Solmes's addreſs—May I, my dear; is it beſt to continue it a little longer, in hopes to extricate myſelf out of the other difficulty, by giving up all thoughts of Mr. Lovelace?—Whoſe advice can I now aſk but yours?

All my relations are met. They are at breakfaſt together. Mr. Solmes is expected. I am exceſſively uneaſy. I muſt lay down my pen.

THEY are all going to church together. Grievouſly diſordered they appear to be, as Hannah tells me. She believes ſomething is reſolved upon.

SUNDAY NOON.

WHAT a cruel thing is ſuſpence!—I will aſk leave to go to church this afternoon. I expect to be denied: but if I do not aſk, they may alledge, that my not going is owing to myſelf.

I DESIRED to ſpeak with Shorey. Shorey came. I directed her to carry to my mother my requeſt for permiſſion to go to church this afternoon. What think you was the return? 'Tell her, 'that ſhe muſt direct herſelf to her bro-'ther for any favour ſhe has to aſk.'—So, my dear, I am to be delivered up to my brother!

I was reſolved, however, to aſk of him this favour. Accordingly, when they ſent me up my ſolitary dinner, I gave the meſſenger a billet, in which I made it my humble requeſt through him to my father, to be permitted to go to church this afternoon.

This was the contemptuous anſwer: 'Tell her, that her requeſt will be 'taken into conſideration to-morrow.'—My requeſt to go to church to-day to be taken into conſideration to-morrow!

Patience will be the fitteſt return I can make to ſuch an inſult. But this method will not do with me; indeed it will not! And yet it is but the beginning, I ſuppoſe, of what I am to expect from my brother, now I am delivered up to him.

ON recollection, I thought it beſt to renew my requeſt. I did. The following is a copy of what I wrote, and what follows that, of the anſwer ſent me.

'SIR,

'I KNOW not what to make of the 'anſwer brought to my requeſt of be-'ing permitted to go to church this 'afternoon.

'afternoon. If you deſigned to ſhew 'your pleaſantry by it, I hope that will 'continue; and then my requeſt will be 'granted.

'You know, that I never abſented 'myſelf when well, and at home, till 'the two laſt Sundays; when I was 'adviſed not to go. My preſent ſitua-'tion is ſuch, that I never more want-'ed the benefit of the public prayers.

'I will ſolemnly engage only to go 'thither, and back again.

'I hope it cannot be thought that I 'would do otherwiſe.

'My dejection of ſpirits will give a 'too juſt excuſe on the ſcore of indiſ-'poſition for avoiding viſits. Nor will 'I, but by diſtant civilities, return the 'compliments of any of my acquaint-'ance. My diſgraces, if they are to 'have an end, need not to be pro-'claimed to the whole world. I aſk 'this favour, therefore, for my repu-'tation's ſake, that I may be able to 'hold up my head in the neighbour-'hood, if I live to ſee an end of the 'unmerited ſeverities which ſeem to be 'deſigned for your unhappy ſiſter,

'CL. HARLOWE.'

'TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

'FOR a girl to lay ſo much ſtreſs upon 'going to church, and yet reſolve to 'defy her parents, in an article of the 'greateſt conſequence to them, and to 'the whole family, is an abſurdity. 'You are recommended, Miſs, to the 'practice of your private devotions. 'May they be efficacious upon the mind 'of one of the moſt pervications young 'creatures that ever was heard of! 'The intention is, I tell you plainly, to 'mortify you into a ſenſe of your duty. 'The neighbours you are ſo ſolicitous 'to appear well with, already know, 'that you defy that. So, Miſs, if you 'have a real value for your reputation, 'ſhew it as you ought. It is yet in your 'own power to eſtabliſh or impair it.

JA. HARLOWE.'

Thus, my dear Miſs Howe, has my brother got me into his ſnares; and I, like a poor ſilly bird, the more I ſtruggle, am the more entangled.

LETTER XXIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 6.

THEY are reſolved to break my heart. My poor Hannah is diſcharged—diſgracefully diſcharged!—Thus it was.

Within half an hour after I had ſent the poor girl down for my breakfaſt, that bold creature Betty Barnes, my ſiſter's confidante and ſervant, (if a favourite maid and confidante can be deemed a ſervant) came up.

'What, Miſs, will you pleaſe to 'have for breakfaſt?'

I was ſurprized. 'What will I have 'for breakfaſt, Betty!—How!—What! '—How comes it?'—Then I named Hannah. I could not tell what to ſay.

'Don't be ſurprized, Miſs—But 'you'll ſee Hannah no more in this houſe.'

'God forbid!—Is any harm come to 'Hannah?—What! what is the matter 'with Hannah?'

'Why, Miſs, the ſhort and the long 'is this: your papa and mamma think 'Hannah has ſtaid long enough in the 'houſe to do miſchief; and ſo ſhe is or-'dered to troop;' [that was the confident creature's word] 'and I am directed to 'wait upon you in her ſtead.'

I burſt into tears. 'I have no ſer-'vice for you, Betty Barnes; none at 'all. But where is Hannah? Cannot 'I ſpeak with the poor girl? I owe her 'half a year's wages. May I not ſee 'the honeſt creature, and pay her her 'wages? I may never ſee her again 'perhaps; for they are reſolved to break 'my heart.'

'And they think you are reſolved to 'break theirs: ſo tit for tat, Miſs.'

Impertinent I called her; and aſked her, if it were upon ſuch confident terms that her ſervice was to begin.

I was ſo very earneſt to ſee the poor maid, that (to oblige me, as ſhe ſaid) ſhe went down with my requeſt.

The worthy creature was as earneſt to ſee me; and the favour was granted in preſence of Shorey and Betty.

I thanked her, when ſhe came up, for her paſt ſervice to me.

Her heart was ready to break. And ſhe began to vindicate her fidelity and love; and diſclaimed any miſchief ſhe had ever made.

I told her that thoſe who occaſioned her being turned out of my ſervice, made no queſtion of her integrity: that her diſmiſſion was intended for an indignity to me. That I was very ſorry to be obliged to part with her, and hoped ſhe would meet with as good a ſervice.

Never, never! wringing her hands, ſhould ſhe meet with a miſtreſs ſhe loved ſo well. And the poor creature ran on in my praiſes, and in profeſſions of love to me.

We are all apt, you know, my dear, to praiſe our benefactors, becauſe they are our benefactors; as if every-body did right or wrong, as they obliged or diſobliged us. But this good creature deſerved to be kindly treated; ſo I could have no merit in favouring one whom it would have been ungrateful not to diſtinguiſh.

I gave her a little linen, ſome laces, and other odd things; and inſtead of four pounds which were due to her, ten guineas: and ſaid, if ever I were again allowed to be my own miſtreſs, I would think of her in the firſt place.

Betty enviouſly whiſpered Shorey upon it.

Hannah told me, before their faces, having no other opportunity, that ſhe had been examined about letters to me, and from me: and that ſhe had given her pockets to Miſs Harlowe, who looked into them, and put her fingers in her ſtays, to ſatisfy herſelf that ſhe had not any.

She gave me an account of the number of my pheaſants and bantams; and I ſaid, they ſhould be my own care twice or thrice a day.

We wept over each other at parting. The girl prayed for all the family.

To have ſo good a ſervant ſo diſgracefully diſmiſſed, is very cruel: and I could not help ſaying, that theſe methods might break my heart, but not any other way anſwer the end of the authors of my diſgraces.

Betty, with a very ſaucy ſleer, ſaid to Shorey, There would be a trial of ſkill about that, ſhe fancied. But I took no notice of it. If this wench thinks that I have robbed her young miſtreſs of a lover, as you ſay ſhe has given out, ſhe may believe that it is ſome degree of merit in herſelf to be impertinent to me.

Thus have I been forced to part with my faithful Hannah. If you can commend the good creature to a place worthy of her, pray do for my ſake.

LETTER XXIV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

MONDAY, NEAR 12 O'CLOCK.

THE incloſed letter was juſt now delivered to me.

My brother has carried all his points. I ſend you alſo the copy of my anſwer. No more at this time can I write!

'MONDAY, MAR. 6.

'MISS CLARY,

'BY command of your father and mother I write expreſsly to forbid you 'to come into their preſence, or into the 'garden when they are there: nor when 'they are not there, but with Betty 'Barnes to attend you; except by parti-'cular licence or command.

'On their bleſſings you are forbidden 'likewiſe to correſpond with the vile 'Lovelace; as it is well known you did 'by means of your ſly Hannah. Whence 'her ſudden diſcharge. As was fit.

'Neither are you to correſpond with 'Miſs Howe; who has given herſelf high 'airs of late; and might poſſibly help on 'your correſpondence with that deteſted 'libertine. Nor, in ſhort, with any-body 'without leave.

'You are not to enter into the pre-'ſence of either of your uncles, without 'their leave firſt obtained. It is in mercy 'to you, after ſuch a behaviour to your 'mother, that your father refuſes to ſee 'you.

'You are not to be ſeen in any apart-'ment of the houſe you ſo lately go-'verned as you pleaſed, unleſs you are 'commanded down.

'In ſhort, you are ſtrictly to confine 'yourſelf to your chamber, except now-'and then, in Betty Barnes's ſight, (as 'aforeſaid) you take a morning or even-'ing turn in the garden: and then you 'are to go directly, and without ſtop-'ping at any apartment in the way, up 'and down the back-ſtairs, that the 'ſight of ſo perverſe a young creature 'may not add to the pain you have given 'every-body.

'The hourly threatenings of your fine 'fellow, as well as your own unheard-'of obſtinacy, will account to you for 'all this. What a hand has the beſt and 'moſt indulgent of mothers had with 'you, who ſo long pleaded for you, and 'undertook for you; even when others, 'from the manner of your ſetting out, 'deſpaired of moving you!—What muſt 'your perverſeneſs have been, that ſuch 'a mother can give you up! She thinks 'it right ſo to do: nor will take you to 'favour, unleſs you make the firſt ſteps, 'by a compliance with your duty.

'As for myſelf, whom perhaps you 'think hardly of, [in very good com-'pany, if you do, that's my conſola-'tion;] I have adviſed, that you may be 'permitted to purſue your own inclina-'tions, (ſome people need no greater 'puniſhment than ſuch a permiſſion) 'and not to have the houſe encumbered 'by one who muſt give them the more 'pain for the neceſſity ſhe has laid them 'under of avoiding the ſight of her, al-'though in it.

'If any thing I have written appear 'severe or harsh, it is still in your power '(but perhaps will not always be so) to 'remedy it; and that by a single word.

'Betty Barnes has orders to obey you 'in all points consistent with her duty 'to those to whom you owe it, as well as 'she. 'JA. HARLOWE.'

'TO JAMES HARLOWE, JUNIOR, ESQ.

'SIR,

'I WILL only say, That you may 'congratulate yourself on having so far 'succeeded in all your views, that you 'may report what you please of me, and 'I can no more defend myself, than if I 'were dead. Yet one favour, nevertheless, I will beg of you. It is this—That 'you will not occasion more severities, 'more disgraces, than are necessary for 'carrying into execution your further 'designs, whatever they be, against your 'unhappy sister,

'CLARISSA HARLOWE.'

LETTER XXV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

TUESDAY, MARCH 7.

BY my last deposit, you will see how I am driven, and what a poor prisoner I am.—No regard had to my reputation. The whole matter is now before you. Can such measures be supposed to soften?—But surely they can only mean to try to frighten me into my brother's views!—All my hope is, to be able to weather this point till my cousin Morden comes from Florence; and he is soon expected: yet, if they are determined upon a short day, I doubt he will not be here time enough to save me.

It is plain by my brother's letter, that my mother has not spared me, in the report she was pleased to make of the conference between herself and me: yet she was pleased to hint to me, that my brother had views which she would have had me try to disappoint. But, indeed, she had engaged to give a faithful account of what was to pass between herself and me: and it was, doubtless, much more eligible to give up a daughter, than to disoblige a husband, and every other person of the family.

They think they have done everything by turning away my poor Hannah: but as long as the liberty of the garden, and my poultry visits, are allowed me, they will be mistaken.

I asked Mrs. Betty if she had any orders to watch or attend me; or whether I was to ask her leave whenever I should be disposed to walk in the garden, or to go to feed my bantams?—Lord bless her! what could I mean by such a question! Yet she owned, that she had heard that I was not to go into the garden, when my father, mother, or uncles, were there.

However, as it behoved me to be assured on this head, I went down directly, and staid an hour, without question or impediment; and yet a good part of the time I walked under and in sight, as I may say, of my brother's study-window, where both he and my sister happened to be. And I am sure they saw me, by the loud mirth they affected, by way of insult, as I suppose.

So this part of my restraint was doubtless a stretch of the authority given him. The enforcing of that may perhaps come next. But I hope not.

TUESDAY NIGHT.

SINCE I wrote the above, I ventured to send a letter by Shorey to my mother. I desired her to give it into her own hand, when nobody was by.

I shall inclose the copy of it. You will see that I would have it thought, that now Hannah is gone, I have no way to correspond out of the house. I am far from thinking all I do, right. I am afraid this is a little piece of art, that is not so. But this is an after-thought—The letter went first.

'HONOURED MADAM,

'HAVING acknowledged to you that 'I had received letters from Mr. Lovelace full of resentment, and that I answered them purely to prevent further 'mischief; and having shewn you copies of my answers, which you did not 'disapprove of, although you thought 'fit, after you had read them, to forbid 'me any further correspondence with 'him; I think it my duty to acquaint 'you, that another letter from him has 'since come to my hand, in which he 'is very earnest with me to permit him 'to wait on my papa, or you, or my two 'uncles, in a pacifick way, accompanied by Lord M. on which I beg your 'commands.

'I own to you, Madam, that had not 'the prohibition been renewed, and had 'not Hannah been so suddenly dismissed my service, I should have made 'the less scruple to have written an answer, and to have commanded her to 'convey it to him, with all speed, in 'order to dissuade him from these visits, 'lest any thing should happen on the 'occasion

'occaſion that my heart aches but to 'think of.

'And here I cannot but expreſs my 'grief, that I ſhould have all the puniſh-'ment, and all the blame, who, as I 'have reaſon to think, have prevented 'great miſchief, and have not been the 'occaſion of any. For, Madam, could 'I be ſuppoſed to govern the paſſions of 'either of the gentlemen?—Over the one 'indeed I have had ſome little influence, 'without giving him hitherto any reaſon 'to think he has faſtened an obligation 'upon me for it—Over the other, who, 'Madam, has any?—I am grieved at 'heart, to be obliged to lay ſo great 'blame at my brother's door, although 'my reputation and my liberty are both 'to be ſacrificed to his reſentment and 'ambition. May not, however, ſo deep 'a ſufferer be permitted to ſpeak out?

'This communication being as vo-'luntarily made, as dutifully intended; 'I humbly preſume to hope, that I ſhall 'not be required to produce the letter 'itſelf. I cannot either in honour or 'prudence do that, becauſe of the vehe-'mence of his ſtyle; for having heard '[not, I aſſure you, by my means, or 'through Hannah's] of ſome part of the 'harſh treatment I have met with; he 'thinks himſelf entitled to place it to his 'own account, by reaſon of ſpeeches 'thrown out by ſome of my relations, 'equally vehement.

'If I do not anſwer him, he will be 'made deſperate, and think himſelf 'juſtified (though I ſhall not think him 'ſo) in reſenting the treatment he com-'plains of: if I do, and if, in compli-'ment to me, he forbears to reſent what 'he thinks himſelf entitled to reſent; 'be pleaſed, Madam, to conſider the 'obligation he will ſuppoſe he lays me 'under.

'If I were as ſtrongly prepoſſeſſed in 'his favour as is ſuppoſed, I ſhould not 'have wiſhed this to be conſidered by 'you. And permit me, as a ſtill fur-'ther proof that I am not prepoſſeſſed, 'to beg of you to conſider, whether, 'upon the whole, the propoſal I made, 'of declaring for the ſingle life, (which 'I will religiouſly adhere to) is not the 'beſt way to get rid of his pretenſions 'with honour. To renounce him, and 'not be allowed to aver that I will never 'be the other man's, will make him con-'clude (driven as I am driven) that I 'am determined in that other man's fa-'vour.

'If this has not it's due weight, my 'brother's ſtrange ſchemes muſt be tried, 'and I will reſign myſelf to my deſtiny 'with all the acquieſcence that ſhall be 'granted to my prayers. And ſo leav-'ing the whole to your own wiſdom, 'and whether you chuſe to conſult my 'papa and uncles upon this humble ap-'plication, or not; or whether I ſhall 'be allowed to write an anſwer to Mr. 'Lovelace, or not, [And if allowed 'ſo to do, I beg your direction, by 'whom to ſend it;] I remain, honoured 'Madam, your unhappy, but ever-dutiful 'daughter, 'CL. HARLOWE.'

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

I HAVE juſt received an anſwer to the incloſed letter. My mother, you will obſerve, has ordered me to burn it: but, as you will have it in your ſafe keeping, and nobody elſe will ſee it, her end will be equally anſwered, as if it were burnt. It has neither date nor ſuperſcription.

'CLARISSA,

'SAY not all the blame and all the 'puniſhment is yours. I am as much 'blamed and as much puniſhed as you 'are; yet am more innocent. When your 'obſtinacy is equal to any other perſon's 'paſſion, blame not your brother. We 'judged right, that Hannah carried on 'your correſpondences. Now ſhe is 'gone, and you cannot write [We think 'you cannot] to Miſs Howe, nor ſhe to 'you, without our knowledge, one cauſe 'of uneaſineſs and jealouſy is over.

'I had no diſlike to Hannah. I did 'not tell her ſo; becauſe ſomebody was 'within hearing when ſhe deſired to pay 'her duty to me at going. I gave her 'a caution, in a raiſed voice, to take 'care, wherever ſhe went to live next, 'if there were any young ladies, how 'ſhe made parties, and aſſiſted in clan-'deſtine correſpondences—But I ſlid 'two guineas into her hand. Nor was 'I angry to hear that you were ſtill 'more bountiful to her.—So much for 'Hannah.

'I don't know what to write, about 'your anſwering that man of violence. 'What can you think of it, that ſuch a 'family as ours ſhould have ſuch a rod 'held over it?—For my part, I have 'not owned that I know you have corre-'ſponded: by your laſt boldneſs to me '[An aſtoniſhing one it was to purſue 'before Mr. Solmes the ſubject that I 'was forced to break from above-ſtairs!] 'you may, as far as I know, plead, that 'you had my countenance for your cor-'reſpondence with him; and ſo add to 'the uneaſineſs between your father and 'me. You was once all my comfort,

'Clariſſa: you made all my hardſhips 'tolerable—but now!—However, no-'thing, it is plain, can move you; and 'I will ſay no more on that head: for 'you are under your father's diſcipline 'now; and he will neither be preſcribed 'to, nor entreated.

'I ſhould have been glad to ſee the 'letter you tell me of, as I ſaw the reſt '—you ſay, both honour and prudence 'forbid you to ſhew it to me.—O 'Clariſſa! what think you of receiving 'letters that honour and prudence for-'bid you to ſhew to a mother!—But it 'is not for me to ſee it, if you would 'chuſe to ſhew it me. I will not be in 'your ſecret. I will not know that 'you did correſpond. And, as to an 'anſwer, take your own methods. But 'let him know it will be the laſt you 'will write. And, if you do write, 'I won't ſee it: ſo ſeal it up (if you 'do) and give it to Shorey; and ſhe '—Yet do not think I give you licence 'to write.

'We will be upon no conditions with 'him, nor will you be allowed to be up-'on any. Your father and uncles would 'have no patience were he to come. 'What have you to do to oblige him 'with your refuſal of Mr. Solmes?—'Will not that refuſal be to give him 'hope? And while he has any, can we 'be eaſy or free from his inſult? Were 'even your brother in fault, as that 'fault cannot be conquered, is a ſiſter 'to carry on a correſpondence that ſhall 'endanger her brother? But your fa-'ther has given his ſanction to your bro-'ther's diſlikes, and they are now your 'father's diſlikes, and my diſlikes, your 'uncles and every-body's!—No matter 'to whom owing.

'As to the reſt, you have by your 'obſtinacy put it out of my power to do 'any thing for you. Your father takes 'upon himſelf to be anſwerable for all 'conſequences. You muſt not therefore 'apply to me for favour. I ſhall en-'deavour to be only an obſerver; hap-'py, if I could be an unconcerned 'one!—While I had power, you would 'not let me uſe it as I would have uſed 'it. Your aunt has been forced to en-'gage not to interfere but by your fa-'ther's direction. You'll have ſevere 'trials. If you have any favour to 'hope for, it muſt be from the media-'tion of your uncles. And yet, I be-'lieve, they are equally determined: 'for they make it a principle [Alas! 'they never had children!] that that 'child, who in marriage is not governed 'by her parents, is to be given up as a 'loſt creature.

'I charge you, let not this letter be 'found. Burn it. There is too much of 'the mother in it, to a daughter ſo unac-'countably obſtinate.

'Write not another letter to me. I 'can do nothing for you. But you can 'do every-thing for yourſelf.'

Now, my dear, to proceed with my melancholy narrative.

After this letter, you will believe, that I could have very little hopes, that an application directly to my father would ſtand me in any ſtead: but I thought it became me to write, were it but to acquit myſelf to myſelf, that I have left nothing unattempted that has the leaſt likelihood to reſtore me to his favour. Accordingly I wrote to the following effect.

'I PRESUME not, I ſay, to argue 'with my papa; I only beg his mercy 'and indulgence in this one point, on 'which depends my preſent and perhaps 'my future happineſs; and beſeech him 'not to reprobate his child for an aver-'ſion which it is not in her power to 'conquer. I beg, that I may not be 'ſacrificed to projects, and remote con-'tingencies. I complain of the diſ-'graces I ſuffer in this baniſhment from 'his preſence, and in being confined 'to my chamber. In every-thing but 'this one point, I promiſe implicit duty 'and reſignation to his will. I repeat 'my offers of a ſingle life; and appeal 'to him, whether I have ever given 'him cauſe to doubt my word. I beg 'to be admitted to his, and to my 'mamma's preſence, and that my con-'duct may be under their own eye: 'and this with the more earneſtneſs, as 'I have too much reaſon to believe, 'that ſnares are laid for me; and 'tauntings and revilings uſed on pur-'poſe to make a handle of my words 'againſt me, when I am not permit-'ted to ſpeak in my own defence. I 'conclude with hoping, that my bro-'ther's inſtigations may not rob an un-'happy child of her father.'

This is the anſwer, ſent without ſuperſcription, and unſealed, although by Betty Barnes who delivered it with an air, as if ſhe knew the contents.

WEDNESDAY.

'I WRITE, perverſe girl; but with 'all the indignation that your diſobe-'dience deſerves. To deſire to be for-'given a fault you own, and yet reſolve

'to

'to perſevere in, is a boldneſs, no more 'to be equalled, than paſſed over. It is 'my authority you defy. Your reflec- 'tions upon a brother, that is an honour 'to us all, deſerve my utmoſt reſent- 'ment. I ſee how light all relationſhip 'ſits upon you. The cauſe I gueſs at, 'too. I cannot bear the reflections 'that naturally ariſe from this conſi- 'deration. Your behaviour to your 'too indulgent, and too fond mother— 'But I have no patience—Continue 'baniſhed from my preſence, undutiful 'as you are, till you know how to 'conform to my will. Ingrateful crea- 'ture! Your letter but upbraids me 'for my paſt indulgence. Write no 'more to me, till you can diſtinguiſh 'better; and till you are convinced of 'your duty to

'A juſtly-incenſed Father.'

This angry letter was accompanied with one from my mother, unſealed, and unſuperſcribed alſo. Thoſe who take ſo much pains to confederate every one againſt me, I make no doubt, obliged her to bear her teſtimony againſt the poor girl.

My mother's letter being a repetition of ſome of the ſevere things that paſſed between herſelf and me, of which I have already informed you, I ſhall not need to give you the contents—Only thus far, that ſhe alſo praiſes my brother, and blames me for my freedoms with him.

LETTER XXVI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

THURSDAY MORN. MARCH 9.

I Have another letter from Mr. Lovelace, although I had not anſwered his former.

This man, ſome how or other, knows every-thing that paſſes in our family. My confinement; Hannah's diſmiſſion; and more of the reſentments and reſolutions of my father, uncles, and brother, than I can poſſibly know, and almoſt as ſoon as the things happen which he tells me of. He cannot come at theſe intelligences fairly.

He is exceſſively uneaſy upon what he hears; and his expreſſions both of love to me, and reſentment to them, are very fervent. He ſolicits me, to engage my honour to him, never to have Mr. Solmes.

I think I may fairly promiſe him that I will not.

He begs, That I will not think he is endeavouring to make to himſelf a merit at any man's expence, ſince he hopes to obtain my favour on the foot of his own; nor that he ſeeks to intimidate me into a conſideration for him. But declares, that the treatment he meets with from my family is of ſuch a nature, that he is perpetually reproached for not reſenting it; and that as well by Lord M. and Lady Sarah, and Lady Betty, as by all his other friends: and if he muſt have no hope from me, he cannot anſwer for what his deſpair will make him do.

Indeed, he ſays, his relations, the ladies particularly, adviſe him to have recourſe to a legal remedy: but how, he aſks, can a man of honour go to law for verbal abuſes given by people entitled to wear ſwords?

You ſee, my dear, that my mother ſeems as apprehenſive of miſchief as myſelf; and has indirectly offered to let Shorey carry my anſwer to the letter he ſent me before.

He is full of the favour of the ladies of his family to me: to whom, nevertheleſs, I am perſonally a ſtanger; except that once I ſaw Miſs Patty Montague at Mrs. Knollys's.

It is natural, I believe, for a perſon to be the more deſirous of making new friends, in proportion as ſhe loſes the favour of old ones: yet had I rather appear amiable in the eyes of my own relations, and in your eyes, than in thoſe of all the world beſide.—But theſe four ladies of his family have ſuch excellent characters, that one cannot but wiſh to be thought well of by them. Cannot there be a way to find out by Mrs. Forteſcue's means, or by Mr. Hickman, who has ſome knowledge of Lord M. [covertly, however] what their opinions are of the preſent ſituation of things in our family; and of the little likelihood there is, that ever the alliance once approved of by them, can take effect?

I cannot, for my own part, think ſo well of myſelf, as to imagine, that they can wiſh their kinſman to perſevere in his views with regard to me, through ſuch contempts and diſcouragements.—Not that it would concern me, ſhould they adviſe him to the contrary. By my lord's ſigning Mr. Lovelace's former letter; by Mr. Lovelace's aſſurances of the continued favour of all his relations; and by the report of others; I ſeem ſtill to ſtand high in their favour: but, methinks, I ſhould be glad to have this confirmed to me, as from themſelves, by the lips of an indifferent perſon; and the the rather, as they are known to put a value upon their alliance, becauſe of their fortunes and family: and take it amiſs (as they have reaſon) to be included by ours in the contempt thrown upon their kinſman.

Curioſity at preſent is all my motive: nor will there ever, I hope, be a ſtronger, notwithſtanding your queſtionable throbs—even were the merits of Mr. Lovelace much greater than they are.

I HAVE anſwered his letters. If he takes me at my word, I ſhall need to be the leſs ſolicitous for the opinions of his relations in my favour: and yet one would be glad to be well thought of by the worthy.

This is the ſubſtance of my letter,

I expreſs my ſurprize at his knowing (and ſo early) all that paſſes here.

I aſſure him, That were there not ſuch a man in the world as himſelf, I would not have Mr. Solmes.

I tell him, That to return, as I underſtand he does, defiances for defiances, to my relations, is far from being a proof with me, either of his politeneſs, or of the conſideration he pretends to have for me.

That the moment I hear he viſits any of my friends without their conſent I will make a reſolution never to ſee him more, I can help it.

I apprize him, That I am connived at in ſending this letter, (although no one has ſeen the contents) provided it ſhall be the laſt I will ever write to him: that I had more than once told him, that the ſingle life was my choice; and this before Mr. Solmes was introduced as a viſitor in our family. That Mr. Wyerley, and other gentlemen, knew it to be my choice, before himſelf was acquainted with any of us; that I had never been induced to receive a line from him on the ſubject, but that I thought he had not acted ungenerouſly by my brother; and yet had not been ſo handſomely treated by my friends, as he might have expected: but that had he even my friends on his ſide, I ſhould have very great objections to him, were I to get over my choice of a ſingle life, ſo really preferable to me as it is; and that I ſhould have declared as much to him, had I regarded him as more than a common viſitor. On all theſe accounts, I deſire, that the one more letter, which I will allow him to depoſit in the uſual place, may be the very laſt; and that only, to acquaint me with his acquieſcence that it ſhall be ſo; at leaſt till happier times.

This laſt I put in that he may not be quite deſperate. But if he take me at my word, I ſhall be rid of one of my tormentors.

I have promiſed to lay before you all his letters, and my anſwers: I repeat that promiſe; and am the leſs ſolicitous, for that reaſon, to amplify upon the contents of either. But I cannot too often expreſs my vexation to be driven to ſuch ſtreights and difficulties, here at home, as oblige me to anſwer letters (from a man I had not abſolutely intended to encourage, and to whom I had really great objections) filled as his are with ſuch warm proteſtations, and written to me with a ſpirit of expectation.

For, my dear, you never knew ſo bold a ſuppoſer. As commentators find beauties in an author, to which the author perhaps was a ſtranger; ſo he ſometimes compliments me in high ſtrains of gratitude for favours, and for a conſideration, which I never deſigned him; inſomuch that I am frequently under a neceſſity of explaining away the attributed goodneſs to him, which if I ſhewed, I ſhould have the leſs opinion of myſelf.

In ſhort, my dear, like a reſtiff horſe, (as I have heard deſcribed by ſportſmen) he pains one's hands, and half disjonts one's arms, to rein him in. And, when you ſee his letters, you muſt form no judgment upon them, till you have read my anſwers. If you do, you will indeed think you have cauſe to attribute ſelf-deceit, and throbs, and glows to your friend—And yet, at other times, the contradictory creature complains, that I ſhew him as little favour, and my friends as much inveteracy, as if in the rencounter betwixt my brother and him, he had been the aggreſſor; and as if the cataſtrophe had been as fatal, as it might have been.

If he had a deſign by this conduct (ſometimes complaining of my ſhyneſs, at others exulting in my imaginary favours) to induce me at one time to acquieſce with his compliments; at another to be more complaiſant for his complaints; and if the contradiction be not the effect of his inattention and giddineſs; I ſhall think him as deep and as artful (too probably, as practiſed) a creature, as ever lived: and were I to be ſure of it, ſhould hate him, if poſſible, worſe than I do Solmes.

But enough for the preſent of a creature ſo very various.

LET-

LETTER XXVII.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

THURSDAY NIGHT, MARCH 9.

I Have not patience with any of the people you are with. I know not what to adviſe you to do. How do you know, that you are not puniſhable for being the cauſe, though to your own loſs, that the will of your grandfather is not complied with?—Wills are ſacred things, child. You ſee, that they, even they, think ſo, who imagine they ſuffer by a will, through the diſtinction paid you in it.

I allow of all your noble reaſonings for what you did at the time: but ſince ſuch a charming, ſuch a generous inſtance of filial duty is to go thus unrewarded, why ſhould you not reſume?

Your grandfather knew the family-failing. He knew what a noble ſpirit you had to do good. He himſelf perhaps [Excuſe me, my dear] had done too little in his life-time; and therefore he put it in your power to make up for the defects of the whole family. Were it to me, I would reſume it. Indeed I would.

You will ſay, you cannot do it, while you are with them. I don't know that. Do you think they can uſe you worſe than they do? And is it not your right? And do they not make uſe of your own generoſity to oppreſs you? Your uncle Harlowe is one truſtee; your couſin Morden is the other: inſiſt upon your right to your uncle; and write to your couſin Morden about it. This, I dare ſay, will make them alter their behaviour to you.

Your inſolent brother—what has he to do to controul you?—Were it me, [I wiſh it were for one month, and no more] I'd ſhew him the difference. I would be in my own manſion, purſuing my charming ſchemes, and making all around me happy. I would ſet up my own chariot. I would viſit them when they deſerved it. But when my brother and ſiſter gave themſelves airs, I would let them know, that I was their ſiſter, and not their ſervant; and, if that did not do, I would ſhut my gates againſt them; and bid them go, and be company for each other.

It muſt be confeſſed, however, that this brother and ſiſter of yours, judging as ſuch narrow ſpirits will ever judge, have ſome reaſon for treating you as they do. It muſt have long been a mortification to them (ſet diſappointed love on her ſide, and avarice on his, out of the queſtion) to be ſo much eclipſed by a younger ſiſter. Such a ſun in a family, where there are none but faint twinklers, how could they bear it! Why, my dear, they muſt look upon you as a prodigy among them: and prodigies, you know, though they obtain our admiration, never attract our love. The diſtance between you and them is immenſe. Their eyes ache to look up at you. What ſhade does your full day of merit caſt upon them! Can you wonder then, that they ſhould embrace the firſt opportunity that offered, to endeavour to bring you down to their level?

Depend upon it, my dear, you will have more of it, and more ſtill, as you bear it.

As to this odious Solmes, I wonder not at your averſion to him. It is needleſs to ſay any thing to you, who have ſo ſincere an antipathy to him, to ſtrengthen your diſlike: yet, who can reſiſt her own talents? One of mine, as I have heretofore ſaid, is to give an ugly likeneſs. Shall I indulge it?—I will. And the rather, as, in doing ſo, you will have my opinion in juſtification of your averſion to him, and in approbation of a ſteadineſs that I ever admired and muſt for ever approve of in your temper.

I was twice in this wretch's company. At one of the times your Lovelace was there. I need not mention to you, who have ſuch a pretty curioſity, (though at preſent, only a curioſity, you know) the unſpeakable difference.

Lovelace entertained the company in his lively gay way, and made everybody laugh at one of his ſtories. It was before this creature was thought of for you. Solmes laughed too. It was, however, his laugh; for his firſt three years, at leaſt, I imagine, muſt have been one continual fit of crying; and his muſcles have never yet been able to recover a riſible tone. His very ſmile [You never ſaw him ſmile, I believe; never at leaſt gave him cauſe to ſmile] is ſo little natural to his features, that it appears in him as hideous as the grin of a man in malice.

I took great notice of him, as I do of all the noble lords of the creation, in their peculiarities; and was diſguſted, nay, ſhocked at him, even then. I was glad, I remember, on that particular occaſion, to ſee his ſtrange features recovering their natural gloomineſs; though they did this but ſlowly, as if the muſcles which contributed to his diſtortions, diſtortions, had turned upon ruſty ſprings.

What a dreadful thing muſt even the love of ſuch a huſband be! For my part, were I his wife! (But what have I done to myſelf, to make but ſuch a ſuppoſition?) I ſhould never have comfort but in his abſence, or when I was quarrelling with him. A ſplenetick woman, who muſt have ſomebody to find fault with, might indeed be brought to endure ſuch a wretch: the ſight of him would always furniſh out the occaſion, and all her ſervants, for that reaſon, and for that only, would have cauſe to bleſs their maſter. But how grievous and apprehenſive a thing muſt it be for his wife, had ſhe the leaſt degree of delicacy, to catch herſelf in having done ſomething to oblige him?

So much for his perſon: as to the other half of him, he is ſaid to be an inſinuating, creeping mortal, to anybody he hopes to be a gainer by; an inſolent, over-bearing one, where he has no ſuch views. And is not this the genuine ſpirit of meanneſs? He is reported to be ſpiteful and malicious, even to the whole family of any ſingle perſon who has once diſobliged him; and to his own relations moſt of all. I am told, that they are none of them ſuch wretches as himſelf. This may be one reaſon why he is for diſinheriting them.

My Kitty, from one of his domeſticks, tells me, that his tenants hate him: and that he never had a ſervant who ſpoke well of him. Vilely ſuſpicious of their wronging him (probably from the badneſs of his own heart) he is always changing.

His pockets, they ſay, are continually crammed with keys: ſo that when he would treat a gueſt (A friend he has not out of your family) he is half as long puzzling which is which, as his niggardly treat might be concluded in. And if it be wine, he always fetches it himſelf. Nor has he much trouble in doing ſo; for he has very few viſitors—only thoſe, whom buſineſs or neceſſity brings: for a gentleman who can help it, would rather be benighted, than put up at his houſe.

Yet this is the man they have found out (for conſiderations as ſordid as thoſe he is governed by) for a huſband, that is to ſay, for a lord and maſter, for Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe!

But perhaps, he may not be quite ſo miſerable as he is repreſented. Characters extremely good, or extremely bad, are ſeldom juſtly given. Favour for a perſon will exalt the one, as diſfavour will ſink the other. But your uncle Antony has told my mother, who objected to his covetouſneſs, that it was intended to tie him up, as he called it, to your own terms; which would be with a hempen, rather than a matrimonial cord, I dare ſay. But, is not this a plain indication, that even his own recommenders think him a mean creature, and that he muſt be articled with—perhaps for neceſſaries? But enough, and too much, of ſuch a wretch as this!—You muſt not have him, my dear—that I am clear in—though not ſo clear, how you will be able to avoid it, except you aſſert the independence to which your eſtate gives you a title.

HERE my mother broke in upon me. She wanted to ſee what I had written. I was ſilly enough to read Solmes's character to her.

She owned, that the man was not the moſt deſirable of men; and that he had not the happieſt appearance: 'But 'what,' ſaid ſhe, 'is perſon in a man?' And I was chidden for ſetting you againſt complying with your father's will. Then followed a lecture upon the preference to be given in favour of a man who took care to diſcharge all his obligations to the world, and to keep all together, in oppoſition to a ſpendthrift or profligate: a fruitful ſubject you know, whether any particular perſon be meant by it, or not.

Why will theſe wiſe parents, by ſaying too much againſt the perſons they diſlike, put one upon defending them? Lovelace is not a ſpendthrift; owes not obligations to the world; though, I doubt not, profligate enough. Then, putting one upon doing ſuch but common juſtice, we muſt needs be prepoſſeſſed, truly!—And ſo perhaps we are put upon curioſities firſt, that is to ſay, how ſuch a one or his friends may think of one:—and then, but too probably, comes in a diſtinguiſhing preference, or ſomething that looks exceedingly like it.

My mother charged me at laſt, to write that ſide over again.—'But excuſe me, my good mamma!' I would not have the character loſt upon any conſideration; ſince my vein ran freely into it: and I never wrote to pleaſe myſelf, but I pleaſed you. A very good reaſon why—We have but one mind between us—only, that ſometimes you are a little too grave, methinks;

I, no doubt, a little too flippant in your opinion.

This difference in our tempers, however, is probably the reason that we love one another so well, that in the words of Norris, no third love can come in betwixt. Since each, in the other's eye, having something amiss, and each loving the other well enough to bear being told of it; (and the rather perhaps as neither wishes to mend it) this takes off a good deal from that rivalry which might encourage a little (if not a great deal) of that latent spleen, which in time might rise into envy, and that into ill-will. So, my dear, if this be the case, let each keep her fault, and much good may do her with it, say I: for there is constitution in both to plead for it. And what an hero or heroine must he or she be, who can conquer a constitutional fault? Let it be avarice, as in some I dare not name: let it be gravity, as in my best friend; or let it be flippancy, as in—I need not say whom.

It is proper to acquaint you, that I was obliged to comply with my mother's curiosity, [My mother has her share, her full share, of curiosity, my dear] and to let her see here-and-there some passages in your letters.

I am broken in upon—but I will tell you by-and-by what passed between my mother and me on this occasion—and the rather, as she had her GIRL, her favourite HICKMAN, and your LOVELACE, all at once in her eye, in her part of the conversation.

THUS it was.

'I cannot but think, Nancy,' said she, 'after all, that there is a little hardship 'in Miss Harlowe's case: and yet (as 'her mother says) it is a grating thing 'to have a child who was always noted 'for her duty in smaller points, to stand 'in opposition to her parents will, in 'the greater; yea, in the greatest of all. 'And now, to middle the matter between 'both, it is pity, that the man they favour 'has not that sort of merit which a person of a mind so delicate as that of Miss 'Harlowe might reasonably expect in a 'husband.—But then this man is surely 'preferable to a libertine; to a libertine 'too, who has had a duel with her own 'brother: fathers and mothers must think 'so, were it not for that circumstance— 'And it is strange if they do not know 'best.'

'And so they must,' thought I, 'from 'their experience, if no little dirty views 'give them also that prepossession in one 'man's favour, which they are so apt to 'censure their daughters for having in 'another's.—And if, as I may add in your case, they have no creeping, old, musty uncle Antony's to strengthen their prepossessions, as he does my mother's— Poor, creeping, positive soul, what has such an old batchelor as he to do, to prate about the duties of children to parents; unless he had a notion that parents owe some to their children? But your mother, by her indolent meekness, let me call it, has spoiled all the three brothers.

'But you see, child' proceeded my mother, 'what a different behaviour 'MINE is to YOU. I recommend to you 'one of the soberest, yet politest, men 'in England.'

I think little of my mother's politest, my dear. She judges of honest Hickman for her daughter, as she would have done, I suppose, twenty years ago, for herself.

'Of a good family,' continued my mother; 'a fine, clear, and improving 'estate;' [a prime consideration with my mother, as well as with some other folks, whom you know] 'and I beg and I pray 'you to encourage him: at least, not to 'use him worse for his being so obsequious to you.'

Yes indeed! To use him kindly, that he may treat me familiarly—But distance to the men-wretches is best—I say.

'Yet all will hardly prevail upon you 'to do as I would have you. What 'would you say, were I to treat you as 'Miss Harlowe's father and mother treat 'her?'

'What would I say, Madam!—That's 'easily answered. I would say nothing. 'Can you think such usage, and to such 'a young lady, is to be borne?'

'Come, come, Nancy, be not so hasty: 'you have heard but one side; and that 'there is more to be said is plain, by your 'reading to me but parts of her letters. 'They are her parents. They must know 'best. Miss Harlowe, as fine a child as 'she is, must have done something, must 'have said something, (you know how 'they loved her) to make them treat her 'thus.'

'But if she should be blameless, Madam, how does your own supposition 'condemn them?'

Then came up Solmes's great estate; his good management of it—'A little 'too NEAR indeed!' was the word.—['O how money-lovers,' thought I, 'will 'palliate!' Yet my mother is a princess in spirit to this Solmes!] 'What strange 'effects,' added she, 'have prepossession 'and love upon young ladies?'

I don't know how it is, my dear; but people people take high delight in finding out folks in love. Curiosity begets curiosity: I believe that's the thing.

She proceeded to praise Mr. Lovelace's person and his qualifications natural and acquired: but then she would judge as mothers will judge, and as daughters are very loth to judge:—but could say nothing in answer to your offer of living single; and breaking with him—if—if—[three or four if's she made of one good one, if] that could be depended on.

But still obedience without reserve, reason what I will, is the burden of my mother's song: and this for my sake, as well as for yours.

I must needs say, that I think duty to parents is a very meritorious excellence: but I bless God I have not your trials. We can all be good when we have no temptation nor provocation to the contrary: but few young persons (who can help themselves too as you can) would bear what you bear.

I will now mention all that is upon my mind, in relation to the behaviour of your father and uncles, and the rest of them, because I would not offend you: but I have now a higher opinion of my own sagacity, than ever I had, in that I could never cordially love any one of your family but yourself. I am not born to like them. But it is my duty to be sincere to my friend: and this will excuse her Anna Howe to Miss Clarissa Harlowe.

I ought indeed to have excepted your mother; a lady to be reverenced; and now to be pitied. What must have been her treatment, to be thus subjugated, as I may call it? Little did the good old viscount think, when he married his darling, his only daughter to so well-appearing a gentleman, and to her own liking too, that she would have been so much kept down. Another would call your father a tyrant, if I must not: all the world that know him, do call him so; and if you love your mother, you should not be very angry at the world for taking that liberty.

Yet, after all, I cannot help thinking, that she is the less to be pitied, as she may be said (be the gout, or what will, the occasion of his moroseness) to have long behaved unworthy of her birth and fine qualities, in yielding so much as she yields to encroaching spirits; [You may confine the reflection to your brother, if it will pain you to extend it] and this for the sake of preserving a temporary peace to herself; which was the less worth endeavouring to preserve, as it always produced a strength in the will of others, and was followed by a weakness in her own, which subjected her to an arbitrariness that of course grew, and became established, upon her patience.—And now to give up the most deserving of her children (against her judgment) a sacrifice to the ambition and selfishness of the least deserving!—But I fly from this subject—having, I fear, said too much to be forgiven—and yet much less than is in my heart to say upon the over-meek subject.

Mr. Hickman is expected from London this evening. I have desired him to enquire after Lovelace's life and conversation in town. If he has not enquired, I shall be very angry with him. Don't expect a very good account of either. He is certainly an intriguing wretch, and full of inventions.

Upon my word, I most heartily despise that sex! I wish they would let our fathers and mothers alone; teazing them to teaze us with their golden promises, and protestations, and settlements, and the rest of their ostentatious nonsense. How charmingly might you and I live together, and despise them all!—But to be cajoled, wire-drawn, and ensnared, like silly birds, into a state of bondage, or vile subordination: to be courted as princesses for a few weeks, in order to be treated as slaves for the rest of our lives—Indeed, my dear, as you say of Solmes, I cannot endure them! But for your relations [friends no more will I call them, unworthy as they are even of the other name!] to take such a wretch's price as that; and to the cutting off all reversions from his own family!—How must a mind but commonly just resist such a measure!

Mr. Hickman shall sound Lord M. upon the subject you recommend. But beforehand I can tell you what he and what his sister will say, when they are sounded. Who would not be proud of such a relation as Miss Clarissa Harlowe?—Mrs. Fortescue told me, that they are all your very great admirers.

If I have not been clear enough in my advice about what you shall do, let me say, that I can give it in one word: it is only by re-urging you to RESUME. If you do, all the rest will follow.

We are told here, that Mrs. Norton, as well as your aunt Hervey, has given her opinion on the implicit side of the question. If she can think, that the part she has had in your education, and your own admirable talents and acquirements, are are to be thrown away upon ſuch a worthleſs creature as Solmes, I could heartily quarrel with her. You may think I ſay this to leſſen your regard for the good woman. And perhaps not wholly without cauſe, if you do. For, to own the truth, methinks, I don't love her ſo well as I ſhould do, did you love her ſo apparently leſs, that I could be out of doubt, that you love me better.

Your mother tells you, That you will have great trials: that you are under your father's diſcipline.—The word is enough for me to deſpiſe them who give occaſion for it's uſe.—That it is out of her power to help you! And again, that if you have any favour to hope for, it muſt be by the mediation of your uncles. I ſuppoſe you will write to the oddities, ſince you are forbid to ſee them—But can it be, that ſuch a lady, ſuch a ſiſter, ſuch a wife, ſuch a mother, has no influence in her own family? Who, indeed, as you ſay, if this be ſo, would marry, that can live ſingle? My choler is again beginning to riſe. RESUME, my dear:—and that is all I will give myſelf time to ſay further, leſt I offend you when I cannot ſerve you.—Only this, that I am your truly affectionate friend and ſervant, ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XXVIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

FRIDAY, MARCH 10.

YOU will permit me, my dear, to touch upon a few paſſages in your laſt letter, that affect me ſenſibly.

In the firſt place, you muſt allow me to ſay, low as I am in ſpirits, that I am very angry with you for your reflections on my relations, particularly on my father and mother, and on the memory of my grandfather. Nor, my dear, does your own mother always eſcape the keen edge of your vivacity. One cannot one's ſelf forbear to write or ſpeak freely of thoſe we love and honour, when grief from imagined hard treatment wrings the heart: but it goes againſt one to hear any-body elſe take the ſame liberties. Then you have ſo very ſtrong a manner of expreſſion where you take a diſtaſte, that when paſſion has ſubſided, and I come (upon reflection) to ſee by your ſeverity what I have given occaſion for, I cannot help condemning myſelf.

But leaſt of all can I bear that you ſhould reflect upon my mother. What, my dear, if her meekneſs ſhould not be rewarded? Is the want of reward, or the want even of a grateful acknowledgment, a reaſon for us to diſpenſe with what we think our duty? They were my father's lively ſpirits that firſt made him an intereſt in her gentle boſom. They were the ſame ſpirits turned inward, as I have heretofore obſerved, that made him ſo impatient when the cruel malady ſeized him. He always loved my mother: and would not LOVE and PITY, excuſably, nay, laudably, make a good wife (who was an hourly witneſs of his pangs, when labouring under a paroxyſm, and his paroxyſms becoming more and more frequent, as well as more and more ſevere) give up her own will, her own likings, to oblige a huſband thus afflicted, whoſe love for her was unqueſtionable?—And if ſo, was it not too natural, [human nature is not perfect, my dear] that the huſband thus humoured by the wife, ſhould be unable to bear controul from any-body elſe? much leſs contradiction from his children?

If then you would avoid my higheſt diſpleaſure, you muſt ſpare my mother: and, ſurely, you will allow me, with her, to pity, as well as to love and honour my father.

I have no friend but you to whom I can appeal, to whom I dare complain. Unhappily circumſtanced as I am, it is but too probable that I ſhall complain, becauſe it is but too probable that I ſhall have more and more cauſe given me for complaint. But be it your part, if I do, to ſoothe my angry paſſions, and to ſoften my reſentments; and this the rather, as you know what an influence your advice has upon me; and as you muſt alſo know, that the freedoms you take with my friends, can have no other tendency but to weaken the ſenſe of my duty to them, without anſwering any good end to myſelf.

I cannot help owning, however, that I am pleaſed to have you join with me in opinion of the contempt which Solmes deſerves from me. But yet, permit me to ſay, that he is not quite ſo horrible a creature as you make him: as to his perſon, I mean; for with regard to his mind, by all I have heard, you have done him but juſtice: but you have ſuch a talent at an ugly likeneſs, and ſuch a vivacity, that they ſometimes carry you out of verifimilitude. In ſhort, my dear, I have known you, in more inſtances than one, ſit down reſolved to write all that wit, rather than ſtrict juſtice, could ſuggeſt upon the given occaſion. Perhaps it may be thought, that I ſhould ſay the leſs on this particular ſubject, becauſe your diſlike of him ariſes from love to me: but ſhould it not be our aim to judge of ourſelves, and of every thing that affects us, as we may reaſonably imagine other people would judge of us and of our actions?

As to the advice you give, to reſume my eſtate, I am determined not to litigate with my father, let what will be the conſequence to myſelf. I may give you, at another time, a more particular anſwer to your reaſonings on this ſubject: but, at preſent, will only obſerve, that it is my opinion, that Lovelace himſelf would hardly think me worth addreſſing, were he to know this to be my reſolution. Theſe men, my dear, with all their flatteries, look forward to the PERMANENT. Indeed, it is fit they ſhould. For love muſt be a very fooliſh thing to look back upon, when it has brought perſons born to affluence into indigence, and laid a generous mind under obligation and dependence.

You very ingeniouſly account for the love we bear to one another, from the difference in our tempers. I own I ſhould not have thought of that. There may poſſibly be ſomething in it: but whether there be, or not, whenever I am cool, and give myſelf time to reflect, I will love you the better for the correction you give me, be as ſevere as you will upon me. Spare me not therefore, my dear friend, whenever you think me in the leaſt fault. I love your agreeable raillery: you know I always did; nor, however over-ſerious you think me, did I ever think you flippant, as you harſhly call it. One of the firſt conditions of our mutual friendſhip was, that each ſhould ſay or write to the other whatever was upon her mind, without any offence to be taken: a condition that is indeed indiſpenſable in friendſhip.

I know your mother would be for implicit obedience in a child. I am ſorry my caſe is ſo circumſtanced, that I cannot comply. It would be my duty to do ſo, if I could. You are indeed very happy, that you have nothing but your own agreeable, yet whimſical, humours to contend with, in the choice ſhe invites you to make of Mr. Hickman. How happy ſhould I be to be treated with ſo much lenity!—I ſhould bluſh to have my mother ſay, that ſhe begged and prayed me, and all in vain, to encourage a man ſo unexceptionable as Mr. Hickman.

Indeed, my beloved Miſs Howe, I am aſhamed to have your mother ſay, with ME in her view, What ſtrange effects have prepoſſeſſion and love upon young creatures of our ſex! This touches me the more ſenſibly, becauſe you yourſelf my dear, are ſo ready to perſuade me into it.

I ſhould be very blameable to endeavour to hide any the leaſt bias upon my mind from you: and I cannot but ſay—that this man—this Lovelace—is a man that might be liked well enough, if he bore ſuch a character as Mr. Hickman bears; and even if there were hopes of reclaiming him. And further ſtill I will acknowledge, that I believe it poſſible that one might be driven, by violent meaſures, ſtep by ſtep, as it were, into ſomething that might be called—I do not know what to call it—A conditional kind of liking, or ſo. But as to the word LOVE—juſtifiable and charming as it is in ſome caſes, (that is to ſay, in all the relative, in all the ſocial, and, what is ſtill bevond both, in all our ſuperior duties, in which it may be properly called divine;) it has, methinks, in the narrow, circumſcribed, ſelfiſh, peculiar ſenſe, in which you apply it to me, (the man too ſo little to be approved of for his morals, if all that report ſays of him be true) no pretty ſound with it. Treat me as freely as you will in other reſpects, I will love you, as I have ſaid, the better for your friendly freedom: but, methinks, that I could be glad that you would not let this imputation paſs ſo glibly from your pen, or your lips, as attributable to one of your own ſex, whether I be the perſon or not; ſince the other muſt have a double triumph, when a perſon of your delicacy (armed with ſuch contempts of them all, as you would have one think) can give up a friend, with an exultation over her weakneſs, as a ſilly, love-ſick creature!

I could make ſome other obſervations upon the contents of your laſt two letters; but my mind is not free enough at preſent. The occaſions for the above ſtuck with me; and I could not help taking the earlieſt notice of them.

Having written to the end of my ſecond ſheet, I will cloſe this letter, and in my next acquaint you with all that has happened here ſince my laſt.

LETTER XXXIX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SATURDAY, MARCH 11.

I Have had ſuch taunting meſſages, and ſuch repeated avowals of ill offices, brought me from my brother and ſiſter, if I do not comply with their wills, (delivered, too, with provoking ſaucineſs by by Betty Barnes) that I have thought it proper, before I entered upon my intended addreſs to my uncles, in purſuance of the hint given me in my mother's letter, to expoſtulate a little with them. But I have done it in ſuch a manner as will give you (if you pleaſe to take it as you have done ſome parts of my former letters) great advantage over me. In ſhort, you will have more cauſe than ever to declare me far gone in love, if my reaſons for the change of my ſtile in theſe letters, with regard to Mr. Lovelace, do not engage your more favourable opinion. — For I have thought proper to give them their own way; and, ſince they will have it that I have a preferable regard for Mr. Lovelace, I give them cauſe rather to confirm their opinion than doubt it.

Theſe are my reaſons in brief, for the alteration of my ſtile.

In the firſt place, they have grounded their principal argument for my compliance with their will, upon my acknowledgment that my heart is free; and ſo, ſuppoſing I give up no preferable perſon, my oppoſition has the look of downright obſtinacy in their eyes; and they argue, that, at worſt, my averſion to Solmes is an averſion that may be eaſily ſurmounted, and ought to be ſurmounted in duty to my father, and for the promotion of family-views.

Next, although they build upon this argument in order to ſilence me, they ſeem not to believe me, but treat me as diſgracefully as if I were in love with one of my father's footmen—ſo that my conditional willingneſs to give up Mr. Lovelace has procured me no favour.

In the next place, I cannot but think, that my brother's antipathy to Mr. Lovelace is far from being well grounded; the man's inordinate paſſion for the ſex is the crime that is always rung in my ears; and a very great one it is; but, does my brother recriminate upon him thus in love to me?—No—His whole behaviour ſhews me, that that is not his principal motive, and that he thinks me rather in his way than otherwiſe.

It is then the call of juſtice, as I may ſay, to ſpeak a little in favour of a man, who, although provoked by my brother, did not do him all the miſchief he could have done him, and which my brother had endeavoured to do him. It might not be amiſs, therefore, I thought, to alarm them a little with an apprehenſion, that the methods they are a taking with me are the very reverſe of thoſe they ſhould take to anſwer the end they deſign by them. And after all, what is the compliment I make Mr. Lovelace, if I allow it to be thought that I do really prefer him to ſuch a man as him they terrify me with? Then, my Miſs Howe [concluded I] accuſes me of a tameneſs which ſubjects me to inſults from my brother: I will keep that dear friend in my eye; and for all theſe conſiderations, try what a little of her ſpirit will do—ſit it ever ſo awkwardly upon me.

In this way of thinking, I wrote to my brother and ſiſter. This is my letter to him.

'TREATED as I am treated, and, 'in a great meaſure, if not wholly, by 'your inſtigations, brother, you muſt permit me to expoſtulate with you upon 'the occaſion. It is not my intention to 'diſpleaſe you in what I am going to 'write: and yet I muſt deal freely with 'you. The occaſion calls for it.

'And permit me, in the firſt place, to 'remind you, That I am your ſiſter; and 'not your ſervant; and that, therefore, 'the bitter revilings and paſſionate lan'guage brought me from you, upon an 'occaſion in which you have no reaſon 'to preſcribe to me, are neither worthy 'of my character to bear, nor of yours 'to offer.

'Put the caſe, that I were to marry the 'man you diſlike; and that he were not 'to make a polite or tender huſband, is 'that a reaſon for you to be an unpolite 'and diſobliging brother?—Why muſt 'you, Sir, anticipate my misfortunes, 'were ſuch a caſe to happen?—Let me 'tell you plainly, that the man who could 'treat me as a wife, worſe than you of 'late have treated me as a ſiſter, muſt be 'a barbarous man indeed.

'Aſk yourſelf, I pray you, Sir, if 'you would thus have treated your ſiſter 'Bella, had ſhe thought fit to receive the 'addreſſes of the man ſo much hated by 'you?—If not, let me caution you, my 'brother, not to take your meaſures by 'what you think will be borne, but rather 'by what ought to be offered.

'How would you take it, if you had a 'brother, who, in a like caſe, were to 'act by you, as you do by me?—You 'cannot but remember what a laconick 'anſwer you gave even to my father, 'who recommended to you Miſs Nelly 'D'Oily—You did not like her, were your 'words: and that was thought ſufficient.

'You muſt needs think that I cannot 'but know to whom to attribute my diſ'graces, when I recollect my father's 'indulgence to me, in permitting me to 'decline ſeveral offers; and to ſhew

'that a common cauſe is endeavoured 'to be made, in favour of a man whoſe 'perſon and manners are more excep-'tionable than thoſe of any of the gen-'tlemen I have been permitted to refuſe.

'I offer not to compare the two men 'together: nor is there, indeed, the 'leaſt compariſon to be made between 'them. All the difference to the one's 'diſadvantage, if I did, is but in one 'point—Of the greateſt importance, in-'deed—But to whom of the moſt im-'portance?—To myſelf, ſurely, were I 'to encourage his application—of the 'leaſt to you. Nevertheleſs, if you do 'not, by your ſtrange politicks, unite 'that man and me as joint-ſufferers in 'one cauſe, you ſhall find me as much 'reſolved to renounce him, as I am to 'refuſe the other. I have made an over-'ture to this purpoſe: I hope you will 'not give me reaſon to confirm my ap-'prehenſions, that it will be owing to you 'it be not accepted.

'It is a ſad thing to have it to ſay, 'without being conſcious of ever hav-'ing given you cauſe of offence, that I 'have in you a brother, but not a friend.

'Perhaps you will not condeſcend to 'enter into the reaſons of your late and 'preſent conduct with a fooliſh ſiſter. 'But if politeneſs, if civility, be not due 'to that character and to my ſex, juſtice 'is.

'Let me take the liberty further to 'obſerve, that the principal end of a 'young man's education at a univerſity, 'is, to learn him to reaſon juſtly, and 'to ſubdue the violence of his paſſions. 'I hope, brother, that you will not 'give room for any-body who knows 'us both, to conclude, that the toilette 'has taught the one more of the latter 'doctrine, than the univerſity has taught 'the other. I am truly ſorry to have 'cauſe to ſay, that I have heard it often 'remarked, that your uncontrouled 'paſſions are not a credit to your liberal 'education.

'I hope, Sir, that you will excuſe the 'freedom I have taken with you: you 'have given me too much reaſon for it, 'and you have taken much greater with 'me, without reaſon—ſo, if you are of-'fended, ought to look at the cauſe, 'and not at the effect—Then examin-'ing yourſelf, that cauſe will ceaſe, and 'there will not be any-where a more 'accompliſhed gentleman than my bro-'ther.

'Sifterly affection, I do aſſure you, 'Sir, (unkindly as you have uſed me) 'and not the pertneſs which of late you 'have been ſo apt to impute to me, is 'my motive in this hint. Let me in-'voke your returning kindneſs, my 'only brother! And give me cauſe I be-'ſeech you, to call you my compaſſionating 'friend. For I am, and ever will be, 'your affectionate friend,

'CLARISSA HARLOWE.'

This is my brother's anſwer.

'TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

'I KNOW there will be no end of 'your impertinent ſcribble, if I do not 'write to you. I write therefore: but, 'without entering into argument with 'ſuch a conceited and pert preacher 'and queſtioner, it is, to forbid you to 'plague me with your quaint nonſenſe. 'I know not what wit in a woman is 'good for, but to make her over-value 'herſelf, and deſpiſe every other perſon. 'Yours, Miſs Pert, has ſet you above 'your duty, and above being taught or 'preſcribed to, either by parents, or 'any-body elſe—But go on, Miſs: your 'mortification will be the greater; that 'is all, child. It ſhall, I aſſure you, if 'I can make it ſo, ſo long as you prefer 'that villainous Lovelace (who is juſtly 'hated by all your family) to every-'body. We ſee by your letter now, '(what we too juſtly ſuſpected before) 'moſt evidently we ſee, the hold he has 'got of your forward heart. But the 'ſtronger the hold, the greater muſt be 'the force (and you ſhall have enough of 'that) to tear ſuch a miſcreant from it. 'In me, notwithſtanding your ſaucy 'lecturing and your ſaucy reflections 'before, you are ſure of a friend, as 'well as of a brother, if it be not your 'own fault. But if you will ſtill 'think of ſuch a wretch as that Love-'lace, never expect either friend or 'brother in 'JA. HARLOWE.'

I will now give you a copy of my letter to my ſiſter; with her anſwer.

'IN what, my dear ſiſter, have I of-'fended you, that inſtead of endeavour-'ing to ſoften my father's anger againſt 'me, (as I am ſure I ſhould have done 'for you, had my unhappy caſe been 'yours) you ſhould, in ſo hard-hearted 'a manner, join to aggravate not only 'his diſpleaſure, but my mother's againſt 'me. Make but my caſe your own, my 'dear Bella; and ſuppoſe you were com-'manded to marry Mr. Lovelace, (to 'whom you are believed to have an an-'tipathy) would you not think it a very 'grievous injunction?—Yet cannot your

'dislike to Mr. Lovelace be greater than 'mine is to Mr. Solmes. Nor are love 'and hatred voluntary passions.

'My brother may perhaps think it a 'proof of a manly spirit, to shew himself 'an utter stranger to the gentle passions. 'We have both heard him boast that he 'never loved with distinction; and, hav-'ing predominating passions, and check-'ed in his first attempt, perhaps he never 'will. It is the less wonder then, raw 'from the college, so lately himself the 'tutored, that he should set up for a tu-'tor, a prescriber to our gentler sex, 'whose tastes and manners are differently 'formed; for what, according to his 'account, are colleges, but classes of 'tyrants, from the upper-students over 'the lower, and from them to the tutor? '—That he, with such masculine passions, 'should endeavour to controul and bear 'down an unhappy sister, in a case where 'his antipathy, and, give me leave to 'say, his ambition, [Once you would 'have allowed the latter to be his fault] 'can be gratified by so doing, may not 'be quite so much to be wondered at— 'But that a sister should give up the 'cause of a sister, and join with him to 'set her father and mother against her, 'in a case that might have been her own '—Indeed, my Bella, this is not pretty 'in you.

'There was a time when Mr. Love-'lace was thought reclaimable, and when 'it was far from being deemed a cen-'surable view to hope to bring back to 'the paths of virtue and honour, a man 'of his sense and understanding. I am 'far from wishing to make the experi-'ment: but, nevertheless, will say, that 'if I have not a regard for him, the dis-'graceful methods taken to compel me 'to receive the addresses of such a man 'as Mr. Solmes, are enough to induce it.

'Do you, my sister, for one moment, 'lay aside all prejudice, and compare 'the two men in their births, their edu-'cations, their persons, their under-'standings, their manners, their air, 'and their whole deportments; and in 'their fortunes too, taking in rever-'sions; and then judge of both: yet, as 'I have frequently offered, I will live 'single with all my heart, if that will do.

'I cannot thus live in displeasure and 'disgrace. I would, if I could, oblige 'all my friends. But will it be just, 'will it be honest, to marry a man I can-'not endure? If I have not been used 'to oppose the will of my father, but 'have always delighted to oblige and 'obey, judge of the strength of my anti-'pathy, by the painful opposition I am 'obliged to make, and cannot help it.

'Pity, then, my dearest Bella, my 'sister, my friend, my companion, my 'adviser, as you used to be when I was 'happy, and plead for your ever-affec-'tionate 'CL. HARLOWE.'

'TO MISS CLARY HARLOWE.

'LET it be pretty or not pretty in 'your wise opinion, I shall speak my 'mind, I will assure you, both of you 'and your conduct in relation to this 'detested Lovelace. You are a fond 'foolish girl with all your wisdom. Your 'letter shews that enough in twenty 'places. And as to your cant of living 'single, nobody will believe you. This 'is one of your fetches to avoid complying 'with your duty, and the will of the 'most indulgent parents in the world, 'as yours have been to you, I am sure '—Though now they see themselves 'finely requited for it.

'We all, indeed, once thought your 'temper soft and amiable: but why was 'it? You never was contradicted be-'fore. You had always your own way. 'But no sooner do you meet with oppo-'sition in your wishes to throw yourself 'away upon a vile rake, but you shew 'what you are. You cannot love Mr. 'Solmes! that is the pretence: but, sis-'ter, sister, let me tell you, that is be-'cause Lovelace has got into your fond 'heart—A wretch hated, justly hated, 'by us all; and who has dipped his 'hands in the blood of your brother: 'yet him you would make our relation, 'would you?

'I have no patience with you, but 'for putting the case of my liking such 'a vile wretch as him. As to the en-'couragement you pretended he re-'ceived formerly from all our family, 'it was before we knew him to be so 'vile: and the proofs that had such 'force upon us, ought to have had some 'upon you—And would, had you not 'been a foolish forward girl; as on this 'occasion every-body sees you are.

'O how you run out in favour of the 'wretch!—His birth, his education, his 'person, his understanding, his man-'ners, his air, his fortune—Reversions 'too taken in to augment the surfeiting 'catalogue! What a fond string of love-'sick praises is here! And yet you would 'live single—Yes, I warrant!—when so 'many imaginary perfections dance be-'fore your dazzled eye!—But no more '—I only desire, that you will not, while 'you seem to have such an opinion of 'your

'your wit, think every-one elſe a fool; 'and that you can at pleaſure, by your 'whining flouriſhes, make us all dance 'after your lead.

'Write as often as you will, this ſhall 'be the laſt anſwer or notice you ſhall 'have upon this ſubject from

'ARABELLA HARLOWE.'

I had in readineſs a letter for each of my uncles; and meeting in the garden a ſervant of my uncle Harlowe, I gave them to him to deliver according to their reſpective directions. If I am to form a judgment by the anſwers I have received from my brother and ſiſter, as above, I muſt not, I doubt, expect any good from thoſe letters. But when I have tried every expedient, I ſhall have the leſs to blame myſelf for, if any-thing unhappy ſhould fall out. I will ſend you copies of both, when I ſhall ſee what notice they will be thought worthy of, if of any.

LETTER XXX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SUNDAY NIGHT, MARCH 12.

THIS man, this Lovelace, gives me great uneaſineſs. He is extremely bold and raſh. He was this afternoon at our church—In hopes to ſee me, I ſuppoſe: and yet, if he had ſuch hopes, his uſual intelligence muſt have failed him.

Shorey was at church; and a principal part of her obſervation was upon his haughty and proud behaviour when he turned round in the pew were he ſat to our family-pew. My father and both my uncles were there; ſo were my mother and ſiſter. My brother happily was not.—They all came home in diſorder. Nor did the congregation mind any-body but him; it being his firſt appearance there, ſince the unhappy rencounter.

What did the man come for, if he intended to look challenge and defiance, as Shorey ſays he did, and as others, it ſeems, thought he did, as well as ſhe? Did he come for my ſake; and, by behaving in ſuch a manner to thoſe preſent of my family, imagine he was doing me either ſervice or pleaſure?—He knows how they hate him: nor will he take pains, would pains do, to obviate their hatred.

You and I, my dear, have often taken notice of his pride; and you have rallied him upon it; and inſtead of exculpating himſelf, he has owned it: and by owning it he has thought he has done enough.

For my own part, I thought pride in his caſe an improper ſubject for raillery.—People of birth and fortune to be proud, is ſo needleſs, ſo mean a vice!—If they deſerve reſpect, they will have it, without requiring it. In other words, for perſons to endeavour to gain reſpect by a haughty behaviour, is to give a proof that they miſtruſt their own merit: to make confeſſion that they know that their actions will not attract it.—Diſtinction or quality may be prided in by thoſe to whom diſtinction or quality is a new thing. And then the reflection and contempt which ſuch bring upon themſelves by it, is a counter-balance.

Such added advantages, too, as this man has in his perſon and mien: learned alſo, as they ſay he is—Such a man to be haughty, to be imperious!—The lines of his own face at the ſame time condemning him—how wholly inexcuſable!—Proud of what? Not of doing well: the only juſtifiable pride.—Proud of exterior advantages!—Muſt not one be led by ſuch a ſtop-ſhort pride, as I may call it, in him or her who has it, to miſtruſt the interior? Some people may indeed be afraid, that if they did not aſſume, they would be trampled upon. A very narrow fear, however, ſince they trample upon themſelves, who can fear this. But this man muſt be ſecure, that humility would be an ornament to him.

He has talents indeed: but thoſe talents and his perſonal advantages have been ſnares to him. It is plain they have. And this ſhews, that, weighed in an equal balance, he would be found greatly wanting.

Had my friends confided as they did at firſt, in that diſcretion which they do not accuſe me of being defective in. I dare ſay I ſhould have found him out: and then ſhould have been as reſolute to diſmiſs him, as I was to diſmiſs others, and as I am never to have Mr. Solmes. O that they did but know my heart!—It ſhall ſooner burſt, than voluntarily, uncompelled, undriven, dictate a meaſure that ſhall caſt a ſlur either upon them, or upon my ſex.

Excuſe me, my dear friend, for theſe grave ſoliloquies, as I may call them. How have I run from reflection to reflection!—But the occaſion is recent—They are all in commotion below upon it.

Shorey ſays, that Mr. Lovelace watched my mother's eye, and bowed to her: and ſhe returned the compliment. He always admired my mother. She would not, I believe, have hated him, had ſhe not been bid to hate him; and had it not been been for the rencounter between him and her only ſon.

Doctor Lewen was at church; and obſerving, as every-one elſe did, the diſorder into which Mr. Lovelace's appearance had put all our family, was ſo good as to engage him in converſation, when the ſervice was over, till they were all gone to their coaches.

My uncles had my letters in the morning. They, as well as my father, are more and more incenſed againſt me, it ſeems. Their anſwers, if they vouchſafe to anſwer me, will demonſtrate, I doubt not, the unſeaſonableneſs of this raſh man's preſence at our church.

They are angry alſo, as I underſtand, with my mother, for returning his compliment. What an enemy is hatred, even to the common forms of civility! which, however, more diſtinguiſh the payer of a compliment, than the receiver. But they all ſee, they ſay, that there is but one way to put an end to his inſults. So I ſhall ſuffer: and in what will the raſh man have benefited himſelf, or mended his proſpects?

I am extremely apprehenſive that this worſe than ghoſt-like appearance of his, bodes ſome ſtill bolder ſtep. If he come hither, (and very deſirous he is of my leave to come) I am afraid there will be murder. To avoid that, if there were no other way, I would moſt willingly be buried alive.

They are all in conſultation—Upon my letters, I ſuppoſe—So they were in the morning; which occaſioned my uncles to be at our church. I will ſend you the copies of thoſe letters, as I promiſed in my laſt, when I ſee whether I can give you their anſwers with them. This letter is all—I cannot tell what—the effect of apprehenſion and diſpleaſure at the man who has occaſioned my apprehenſions. Six lines would have contained all that is in it to the purpoſe of my ſtory.

LETTER XXXI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

MONDAY, MARCH 13.

IN vain doſt thou * and thy compeers preſs me to go to town, while I am in ſuch an uncertainty as I am in at preſent with this proud beauty. All the ground I have hitherto gained with her, is entirely owing to her concern for the ſafety of people whom I have reaſon to hate.

Write, then, thou biddeſt me, if I will not come. That, indeed, I can do; and as well without a ſubject, as with one. And what follows ſhall be a proof of it.

The lady's malevolent brother has now, as I told thee at M. Hall, introduced another man; the moſt unpromiſing in his perſon and qualities, the moſt formidable in his offers, that has yet appeared.

This man has by his propoſals captivated every ſoul of the Harlowes—Soul! did I ſay—There is not a ſoul among them but my charmer's: and ſhe, withſtanding them all, is actually confined, and otherwiſe maltreated by a father the moſt gloomy and poſitive; at the inſtigation of a brother the moſt arrogant and ſelfiſh—But thou knoweſt their characters; and I will not therefore ſully my paper with them.

But is it not a confounded thing to be in love with one who is the daughter, the ſiſter, the niece, of a family I muſt eternally deſpiſe? And, the devil of it, that love increaſing, with her—what ſhall I call it?—It is not ſcorn—It is not pride—It is not the inſolence of an adored beauty—But it is to virtue, it ſeems, that my difficulties are owing; and I pay for not being a fly ſinner, an hypocrite; for being regardleſs of my reputation; for permitting ſlander to open it's mouth againſt me. But is it neceſſary for ſuch a one as I, who have been uſed to carry all before me, upon my own terms—I, who never inſpired a fear, that had not a diſcernibly-predominant mixture of love in it; to be an hypocrite?—Well ſays the poet—

'He who ſeems virtuous does but act a part;
'And ſhews not his own nature, but his art.'

Well, but it ſeems I muſt practiſe for this art, if I would ſucceed with this truly admirable creature! But why practiſe for it?—Cannot I indeed reform?—I have but one vice—Have I, Jack?—Thou knoweſt my heart, if any man living does. As far as I know it myſelf, thou knoweſt it. But it is a curſed deceiver; for it has many and many a time impoſed upon it's maſter—Maſter, did I ſay? That am I not now; nor have I been from the moment I beheld this angel of a woman. Prepared, indeed, as I was by her character before I ſaw her: for what a mind muſt that be, which though not virtuous itself, admires not virtue in another? —My visit to Arabella, owing to a mistake of the sisters, into which, as thou hast heard me say, I was led by the blundering uncle; who was to introduce me (but lately come from abroad) to the divinity, as I thought; but, instead of her, carried me to a mere mortal. And much difficulty had I, so fond and forward my lady! to get off without forfeiting all with a family that I intended should give me a goddess.

* Theſe gentlemen affected what they called the Roman ſtile (to wit, the thee and the thou) in their letters: and it was an agreed-rule with them, to take in good part whatever freedoms they treated each other with, if the paſſages were written in that ſtile.

I have boasted, that I was once in love before—And indeed I thought I was. It was in my early manhood—with that quality-jilt, whose infidelity I have vowed to revenge upon as many of the sex as shall come into my power. I believe, in different climes, I have already sacrificed an Hecatomb to my Nemesis, in pursuance of this vow. But upon recollecting what I was then, and comparing it with what I find myself now, I cannot say that I was ever in love before.

What was it then, dost thou ask me, since the disappointment had such effects upon me, when I found myself jilted, that I was hardly kept in my senses?—Why, I'll tell thee what, as near as I can remember; for it was a great while ago: —It was—Egad, Jack, I can hardly tell what it was—But a vehement aspiration after a novelty, I think—Those confounded poets, with their terrenely-celestial descriptions, did as much with me as the lady: they fired my imagination, and set me upon a desire to become a goddess-maker. I must needs try my new-fledged pinions in sonnet, elogy, and madrigal. I must have a Cynthia, a Stella, a Sachariffa, as well as the best of them: darts, and flames, and the devil knows what, must I give to my Cupid. I must create beauty, and place it where nobody else could find it: and many a time have I been at a loss for a subject, when my new-created goddess has been kinder than it was proper for my plaintive sonnet that she should be.

Then I had a vanity of another sort in my passion: I found myself well received among the women in general; and I thought it a pretty lady like tyranny [I was then very young, and very vain!] to single out some one of the sex, to make half a score jealous. And I can tell thee, it had it's effect: for many an eye have I made to sparkle with rival indignation; many a cheek glow; and even many a fan have I caused to be snapped at a sister-beauty; accompanied with a reflection perhaps at being seen alone with a wild young fellow who could not be in private with both at once.

In short, Jack, it was more pride than love, as I now find it, that put me upon making such a confounded rout about losing this noble varletess. I thought she loved me at least as well as I believed I loved her: nay, I had the vanity to suppose she could not help it. My friends were pleased with my choice. They wanted me to be shackled: for early did they doubt my morals as to the sex. They saw, that the dancing, the singing, the musical ladies were all fond of my company: for who [I am in a humour to be vain, I think!—for who] danced, who sung, who touched the string, whatever the instrument, with a better grace than thy friend?

I have no notion of playing the hypocrite so egregiously, as to pretend to be blind to qualifications which every one sees and acknowledges. Such praise-begging hypocrisy! Such affectedly disclaimed attributes: such contemptible praise-traps!—But yet, shall my vanity extend only to personals, such as the gracefulness of dress, my debonnaire, and my assurance—Self-taught, self-acquired, these!—For my parts, I value not myself upon them. Thou wilt say, I have no cause.—Perhaps not: but if I had any-thing valuable as to the intellectuals, those are not my own, and to be proud of what a man is answerable for the abuse of, and has no merit in the right use of, is to strut, like the jay, in borrowed plumage.

But to return to my fair jilt—I could not bear, that a woman who was the first that had bound me in silken fetters, [they were not iron ones, like those I now wear] should prefer a coronet to me: and when the bird was flown, I set more value upon it, than when I had it safe in my cage, and could visit it when I pleased.

But now am I indeed in love. I can think of nothing, of nobody, but the divine Clariffa Harlowe—Harlowe!—How that hated word sticks in my throat—But I shall give her for it the name of Love*.

CLARISSA! O there's musick in the name,
That, soft'ning me to infant tenderness,
Makes my heart spring like the first leaps of life!

But couldst thou have believed that I, who think it possible for me to favour as much as I can be favoured; that I, who for this charming creature think of foregoing the life of honour for the life of ſhackles; could adopt thoſe over tender lines of Otway?

going

I check myſelf, and leaving the three firſt lines of the following of Dryden to the family of the whiners, find the workings of the paſſions in my ſtormy ſoul better expreſſed by the three laſt.

'Love various minds does variouſly inſpire:
'He ſtirs in gentle natures gentle fires;
'Like that of incenſe on the altar laid.

'But raging flames tempeſtuous ſouls invade:
'A fire, which ev'ry windy paſſion blows;
'With pride it mounts, and with revenge it glows.'

And with REVENGE it ſhall glow!—For, doſt thou think, that if it were not from the hope, that this ſtupid family are all combined to do my work for me, I would bear their inſults?—Is it poſſible to imagine, that I would be braved as I am braved, threatened as I am threatened, by thoſe who are afraid to ſee me; and by this brutal brother too, to whom I gave a life, [a life, indeed, not worth my taking!] had I not a greater pride in knowing, that by means of his very ſpy upon me, I am playing him off as I pleaſe; cooling or inflaming his violent paſſions as may beſt ſuit my purpoſes; permitting ſo much to be revealed of my life and actions, and intentions, as may give him ſuch a confidence in his double-faced agent, as ſhall enable me to dance his employer upon my own wires?

This it is that makes my pride mount above my reſentment. By this engine, whoſe ſprings I am continually oiling, I play them all off. The buſy old tarpaulin uncle I make but my ambaſſador to Queen Annabella Howe, to engage her (for example-ſake to her princeſsly daughter) to join in their cauſe, and to aſſert an authority they are reſolved, right or wrong, (or I could do nothing) to maintain.

And what my motive, doſt thou aſk? No leſs than this, That my beloved ſhall find no protection out of my family; for, if I know hers, fly the muſt, or have the man ſhe hates. This, therefore, if I take my meaſures right, and my familiar fail me not, will ſecure her mine, in ſpite of them all; in ſpite of her own inflexible heart: mine, without condition; without reformation promiſes; without the neceſſity of a ſieve of years, perhaps; and to be even then, after wearing the guiſe of a merit-doubting hypocriſy, at an uncertainty, upon a probation unapproved of—Then ſhall I have all the raſcals and raſcaleſſes of the family come creeping to me: I preſcribing to them; and bringing that ſordidly-imperious brother to kneel at the foot-ſtool of my throne.

All my fear ariſes from the little hold I have in the heart of this charming frontiſpiece; ſuch a conſtant glow upon her lovely features; eyes ſo ſparkling; limbs ſo divinely turned; health ſo florid; youth ſo blooming; air ſo animated—To have an heart ſo impenetrable: and I, the hitherto ſucceſsful Lovelace, the addreſſer—How can it be? Yet there are people, and I have talked with ſome of them, who remember that ſhe was born. Her nurſe Norton boaſts of her maternal offices in her earlieſt infancy; and in her education gradatim. So that there is full proof, that ſhe came not from above all at once an angel! How then can ſhe be ſo impenetrable?

But here's her miſtake; nor will ſhe be cured of it—She takes the man ſhe calls her father; [her mother had been faultleſs, had ſhe not been her father's wife] ſhe takes the men ſhe calls her uncles; the fellow ſhe calls her brother; and the poor contemptible ſhe calls her ſiſter; to be her father, to be her uncles, her brother, her ſiſter; and that, as ſuch, ſhe owes to ſome of them reverence, to others reſpect, let them treat her ever ſo cruel!—Sordid ties!—Mere cradle-prejudices!—For had they not been impoſed upon her by Nature, when ſhe was in a perverſe humour, or could ſhe have choſen her relations, would any of theſe have been among them?

How my heart riſes at her preference of them to me, when ſhe is convinced of their injuſtice to me! Convinced, that the alliance would do honour to them all—herſelf excepted; to whom every one owes honour; and from whom the moſt princely family might receive it. But how much more will my heart riſe with indignation againſt her, if I find ſhe heſitates but one moment (however perſecuted) about preferring me to the man ſhe avowedly hates! But ſhe cannot ſurely be ſo mean as to purchaſe her peace with them at ſo dear a rate. She cannot give a ſanction to projects formed in malice, and founded in a ſelfiſhneſs (and that at her own expence) which ſhe has ſpirit enough to deſpiſe in others; and ought to diſavow, that we may not think her a Harlowe.

By this incoherent ramble thou wilt gather, that I am not likely to come up in haſte; ſince I muſt endeavour firſt to obtain ſome aſſurance from the beloved of my ſoul, that I ſhall not be ſacrificed to ſuch a wretch as Solmes! Woe be to the fair-one, if ever ſhe be driven into my power, (for I deſpair of a voluntary impulſe in my favour) and I find a difficulty in obtaining this ſecurity.

That her indifference to me is not owing to the ſuperior liking ſhe has for any other man, is what rivets my chains: but take care, fair-one; take care, O thou moſt exalted of female minds, and lovelieſt of perſons, how thou debaſeſt thyſelf, by encouraging ſuch a competition as thy fordid relations have ſet on foot in mere malice to me! Thou wilt ſay I rave. And ſo I do—

'Perdition catch my ſoul, but I do love her!'

Elſe, could I bear the perpetual revilings of her implacable family?—Elſe, could I baſely creep about—not her proud father's houſe—but his paddock—and garden-walls?—Yet (a quarter of a mile's diſtance between us) not hoping to behold the leaſt glimpſe of her ſhadow?—Elſe, ſhould I think myſelf repaid, amply repaid, if the fourth, fifth, or ſixth midnight ſtroll, through unfrequented paths, and over briery incloſures, affords me a few cold lines; the even expected purport only to let me know, that ſhe values the moſt worthleſs perſon of her very worthleſs family, more than ſhe values me; and that ſhe would not write at all, but to induce me to bear inſults, which un-man me to bear?—My lodging in the intermediate way, at a wretched alehouſe; diſguiſed like an inmate of it: accommodations equally vile, as thoſe I met with in my Weſtphalian journey. It is well, that the neceſſity for all this ariſes not from ſcorn and tyranny! but is firſt impoſed upon herſelf!

But was ever hero in romance (fighting with giants and dragons excepted) called upon to harder trials?—Fortune and family, and reverſionary grandeur, on my ſide! Such a wretched fellow my competitor!—Muſt I not be deplorably in love, that can go through theſe difficulties, encounter theſe contempts?—By my ſoul, I am half-aſhamed of myſelf: I, who am perjured too, by priority of obligation, if I am faithful to any woman in the world!

And yet, why ſay I, I am half-aſhamed?—Is it not a glory to love her whom every-one who ſee her, either loves, or reveres, or both? Dryden ſays—

'The cauſe of love can never be aſſign'd:
'Tis in no face—but in the lover's mind.'

—And Cowley thus addreſſes beauty as a mere imaginary—

'Beauty! thou wild fantaſtick ape,
'Who doſt in ev'ry country change thy ſhape:
'Here black; there brown; here tawny; and
'there white;
'Thou flatt'rer! who comply'ſt with ev'ry
'ſight!
'Who haſt no certain what, nor where.'

But both theſe, had they been her contemporaries, and known her, would have confeſſed themſelves miſtaken: and, taking together perſon, mind, and behaviour, would have acknowledged the juſtice of the univerſal voice in her favour.

——'Full many a lady
'I've ey'd with beſt regard; and many a time
'Th' harmony of their tongues hath into
'bondage
'Brought my too diligent ear. For ſev'ral
'virtues
'Have I liked ſev'ral women. Never any
'With ſo full ſoul, but ſome defect in her
'Did quarrel with the nobleſt grace ſhe ow'd,
'And put it to the foil. But SHE!—O SHE!
'So perfect and ſo peerleſs is created,
'Of ev'ry creature's beſt.'

SHAKESP.

Thou art curious to know, if I have not ſtarted a new game?—If it be poſſible for ſo univerſal a lover to be confined ſo long to one object? Thou knoweſt nothing of this charming creature, that thou canſt put ſuch queſtions to me; or thinkeſt thou knoweſt me better than thou doſt. All that's excellent in her ſex is this lady!—Until by MATRIMONIAL, or EQUAL intimacies, I have found her leſs than angel, it is impoſſible to think of any other. Then there are ſo many ſtimulatives to ſuch a ſpirit as mine in this affair, beſides love: ſuch a field for ſtratagem and contrivance, which thou knoweſt to be the delight of my heart. Then the rewarding end of all!—To carry off ſuch a girl as this, in ſpite of all her watchful and implacable friends; and in ſpite of a prudence and reſerve that I never met with in any of the ſex:—What a triumph!—What a triumph over the whole ſex!—And then ſuch a revenge to gratify; which is only at preſent politically reined in, eventually to break forth with the greater fury—Is it poſſible, thinkeſt thou, that there can be room for a thought that is not of her, and devoted to her?

By the advices I have this moment received, I have reaſon to think, that I ſhall have occaſion for thee here. Hold thyſelf in readineſs to come down upon the firſt ſummons.

Let Belton, and Mowbray, and Tourville, ville, likewiſe prepare themſelves. I have a great mind to contrive a method to ſend James Harlowe to travel for improvement. Never was there booby-ſquire that more wanted it. Contrives it, did I ſay? I have already contrived it; could I but put it in execution without being ſuſpected to have a hand in it. This I am reſolved upon; if I have not his ſiſter, I will have him.

But be this as it may, there is a preſent likelihood of room for glorious miſchief. A confederacy had been for ſome time formed againſt me; but the uncles and the nephew are now to be double-ſervanted; [ſingle-ſervanted they were before] and thoſe ſervants are to be double-armed when they attend their maſters abroad. This indicates their reſolute enmity to me, and as reſolute favour to Solmes.

The reinforced orders for this hoſtile apparatus are owing it ſeems to a viſit I made yeſterday to their church—A good place I thought to begin a reconciliation in; ſuppoſing the heads of the family to be chriſtians, and that they meant ſomething by their prayers. My hopes were to have an invitation (or, at leaſt, to gain a pretence) to accompany home the gloomy fire; and ſo get an opportunity to ſee my goddeſs: for I believed they durſt not but be civil to me, at leaſt. But they were filled with terror it ſeems at my entrance; a terror they could not get over. I ſaw it indeed in their countenances; and that they all expected ſomething extraordinary to follow.—And ſo it ſhould have done, had I been more ſure than I am of their daughter's favour. Yet not a hair of any of their ſtupid heads do I intend to hurt.

You ſhall all have your directions in writing, if there be occaſion. But after all, I dare ſay there will be no need but to ſhew your faces in my company.

Such faces never could four men ſhew—Mowbray's ſo fierce and ſo fighting; Belton's ſo pert and ſo pimply; Tourville's ſo fair and ſo foppiſh; thine ſo rough and ſo reſolute; and I your leader! —What hearts, although meditating hoſtility, muſt thoſe be which we ſhall not appall?—Each man occaſionally attended by a ſervant or two, long ago choſen for qualities reſembling thoſe of his maſter.

Thus, Jack, as thou deſireſt, have I written.—Written upon ſomething; upon nothing; upon REVENGE, which I love; upon LOVE, which I hate, heartily hate, becauſe it is my maſter; and upon the devil knows what beſides:—for, looking back, I am amazed at the length of it. Thou mayeſt read it: I would not for a king's ranſom—But ſo as I do but write, thou ſayeſt thou wilt be pleaſed.

Be pleaſed then. I command thee to be pleaſed: if not for the writer's or written's ſake, for thy word's ſake. And ſo in the royal ſtyle (for am I not likely to be thy king and thy emperor in the great affair before us?) I bid thee very heartily Farewel.

LETTER XXXII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

TUESDAY, MARCH 14.

I Now ſend you copies of my letters to my uncles: with their anſwers. Be pleaſed to return the latter by the firſt depoſit. I leave them for you to make remarks upon. I ſhall make none.

'TO JOHN HARLOWE, ESQ.

'SAT. MARCH 11.

'ALLOW me, my honoured ſecond 'papa, as in my happy days you taught 'me to call you, to implore your intereſt 'with my papa, to engage him to diſ-'penſe with a command, which, if in-'ſiſted upon, will deprive me of my 'free-will, and make me miſerable for 'my whole life.

'For my whole life! let me repeat; 'is that a ſmall point, my dear uncle, 'to give up? Am not I to live with 'the man? Is any-body elſe? Shall I 'not therefore be allowed to judge for 'myſelf, whether I can, or cannot, live 'happily with him?

'Should it be ever ſo unhappily, will 'it be prudence to complain, or appeal? 'If it were, to whom could I appeal 'with effect againſt a huſband? And 'would not the invincible and avowed 'diſlike I have for him at ſetting out, 'ſeem to juſtify any ill uſage from him, 'in that ſtate, were I to be ever ſo ob-'ſervant of him? And if I were to be 'at all obſervant of him, it muſt be 'from fear, not love.

'Once more, let me repeat, That 'this is not a ſmall point to give up: 'and that it is for life. Why, I pray 'you, good Sir, ſhould I be made mi-'ſerable for life? Why ſhould I be 'deprived of all comfort, but that which 'the hope that it would be a very ſhort 'one, would afford me?

'Marriage is a very ſolemn engage-'ment, enough to make a young crea-'ture's heart ache, with the beſt pro-'ſpects,

'ſpects, when ſhe thinks ſeriouſly of 'it!—To be given up to a ſtrange man; 'to be engrafted into a ſtrange family; 'to give up her very name, as a mark 'of her becoming his abſolute and de-'pendent property; to be obliged to 'prefer this ſtrange man to father, mo-'ther—to every body:—and his hu-'mours to all her own—Or to contend 'perhaps, in breach of a vowed duty, 'for every innocent inſtance of free-'will—To go no whither; to make ac-'quaintance; to give up acquaintance; 'to renounce even the ſtricteſt friend-'ſhips perhaps; all at his pleaſure, whe-'ther ſhe think it reaſonable to do ſo or 'not: ſurely, Sir, a young creature 'ought not to be obliged to make all 'theſe ſacrifices but for ſuch a man as 'ſhe can love.—If ſhe be, how ſad muſt 'be the caſe!—How miſerable the life, 'if it be called life!

'I wiſh I could obey you all. What 'a pleaſure would it be to me, if I 'could!—Marry firſt, and love will come 'after, was ſaid by one of my deareſt 'friends: but this is a ſhocking aſſertion. 'A thouſand things may happen to 'make that ſtate but barely tolerable, 'where it is entered into with mutual 'affection: what muſt it then be, where 'the huſband can have no confidence in 'the love of his wife; but has reaſon 'rather to queſtion it, from the pre-'ference he himſelf believes ſhe would 'have given to ſomebody elſe, had ſhe 'had her own option? What doubts, 'what jealouſies, what want of tender-'neſs, what unfavourable prepoſſeſſions, 'will there be, in a matrimony thus 'circumſtanced! How will every look, 'every action, even the moſt innocent, 'be liable to miſconſtruction!—While, 'on the other hand, an indifference, a 'careleſſneſs to oblige, may take place; 'and fear only can conſtrain even an ap-'pearance of what ought to be the effect 'of undiſguiſed love!

'Think ſeriouſly of theſe things, dear 'good Sir, and repreſent them to my 'father in that ſtrong light which the 'ſubject will bear; but in which my ſex, 'and my tender years and inexperience, 'will not permit me to paint it; and 'uſe your powerful intereſt, that your 'poor niece may not be conſigned to a 'miſery ſo durable.

'I offered to engage not to marry at 'all, if that condition may be accepted. 'What a diſgrace is it to me to be thus 'ſequeſtered from company, thus baniſh-'ed my papa's and mamma's preſence; 'thus ſlighted and deſerted by you, Sir, 'and my other kind uncle! And to be 'hindered from attending at that pub-'lick worſhip, which, were I out of the 'way of my duty, would be moſt likely 'to reduce me into the right path again! '—Is this the way, Sir; can this be 'thought to be the way to be taken 'with a free and open ſpirit? May not 'this ſtrange method rather harden 'than convince? I cannot bear to live 'in diſgrace thus: the very ſervants ſo 'lately permitted to be under my own 'direction, hardly daring to ſpeak to 'me; my own ſervant diſcarded with 'high marks of undeſerved ſuſpicion 'and diſpleaſure, and my ſiſter's maid 'ſet over me.

'The matter may be too far puſhed. '—Indeed it may.—And then, perhaps, 'every-one will be ſorry for their parts 'in it.

'May I be permitted to mention an 'expedient?—If I am to be watched, 'baniſhed, and confined; ſuppoſe Sir, 'it were to be at your houſe?—Then 'the neighbouring gentry will the leſs 'wonder, that the perſon of whom they 'uſed to think ſo favourably, appear not 'at church here; and that ſhe received 'not their viſits.

'I hope there can be no objection 'to this. You uſed to love to have 'me with you, Sir, when all went hap-'pily with me: and will you not now 'permit me, in my troubles, the favour 'of your houſe, till all this diſplea-'ſure be overblown!—Upon my word, 'Sir, I will not ſtir out of doors, if 'you require the contrary of me: nor 'will I ſee any-body, but whom you 'will allow me to ſee; provided Mr. 'Solmes be not brought to perſecute 'me there.

'Procure, then, this favour for me; 'if you cannot procure the ſtill greate-'er, that of a happy reconciliation; '(which nevertheleſs I preſume to hope 'for, if you will be ſo good as to plead 'for me) and you will then add to 'thoſe favours, and to that indulgence, 'which have bound me, and will for 'ever bind me to be your dutiful and 'obliged niece,

'CLARISSA HARLOWE.'

THE ANSWER.

'SUNDAY NIGHT.

'MY DEAR NIECE,

'I T grieves me to be forced to de-'ny you any-thing you aſk. Yet it 'muſt be ſo; for unleſs you can bring 'your mind to oblige us in this one 'point,

'point, in which our promiſes and 'honour were engaged before we be-'lieved there could be ſo ſturdy an op-'poſition, you muſt never expect to be 'what you have been to us all.

'In ſhort, niece, we are an embattled 'phalanx. Your reading makes you a 'ſtranger to nothing, but what you 'ſhould be moſt acquainted with—So 'you will ſee by that expreſſion, that we 'are not to be pierced by your perſua-'ſions, and invincible perſiſtence. We 'have agreed all to be moved, or none; 'and not to comply without one ano-'ther. So you know your deſtiny; 'and have nothing to do but to yield to it.

'Let me tell you, the virtue of obe-'dience lies not in obliging when you 'can be obliged again—But give up an 'inclination, and there is ſome merit in 'that.

'As to your expedient; you ſhall 'not come to my houſe, Miſs Clary; 'though this is a prayer I little thought 'I ever ſhould have denied you: for 'were you to keep your word as to 'ſeeing nobody but whom we pleaſe, 'yet can you write to ſomebody elſe, and 'receive letters from him. This we 'too well know you can, and have 'done—More is the ſhame and the pity!

'You offer to live ſingle, Miſs—We 'wiſh you married: but becauſe you 'may not have the man your heart is 'ſet upon, why, truly, you will have 'nobody we ſhall recommend. And as 'we know, that ſomehow or other you 'correſpond with him, or at leaſt did, 'as long as you could; and as he de-'fies us all, and would not dare to do 'ſo, if he were not ſure of you in ſpite 'of us all; (which is not a little vexa-'tious to us, you muſt think) we are 'reſolved to fruſtrate him, and triumph 'over him, rather than that he ſhould 'triumph over us: that is one word for 'all. So expect not any advocateſhip 'from me: I will not plead for you; 'and that's enough. From your diſ-'pleaſed uncle, JOHN HARLOWE.

'P. S. For the reſt, I refer to my bro-'ther Antony.'

'TO ANTONY HARLOWE, ESQ.

'SATURDAY, MARCH 11.

'HONOURED SIR,

'AS you have thought fit to fa-'vour Mr. Solmes with your particu-'lar recommendation, and was very 'earneſt in his behalf, ranking him (as 'you told me upon introducing him to 'me) among your ſelect friends, and 'expecting my regards to him accord-'ingly; I beg your patience, while I 'offer a few things, out of many that 'I could offer, to your ſerious conſi-'deration, on occaſion of his addreſs to 'me, if I am to uſe that word.

'I am charged with prepoſſeſſion in 'another perſon's favour. You will 'be pleaſed, Sir, to remember, that till 'my brother returned from Scotland, 'that other perſon was not abſolutely 'diſcouraged, nor was I forbid to re-'ceive his viſits. I believe it will not 'be pretended, that in birth, educa-'tion, or perſonal endowments, a com-'pariſon can be made between the two. 'And only let me aſk you, Sir, if the 'one would have been thought of for 'me, had he not made ſuch offers, as, 'upon my word, I think, I ought not 'in juſtice to accept of, nor he to pro-'poſe: offers, which if he had not 'made, I dare ſay, my papa would not 'have required them of him.

'But the one, it ſeems, has many 'faults:—is the other faultleſs?—The 'principal thing objected to Mr. Love-'lace (and a very inexcuſable one) is, 'that he is immoral in his loves—Is not 'the other in his hatreds?—Nay, as I 'may ſay, in his loves too, (the object 'only differing) if the love of money be 'the root of all evil.

'But, Sir, if I am prepoſſeſſed, 'what has Mr. Solmes to hope for?—'Why ſhould he perſevere? What muſt 'I think of the man who would wiſh me 'to be his wife againſt my inclination? '—And is it not a very harſh thing for 'my friends to deſire to ſee me married 'to one I cannot love, when they will 'not be perſuaded but that there is one 'whom I do love?

'Treated as I am, now is the time 'for me to ſpeak out, or never.—Let 'me review what it is Mr. Solmes de-'pends upon on this occaſion. Does he 'believe, that the diſgrace which I ſuf-'fet on his acconnt, will give him a 'merit with me? Does he think to win 'my eſteem, through my uncles ſtern-'neſs to me; by my brother's con-'temptuous uſage; by my ſiſter's un-'kindneſs; by being denied to viſit, or 'be viſited; and to correſpond with my 'choſen friend, although a perſon of 'unexceptionable honour and prudence, 'and of my own ſex; my ſervant to be 'torn from me, and another ſervant ſet 'over me; to be confined, like a pri-'ſoner, to narrow and diſgraceful li-'mits, in order avowedly to mortify me, 'and to break my ſpirit; to be turned 'out of that family-management which 'I loved, and had the greater pleaſure 'in it, becauſe it was an eaſe, as I 'thought, to my mamma, and what 'my ſiſter choſe not; and yet, though 'time hangs heavy upon my hands, to 'be ſo put out of my courſe, that I have 'as little inclination as liberty to pur-'ſue any of my choice delights?—Are 'theſe ſteps neceſſary to reduce me to 'a level ſo low, as to make me a fit wife 'for this man?—Yet theſe are all he 'can have to truſt to—And if his re-'liance is on theſe meaſures, I would 'have him to know, that he miſtakes 'meekneſs and gentleneſs of diſpoſition for 'ſervility and baſeneſs of heart.

'I beſeech you, Sir, to let the na-'tural turn and bent of his mind and 'my mind be conſidered: what are his 'qualities by which he would hope to 'win my eſteem?—Dear, dear Sir, if I 'am to be compelled, let it be in favour 'of a man that can read and write—'That can teach me ſomething: for what 'a huſband muſt that man make, who 'can do nothing but command; and 'needs himſelf the inſtruction he ſhould 'be qualified to give?

'I may be conceited, Sir; I may be 'vain of my little reading; of my writ-'ing; as of late I have more than once 'been told I am—But, Sir, the more 'unequal the propoſed match, if ſo: 'the better opinion I have of myſelf, 'the worſe I muſt have of him; and the 'more unfit are we for each other.

'Indeed, Sir, I muſt ſay, I thought 'my friends had put a higher value up-'on me. My brother pretended once, 'that it was owing to ſuch value, that 'Mr. Lovelace's addreſs was prohibited. '—Can this be; and ſuch a man as 'Mr. Solmes be intended for me?

'As to his propoſed ſettlements, I 'hope I ſhall not incur your greater diſ-'pleaſure, if I ſay, what all who know 'me have reaſon to think, (and ſome 'have upbraided me for) that I deſpiſe 'thoſe motives. Dear, dear Sir, what 'are ſettlements to one who has as much 'of her own as ſhe wiſhes for?—Who 'has more in her own power, as a ſin-'gle perſon, than it is probable ſhe 'would be permitted to have at her 'diſpoſal, as a wife?—Whoſe expences 'and ambition are moderate; and who, 'if ſhe had ſuperfluities, would rather 'diſpenſe them to the neceſſitous, than 'lay them by her uſeleſs? If then ſuch 'narrow motives have ſo little weight 'with me for my own benefit, ſhall the 'remote and uncertain view of family-'aggrandizement, and that in the per-'ſon of my brother and his deſcendants, 'be thought ſufficient to influence me?

'Has the behaviour of that brother 'to me of late, or his conſideration for 'the family (which had ſo little weight 'with him, that he could chuſe to ha-'zard a life ſo juſtly precious as an only 'ſon's, rather than not gratify paſſions 'which he is above attempting to ſub-'due, and, give me leave to ſay, has 'been too much indulged in, either 'with regard to his own good, or the 'peace of any-body related to him; 'has his behaviour, I ſay) deſerved of 'me in particular, that I ſhould make 'a ſacrifice of my temporal (and, who 'knows? of my eternal) happineſs, to 'promote a plan formed upon chimerical, 'at leaſt upon unlikely contingencies; as 'I will undertake to demonſtrate, if I 'may be permitted to examine it?

'I am afraid you will condemn my 'warmth: but does not the occaſion re-'quire it? To the want of a greater 'degree of earneſtneſs in my oppoſition, 'it ſeems, it is owing, that ſuch ad-'vances have been made, as have been 'made. Then, dear Sir, allow ſome-'thing, I beſeech you, for a ſpirit 'raiſed and embittered by diſgraces, 'which (knowing my own heart) I am 'confident to ſay, are unmerited.

'But why have I ſaid ſo much, in 'anſwer to the ſuppoſed charge of pre-'poſſeſſion, when I have declared to 'my mamma, as now, Sir, I do to 'you, that if it be not inſiſted upon 'that I ſhall marry any other perſon, 'particularly this Mr. Solmes, I will 'enter into any engagements never to 'have the other, nor any man elſe, 'without their conſents; that is to ſay, 'without the conſents of my father and 'mother, and of you my uncle, and my 'elder uncle, and my couſin Morden, 'as he is one of the truſtees for my 'grandfather's bounty to me?—As to 'my brother indeed, I cannot ſay, that 'his treatment of me has been of late 'ſo brotherly, as to entitle him to more 'than civility from me: and for this, 'give me leave to add, he would be 'very much my debtor.

'If I have not been explicit enough 'in declaring my diſlike to Mr. Solmes, '(that the prepoſſeſſion which is charged 'upon me may not be ſuppoſed to in-'fluence me againſt him) I do declare 'ſolemnly, that, were there no ſuch 'man as Mr. Lovelace in the world, I 'would not have Mr. Solmes. It is 'neceſſary, in ſome one of my letters to 'my

'my dear friends, that I ſhould write 'ſo clearly as to put this matter out of 'all doubt: and to whom can I better 'addreſs myſelf with an explicitneſs 'that can admit of no miſtake, than to 'that uncle who profeſſes the higheſt 'regard for plain-dealing and ſincerity?

'Let me then, for theſe reaſons, be 'ſtill more particular in ſome of my 'exceptions to him.

'Mr. Solmes appears to me (to all 'the world indeed) to have a very nar-'row mind, and no great capacity: he 'is coarſe and indelicate; as rough in 'his manners as in his perſon. He is 'not only narrow, but covetous: be-'ing poſſeſſed of great wealth, he en-'joys it not; nor has the ſpirit to com-'municate to a diſtreſs of any kind. 'Does not his own ſiſter live unhappi-'ly, for want of a little of his ſuperflui-'ties? And ſuffers he not his aged 'uncle, the brother of his own mother, 'to owe to the generoſity of ſtrangers 'the poor ſubſiſtence he picks up from 'half-a-dozen families?—You know, 'Sir, my open, free, communicative 'temper: how unhappy muſt I be, 'circumſcribed in his narrow, ſelfiſh 'circle! out of which, being withheld 'by this diabolical parſimony, he dare 'no more ſtir, than a conjuror out of 'his; nor would let me.

'Such a man as this, love!—Yes, per-'haps he may, my grandfather's eſtate; 'which he has told ſeveral perſons (and 'could not reſiſt hinting the ſame thing 'to me, with that ſort of pleaſure which 'a low mind takes, when it intimates it's 'own intereſt as a ſufficient motive for it 'to expect another's favour) lies ſo ex-'tremely convenient for him, that it 'would double the value of a conſidera-'ble part of his own. That eſtate, and 'an alliance which would do credit to 'his obſcurity and narrowneſs, may 'make him think he can love, and in-'duce him to believe he does: but at 'moſt, it is but a ſecond-place love. 'Riches were, are, and always will be, 'his predominant paſſion. His were left 'him by a miſer, on this very account: 'and I muſt be obliged to forego all the 'choice delights of my life, and be as 'mean as he, or elſe be quite unhappy. 'Pardon, Sir, this ſeverity of expreſſion '—One is apt to ſay more than one 'would, of a perſon one diſlikes, when 'more is ſaid in his favour than he can 'poſſibly deſerve; and when he is urged 'to my acceptance with ſo much vehe-'mence, that there is no choice left me.

'Whether theſe things be perfectly 'ſo, or not, while I think they are, it 'is impoſſible I ſhould ever look upon 'Mr. Solmes in the light he is offered 'to me. Nay, were he to be proved 'ten times better than I have repreſent-'ed him, and ſincerely think him: yet 'would he be ſtill ten times more diſa-'greeable to me than any other man I 'know in the world. Let me therefore 'beſeech you, Sir, to become an advo-'cate for your niece, that ſhe may not 'be made a victim to a man ſo highly 'diſguſtful to her.

'You and my other uncle can do a 'great deal for me, if you pleaſe, with 'my papa. Be perſuaded, Sir, that I 'am not governed by obſtinacy in this 'caſe; but by an averſion; an averſion 'I cannot overcome: for, if I have 'but endeavoured to reaſon with myſelf, '(out of regard to the duty I owe to my 'father's will) my heart has recoiled, 'and I have been averſe to myſelf, for 'offering but to argue with myſelf, in 'behalf of a man who, in the light he 'appears to me, has no one merit; and 'who, knowing this averſion, could not 'perſevere as he does, if he had the ſpi-'rit of a man.

'If, Sir, you can think the contents 'of this letter reaſonable, I beſeech you 'to ſupport them with your intereſt: if 'not—I ſhall be moſt unhappy!—Ne-'verthleſs, it is but juſt in me ſo to 'write, as that Mr. Solmes may know 'what he has to truſt to.

'Forgive, dear Sir, this tedious let-'ter; and ſuffer it to have weight with 'you; and you will for ever oblige your 'dutiful and affectionate niece,

'CL. HARLOWE.'

MR. ANTONY HARLOWE, TO MISS CL. HARLOWE.

'NIECE CLARY,

'YOU had better not write to us, or 'to any of us. To me, particularly, 'you had better never to have ſet pen to 'paper, on the ſubject whereupon you 'have written. He that is firſt in his own 'cauſe, ſaith the wiſe man, ſeemeth juſt: 'but his neighbour cometh and ſearcheth him. 'And ſo, in this reſpect, I will be your 'neighbour; for I will ſearch your heart 'to the bottom; that is to ſay, if your 'letter be written from your heart. Yet 'do I know what a taſk I have under-'taken, becauſe of the knack you are 'noted for at writing: but in defence of 'a father's authority, in behalf of the 'good, and honour, and proſperity of a 'family one comes of, what a hard thing 'would it be, if one could not beat 'down

'down all the arguments a rebel child '(How loth I am to write down that 'word of Miſs Clary Harlowe!) can 'bring, in behalf of her obſtinacy!

'In the firſt place, don't you declare '(and that contrary to your declarations 'to your mother; remember that, girl!) 'that you prefer the man we all hate, 'and who hates us as bad?—Then what 'a character have you given of a worthy 'man! I wonder you dare write ſo 'freely of one we all reſpect—But poſ-'ſibly it may be for that very reaſon.

'How you begin your letter!—Be-'cauſe I value Mr. Solmes as my friend, 'you treat him the worſe—That's the 'plain dunſtable of the matter, Miſs!—'I am not ſuch a fool but I can ſee that. '—And ſo a noted whoremonger is to 'be choſen before a man who is a mo-'ney-lover!—Let me tell you, niece, 'this little becomes ſo nice a one as you 'have been always reckoned. Who, 'think you, does moſt injuſtice, a pro-'digal man or a ſaving man?—The one 'ſaves his own money; the other ſpends 'other people's. But your favourite is 'a ſinner in grain, and upon record.

'The devil's in your ſex! God forgive 'me for ſaying ſo—The niceſt of them 'will prefer a vile rake and wh—— I 'ſuppoſe I muſt not repeat the word:—'the word will offend, when the vicious 'denominated by that word will be cho-'ſen! I had not been a batchelor to this 'time, if I had not ſeen ſuch a maſs of 'contradictions in you all.—Such gnat-'ſtrainers and camel-ſwallowers, as vene-'rable holy writ has it.

'What names will perverſeneſs call 'things by!—A prudent man, who in-'tends to be juſt to every-body, is a co-'vetous man!—While a vile, profligate 'rake, is chriſtened with the appella-'tion of a gallant man; and a polite 'man, I'll warrant you!

'It is my firm opinion, Lovelace 'would not have ſo much regard for you 'as he profeſſes; but for two reaſons. 'And what are theſe?—Why, out of 'ſpite to all of us—one of them: the 'other, becauſe of your independent 'fortune. I wiſh your good grandfa-'ther had not left what he did ſo much 'in your own power, as I may ſay. But 'little did he imagine his beloved grand-'daughter would have turned upon all 'her friends as ſhe has done!

'What has Mr. Solmes to hope for, if you 'are prepoſſeſſed! Hey-day! Is this you, 'couſin Clary!—Has he then nothing to 'hope for from your father's, and mo-'ther's, and our recommendations?—'No, nothing at all, it ſeems!—O brave! '—I ſhould think that this, with a duti-'ful child, as we took you to be, was 'enough. Depending on this your du-'ty, we proceeded: and now there is 'no help for it. For we will not be 'balked: neither ſhall our friend Mr. 'Solmes, I can tell you that.

'If your eſtate is convenient for him, 'what then? Does that (pert couſin) 'make it out that he does not love you? 'He had need to expect ſome good with 'you, that has ſo little good to hope for 'from you; mind that. But, pray, is 'not this eſtate our eſtate, as we may 'ſay? Have we not all an intereſt in it, 'and a prior right, if right were to have 'taken place? And was it more than a 'good old man's dotage, God reſt his 'ſoul! that gave it you before us all?—'Well, then, ought we not to have a 'choice who ſhall have it in marriage 'with you? And would you have the 'conſcience to wiſh us to let a vile fel-'low who hates us all, run away with 'it?—You bid me weigh what you 'write: do you weigh this, girl; and 'it will appear we have more to ſay for 'ourſelves than you was aware of.

'As to your hard treatment, as you 'call it, thank yourſelf for that. It may 'be over when you will: ſo I reckon 'nothing upon that. You was not ba-'niſhed and confined till all entreaty and 'fair ſpeeches were tried with you: mind 'that. And Mr. Solmes cannot help 'your obſtinacy.—Let that be obſerved 'too.

'As to being viſited, and viſiting; you 'never was fond of either: ſo that is a 'grievance put into the ſcale to make 'weight.—As to diſgrace, that is as bad 'to us as to you: ſo fine a young crea-'ture! So much as we uſed to brag of 'you!—And too-beſides, this is all in 'your power, as the reſt.

'But your heart recoils, when you 'would perſuade yourſelf to obey your 'parent—Finely deſcribed, is it not!—'Too truly deſcribed, I own, as you go 'on. I know, that you may love him 'if you will. I had a good mind to bid 'you hate him; then, perhaps, you 'would like him the better: for I have 'always found a moſt horrid romantick 'perverſeneſs in your ſex. To do and 'to love what you ſhould not, is meat, 'drink, and veſture, to you all.

'I am abſolutely of your brother's 'mind, That reading and writing, though 'not too much for the wits of you young 'girls, are too much for your judgments. '—You ſay, you may be conceited, cou-

'ſin;

'ſin; you may be vain!—And ſo you are, 'to deſpiſe this gentleman as you do. 'He can read and write as well as moſt 'gentlemen, I can tell you that. Who 'told you Mr. Solmes cannot read and 'write? But you muſt have a huſband who 'can learn you ſomething!—I wiſh you 'knew but your duty as well as you do 'your talents—That, niece, you have 'of late days to learn; and Mr. Solmes 'will therefore find ſomething to inſtruct 'you in. I will not ſhew him this letter 'of yours, though you ſeem to deſire 'it, leſt it ſhould provoke him to be too 'ſevere a ſchoolmaſter, when you are 'his'n.

'But when I think of it, ſuppoſe you 'are readier at your pen than he—You 'will make the more uſeful wife to him; 'won't you? For who ſo good an œco-'nomiſt as you?—And you may keep 'all his accounts, and ſave yourſelves 'a ſteward.—And, let me tell you, this 'is a fine advantage in a family: for 'thoſe ſtewards are often ſad dogs, and 'creep into a man's eſtate before he 'knows where he is; and not ſeldom 'is he forced to pay them intereſt for his 'own money.

'I know not why a good wife ſhould 'be above theſe things. It is better than 'lying abed half the day, and junket-'ing and card playing all the night, 'and mak ng yourſelves wholly uſeleſs 'to every good purpoſe in your own fa-'milies, as is now the faſhion among 'ye—The deuce take you all that do ſo, 'ſay I!—Only that, thank my ſtars, I 'am a batchelor.

'Then this is a province you are ad-'mirably verſed in: you grieve that it 'is taken from you here, you know. So 'here, Miſs, with Mr. Solmes you will 'have ſomething to keep account of, 'for the ſake of you and your children: 'with the other, perhaps, you will have 'an account to keep, too—But an ac-'count of what will go over the left-'ſhoulder: only of what he ſquanders, 'what he borrows, and what he owes, 'and never will pay. Come, come, cou-'ſin, you know nothing of the world; a 'man's a man; and you may have many 'partners in a handſome man, and coſt-'ly ones too, who may laviſh away all 'you ſave. Mr. Solmes, therefore, for 'my money, and I hope for yours.

'But Mr. Solmes is a coarſe man. He 'is not delicate enough for your nice-'neſs; becauſe I ſuppoſe he dreſſes not 'like a fop and a coxcomb, and becauſe 'he lays not himſelf out in complimen-'tal nonſenſe, the poiſon of female 'minds. He is a man of ſenſe, I can 'tell you. No man talks more to the 'purpoſe to us: but you fly him ſo, that 'he has no opportunity given him to ex-'preſs it to you; and a man who loves, 'if he have ever ſo much ſenſe, looks 'like a fool; eſpecially when he is de-'ſpiſed, and treated as you treated him 'the laſt time he was in your company.

'As to his ſiſter; ſhe threw herſelf 'away (as you want to do) againſt his 'full warning: for he told her what ſhe 'had to truſt to, if ſhe married where 'ſhe did marry. And he was as good 'as his word; and ſo an honeſt man 'ought: offences againſt warning ought 'to be ſmarted for. Take care this be 'not your caſe. Mind that.

'His uncle deſerves no favour from 'him; for he would have circumvented 'Mr. Solmes, and got Sir Oliver to 'leave to himſelf the eſtate he had al-'ways deſigned for him his nephew; and 'brought him up in the hope of it. Too 'ready forgiveneſs does but encourage offences: 'that's your good father's maxim; and 'there would not be ſo many headſtrong 'daughters as there are, if this maxim 'were kept in mind.—Puniſhments are 'of ſervice to offenders; rewards ſhould 'be only to the meriting: and I think 'the former are to be dealt out rigor-'ouſly, in wilful caſes.

'As to his love; he ſhews it but too 'much for your deſervings, as they have 'been of late; let me tell you that: and 'this is his misfortune; and may in time 'perhaps be yours.

'As to his parſimony, which you wick-'edly call diabolical, [very free word in 'your mouth, let me tell ye] little rea-'ſon have you of all people for this, on 'whom he propoſes, of his own accord, 'to ſettle all he has in the world: a proof, 'let him love riches as he will, that he 'loves you better. But that you may be 'without excuſe on this ſcore, we will 'tie him up to your own terms. and o-'blige him by the marriage-articles to 'allow you a very handſome quarterly 'ſum to do what you pleaſe with. And 'this has been told you before; and I 'have ſaid it to Mrs. Howe (that good 'and worthy lady) before her proud 'daughter, that you might hear of it 'again.

'To contradict the charge of prepoſ-'ſeſſion to Lovelace, you offer never to 'have him without our conſents: and 'what is this ſaying, but that you will 'hope on for our conſents, and to whee-'dle and tire us out? Then he will al-'ways be in expectation while you are 'single: and we are to live on at this 'rate, (are we?) vexed by you, and continually watchful about you; and as 'continually exposed to his insolence and 'threats. Remember last Sunday, girl! '—What might have happened, had 'your brother and he met?—Moreover, 'you cannot do with such a spirit as his, 'as you can with worthy Mr. Solmes: 'the one you make tremble; the other 'will make you quake—Mind that— 'And you will not be able to help your'self. And remember, that if there 'should be any misunderstanding be'tween one of them and you, we should 'all interpose; and with effect no doubt: 'but with the other, it would be self-do, self-have; and who would either care or dare 'to put in a word for you? Nor let the 'supposition of matrimonial differences 'frighten you: honey-moon lasts not 'now-a-days above a fortnight; and 'Dunmow Flitch, as I have been inform'ed, was never claimed; though some 'say once it was. Marriage is a queer 'state, child, whether paired by the par'ties or by their friends. Out of three 'brothers of us, you know, there was 'but one had courage to marry. And 'why was it, do you think? We were 'wise by other peoples experience.

'Don't despise money so much; you 'may come to know the value of it: that 'is a piece of instruction that you are to learn; and which, according to your 'own notions, Mr. Solmes will be able to teach you.

'I do indeed condemn your warmth. I 'will not allow for disgraces you bring upon yourself. If I thought them unmerited, 'I would be your advocate. But it was 'always my notion, that children should 'not dispute their parents authority. 'When your grandfather left his estate 'to you, though his three sons, and a 'grandson, and your elder sister, were 'in being, we all acquiesced: and why? 'Because it was our father's doing. Do 'you imitate that example: if you will 'not, those who set it you have the more 'reason to hold you inexcusable. Mind 'that, cousin.

'You mention your brother too scorn'fully: and, in your letter to him, are 'very disrespectful; and so indeed you 'are to your sister, in the letter you 'wrote to her. Your brother, Madam, 'is your brother; a third older than 'yourself; and a man: and pray be so 'good as not to forget what is due to a 'brother, who (next to us three bro'thers) is the head of the family; and 'on whom the name depends—As upon 'your dutiful compliance depends the 'success of the noblest plan that ever 'was laid down for the honour of the 'family you are come of. And pray 'now let me ask you, If the honour of 'that will not be an honour to you?— 'If you don't think so, the more un'worthy you. You shall see the plan, if 'you promise not to be prejudiced a'gainst it, right or wrong. If you are 'not besotted to that man, I am sure you 'will like it. If you are, were Mr. 'Solmes an angel, it would signify no'thing: for the devil is love, and love 'is the devil, when it gets into any of 'your heads. Many examples have I 'seen of that.

'If there were no such man as Lovelace in 'the world, you would not have Mr. Solmes. '—You would not, Miss!—Very pretty, 'truly!—We see how your spirit is em'bittered indeed.—Wonder not, since it 'is come to your will not's, that those 'who have authority over you, say, You 'shall have the other. And I am one. 'Mind that. And if it behoves YOU to 'speak out Miss, it behoves US not to 'speak in. What's sauce for the goose is 'sauce for the gander: take that in your 'though too.

'I humbly apprehend, that Mr. 'Solmes has the spirit of a man, and a gen'tleman. I would admonish you, there'fore, not to provoke it. He pities you 'as much as he loves you. He says, he 'will convince you of his love by deeds, 'since he is not permitted by you to ex'press it by words. And all his depend'ence is upon your generosity hereafter. 'We hope he may depend upon that: 'we encourage him to think he may. 'And this heartens him up. So that you 'may lay his constancy at your parents 'and your uncles doors; and this will be 'another mark of your duty, you know.

'You must be sensible, that you re'flect upon your parents and all of us, 'when you tell me you cannot in justice 'accept of the settlements proposed you. 'This reflection we should have won'dered at from you once; but now we 'don't.

'There are many other very censur'able passages in this free letter of yours; 'but we must place them to the account 'of your embittered spirit. I am glad you 'mentioned that word, because we 'should have been at a loss what to have 'called it.—I should much rather, ne'vertheless, have had reason to give it 'a better name.

'I love you dearly still, Miss. I think 'you, though my niece, one of the finest

'young gentlewomen I ever saw. But, 'upon my conscience, I think you ought 'to obey your parents, and oblige me, 'and my brother John: for you know 'very well, that we have nothing but 'your good at heart; consistently indeed 'with the good and honour of all of us. 'What must we think of any one of it, 'who would not promote the good of 'the whole? and who would set one part 'of it against another?—Which God 'forbid say I!—You see I am for the 'good of all. What shall I get by it, 'let things go as they will? Do I want 'any-thing of any-body for my own 'sake?—Does my brother John?—'Well, then, cousin Clary, what would 'you be at, as I may say?

'O but you can't love Mr. Solmes!—'But, I say, you know not what you can 'do. You encourage yourself in your 'dislike. You permit your heart (little 'did I think it was such a froward one) 'to recoil. Take it to task, niece; drive it 'on as fast as it recoils, [we do so in all our 'sea-fights, and land-fights too, by our 'sailors and soldiers, or we should not 'conquer] and we are all sure you will 'overcome it. And why? because you 'ought. So we think, whatever you think: 'and whose thoughts are to be preferred? You may be wittier than we; but, 'if you are wiser, we have lived some of 'us, let me tell you, to very little purpose thirty or forty years longer than 'you.

'I have written as long a letter as 'yours. I may not write in so lively, or 'so polite a stile as my niece: but I think 'I have all the argument on my side: 'and you will vastly oblige me, if you 'will shew me by your compliance with 'all our desires, that you think so too. 'If you do not, you must not expect an 'advocate, or even a friend, in me, dearly as I love you. For then I shall be 'sorry to be called your uncle,

'ANTONY HARLOWE.

'TUESDAY, TWO IN THE MORNING.

'P. S. You must send me no more letters: but a compliable one you may 'send. But I need not have forbid 'you; for I am sure, this, by fair argument, is unanswerable—I know it 'is. I have written day and night, I 'may say, ever since Sunday morning, 'only church time, or the like of that: 'but this is the last, I can tell you, 'from

LETTER XXXIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

THURSDAY, MARCH 16.

HAVING met with such bad success in my application to my relations, I have taken a step that will surprize you. It is no other than writing a letter to Mr. Solmes himself. I sent it; and have his answer. He had certainly help in it. For I have seen a letter of his; as indifferently worded, as poorly spelt. Yet the superscription, is of his dictating, I dare say; for he is a formal wretch. With these, I shall inclose one from my brother to me, on occasion of mine to Mr. Solmes. I did think that it was possible to discourage the man from proceeding; and if I could have done that, it would have answered all my wishes. It was worth the trial. But you'll see nothing will do. My brother has taken his measures too securely.

'TO ROGER SOLMES, ESQ.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 15.

'SIR,

'YOU will wonder to receive a letter 'from me; and more still at the uncommon subject of it. But the necessity 'of the case will justify me, at least in my 'own apprehension; and I shall therefore make no other apology for it.

'When you first came acquainted with 'our family, you found the writer of 'this one of the happiest creatures in the 'world; beloved by the best and most 'indulgent of parents; and rejoicing in 'the kind favour of two affectionate uncles, and in the esteem of every one.

'But now is this happy scene now 'changed!—You was pleased to cast a 'favourable eye upon me. You addressed 'yourself to my friends: your proposals 'were approved of by them—approved 'of without consulting me, as if my 'choice and happiness were of the least 'signification. Those who had a right 'to all reasonable obedience from me, 'insisted upon it without reserve. I had 'not the felicity to think as they did; 'almost the first time my sentiments differed from theirs. I besought them 'to indulge me in a point so important 'to my future happiness: but, alas, in 'vain! And then (for I thought it was 'but honest) I told you my mind; and 'that even my affections were engaged. 'But, to my mortification and surprize, 'you persisted, and still persist.

'The consequence of all is too grievous

'ous for me to repeat: you, who have 'such free access to the rest of the fami-'ly, know it too well—too well you 'know it, either for the credit of your 'own generosity, or for my reputation. 'I am used, on your account, as I never 'before was used, and never before was 'thought to deserve to be used; and 'this was the hard, the impossible con-'dition of their returning favour, that I 'must prefer a man to all others, that of 'all others I cannot prefer.

'Thus distressed, and made unhappy, 'and all for your sake, and through your 'cruel perseverance, I write, Sir, to de-'mand of you the peace of mind you 'have robbed me of: to demand of you 'the love of so many dear friends, of 'which you have deprived me; and, if 'you have the generosity that should dis-'tinguish a man, and a gentleman, to 'adjure you not to continue an address 'that has been attended with such cruel 'effects to the creature you profess to 'esteem.

'If you really value me, as my friends 'would make me believe, and as you 'have declared you do, must it not be a 'mean and selfish value? A value that 'can have no merit with the unhappy 'object of it, because it is attended with 'effects so grievous to her? It must be 'for your own sake only, not for mine. 'And even in this point you must be 'mistaken; for, would a prudent man 'wish to marry one who has not a heart 'to give? Who cannot esteem him? Who 'therefore must prove a bad wife!— 'And how cruel would it be to make a 'poor creature a bad wife, whose pride 'it would be to make a good one?

'If I am capable of judging, our tem-'pers and inclinations are vastly differ-'rent. Any other of my sex will make 'you happier than I can. The treatment 'I meet with, and the obstinacy, as it is 'called, with which I support myself un-'der it, ought to convince you of this; 'were I not able to give so good a reason 'for this my supposed perverseness, as 'that I cannot consent to marry a man 'whom I cannot value.

'But if, Sir, you have not so much 'generosity in your value for me, as to 'desist for my own sake, let me conjure 'you, by the regard due to yourself, and 'to your own future happiness, to dis-'continue your suit, and place your af-'fections on a worthier object: for why 'should you make me miserable, and 'yourself not happy? By this means you 'will do all that is now in your power to 'restore to me the affection of my friends; 'and, if that can be, it will leave me in 'as happy a state as you found me in. 'You need only to say, that you see 'there are no HOPES, as you will per-'haps complaisantly call it, of succeed-'ing with me; [and indeed, Sir, there 'cannot be a greater truth] and that you 'will therefore no more think of me; 'but turn your thoughts another way.

'Your compliance with this request 'will lay me under the highest obligation 'to your generosity, and make me ever 'your well-wisher, and humble servant,

'CLARISSA HARLOWE.'

'TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

'THESE MOST HUMBLY PRESENT.

'DEAREST MISS,

'YOUR letter has had a very contra-'ry effect upon me, to what you seem to 'have expected from it. It has double 'convinced me of the excellency of your 'mind, and of the honour of your dis-'position. Call it selfish, or what you 'please, I must persist in my suit; and 'happy shall I be, if by patience and per-'severance, and a steady and unalterable 'devoir, I may at last overcome the dif-'ficulty laid in my way.

'As your good parents, your uncles, 'and other friends, are absolutely deter-'mined you shall never have Mr. Love-'lace, if they can help it; and as I pre-'sume no other person is in the way, I 'will contentedly wait the issue of this 'matter. And forgive me, dearest Miss; 'but a person should sooner persuade 'me to give up to him my estate, as an 'instance of my generosity, because he 'could not be happy without it, than I 'would a much more valuable treasure, 'to promote the felicity of another, and 'make his way easier to circumvent 'myself.

'Pardon me, dear Miss; but I must 'persevere, though I am sorry you suf-'fer on my account, as you are pleased 'to think; for I never before saw the 'woman I could love: and while there 'is any hope, and that you remain un-'disposed of to some happier man, I 'must and will be your faithful and obse-'quious admirer,

'ROGER SOLMES.

'MARCH 16.'

MR. JAMES HARLOWE, TO MISS CL. HARLOWE.

'MARCH 16.

'WHAT a fine whim you took into 'your head, to write a letter to Mr. 'Solmes, to persuade him to give up his

'pretenſions to you!—Of all the pretty 'romantick flights you have delighted 'in, this was certainly one of the moſt ex-'traordinary But to ſay nothing] of 'what fires us all with indignation a-'gainſt you; (your owning your prepoſ-'ſeſſion in a villain's favour, and your 'impertinence to me, and your ſiſter, 'and your uncles; one of which has 'given it you home, child) how can you 'lay at Mr. Solmes's door the uſage you 'ſo bitterly complain of?—You know, 'little fool as you are, that it is your 'fondneſs for Lovelace that has brought 'upon you all theſe things; and which 'would have happened whether Mr. 'Solmes had honoured you with his ad-'dreſſes or not.

'As you muſt needs know this to be 'true, conſider, pretty witty Miſs, if your 'fond love-ſick heart can let you conſi-'der, what a fine figure all your expoſtu-'lations with Us, and charges upon Mr. 'Solmes, make!—With what propriety 'do you demand of him to reſtore to you 'your former happineſs, (as you call it, 'and merely call it; for if you thought 'our favour ſo, you would reſtore it to 'yourſelf) ſince it is yet in your own 'power to do ſo? Therefore, Miſs Pert, 'none of your patheticks, except in the 'right place. Depend upon it, whether 'you have Mr. Solmes, or not, you 'ſhall never have your heart's delight, 'the vile rake Lovelace, if your parents, 'if our uncles, if I, can hinder it. No! 'you fallen angel, you ſhall not give 'your father and mother ſuch a ſon, nor 'me ſuch a brother, in giving yourſelf 'that profligate wretch for a huſband. 'And ſo ſet your heart at reſt, and lay 'aſide all thoughts of him, if ever you 'expect forgiveneſs, reconciliation, or a 'kind opinion from any of your family; 'but eſpecially from him, who at pre-'ſent, ſtyles himſelf your brother,

'JAMES HARLOWE.

'P. S. I know your knack at letter-'writing. If you ſend me an anſwer 'to this, I will return it unopened; 'for I will not argue with your per-'verſeneſs in ſo plain a caſe.—Only 'once for all, I was willing to put you 'right as to Mr. Solmes; whom I 'think to blame to trouble his head 'about you.'

LETTER XXXIV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

FRIDAY, MARCH 17.

I Receive, with great pleaſure, the early and cheerful aſſurance of your loyalty and love. And let our principal and moſt truſty friends named in my laſt know that I do.

I would have thee, Jack, come down, as ſoon as thou canſt. I believe I ſhall not want the others ſo ſoon. Yet they may come down to Lord M.'s. I will be there, if not to receive them, to ſatisfy my lord, that there is no new miſchief in hand, which will require his ſecond intervention.

For thyſelf, thou muſt be conſtantly with me: not for my ſecurity; the family dare do nothing but bully; they bark only at a diſtance; but for my entertainment; that thou mayſt, from the Latin and Engliſh claſſicks, keep my love-ſick ſoul from drooping.

Thou hadſt beſt come to me here, in thy old corporal's coat: thy ſervant out of livery; and to be upon a familiar foot with me, as a diſtant relation, to be provided for by thy intereſt above—I mean not in Heaven, thou mayſt be ſure. Thou wilt find me at a little alehouſe; they call it an inn: the White Hart; moſt terribly wounded (but by the weather only) the ſign—In a ſorry village; within five miles from Harlowe Place. Every-body knows Harlowe Place; for, like Verſailles, it is ſprung up from a dunghill, within every elderly perſon's remembrance. Every poor body, particularly, knows it. But that only for a few years paſt, ſince a certain angel has appeared there among the ſons and daughters of men.

The people here at the Hart are poor, but honeſt; and have gotten it into their heads, that I am a man of quality in diſguiſe; and there is no reining in their officious reſpect. Here is a pretty little ſmirking daughter; ſeventeen ſix days ago. I call her my roſe-bud. Her grandmother, (for there is no mother) a good neat old woman, as ever filled a wicker chair in a chimney-corner, has beſought me to be merciful to her.

This is the right way with me. Many and many a pretty rogue had I ſpared, whom I did not ſpare, had my power been acknowledged, and my mercy in time implored. But the debellare ſuperbos ſhould be my motto, were I to have a new one.

This ſimple chit (for there is a ſimplicity in her thou wouldſt be highly pleaſed with: all humble; all officious; all innocent—I love her for her humility, her officiouſneſs, and even for her innocence) will be pretty amuſement to thee; while I combat with the weather, and dodge and creep about the walls and purlieus of Harlowe-Place. Thou wilt ſee in her mind, all that her ſuperiors have been taught to conceal, in order to render themſelves leſs natural, and of conſequence leſs pleaſing.

But I charge thee, that thou do not (what I would not permit myſelf to do for the world—I charge thee that thou do not) crop my roſe-bud. She is the only flower of fragrance, that has blown in this vicinage for ten years paſt; or will for ten years to come: for I have looked backwards to the have-been's, and forward to the will-be's; having but too much leiſure upon my hands in my preſent waiting.

I never was ſo honeſt for ſo long together ſince my matriculation. It behoves me ſo to be—Some way or other, my receſs at this little inn may be found out; and it will then be thought that my roſe-bud has attracted me. A report in my favour, from ſimplicities ſo amiable, may eſtabliſh me; for the grandmother's relation to my roſe-bud may be ſworn to: and the father is an honeſt poor man; has no joy, but in his roſe-bud.—O Jack! ſpare thou therefore (for I ſhall leave thee often alone with her, ſpare thou) my roſe-bud!—Let the rule I never departed from, but it coſt me a long regret, be obſerved to my roſe-bud! Never to ruin a poor girl, whoſe ſimplicity and innocence were all ſhe had to truſt to; and whoſe fortunes were too low to ſave her from the rude contempts of worſe minds than her own, and from an indigence extreme: ſuch a one will only pine in ſecret; and at laſt, perhaps, in order to refuge herſelf from ſlanderous tongues and virulence, be induced to tempt ſome guilty ſtream, or ſeek her end in the knee-encircling garter, that, peradventure, was the firſt attempt of abandoned love.—No defiances will my roſe-bud breathe; no ſelf-dependent, thee-doubting watchfulneſs, (indirectly challenging thy inventive machinations to do their worſt) will ſhe aſſume. Unſuſpicious of her danger, the lamb's throat will hardly ſhun thy knife!—O be not thou the butcher of my lambkin!

The leſs be thou ſo, for the reaſon I am going to give thee—The gentle heart is touched by love: her ſoft boſom heaves with a paſſion ſhe has not yet found a name for. I once caught her eye following a young carpenter, a widow neighbour's ſon, living [to ſpeak in her dialect] at the little white houſe over the way. A gentle youth he alſo ſeems to be, about three years older than herſelf: play-mates from their infancy, till his eighteenth and her fifteenth year furniſhed a reaſon for a greater diſtance in ſhew, while their hearts gave a better for their being nearer than ever—For I ſoon perceived the love reciprocal. A ſcrape and a bow at firſt ſeeing his pretty miſtreſs; turning often to ſalute her following eye; and, when a winding-lane was to deprive him of her ſight, his whole body turned round, his hat more reverently d'offed than before. This anſwered (for, unſeen, I was behind her) by a low curtſey, and a ſigh that Johnny was too far off to hear!—'Hap-'py whelp!' ſaid I to myſelf!—I withdrew; and in tript my roſe-bud, as if ſatisfied with the dumb ſhew, and nothing beyond it.

I have examined the little heart. She has made me her confidante. She owns, ſhe could love Johnny Barton very well: and Johnny Barton has told her, he could love her better than any maiden he ever ſaw—'But, alas! it muſt not be 'thought of.'—'Why not be thought 'of!'—She don't know!—And then ſhe ſighed: but Johnny has an aunt, who will give him an hundred pounds, when his time is out: and her father cannot give her but a few things, or ſo, to ſet her out with; and though Johnny's mother ſays, ſhe knows not where Johnny would have a prettier, or notabler wife, yet—and then ſhe ſighed again—'What 'ſignifies talking?—I would not have 'Johnny be unhappy and poor for me! '—For what good would that do me, 'you know, Sir!'

What would I give [by my ſoul my angel will indeed reform me, if her friends implacable folly ruin us not both! What would I give] to have ſo innocent and ſo good a heart, as either my roſe-bud's, or Johnny's!

I have a confounded miſchievous one—by nature too, I think!—A good motion now-and-then riſes from it: but it dies away preſently—A love of intrigue—An invention for miſchief—A triumph in ſubduing—Fortune encouraging and ſupporting—And a conſtitution—What ſignifies palliating? But I believe I had been a rogue, had I been a plough-boy.

But the devil's in this ſex. Eternal miſguiders. Who, that has once treſpaſſed with them, ever recovered his virtue? And yet where there is not virtue, which nevertheleſs we free-livers are continually plotting to deſtroy, what is there even in the ultimate of our wiſhes with them?—Preparation and expectation are are in a manner every-thing; reflection indeed may be ſomething, if the mind be hardened above feeling the guilt of a paſt treſpaſs; but the fruition, what is there in that? And yet that being the end, nature will be ſatisfied with it.

See what grave reflections an innocent ſubject will produce! It gives me ſome pleaſure to think, that it is not out of my power to reform: but then, Jack, I am afraid I muſt keep better company than I do at preſent—For we certainly harden one another. But be not caſt down, my boy; there will be time enough to give the whole fraternity warning to chuſe another leader: and I fancy thou wilt be the man.

Mean time, as I make it my rule, whenever I have committed a very capital enormity, to do ſome good by way of atonement; and as I believe I am a pretty deal indebted on that ſcore: I intend, before I leave theſe parts, (ſucceſsfully ſhall I leave them I hope, or I ſhall be tempted to double the miſchief by way of revenge, though not to my roſe-bud any) to join an hundred pounds to Johnny's aunt's hundred pounds, to make one innocent couple happy.—I repeat therefore, and for half-a-dozen more thereſores, ſpare thou my roſe-bud.

An interruption — Another letter anon; and both ſhall go together.

LETTER XXXV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

I Have found out by my watchful ſpy almoſt as many of my charmer's motions, as of thoſe of the reſt of her relations. It delights me to think how the raſcal is careſſed by the uncles and nephew; and let into their ſecrets; yet it proceeds all the time by my line of direction. I have charged him, however, on forfeiture of his preſent weekly ſtipend, and my future favour, to take care, that neither my beloved, nor any of the family, ſuſpect him: I have told him that he may indeed watch her egreſſes and regreſſes; but that only keep off other ſervants from her paths; yet not to be ſeen by her himſelf.

The dear creature has tempted him, he told them, with a bribe [which ſhe never offered] to convey a letter [which ſhe never wrote] to Miſs Howe; he believes, with one incloſed, (perhaps to me:) but he declined it; and he begged they would take no notice of it to her. This brought him a ſtingy ſhilling; great applauſe; and an injunction followed it to all the ſervants, for the ſtricteſt look-out, leſt ſhe ſhould contrive ſome way to ſend it—And, about an hour after, an order was given him to throw himſelf in her way; and (expreſſing his concern for denying her requeſt) to tender his ſervice to her, and to bring them her letter: which it will be proper for him to report that ſhe has refuſed to give him.

In the firſt place, the lady is ſecured by it, againſt her own knowledge, in the liberty allowed her of taking her private walks in the garden; for this attempt has confirmed them in their belief, that now they have turned off her maid, ſhe has no way to ſend a letter out of the houſe: if ſhe had, ſhe would not have run the riſque of tempting a fellow who had not been in her ſecret—So that ſhe can proſecute unſuſpectedly her correſpondence with me, and Miſs Howe.

In the next place, it will perhaps afford me an opportunity of a private interview with her, which I am meditating, let her take it as ſhe will; having found out by my ſpy (who can keep off every-body elſe) that ſhe goes every morning and evening to a wood-houſe remote from the dwelling-houſe, under pretence of viſiting and feeding a ſet of bantam-poultry, which were produced from a breed that was her grandfather's, and of which, for that reaſon, ſhe is very fond; as alſo of ſome other curious fowls brought from the ſame place. I have an account of all her motions here.—And as ſhe has owned to me in one of her letters that ſhe correſponds privately with Miſs Howe, I preſume it is by this way.

The interview I am meditating, will produce her conſent, I hope, to other favours of the like kind: for, ſhould ſhe not chuſe the place in which I am expecting to ſee her, I can attend her anywhere in the rambling, Dutch-taſte garden, whenever ſhe will permit me that honour; for my implement, high Joſeph Leman, has procured me the opportunity of getting two keys made to the garden-door, (one of which I have given him, for reaſons good;) which door opens to the haunted coppice, as tradition has made the ſervants think it; a man having been found hanging in it about twenty years ago: and Joſeph, upon proper notice, will leave it unbolted.

But I was obliged previouſly to give him my honour, that no miſchief ſhould happen to any of my adverſaries from this liberty; for the fellow tells me, he loves all his maſters: and, only that he knows knows I am a man of honour; and that my alliance will do credit to the family; and after prejudices are overcome, everybody will think so; or he would not for the world act the part he does.

There never was a rogue, who had not a salve to himself for being so.—What a praise to honesty, that every man pretends to it, even at the instant that he knows he is pursuing the methods that will perhaps prove him a knave to the whole world, as well as to his own conscience!

But what this stupid family can mean, to make all this necessary, I cannot imagine. My REVENGE and my LOVE are uppermost by turns. If the latter succeed not, the gratifying of the former will be my only consolation: and, by all that's good, they shall feel it; although for it I become an exile from my native country for ever!

I will throw myself into my charmer's presence. I have twice already attempted it in vain. I shall then see what I may depend upon from her favour. If I thought I had no prospect of that, I should be tempted to carry her off.—That would be a rape worthy of a Jupiter!

But all gentle shall be my movements: all respectful, even to reverence, my address to her—Her hand shall be the only witness to the pressure of my lip—my trembling lip: I know it will tremble, if I do not feel it tremble. As soft my sighs, as the sighs of my gentle rose-bud. By my humility will I invite her confidence; the loneliness of the place shall give me no advantage: to dissipate her fears, and engage her reliance upon my honour for the future, shall be my whole endeavour; but little will I complain of, not at all will I threaten, those who are continually threatening me; but yet with a view to act the part of Dryden's lion; to secure my love, or to let loose my vengeance upon my hunters.

'What tho' his mighty soul his grief contains?
'He meditates revenge who least complains:
'And like a lion slumb'ring in his way,
'Or sleep dissembling, while he waits his prey,
'His fearless foes within his distance draws;
'Constrains his roaring, and contracts his paws:
'Till at the last, his time for fury found,
'He shoots with sudden vengeance from the ground:
'The prostrate vulgar passes o'er, and spares;
'But, with a lordly rage, his hunters tears.'

LETTER XXXVI.

MISS CL. HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SATURDAY, MARCH 18.

I Have been frighted out of my wits—Still am in a manner out of breath—Thus occasioned—I went down, under the usual pretence, in hopes to find something from you. Concerned at my disappointment, I was returning from the wood-house, when I heard a rustling as of somebody behind a stack of wood. I was extremely surprized: but still more, to behold a man coming from behind the furthermost stack. 'O,' thought I, at that moment, 'the sin of a prohibited 'correspondence!'

In the same point of time that I saw him, he besought me not to be frighted: and, still nearer approaching me, threw open a horseman's coat; and who should it be but Mr. Lovelace!—I could not scream out, (yet attempted to scream, the moment I saw a man; and again, when I saw who it was;) for I had no voice: and had I not caught hold of a prop which supported the old rouf, I should have sunk.

I had hitherto, as you know, kept him at a distance: and now, as I recovered myself, judge of my first emotions, when I recollected his character from every mouth of my family; his enterprizing temper; and found myself alone with him, in a place so near a bye-lane, and so remote from the house.

But his respectful behaviour soon dissipated these fears, and gave me others; lest we should be seen together, and information of it given to my brother: the consequences of which, I could readily think, would be, if not further mischief, an imputed assignation, a stricter confinement, a forfeited correspondence with you, my beloved friend, and a pretence for the most violent compulsion; and neither the one set of reflections, nor the other, acquitted him to me for his bold intrusion.

As soon, therefore, as I could speak, I expressed with the greatest warmth my displeasure; and told him, that he cared not how much he exposed me to the resentment of all my friends, provided he could gratify his own impetuous humour. I then commanded him to leave the place that moment; and was hurrying from him, when he threw himself in the way at my feet, beseeching my stay for one moment; declaring, that he suffered himself to be guilty of this rashness, as I thought it, to avoid one much greater—For, in short, he could not bear the hourly insults he received from my family, with the thoughts of having so little interest in my favour, that he could not promise himself that his patience and forbearance would be attended with any other view than to loſe me for ever, and be triumphed over and inſulted upon it.

This man, you know, has very ready knees. You have ſaid, that he ought, in ſmall points, frequently to offend, on purpoſe to ſhew what an addreſs he is maſter of.

He ran on, expreſſing his apprehenſions that a temper ſo gentle and obliging, as he ſaid mine was, to every-body but him, (and a dutifulneſs ſo exemplary inclined me to do my part to others, whether they did theirs or not by me) would be wrought upon in favour of a man ſet up in part to be revenged upon myſelf, for my grandfather's envied diſtinction of me; and in part to be revenged upon him, for having given life to one who would have taken his; and now ſought to deprive him of hopes dearer to him than life.

I told him he might be aſſured, that the ſeverity and ill-uſage I met with would be far from effecting the propoſed end: that although I could, with great ſincerity, declare for a ſingle life, (which had always been my choice;) and particularly, that if ever I married, if they would not inſiſt upon the man I had an averſion to, it ſhould not be with the man they diſliked.

He interrupted me here: he hoped I would forgive him for it; but he could not help expreſſing his great concern, that, after ſo many inſtances of his paſſionate and obſequious devotion—

'And pray, Sir,' ſaid I, 'let me in-'terrupt you in my turn—Why don't 'you aſſert, in ſtill plainer words, the 'obligation you have laid me under by 'this your boaſted devotion? Why don't 'you let me know, in terms as high as 'your implication, that a perſeverance I 'have not wiſhed for, which has ſet all 'my relations at variance with me, is a 'merit that throws upon me the guilt of 'ingratitude for not anſwering it as you 'ſeem to expect?'

I muſt forgive him, he ſaid, if he, who pretended only to a comparative merit, (and otherwiſe thought no man living could deſerve me) had preſumed to hope for a greater ſhare in my favour, than he had hitherto met with, when ſuch men as Mr. Symmes, Mr. Wyerley, and now, laſtly, ſo vile a reptile as this Solmes, however diſcouraged by myſelf, were made his competitors. As to the perſeverance I mentioned, it was impoſſible for him not to perſevere: but I muſt needs know, that were he not in being, the terms Solmes had propoſed were ſuch, as would have involved me in the ſame difficulties with my relations that I now laboured under. He therefore took the liberty to ſay, that my favour to him, far from increaſing thoſe difficulties, would be the readieſt way to extricate me from them. They had made it impoſſible [he told me, with too much truth] to oblige them any way, but by ſacrificing myſelf to Solmes. They were well apprized beſides of the difference between the two; one, whom they hoped to manage as they pleaſed; the other, who could and would protect me from every inſult; and who had natural proſpects much ſuperior to my brother's fooliſh views of a title.

How comes this man to know ſo well all our foibles? But I more wonder, how he came to have a notion of meeting me in this place?

I was very uneaſy to be gone; and the more as the night came on apace. But there was no getting from him, till I had heard a great deal more of what he had to ſay.

As he hoped, that I would one day make him the happieſt man in the world, he aſſured me, that he had ſo much regard for my fame, that he would be as far from adviſing any ſtep that was likely to caſt a ſhade upon my reputation (although that ſtep was to be ever ſo much in his own favour) as I would be to follow ſuch advice. But ſince I was not to be permitted to live ſingle, he would ſubmit it to my conſideration, whether I had any way but one to avoid the intended violence to my inclinations—My father ſo jealous of his authority; both my uncles in my father's way of thinking; my couſin Morden at a diſtance; my uncle and aunt Hervey awed into inſignificance, was his word; my brother and ſiſter inflaming every one; Solmes's offers captivating; Miſs Howe's mother rather of a party with them, for motives reſpecting example to her own daughter.

And then he aſked me, if I would receive a letter from Lady Betty Lawrance, on this occaſion: for Lady Sarah Sadleir, he ſaid, having lately loſt her only child, hardly looked into the world, or thought of it farther than to wiſh him married, and preferably to all the women in the world, with me.

To be ſure my dear, there is a great deal in what the man ſaid—I may be allowed to ſay this, without an imputed glow or throb.—But I told him nevertheleſs, that although I had great honour for the ladies he was related to, yet I ſhould not chuſe to receive a letter on a ſubject that had a tendency to promote an end I was far from intending to promote: that it became me, ill as I was treated at preſent, to hope every-thing, to bear every-thing, and to try every-thing. When my father ſaw my ſtedfaſtneſs, and that I would die rather than have Mr. Solmes, he would perhaps recede.

Interrupting me, he repreſented the unlikelihood there was of that, from the courſes they had entered upon; which he thus enumerated:—Their engaging Mrs. Howe againſt me, in the firſt place, as a perſon I might have thought to fly to, if puſhed to deſperation—my brother continually buzzing in my father's ears, that my couſin Morden would ſoon arrive, and then would inſiſt upon giving me poſſeſſion of my grandfather's eſtate, in purſuance of the will; which would render me independent of my father—their diſgraceful confinement of me—their diſmiſſing ſo ſuddenly my ſervant, and ſetting my ſiſter's over me—their engaging my mother, contrary to her own judgment, againſt me; theſe, he ſaid, were all ſo many flagrant proofs that they would ſtick at nothing to carry their point; and were what made him inexpreſſibly uneaſy.

He appealed to me, whether ever I knew my father recede from any reſolution he had once fixed; eſpecially, if he thought either his prerogative, or his authority, concerned in the queſtion. His acquaintance with our family, he ſaid, enabled him to give ſeveral inſtances (but they would be too grating to me) of an arbitrarineſs that had few examples even in the families of princes: an arbitrarineſs, which the moſt excellent of women, my mother, too ſeverely experienced.

He was proceeding, as I thought, with reflections of this ſort; and I angrily told him, I would not permit my father to be reflected upon; adding, That his ſeverity to me, however unmerited, was not a warrant for me to diſpenſe with my duty to him.

He had no pleaſure, he ſaid, in urging any-thing that could be ſo conſtrued; for, however well warranted he was to make ſuch reflections from the provocations they were continually giving him, he knew how offenſive to me any liberties of this ſort would be.—And yet he muſt own, that it was painful to him, who had youth and paſſions to be allowed for, as well as others, and who had always valued himſelf upon ſpeaking his mind; to curb himſelf under ſuch treatment. Nevertheleſs, his conſideration for me would make him confine himſelf, in his obſervations, to facts that were too flagrant, and too openly avowed, to be diſputed. It could not therefore juſtly diſpleaſe, he would venture to ſay, if he made this natural inference from the premiſes, That if ſuch were my father's behaviour to a wife who diſputed not the imaginary prerogative he was ſo unprecedently fond of aſſerting, what room had a daughter to hope, that he would depart from an authority he was ſo earneſt, and ſo much more concerned to maintain?—Family-intereſts at the ſame time engaging; an averſion, however cauſeleſsly conceived, ſtimulating; my brother's and ſiſter's reſentments and ſelfiſh views co-operating; and my baniſhment from their preſence depriving me of all perſonal plea or entreaty in my own favour.

How unhappy, my dear, that there is but too much reaſon for theſe obſervations, and for this inference; made likewiſe, with more coolneſs and reſpect to my family than one would have apprehended from a man ſo much provoked, and of paſſions ſo high, and generally thought uncontroulable!

Will you not queſtion me about throbs and glows, if, from ſuch inſtances of a command over his fiery temper, for my ſake, I am ready to infer, that were my friends capable of a reconciliation with him, he might be affected by arguments apparently calculated for his preſent and future good! Nor is it a very bad indication that he has ſuch moderate notions of that very high prerogative in huſbands, of which we in our family have been accuſtomed to hear ſo much.

He repreſented to me, that my preſent diſgraceful confinement was known to all the world: that neither my ſiſter nor brother ſcrupled to repreſent me as an obliged and favoured child in a ſtate of actual rebellion—that, nevertheleſs, every-body who knew me was ready to juſtify me for an averſion to a man whom every-body thought utterly unworthy of me, and more fit for my ſiſter. That unhappy as he was, in not having been able to make any greater impreſſion upon me in his favour, all the world gave me to him: nor was there but one objection made to him, by his very enemies; (his birth, his fortune, his proſpects, all unexceptionable, and the latter ſplendid) and that objection, he thanked God, and my example, was in a fair way of being removed for ever; ſince he had ſeen his error, and was heartily ſick of the courſes he had followed; which, however, were far leſs enormous than malice and envy had repreſented them to be. But of this he ſhould ſay the leſs, as it were much better to juſtify himſelf by his actions, than by the moſt ſolemn aſſeverations and promiſes. And then complimenting my perſon, he aſſured me (for that he always loved virtue, although he had not followed it's rules as he ought) that he was ſtill more captivated with the graces of my mind: and would frankly own, that till he had the honour to know me, he had never met with an inducement ſufficient to enable him to overcome an unhappy kind of prejudice to matrimony; which had made me before impenetrable to the wiſhes and recommendations of all his relations.

You ſee, my dear, he ſcruples not to ſpeak of himſelf, as his enemies ſpeak of him. I can't ſay, but his openneſs in theſe particulars gives a credit to his other profeſſions. I ſhould eaſily, I think, detect an hypocrite: and this man particularly, who is ſaid to have allowed himſelf in great liberties, were he to pretend to inſtantaneous lights and convictions—at this time of life too—Habits, I am ſenſible, are not ſo eaſily changed. You have always joined with me in remarking, that he will ſpeak his mind with freedom, even to a degree of unpoliteneſs ſometimes; and that his very treatment of my family is a proof that he cannot make a mean court to any-body for intereſt-ſake—What pity, where there are ſuch laudable traces, that they ſhould have been ſo mired, and choaked up, as I may ſay!—We have heard, that the man's head is better than his heart: but do you really think Mr. Lovelace can have a very bad heart? Why ſhould not there be ſomething in blood in the human creature, as well as in the ignobler animals? None of his family are exceptionable—but himſelf, indeed. The characters of the ladies are admirable—But I ſhall incur the imputation I wiſh to avoid. Yet what a look of cenſorioufneſs does it carry in an unſparing friend, to take one to taſk for doing that juſtice, and making thoſe charitable inferences in favour of a particular perſon, which one ought without ſcruple to do, and to make, in the behalf of any other man living?

He then again preſſed me to receive a letter of offered protection from Lady Betty. He ſaid, that people of birth ſtood a little too much upon punctilio; as people of virtue alſo did: (But indeed birth, worthily lived up to, was virtue; virtue, birth; the inducements of a decent punctilio the ſame; the origin of both, one) [How came this notion from him?]—Elſe, Lady Betty would write to me. But ſhe would be willing to be firſt apprized, that her offer would be well received—as it would have the appearance of being made againſt the liking of one part of my family; and which nothing would induce her to make but the degree of unworthy perſecution which I actually laboured under, and had reaſon further to apprehend.

I told him, that, however greatly I thought myſelf obliged to Lady Betty Lawrance, if this offer came from herſelf; yet it was eaſy to ſee to what it led. It might look like vanity in me perhaps to ſay, That this urgency in him, on this occaſion, wore the face of art, in order to engage me into meaſures from which I might not eaſily extricate myſelf. I ſaid, that I ſhould not be affected by the ſplendor of even a royal title. Goodneſs, I thought, was greatneſs: that the excellent characters of the ladies of his family weighed more with me, than the conſideration that they were half-ſiſters to Lord M. and daughters of an earl; that he would not have found encouragement from me, had my friends been conſenting to his addreſs, if he he had only a mere relative merit to thoſe ladies; ſince, in that caſe, the very reaſons that made me admire them, would have been ſo many objections to their kinſman.

I then aſſured him, that it was with infinite concern, that I had found myſelf drawn into an epiſtolary correſpondence with him; eſpecially ſince that correſpondence had been prohibited:—and the only agreeable uſe I could think of making of this unexpected and undeſired interview, was, to let him know, that I ſhould from henceforth think myſelf obliged to diſcontinue it. And I hoped, that he would not have the thought of engaging me to carry it on by menacing my relations.

There was light enough to diſtinguiſh that he looked very grave upon this. He ſo much valued my free choice, he ſaid, and my unbiaſſed favour, (ſcorning to ſet himſelf upon a footing with Solmes in the compulſory methods uſed in that man's behalf) that he ſhould hate himſelf, were he capable of a view of intimidating me by ſo very poor a method. But, nevertheleſs, there were two things to be conſidered: firſt, that the continual outrages he was treated with; the ſpies ſet over him, one of which he had detected; the indignities all his family were likewiſe treated with; as alſo, myſelf; ſelf; avowedly in malice to him, or he ſhould not preſume to take upon himſelf to reſent for me, without my leave [The artful wretch ſaw he would have lain open here, had he not thus guarded]—All theſe conſiderations called upon him to ſhew a proper reſentment; and he would leave it to me to judge, whether it would be reaſonable for him, as a man of ſpirit, to bear ſuch inſults, if it were not for my ſake. I would be pleaſed to conſider, in the next place, whether the ſituation I was in (a priſoner in my father's houſe, and my whole family determined to compel me to marry a man unworthy of me; and that ſpeedily, and whether I conſented or not) admitted of delay in the preventive meaſures he was deſirous to put me upon, in the laſt reſort only. Nor was there a neceſſity, he ſaid, if I were actually in Lady Betty's protection, that I ſhould be his, if, afterwards, I ſhould ſee any-thing objectible in his conduct.

But what would the world conclude would be the end, I demanded, were I, in the laſt reſort, as he propoſed, to throw myſelf into the protection of his friends, but that it was with ſuch a view?

And what leſs did the world think now, he aſked, than that I was confined that I might not? 'You are to conſider, 'Madam, you have not now an option; 'and to whom is it owing that you have 'not; and that you are in the power of 'thoſe (parents why ſhould I call them?) 'who are determined, that you ſhall not 'have an option. All I propoſe is, that 'you will embrace ſuch a protection;—'but not till you have tried every way, 'to avoid the neceſſity for it.

'And give me leave to ſay,' proceeded he, 'that if a correſpondence on which 'I have founded all my hopes, is, at 'this critical conjuncture, to be broken 'off; and if you are reſolved not to be 'provided againſt the worſt; it muſt be 'plain to me that you will at laſt yield 'to that worſt—Worſt to me only—It 'cannot be to you—And then!' [and he put his hand clenched to his forehead] 'how ſhall I bear the ſuppoſition? Then 'will you be that Solmes's!—But, by all 'that's ſacred, neither he, nor your bro-'ther, nor your uncles, ſhall enjoy their 'triumph—Perdition ſeize my ſoul, if 'they ſhall!'

The man's vehemence frightened me: yet, in reſentment, I would have left him; but throwing himſelf at my feet again, 'Leave me not thus—I beſeech 'you, deareſt Madam, leave me not thus, 'in deſpair. I kneel not, repenting of 'what I have vowed in ſuch a caſe as 'that I have ſuppoſed. I revow it, at 'your feet.'—And ſo he did. But think 'not it is by way of menace, or to in-'timidate you to favour me. If your 'heart inclines you' [and then he aroſe] 'to obey your father, (your brother ra-'ther) and to have Solmes; although I 'ſhall avenge myſelf on thoſe who have 'inſulted me, for their inſults to myſelf 'and family; yet will I tear out my 'heart from this boſom, (if poſſible with 'my own hands) were it to ſcruple to 'give up it's ardors to a woman capable 'of ſuch a preference.'

I told him, that he talked to me in very high language; but he might aſſure himſelf, that I never would have Mr. Solmes, (yet that this I ſaid not in favour to him) and I had declared as much to my relations, were there not ſuch a man as himſelf in the world.

Would I declare, that I would ſtill honour him with my correſpondence?—He could not bear, that, hoping to obtain greater inſtances of my favour, he ſhould forfeit the only one he had to boaſt of.

I bid him forbear raſhneſs or reſentment to any of my family, and I would, for ſome time at leaſt, till I ſaw what iſſue my preſent trials were likely to have, proceed with a correſpondence, which, nevertheleſs, my heart condemned—

And his ſpirit him, the impatient creature ſaid, interrupting me, for bearing what he did; when he conſidered, that the neceſſity of it was impoſed upon him, not by my will, (for then he would bear it cheerfully, and a thouſand times more) but by creatures—And there he ſtopt.

I told him plainly that he might thank himſelf (whoſe indifferent character, as to his morals, had given ſuch a handle againſt him) for all. It was but juſt, that a man ſhould be ſpoken evil of, who ſet no value upon his reputation.

He offered to vindicate himſelf: but I told him, I would judge him by his own rule—by his actions, not by his profeſſions.

Were not his enemies, he ſaid, ſo powerful, and ſo determined; and had they not already ſhewn their intentions in ſuch high acts of even cruel compulſion; but would leave me to my choice, or to my deſire of living ſingle; he would have been content to undergo a twelvemonth's probation, or more: but he was confident, that one month would either complete all their purpoſes, or render them abortive; and I beſt knew what hopes I had of my father's receding—He did not know him, if I had any.

I ſaid,

I ſaid, I would try every method, that either my duty or my influence upon any of them ſhould ſuggeſt, before I would put myſelf into any other protection: and, if nothing elſe would do, would reſign the envied eſtate; and that I dared to ſay would.

He was contented, he ſaid, to abide that iſſue. He ſhould be far from wiſhing me to embrace any other protection, but, as he had frequently ſaid, in the laſt neceſſity. 'But, deareſt creature,' ſaid he, catching my hand with ardor, and preſſing it to his lips, 'if the yielding up 'that eſtate will do—Reſign it—and be 'mine—And I will corroborate, with 'all my ſoul, your reſignation!'

This was not ungenerouſly ſaid: but what will not theſe men ſay to obtain belief, and a power over one?

I made many efforts to go; and now it was ſo dark, that I began to have great apprehenſions. I cannot ſay from his behaviour: indeed, he has a good deal raiſed himſelf in my opinion by the perſonal reſpect, even to reverence, which he paid me during the whole conference; for although he flamed out once, upon a ſuppoſition that Solmes might ſucceed, it was upon a ſuppoſition that would excuſe paſſion, if any-thing could, you know, in a man pretending to love with fervour; although it was ſo levelled, that I could not avoid reſenting it.

He recommended himſelf to my favour at parting, with great earneſtneſs, yet with as great ſubmiſſion; not offering to condition any-thing with me; although he hinted his wiſhes for another meeting; which I forbade him ever attempting again in the ſame place.—And I will own to you, from whom I ſhould be really blameable to conceal any-thing, that his arguments (drawn from the diſgraceful treatment I meet with) of what I am to expect, make me begin to apprehend, that I ſhall be under an obligation to be either the one man's or the other's—And if ſo, I fancy I ſhall not incur your blame, were I to ſay, which of the two it muſt be. You have ſaid, which it muſt not be. But, O my dear, the ſingle life is by far the moſt eligible to me: indeed it is. And I hope yet to be permitted to make that option.

I got back without obſervation: but the apprehenſion that I ſhould not, gave me great uneaſineſs; and made me begin my letter in a greater flutter than he gave me cauſe to be in, except at the firſt ſeeing him; for then indeed my ſpirits failed me; and it was a particular felicity, that, in ſuch a place, in ſuch a fright, and alone with him, I fainted not away.

I ſhould add, that after having reproached him with his behaviour the laſt Sunday at church, he ſolemnly aſſured me, that it was not what had been repreſented to me: that he did not expect to ſee me there; but hoped to have an opportunity to addreſs himſelf to my father, and to be permitted to attend him home. But that the good Dr. Lewen had perſuaded him not to attempt ſpeaking to any of the family, at that time; obſerving to him the emotions into which his preſence had put every-body. He intended no pride or haughtineſs of behaviour, he aſſured me; and that the attributing ſuch to him was the effect of that ill-will which he had the mortification to find inſuperable: adding, that when he bowed to my mother, it was a compliment he intended generally to every one in the pew, as well as to her, whom he ſincerely venerated.

If he may be believed, (and I ſhould think he would not have come purpoſely to defy my family, yet expect favour from me) one may ſee, my dear, the force of hatred, which miſrepreſents all things—yet why ſhould Shorey (except officiouſly to pleaſe her principals) make a report in his diſfavour? He told me, that he would appeal to Dr. Lewen for his juſtification on this head; adding, that the whole converſation between the doctor and him turned upon his deſire to attempt to reconcile himſelf to us all, in the face of the church; and upon the doctor's endeavouring to diſſuade him from making ſuch a publick overture, till he knew how it would be accepted. But to what purpoſe his appeal, when I am debarred from ſeeing that good man, or any one who would adviſe me what to do in my preſent difficult ſituation!

I fancy, my dear, however, that there would hardly be a guilty perſon in the world, were each ſuſpected or accuſed perſon to tell his or her own ſtory, and be allowed any degree of credit.

I have written a very long letter.

To be ſo particular as you require in ſubjects of converſation, it is impoſſible to be ſhort.

I will add to it only the aſſurance, that I am, and ever will be, your affectionate and faithful friend and ſervant,

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

You'll be ſo good, my dear, as to remember, that the date of your laſt letter to me, was the 9th.

LET-

LETTER XXXVII.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

SUNDAY, MARCH 19.

I Beg your pardon, my deareſt friend, for having given you occaſion to remind me of the date of my laſt. I was willing to have before me as much of the workings of your wiſe relations as poſſible; being verily perſuaded, that one ſide or the other would have yielded by this time: and then I ſhould have had ſome degree of certainty to found my obſervations upon. And indeed what can I write that I have not already written?—You know, that I can do nothing but rave at your ſtupid perſecutors: and that you don't like. I have adviſed you to reſume your own eſtate: that you won't do. You cannot bear the thoughts of having their Solmes: and Lovelace is reſolved you ſhall be his, let who will ſay to the contrary. I think you muſt be either the one man's or the other's. Let us ſee what their next ſtep will be.

As to Lovelace, while he tells his own ſtory (having alſo behaved ſo handſomely on his intruſion in the wood-houſe; and intended ſo well at church) who can ſay that the man is the leaſt blameworthy?—Wicked people! to combine againſt ſo innocent a man!—But, as I ſaid, 'Let us ſee what their next ſtep 'will be,' and what courſe you will take upon it; and then we may be the more enlightened.

As to your change of ſtile to your uncles, and brother and ſiſter, ſince they were ſo fond of attributing to you a regard for Lovelace, and would not be perſuaded to the contrary; and, ſince you only ſtrengthened their arguments againſt yourſelf by denying it; you did but juſt as I would have done, in giving way to their ſuſpicions, and trying what that would do—But if—But if—Pray, my dear, indulge me a little—You yourſelf think it was neceſſary to apologize to me for that change of ſtile to them—And till you will ſpeak out like a friend to her unqueſtionable friend, I muſt teaze you a little—Let it run therefore; for it will run—

If, then, there be not a reaſon for this change of ſtile, which you have not thought fit to give me, be ſo good as to watch, as I once before adviſed you, how the cauſe for it will come on—Why ſhould it be permitted to ſteal upon you, and you know nothing of the matter?

When we get a great cold, we are apt to puzzle ourſelves to find out when it began, and how we got it; and when that is accounted for, down we ſit contented, and let it have it's courſe; or, if it be very troubleſome, take a ſweat, or uſe other means to get rid of it—So, my dear, before the malady you wot of, yet wot not of, grows ſo importunate, as that you muſt be obliged to ſweat it out, let me adviſe you to mind how it comes on. For I am perſuaded, as ſurely as that I am now writing to you, that the indiſcreet violence of your friends on one hand, and the inſinuating addreſs of Lovelace on the other, (if the man be not a greater fool than any-body thinks him) will effectually bring it to this, and do all his work for him.

But let it—If it muſt be Lovelace or Solmes, the choice cannot admit of debate. Yet if all be true that is reported, I ſhould prefer almoſt any of your other lovers to either; unworthy as they alſo are. But who can be worthy of a Clariſſa?

I wiſh you are not indeed angry with me for harping ſo much on one ſtring. I muſt own, that I ſhould think myſelf inexcuſable ſo to do, (the rather, as I am bold enough to imagine it a point out of all doubt from fifty places in your letters, were I to labour the proof) if you would ingenuouſly own—

'Own what?' you'll ſay. 'Why, 'my Anna Howe, I hope, you don't 'think, that I am already in love!'

No, to be ſure! How can your Anna Howe have ſuch a thought?—What then ſhall we call it? You have helped me to a phraſe.—A conditional kind of liking!—that's it.—O my friend! Did I not know how much you deſpiſe prudery; and that you are too young, and too lovely, to be a prude—

But, avoiding ſuch hard names, let me tell you one thing, my dear, (which nevertheleſs I have told you before) and that is this; that I ſhall think I have reaſon to be highly diſpleaſed with you, when you write to me, you endeavour to keep from me any ſecret of your heart.

Let me add, that if you would clearly and implicitly tell me, how far Lovelace has, or has not, a hold in your affections, I could better adviſe you what to do, than at preſent I can. You, who are ſo famed for preſcience, as I may call it; and than whom no young lady ever had ſtronger pretenſions to a ſhare of it; have had, no doubt, reaſonings in your heart about him, ſuppoſing you were to be be one day his; [no doubt but you have had the same in Solmes's case: whence the ground for the hatred of the one; and for the conditional liking of the other] will you tell me, my dear, what you have thought of Lovelace's best and of his worst?—How far eligible for the first; and how far rejectible for the last?—Then weighing both parts in opposite scales, we shall see which is likely to preponderate; or rather which does preponderate. Nothing less than the knowledge of the inmost recesses of your heart can satisfy my love and my friendship. Surely, you are not afraid to trust yourself with a secret of this nature: if you are, then you may the more allowably doubt me. But I dare say, you will not own either—Nor is there, I hope, cause for either.

Be pleased to observe one thing, my dear, that whenever I have given myself any of those airs of raillery, which have seemed to make you look about you, (when, likewise, your case may call for a more serious turn from a sympathizing friend) it has not been upon those passages which are written, though perhaps not intended, with such explicitness [don't be alarmed, my dear!] as leaves little cause to doubt: but only when you affect reserve; when you give new words for common things; when you come with your curiosities, with your conditional likings, and with your PRUDE-encies, [mind how I spell the word] in a case that with every other person defies all prudence—Overt acts of treason all these, against the sovereign friendship we have avowed to each other!

Remember, that you found me out in a moment. You challenged me. I owned directly, that there was only my pride between the man and me; for I could not endure, I told you, to think it in the power of any fellow living to give me a moment's uneasiness. And then my man, as I have elsewhere said, was not such a one as yours: so I had reason to impute full as much to my own inconsideration, as to his power over me: nay, more. But still more to yours. For you reasoned me out of the curiosity first; and when the liking was brought to be conditional—why then, you know, I throbbed no more about him.

O! pray now, as you say, now I have mentioned that my fellow was not such a charming fellow as yours, let Miss Biddulph, Miss Lloyd, Miss Campion, and me, have your opinion, how far figure ought to engage us: with a view to your own case, however—Mind that—as Mr. Tony says—And whether at all, if the man be vain of it; since, as you observe in a former, that vanity is a stop-short pride in such a one, that would make one justly doubt the worthiness of his interior. You, our pattern, so lovely in feature, so graceful in person, have none of it; and have therefore with the best grace always held, that it is not excusable even in a woman.

You must know, that this subject was warmly debated among us in our last conversation: and Miss Lloyd wished me to write to you upon it for your opinion; to which, in every debated case, we always paid the greatest deference. I hope you will not be so much engrossed by your more weighty cares, as not to have freedom of spirits enough to enter upon the task.—You know how much we all admire your opinion on such topicks; which ever produces something new and instructive, as you handle the subjects. And pray tell us, to what you think it owing, that your man seems so careful to adorn that self-adorned person of his! yet so manages, that one cannot for one's heart think him a coxcomb?—Let this question, and the above tasks, divert, and not displease you, my dear.—One subject, though ever so important, could never yet engross your capacious mind. If they should displease you, you must recollect the many instances of my impertinence which you have forgiven, and then say, 'This is a mad girl—But yet I 'love her!—And she is my own'

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XXXVIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

MONDAY, MARCH 20.

YOUR last so sensibly affects me, that I must postpone every other consideration, however weighty, to reply to it: and this I will do very distinctly, and with all the openness of heart which our mutual friendship demands.

But let me observe, in the first place, gratefully observe, That if I have in fifty passages of my letters given you such undoubted proofs of my value for Mr. Lovelace, that you have spared me for the sake of my explicitness, it is acting by me with a generosity worthy of yourself.

But lives the man, think you, who is so ſo very bad, that he does not give even a doubting mind reaſon at one time to be better pleaſed with him than at another? And when that reaſon offers, is it not juſt to expreſs one's ſelf accordingly? I would do the man who addreſſes me as much juſtice as if he did not addreſs me: it has ſuch a look of tyranny, it appears ſo ungenerous, methinks, in our ſex, to uſe a man worſe for his reſpect to us, (no other cauſe for diſreſpect occurring) that I would not by any means be that perſon who ſhould do ſo.

But, although I may intend no more than juſtice, it will perhaps be difficult to hinder thoſe who know the man's views, from conſtruing it as a partial favour: and eſpecially if the eager-eyed obſerver has been formerly touched herſelf, and would triumph that her friend had been no more able to eſcape than ſhe. Noble minds, emulative of perfection, (and yet the paſſion properly directed, I do not take to be an imperfection neither) may be allowed a little generous envy, I think.

If I meant by this a reflection, by way of revenge, it is but a revenge, my dear, in the ſoft ſenſe of the word. I love, as I have told you, your pleaſantry. Although at the time your reproof may pain me a little; yet, on recollection, when I find in it more of the cautioning friend, than of the ſatirizing obſerver, I ſhall be all gratitude upon it. All the buſineſs will be this; I ſhall be ſenſible of the pain in the preſent letter perhaps; but I ſhall thank you in the next, and ever after.

In this way, I hope, my dear, you will account for a little of that ſenſibility which you will find above, and perhaps ſtill more, as I proceed.—You frequently remind me, by an excellent example, your own to me, that I muſt not ſpare you!

I am not conſcious, that I have written any-thing of this man, that has not been more in his diſpraiſe than in his favour. Such is the man, that I think I muſt have been faulty, and ought to take myſelf to account, if I had not: but if you think otherwiſe, I will not put you upon labouring the proof, as you call it. My conduct muſt then have a faulty appearance at leaſt, and I will endeavour to rectify it. But of this I aſſure you, That whatever interpretation my words were capable of, I intended not any reſerve to you. I wrote my heart at the time—If I had had thoughts of diſguiſing it, or been conſcious that there was reaſon for doing ſo, perhaps I had not given you the opportunity of remarking upon my curioſity after his relations eſteem for me; nor upon my conditional liking, and ſuch-like. All I intended by the firſt, I believe, I honeſtly told you at the time: to that letter I therefore refer, whether it make for me, or againſt me; and by the other, that I might bear in mind what it became a perſon of my ſex and character to be and to do, in ſuch an unhappy ſituation, where the imputed love is thought an undutiful, and therefore a criminal paſſion; and where the ſuppoſed object of it is a man of faulty morals too. And I am ſure you will excuſe my deſire of appearing at thoſe times the perſon I ought to be; had I no other view in it but to merit the continuance of your good opinion.

But that I may acquit myſelf of having reſerves—O, my dear, I muſt here break off!—

LETTER XXXIX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

MONDAY, MARCH 20.

THIS letter will account to you, my dear, for my abrupt breaking off in the anſwer I was writing to yours of yeſterday; and which, poſſibly, I ſhall not be able to finiſh, and ſend you, till to-morrow or next day; having a great deal to ſay to the ſubjects you put to me in it. What I am now to give you are the particulars of another effort made by my friends, through the good Mrs. Norton.

It ſeems they had ſent to her yeſterday, to be here this day, to take their inſtructions, and to try what ſhe could do with me. It would, at leaſt, I ſuppoſe they thought have this effect; to render me inexcuſable with her; or to let her ſee, there was no room for the expoſtulations ſhe had often wanted to make in my favour to my mother.

The declaration, that my heart was free, afforded them an argument to prove obſtinacy and perverſeneſs upon me; ſince it could be nothing elſe that governed me in my oppoſition to their wills, if I had no particular eſteem for another man: and now, that I have given them reaſon (in order to obviate this argument) to ſuppoſe that I have a preference to another, they are reſolved to carry their ſchemes into execution as ſoon as poſſible. And in order to this, they ſent for this good woman, for whom they know I have even a filial regard.

She

She found assembled my father and mother, my brother and sister, my two uncles, and my aunt Hervey.

My brother acquainted her with all that had passed since she was last permitted to see me; with the contents of my letters avowing my regard for Mr. Lovelace, (as they all interpreted them;) with the substance of their answers to them; and with their resolutions.

My mother spoke next; and delivered herself to this effect, as the good woman told me.

After reciting how many times I had been indulged in my refusals of different men, and the pains she had taken with me, to induce me to oblige my whole family in one instance out of five or six, and my obstinacy upon it; 'O 'my good Mrs. Norton,' said the dear lady, 'could you have thought that my 'Clarissa and your Clarissa was capable 'of so determined an opposition to the 'will of parents so indulgent to her? 'But see what you can do with her. 'The matter is gone too far to be re-'ceded from on our parts. Her fa-'ther had concluded every-thing with 'Mr. Solmes, not doubting her com-'pliance. Such noble settlements, Mrs. 'Norton, and such advantages to the 'whole family!—In short, she has it in 'her power to lay an obligation upon 'us all. Mr. Solmes, knowing she has 'good principles, and hoping by his 'patience now, and good treatment here-'after, to engage her gratitude and by 'degrees her love, is willing to over-'look all!'—

'So, Mrs. Norton, if you are con-'vinced that it is a child's duty to sub-'mit to her parents authority, in the 'most important point as well as in 'the least, I beg you will try your in-'fluence over her; I have none; her 'father has none; her uncles neither; 'although it is her apparent interest to 'oblige us all; for, on that condition, 'her grandfather's estate is not half of 'what, living and dying, is purposed 'to be done for her. If any-body 'can prevail with her, it is you; and 'I hope you will heartily enter upon 'this task.'

The good woman asked, Whether she was permitted to expostulate with them upon the occasion, before she came up to me?

My arrogant brother told her, she was sent for to expostulate with his sister, and not with them. 'And this, 'Goody Norton,' [she is always Goody with him!] 'you may tell her, that the 'treaty with Mr. Solmes is concluded; 'that nothing but her compliance with 'her duty is wanting; of consequence, 'that there is no room for your expos-'tulation, or hers either.'

'Be assured of this, Mrs. Norton,' said my father, in an angry tone, 'that 'we will not be baffled by her. We 'will not appear like fools in this mat-'ter, and as if we had no authority over 'our own daughter. We will not, in 'short, be bullied out of our child by 'a cursed rake, who had like to have 'killed our only son!—And so she had 'better make a merit of her obedience: 'for comply she shall, if I live; inde-'pendent as she thinks my father's in-'discreet bounty has made her of me, 'her father. Indeed, since that, she has 'never been what she was before. An 'unjust bequest!—And it is likely to 'prosper accordingly!—But if she mar-'ry that vile Lovelace, I will litigate 'every shilling with her: tell her so; 'and that the will may be set aside, 'and shall.'

My uncles joined, with equal heat.

My brother was violent in his declarations.

My sister put in with vehemence, on the same side.

My aunt Hervey was pleased to say, There was no article so proper for parents to govern in as this of marriage; and it was very fit, mine should be obliged.

Thus instructed, the good woman came up to me. She told me all that had passed, and was very earnest with me to comply; and so much justice did she to the task imposed upon her, that I more than once thought, that her own opinion went with theirs. But when she saw what an immoveable aversion I had to the man, she lamented with me their determined resolution: and then examined into the sincerity of my declaration, that I would gladly compound with them by living single. Of this being satisfied, she was so convinced that this offer, which, carried into execution, would exclude Lovelace effectually, ought to be accepted, that she would go down, (although I told her it was what I had tendered over-and-over to no purpose) and undertake to be guaranty for me on that score.

She went accordingly; but soon returned in tears; being used harshly for urging this alternative—They had a right to my obedience upon their own terms, they said: my proposal was an artifice, only to gain time; nothing but marrying Mr. Solmes should do; they had told me so before; they should not be at rest till it was done; for they knew what an interest Lovelace had in my heart; I had as good as owned it in my letters to my uncles, and brother and sister, although I had most disingenuously declared otherwise to my mother. I depended, they said, upon their indulgence, and my own power over them: they would not have banished me from their presence, if they had not known that their consideration for me was greater than mine for them. And they would be obeyed or I never should be restored to their favour, let the consequence be what it would.

My brother thought fit to tell the good woman, that her whining nonsense did but harden me. There was a perverseness, he said, in female minds, a tragedy-pride, that would make a romantick young creature, such a one as me, risk any-thing to obtain pity. I was of an age, and a turn [the insolent said] to be fond of a lover-like distress: and my grief (which she pleaded) would never break my heart; I should sooner break that of the best and most indulgent of mothers. He added, that she might once more go up to me; but that, if she prevailed not, he should suspect, that the man they all hated had found a way to attach her to his interest.

Every-body blamed him for this unworthy reflection, which greatly affected the good woman. But, nevertheless, he said, and nobody contradicted him, that if she could not prevail upon her sweet child, [as it seems she had fondly called me] she had best withdraw to her own home, and there tarry till she was sent for; and so leave her sweet child to her father's management.

Sure nobody ever had so insolent, so hard-hearted a brother, as I have! So much resignation to be expected from me! So much arrogance, and to so good a woman, and of so fine an understanding, to be allowed in him!

She nevertheless told him, that however she might be ridiculed for speaking of the sweetness of my disposition, she must take upon her to say, that there never was a sweeter in the sex: and that she had ever found, that by mild methods, and gentleness, I might at any time be prevailed upon, even in points against my own judgment and opinion.

My aunt Hervey hereupon said, It was worth while to consider what Mrs. Norton said: and that she had sometimes allowed herself to doubt, whether I had been begun with by such methods as generous tempers are only to be influenced by, in cases where their hearts are supposed to be opposite to the will of their friends.

She had both my brother and sister upon her for this: who referred to my mother, whether she had not treated me with an indulgence that had hardly any example?

My mother said, she must own, that no indulgence had been wanting from her; but she must needs say, and had often said it, that the reception I met with on my return from Miss Howe, and the manner in which the proposal of Mr. Solmes was made to me, (which was such as left nothing to my choice) and before I had had an opportunity to converse with him, were not what she had by any means approved of.

She was silenced, you will guess by whom—with 'My dear!—my dear!—'You have ever something to say, some-'thing to palliate, for this rebel of a 'girl!—Remember her treatment of 'you, of me!—Remember, that the 'wretch, whom we so justly hate, would 'not dare to persist in his purposes, but 'for her encouragement of him, and ob-'stinacy to us.—Mrs. Norton,' [angrily to her] 'go up to her once more—And 'if you think gentleness will do, you 'have a commission to be gentle.—If it 'will not, never make use of that plea 'again.'

'Aye, my good woman,' said my mother, 'try your force with her. My sister 'Hervey and I will go up to her, and 'bring her down in our hands, to re-'ceive her father's blessing, and assur-'ances of every-body's love, if she will 'be prevailed upon: and, in that case, 'we will all love you the better for your 'good offices.'

She came up to me and repeated all these passages with tears: but I told her, that after what had passed between us, she could not hope to prevail upon me to comply with measures so wholly my brother's; and so much to my aversion.—And then folding me to her maternal bosom, 'I leave you, my dearest Miss,' said she—'I leave you, because I must!—But 'let me beseech you to do nothing rash-'ly; nothing unbecoming your charac-'ter. If all be true that is said, Mr. 'Lovelace cannot deserve you. If you 'can comply, remember it is your duty 'to comply. They take not, I own, the 'right method with so generous a spirit. 'But remember, that there would not

'be any merit in your compliance, if it 'were not to be againſt your own liking. 'Remember alſo, what is expected from 'a character ſo extraordinary as yours: 'remember, it is in your power to unite 'or diſunite your whole family for ever. 'Although it ſhould at preſent be diſa-'greeable to you to be thus compelled, 'your prudence, I dare ſay, when you 'conſider the matter ſeriouſly, will en-'able you to get over all prejudices 'againſt the one, and all prepoſſeſ-'ſions in favour of the other: and then 'the obligation you will lay all your fa-'mily under, will be not only meritori-'ous in you, with regard to them, but in 'a few months very probably, highly ſa-'tisfactory, as well as reputable, to your-'ſelf.

'Conſider, my dear Mrs. Norton,' ſaid I, 'only conſider, that it is not a ſmall 'thing that is inſiſted upon; nor for a 'ſhort duration; it is for my life: con-'ſider too, that all this is owing to an 'over bearing brother, who governs e-'very-body. Conſider how deſirous I 'am to oblige them, if a ſingle life, and 'breaking all correſpondence with the 'man they hate becauſe my brother 'hates him, will do it.'

'I conſider every thing, my deareſt 'Miſs: and, added to what I have ſaid, 'do you only conſider, that if by purſu-'ing your own will, and rejecting theirs, 'you ſhould be unhappy, you will be de-'prived of all that conſolation which 'thoſe have, who have been directed by 'their parents, although the event prove 'not anſwerable to their wiſhes.

'I muſt go,' repeated ſhe—'your bro-'ther will ſay' [and ſhe wept] 'that I 'harden you by my whining nonſenſe. It 'is indeed hard, that ſo much regard 'ſhould be paid to the humours of one 'child; and ſo little to the inclination of 'another. But let me repeat, that it is 'your duty to acquieſce. if you can ac-'quieſce: your father has given your 'brother's ſchemes his ſanction; and 'they are now his. Mr. Lovelace, I 'doubt, is not a man that will juſtify 'your choice ſo much as he will their diſ-'like. It is eaſy to ſee that your bro-'ther has a view in diſcrediting you with 'all your friends, with your uncles in 'particular: but for that very reaſon, 'you ſhould comply, if poſſible, in order 'to diſconcert his ungenerous meaſures. 'I will pray for you; and that is all I 'can do for you. I muſt now go down, 'and make a report, that you are re-'ſolved never to have Mr. Solmes—'Muſt I?—Conſider, my dear Miſs 'Clary—Muſt I?'

'Indeed you muſt!—But of this I do 'aſſure you, that I will do nothing to 'diſgrace the part you have had in my 'education. I will bear every-thing 'that ſhall be ſhort of forcing my hand 'into his who never can have any ſhare 'in my heart. I will try by patient du-'ty, by humility, to overcome them. 'But death will I chuſe, in any ſhape, 'rather than that man.'

'I dread to godown,' ſaid ſhe, 'with 'ſo determined an anſwer: they will 'have no patience with me.—But let me 'leave you with one obſervation, which 'I beg you always to bear in mind.

'That perſons of prudence, and diſ-'tinguiſhed talents, like yours, ſeem to 'be ſprinkled through the world, to give 'credit, by their example, to religion and 'virtue. When ſuch perſons wilfully 'err, how great muſt be the fault! How 'ungrateful to that God, who bleſſed 'them with ſuch talents! What a loſs 'likewiſe to the world! What a wound 'to virtue!—But this, I hope, will ne-'ver be to be ſaid of Miſs Clariſſa Har-'lowe!'

I could give her no anſwer, but by my tears. And I thought, when ſhe went away, the better half of my heart went with her.

I liſtened to hear what reception ſhe would meet with below; and found it was juſt ſuch a one as ſhe had appre-hended.

'Will ſhe, or will ſhe not, be Mrs. 'Solmes? None of your whining circum-'locutions, Mrs. Norton!' [You may 'gueſs who ſaid this] 'Will ſhe, or will 'ſhe not, comply with her parents will?'

This cut ſhort all ſhe was going to ſay.

'If I muſt ſpeak ſo briefly, Miſs will 'ſooner die, than have—'

'Any-body but Lovelace!' interrupt-ed my brother.—'This, Madam—this, 'Sir—is your meek daughter! this is Mrs. 'Norton's ſweet child!—Well, Goody, 'you may return to your own habitation. 'I am empowered to forbid you to have 'any correſpondence with this perverſe 'girl for a month to come, as you value 'the favour of our whole family, or of 'any individual of it.'

And ſaying this, uncontradicted by any-body, he himſelf ſhewed her to the door—No doubt, with all that air of cruel inſult, which the haughty rich can put on to the unhappy low, who have not pleaſed them.

So here, my dear Miſs Howe, am I deprived of the advice of one of the moſt prudent and conſcientious women in the world, were I to have ever ſo much occaſion for it. I might

I might indeed write (as I preſume, under your cover) and receive her anſwers to what I ſhould write. But ſhould ſuch a correſpondence be charged upon her, I know ſhe would not be guilty of a falſhood for the world; nor even of an equivocation: and ſhould ſhe own it after this prohibition, ſhe would forfeit my mother's favour for ever. And in my dangerous fever, ſome time ago, I engaged my mother to promiſe me, that, if I died before I could do any-thing for the good woman, ſhe would ſet her above want for the reſt of her life, ſhould her eyes fail her, or ſickneſs befall her, and ſhe could not provide for herſelf, as ſhe now ſo prettily does by her fine needle-works.

What meaſures will they fall upon next?—Will they not recede when they find that it muſt be a rooted antipathy, and nothing elſe, that could make a temper not naturally inflexible, ſo ſturdy?

Adieu, my dear. Be you happy!—To know that it is in your power to be ſo, is all that ſeems wanting to make you ſo.

CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XL.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

[IN CONTINUATION OF THE SUBJECT IN LETTER XXXVIII.]

I Will now, though midnight, (for I have no ſleep in my eyes) reſume the ſubject I was forced ſo abruptly to quit; and will obey yours, Miſs Lloyd's, Miſs Campion's, and Miſs Biddulph's call, with as much temper as my divided thoughts will admit. The dead ſtillneſs of this ſolemn hour will I hope contribute to calm my diſturbed mind.

In order to acquit myſelf of ſo heavy a charge as that of having reſerves to ſo dear a friend, I will acknowledge (and I thought I had over and over) that it is owing to my particular ſituation, if Mr. Lovelace appears to me in a tolerable light: and I take upon me to ſay, that had they oppoſed him to a man of ſenſe, of virtue, of generoſity; one who enjoyed his fortune with credit; who had a tenderneſs in his nature for the calamities of others, which would have given a moral aſſurance, that he would have been ſtill leſs wanting in grateful returns to an obliging ſpirit—had they oppoſed ſuch a man as this to Mr. Lovelace, and been as earneſt to have me married, as now they are, I do not know myſelf, if they would have had reaſon to tax me with that invincible obſtinacy which they lay to my charge. And this whatever had been the figure of the man; ſince the heart is what we women ſhould judge by in the choice we make, as the beſt ſecurity for the party's good behaviour in every relation of life.

But, ſituated as I am, thus perſecuted and driven; I own to you, that I have now-and-then had a little more difficulty than I wiſhed for, in paſſing by Mr. Lovelace's tolerable qualities, to keep up my diſlike to him for his others.

You ſay, I muſt have argued with myſelf in his favour, and in his diſfavour, on a ſuppoſition, that I might poſſibly be one day his. I own that I have: and thus called upon by my deareſt friend, I will ſet before you both parts of the argument.

And firſt, what occurred to me in his favour.

At his introduction into our family, his negative virtues were inſiſted upon:—he was no gameſter; no horſe-racer; no fox-hunter; no drinker. My poor aunt Hervey had, in confidence, given us to apprehend much diſagreeable evil (eſpecially to a wife of the leaſt delicacy) from a wine lover: and common ſenſe inſtructed us, that ſobriety in a man is no ſmall point to be ſecured, when ſo many miſchiefs happen daily from exceſs. I remember, that my ſiſter made the moſt of this favourable circumſtance in his character while ſhe had any hopes of him.

He was never thought to be a niggard; not even ungenerous: nor when his conduct came to be enquired into, an extravagant, a ſquanderer; his pride [So far was it a laudable pride] ſecured him from that. Then he was ever ready to own his errors. He was no jeſter upon ſacred things: poor Mr. Wyerley's fault; who ſeemed to think, that there was wit in ſaying bold things, which would ſhock a ſerious mind. His converſation with us was always unexceptionable; even chaſtely ſo; which, be his actions what they would, ſhewed him capable of being influenced by decent company; and that he might probably therefore be a led man, rather than a leader, in other company. And one late inſtance, ſo late as laſt Saturday evening, has raiſed him not a little in my opinion, with regard to this point of good (and at the ſame time, of manly) behaviour.

As to the advantage of birth, that is of his ſide, above any man who has been found out for me. If we may judge by that expreſſion of his, which you were pleaſed with at the time; That upon true quality, and hereditary diſtinction, if good ſenſe were not wanting, honour ſat as eaſy as his glove; That, with as familiar an air, was his familiar expreſſion; while none but the proſperous upſtart, MUSHROOMED into rank (another of his peculiars) was arrogantly proud of it.—If, I ſay, we may judge of him by this, we ſhall conclude in his favour, that he knows what ſort of behaviour is to be expected from perſons of birth, whether he act up to it or not. Conviction is half way to amendment.

His fortunes in poſſeſſion are handſome; in expectation, ſplendid: ſo nothing need be ſaid on that ſubject.

But it is impoſſible, ſay ſome, that he ſhould make a tender or kind huſband. Thoſe who are for impoſing upon me ſuch a man as Mr. Solmes, and by methods ſo violent, are not intitled to make this objection. But now, on this ſubject, let me tell you how I have argued with myſelf—For ſtill you muſt remember, that I am upon the extenuating part of his character.

A great deal of the treatment a wife may expect from him, will poſſibly depend upon herſelf. Perhaps ſhe muſt practiſe as well as promiſe obedience, to a man ſo little uſed to controul; and muſt be careful to oblige. And what huſband expects not this?—The more perhaps if he had not reaſon to aſſure himſelf of the preferable love of his wife before ſhe became ſuch. And how much eaſier and pleaſanter to obey the man of her choice, if he ſhould be even unreaſonable ſometimes, than one ſhe would not have had, could ſhe have avoided it? Then, I think, as the men were the framers of the matrimonial office, and made obedience a part of the woman's vow, ſhe ought not, even in policy, to ſhew him, that ſhe can break through her part of the contract, (however lightly ſhe may think of the inſtance) leſt he ſhould take it into his head (himſelf is judge) to think as lightly of other points, which ſhe may hold more important—But indeed no point ſo ſolemnly vowed can be ſlight.

Thus principled, and acting accordingly, what a wretch muſt that huſband be, who could treat ſuch a wife brutally!—Will Lovelace's wife be the only perſon to whom he will not pay the grateful debt of civility and good-manners? He is allowed to be brave: who ever knew a brave man, if a man of ſenſe, an univerſally baſe man? And how much the gentleneſs of our ſex, and the manner of our training up and education, make us need the protection of the brave, and the countenance of the generous, let the general approbation which we are all ſo naturally inclined to give to men of that character, teſtify.

At worſt, will he confine me priſoner to my chamber? Will he deny me the viſits of my deareſt friend, and forbid me to correſpond with her? Will he take from me the miſtreſſly management, which I had not faultily diſcharged? Will he ſet a ſervant over me, with licence to inſult me? Will he, as he has not a ſiſter, permit his couſins Montague, or would either of thoſe ladies accept of a permiſſion, to inſult and tyrannize over me?—It cannot be.—'Why then,' think I often, 'do you 'tempt me, O my cruel friends, to try 'the difference?'

And then has the ſecret pleaſure intruded itſelf, to be able to reclaim ſuch a man to the paths of virtue and honour: to be a ſecondary means, if I were to be his, of ſaving him, and preventing the miſchiefs ſo enterprizing a creature might otherwiſe be guilty of, if he be ſuch a one.

When I have thought of him in theſe lights, (and that as a man of ſenſe he will ſooner ſee his errors, than another) I own to you that I have had ſome difficulty to avoid taking the path they ſo violently endeavour to make me ſhun: and all that command of my paſſions which has been attributed to me as my greateſt praiſe, and, in ſo young a creature, as my diſtinction, has hardly been ſufficient for me.

And let me add, that the favour of his relations (all but himſelf unexceptionable) has made a good deal of additional weight thrown into the ſame ſcale.

But now, in his diſfavour. When I have reflected upon the prohibition of my parents; the giddy appearance, diſgraceful to our ſex, that ſuch a preference would have; that there is no manner of likelihood, enflamed by the rencounter, and upheld by art and ambition on my brother's ſide, that ever the animoſity will be got over; that I muſt therefore be at perpetual variance with all my own family; that I muſt go to him, and to his, as an obliged and half-fortuned perſon; that his averſion to them all is as ſtrong as theirs to him; that his whole family are hated for his ſake; they hating ours in return: that he has a very immoral character as to women; women; that knowing this, it is a high degree of impurity to think of joining in wedlock with such a man; that he is young, unbroken, his passions unsubdued; that he is violent in his temper, yet artful; I am afraid vindictive too; that such an husband might unsettle me in all my own principles, and hazard my future hopes; that his own relations, two excellent aunts, and an uncle, from whom he has such large expectations, have no influence upon him; that what tolerable qualities he has, are founded more in pride than in virtue: that allowing, as he does, the excellency of moral precepts, and believing the doctrine of future rewards and punishments, he can live as if he despised the one, and defied the other; the probability that the taint arising from such free principles, may go down into the manners of posterity; that I knowing these things, and the importance of them, should be more inexcusable than one who knows them not, since an error against judgment is worse, infinitely worse, than an error in judgment.—Reflecting upon these things, I cannot help conjuring you, my dear, to pray with me, and to pray for me, that I may not be pushed upon such indiscreet measures, as will render me inexcusable to myself: for that is the test, after all. The world's opinion ought to be but a secondary consideration.

I have said in his praise, that he is extremely ready to own his errors: but I have sometimes made a great drawback upon this article, in his disfavour; having been ready to apprehend, that this ingenuousness may possibly be attributable to two causes, neither of them, by any means, creditable to him. The one, that his vices are so much his masters, that he attempts not to conquer them; the other, that he may think it policy, to give up one half of his character, to save the other, when the whole may be blameable: by this means, silencing by acknowledgment the objections he cannot answer; which may give him the praise of ingenuousness, when he can obtain no other; and when the challenged proof might bring out, upon discussion, other evils. These, you will allow, are severe constructions; but every-thing his enemies say of him cannot be false.

I will proceed by-and-by.

SOMETIMES we have both thought him one of the most undesigning merely witty men we ever knew; at other times one of the deepest creatures we ever conversed with. So that when in one visit we have imagined we fathomed him, in the next he has made us ready to give him up as impenetrable. This impenetrableness, my dear, is to be put among the shades in his character.—Yet, upon the whole, you have been so far of his party, that you have contested, that his principal fault is overfrankness, and too much regardlessness of appearances, and that he is too giddy to be very artful: you would have it, that at the time he says any thing good, he means what he speaks; that his variableness and levity are constitutional, owing to sound health, and to a soul and body [that was your observation] fitted for and pleased with each other. And hence you concluded, that could this consentaneousness [as you call it] of corporal and animal faculties be pointed by discretion; that is to say, could his vivacity be confined within the pale of but moral obligations; he would be far from rejectible as a companion for life.

But I used then to say, and I still am of opinion, that he wants a heart: and if he does, he wants every-thing. A wrong head may be convinced, may have a right turn given it: but who is able to give a heart, if a heart be wanting? Divine Grace, working a miracle, or next to a miracle, can only change a bad heart. Should not one fly the man who is but suspected of such a one? What, O what, do parents do, when they endeavour to force a child's inclination, but make her think better than otherwise she would think of a man obnoxious to themselves, and perhaps whose character will not stand examination?

I have said, that I think Mr. Lovelace a vindictive man: upon my word, I have sometimes doubted, whether his perseverance in his addresses to me has not been the more obstinate, since he has found himself so disagreeable to my friends. From that time I verily think he has been the more fervent in them; yet courts them not, but sets them at defiance. For this indeed he pleads disinterestedness; [I am sure he cannot politeness] and the more plausibly, as he is apprized of the ability they have to make it worth his while to court them. It is true he has declared, and with too much reason, (or there would be no bearing him) that the lowest submissions on his part would not be accepted; and to oblige me, has offered to seek a reconciliation with them, if I would give him hope of success.

As to his behaviour at church, the Sunday before laſt, I lay no ſtreſs upon that, becauſe I doubt there was too much outward pride in his intentional humility, or Shorey, who is not his enemy, could not have miſtaken it.

I do not think him ſo deeply learned in human nature, or in ethicks, as ſome have thought him. Don't you remember how he ſtared at the following trite obſervations, which every moraliſt could have furniſhed him with? Complaining as he did, in a half-menacing ſtrain, of the obloquies raiſed againſt him—That if he were innocent, he ſhould deſpiſe the obloquy: if not, revenge would not wipe off his guilt.—That nobody ever thought of turning a ſword into a ſponge!—That it was in his own power by reformation of an error laid to his charge by an enemy, to make that enemy one of his beſt friends; and (which was the nobleſt revenge in the world) againſt his will; ſince an enemy would not wiſh him to be without the faults he taxed him with.

But the intention, he ſaid, was the wound.

How ſo, I aſked him, when that cannot wound without the application? That the adverſary only held the ſword: he himſelf pointed it to his breaſt—And why ſhould he mortally reſent that malice, which he might be the better for as long as he lived?—What could be the reading he has been ſaid to be maſter of, to wonder, as he did, at theſe obſervations?

But, indeed, he muſt take pleaſure in revenge; and yet holds others to be inexcuſable for the ſame fault. He is not, however, the only one who can ſee how truly blameable thoſe errors are in another, which they hardly think ſuch in themſelves.

From theſe conſiderations; from theſe over-balances; it was, that I ſaid, in a former, that I would not be in love with this man for the world: and it was going further than prudence would warrant, when I was for compounding with you, by the words conditional liking; which you ſo humorouſly rally.

Well, but, methinks you ſay, what is all this to the purpoſe? This is ſtill but reaſoning; but, if you are in love, you are; and love, like the vapours, is the deeper rooted for having no ſufficient cauſe aſſignable for it's hold. And ſo you call upon me again, to have no reſerves, and ſo-forth.

Why then, my dear, if you will have it, I think, that, with all his preponderating faults, I like him better than I ever thought I ſhould like him; and, thoſe faults conſidered, better perhaps than I ought to like him. And I believe, it is poſſible for the perſecution I labour under, to induce me to like him ſtill more—Eſpecially while I can recollect to his advantage our laſt interview, and as every day produces ſtronger inſtances of tyranny, I will call it, on the other ſide.—In a word, I will frankly own, (ſince you cannot think any thing I ſay too explicit) that were he now but a moral man, I would prefer him to all the men I ever ſaw.

So that this is but conditional liking ſtill, you'll ſay.—Nor, I hope, is it more. I never was in love, as it is called; and whether this be it, or not, I muſt ſubmit to you. But will venture to think it, if it be, no ſuch mighty monarch, no ſuch unconquerable power, as I have heard it repreſented; and it muſt have met with greater encouragement than I think I have given it, to be abſolutely unconquerable—Since I am perſuaded, that I could yet, without a throb, moſt willingly give up the one man to get rid of the other.

But now to be a little more ſerious with you: if, my dear, my particularly unhappy ſituation had driven (or led, if you pleaſe) me into a liking of the man; and if that liking had, in your opinion, inclined me to love him; ſhould you, whoſe mind is ſuſceptible of the moſt friendly impreſſions; who have ſuch high notions of the delicacy which ought to be obſerved by our ſex in theſe matters; and who actually do enter ſo deeply into the diſtreſſes of one you love—ſhould you have puſhed ſo far that unhappy friend on ſo very nice a ſubject?—Eſpecially, when I aimed not (as you could prove by fifty inſtances, it ſeems) to guard againſt being found out. Had you rallied me by word of mouth in the manner you do, it might have been more in character; eſpecially, if your friend's diſtreſſes had been ſurmounted; and if ſhe had affected prudiſh airs in revolving the ſubject: but to ſit down to write it, as methinks I ſee you, with a gladdened eye, and with all the archneſs of exultation—Indeed, my dear, (and I take notice of it, rather for the ſake of your own generoſity, than for my ſake; for, as I have ſaid, I love your raillery) it is not ſo very pretty; the delicacy of the ſubject, and the delicacy of your own mind, conſidered.

I lay down my pen here, that you may conſider of it a little, if you pleaſe.

I RESUME, to give you my opinion of the force which figure or perſon ought to have upon our ſex: and this I ſhall do both generally as to the other ſex, and particularly as to this man; whence you will be able to recollect how far my friends are in the right, or in the wrong, when they attribute a good deal of prejudice in favour of one man, and in diſfavour of the other, on the ſcore of figure. But, firſt, let me obſerve, That they ſee abundant reaſon, on comparing Mr. Lovelace and Mr. Solmes together, to believe that this may be a conſideration with me; and therefore they believe it is.

There is certainly ſomething very plauſible and attractive, as well as creditable to a woman's choice in figure. It gives a favourable impreſſion at firſt ſight, in which we wiſh to be confirmed: and if, upon further acquaintance, we find reaſon ſo to be, we are pleaſed with our judgment, and like the perſon the better, for having given us cauſe to compliment our own ſagacity, in our firſt-ſighted impreſſions. But, nevertheleſs, it has been generally a rule with me, to ſuſpect a fine figure, both in man and woman; and I have had a good deal of reaſon to approve my rule—With regard to men eſpecially; who ought to value themſelves rather upon their intellectual than perſonal qualities. For, as to our ſex, if a fine woman ſhould be led by the opinion of the world, to be vain and conceited upon her form and features; and that to ſuch a degree, as to have neglected the more material and more durable recommendations; the world will be ready to excuſe her; ſince a pretty fool, in all ſhe ſays, and in all ſhe does, will pleaſe, we know not why.

But who would grudge this pretty fool her ſhort day! Since, with her ſummer's ſun, when her butterfly flutters are over, and the winter of age and furrows arrives, ſhe will feel the juſt effects of having neglected to cultivate her better faculties: for then, like another Helen, ſhe will be unable to bear the reflexion even of her own glaſs; and being ſunk into the inſignificance of a mere old woman, ſhe will be entitled to the contempts which follow that character. While the diſcreet matron, who carries up [we will not, in ſuch a one's caſe, ſay down] into advanced life, the ever-amiable character of virtuous prudence, and uſeful experience, finds ſolid veneration take place of airy admiration, and more than ſupply the want of it.

But for a man to be vain of his perſon, how effeminate! If ſuch a one happens to have genius, it ſeldom ſtrikes deep into intellectual ſubjects. His outſide uſually runs away with him. To adorn, and, perhaps, intending to adorn, to render ridiculous, that perſon, takes up all his attention. All he does is perſonal; that is to ſay, for himſelf, all he admires, is himſelf: and in ſpite of the correction of the ſtage, which ſo often and ſo juſtly expoſes a coxcomb, he uſually dwindles down, and ſinks into that character; and, of conſequence, becomes the ſcorn of one ſex, and the jeſt of the other.

This is generally the caſe of your fine figures of men, and of thoſe who value themſelves on dreſs and outward appearance: whence it is, that I repeat, that mere perſon in a man is a deſpicable conſideration. But if a man, beſides figure, has learning, and ſuch talents, as would have diſtinguiſhed him, whatever were his form; then indeed perſon is an addition: and if he has not run too egregiouſly into ſelf-admiration, and if he has preſerved his morals, he is truly a valuable being.

Mr. Lovelace has certainly taſte; and, as far as I am able to determine, he has judgment in moſt of the politer arts. But although he has a humorous way of carrying it off, yet one may ſee, that he values himſelf not a little, both on his perſon and his parts, and even upon his dreſs; and yet he has ſo happy an eaſe in the latter, that it ſeems to be the leaſt part of his ſtudy. And as to the former, I ſhould hold myſelf inexcuſable, if I were to add to his vanity by ſhewing the leaſt regard for what is too evidently ſo much his.

And now, my dear, let me aſk you; Have I come up to your expectation? If I have not, when my mind is more at eaſe, I will endeavour to pleaſe you better. For, methinks, my ſentences drag; my ſtile creeps; my imagination is ſunk; my ſpirits ſerve me not; only to tell you, That whether I have more or leſs, I am wholly devoted to the commands of my dear Miſs Howe.

P. S. The inſolent Betty Barnes has juſt now fired me anew, by reporting to me the following expreſſions of the hideous creature, Solmes—That he is ſure of the coy girl; and that with little labour to himſelf. That be I ever ſo averſe to him beforehand, he can depend upon my principles; and it would be a pleaſure to him to ſee by what pretty degrees I ſhall come to. [Horrid wretch!] That it was Sir Oliver's obſervation, who knew the world perfectly well, that fear was a better ter ſecurity than love, for a woman's good behaviour to her huſband; although, for his part, to ſuch a fine creature [truly] he would try what love would do; for a few weeks at leaſt: being unwilling to believe what the old knight uſed to aver, That fondneſs ſpoils more wives than it makes good.

What think you, my dear, of ſuch a wretch as this! tutored, too, by that old ſurly miſogyniſt, as he was deemed, Sir Oliver?

LETTER XLI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

TUESDAY, MARCH 21.

HOW willingly would my dear mother ſhew kindneſs to me, were ſhe permitted! None of this perſecution ſhould I labour under, I am ſure, if that regard were paid to her prudence and fine underſtanding, which they ſo well deſerve. Whether owing to her, or to my aunt, or to both, that a new trial was to be made upon me, I cannot tell; but this morning her Shorey delivered into my hand the following condeſcending letter.

MY DEAR GIRL,

'FOR ſo I muſt ſtill call you; ſince 'dear you may be to me, in every ſenſe 'of the word—We have taken into par-'ticular conſideration, ſome hints that 'fell yeſterday from your good Norton, 'as if we had not, at Mr. Solmes's firſt 'application, treated you with that con-'deſcenſion, wherewith we have in all 'other inſtances treated you. If it even 'had been ſo, my dear, you were not ex-'cuſeable to be wanting in your part, and 'to ſet yourſelf to oppoſe your father's 'will in a point into which he had 'entered too far, to recede with honour. 'But all yet may be well. On your ſingle 'will, my child, depends all our happineſs.

'Your father permits me to tell you, 'that if you now at laſt comply with his 'expectations, all paſt diſobligations 'ſhall be buried in oblivion, as if they 'had never been: but withal, that this 'is the laſt time that that grace will be 'offered you.

'I hinted to you, you muſt remember, that patterns of the richeſt ſilks 'were ſent for. They are come. And 'as they are come, your father, to ſhew 'how much he is determined, will have 'me ſend them up to you. I could 'have wiſhed they might not have 'accompanied this letter—But there is 'no great matter in that. I muſt tell 'you, that your delicacy is not to be 'quite ſo much regarded, as I had once 'thought it deſerved to be.

'Theſe are the neweſt, as well as richeſt, that we could procure; anſwerable 'to our ſtation in the world; anſwerable 'to the fortune, additional to your grandfather's eſtate, deſigned you; and to 'the noble ſettlements agreed upon.

'Your father intends you ſix ſuits '(three of them dreſſed ſuits) at his own 'expence. You have an entire new ſuit; 'and one beſides, which I think you 'never wore but twice. As the new ſuit 'is rich, if you chuſe to make that one 'of the ſix, your father will preſent you 'with an hundred guineas in lieu.

'Mr. Solmes intends to preſent you 'with a ſet of jewels. As you have your 'grandmother's and your own, if you 'chuſe to have the former new ſet, and 'to make them ſerve, his preſent will be 'made in money; a very round ſum—'which will be given in full property to 'yourſelf; beſides a fine annual allowance for pin-money, as it is called. 'So that your objection againſt the ſpirit 'of a man you think worſe of than it deſerves, will have no weight; but you 'will be more independent than a wife 'of leſs diſcretion than we attribute to 'you, perhaps ought to be. You know 'full well, that I, who firſt and laſt 'brought a ſtill larger fortune into the 'family than you will carry to Mr. 'Solmes, had not a proviſion made me 'of near this that we have made for you. '—Where people marry to their liking, 'terms are the leaſt things ſtood upon—'Yet ſhould I be ſorry if you cannot (to 'oblige us all) overcome a diſlike.

'Wonder not, Clary, that I write to 'you thus plainly and freely upon this 'ſubject. Your behaviour hitherto has 'been ſuch, that we have had no opportunity of entering minutely into the 'ſubject with you. Yet, after all that 'has paſſed between you and me in converſation, and between you and your 'uncles by letter, you have no room to 'doubt what is to be the conſequence. '—Either, child, we muſt give up our 'authority, or you your humour. You 'cannot expect the one. We have all 'the reaſon in the world to expect the 'other. You know I have told you more 'than once, that you muſt reſolve to have 'Mr. Solmes, or never to be looked 'upon as our child.

'The draught of the ſettlements you 'may ſee whenever you will. We think 'there can be no room for objection to 'any of the articles. There is ſtill more

'in them in our family's favour, than 'was ſtipulated at firſt, when your aunt 'talked of them to you. More ſo, in-'deed, than we could have aſked. If, 'upon peruſal of them, you think any 'alteration neceſſary, it ſhall be made. 'Do, my dear girl, ſend to me within 'this day or two, or rather aſk me, for 'the peruſal of them.

'As a certain perſon's appearance at 'church ſo lately, and what he gives out 'every where, make us extremely un-'eaſy, and as that uneaſineſs will con-'tinue while you are ſingle, you muſt 'not wonder that a ſhort day is intended. 'This day-fortnight we deſign it to be, 'if you have no objection to make that 'I ſhall approve of. But if you deter-'mine as we would have you, and ſignify 'it to us, we ſhall not ſtand with you for 'a week or ſo.

'Your ſightlineſs of perſon may per-'haps make ſome think this alliance diſ-'paraging. But I hope you will not put 'ſuch a perſonal value upon yourſelf: if 'you do, it will indeed be the leſs won-'der that perſon ſhould weigh with you '(however weak the conſideration!) in 'another man.

'Thus we parents, in juſtice, ought 'to judge: that our two daughters are 'equally dear and valuable to us; if ſo, 'why ſhould Clariſſa think that a diſpa-'ragement, which Arabella would not '(nor we for her) have thought any, had 'the addreſs been made to her?—You 'will know what I mean by this, with-'out my explaining myſelf farther.

'Signify to us, now, therefore, your 'compliance with our wiſhes. And 'then there is an end of your confine-'ment. An act of oblivion, as I may 'call it, ſhall paſs upon all your former 'refractorineſs: and you will once more 'make us happy in you, and in one ano-'ther. You may, in this caſe, directly 'come down to your father and me, in 'his ſtudy; where we will give you our 'opinions of the patterns, with our 'hearty forgiveneſs and bleſſings.

'Come, be a good child, as you uſed 'to be, my Clariſſa. I have (notwith-'ſtanding your paſt behaviour, and the 'hopeleſſneſs which ſome have expreſſed 'in your compliance) undertaken this 'one time more for you. Diſcredit not 'my hopes, my dear girl. I have pro-'miſed never more to interfere between 'your father and you, if this my moſt 'earneſt application ſucceed not. I ex-'pect you down, love. Your father ex-'pects you down. But be ſure don't let 'him ſee any thing uncheerful in your 'compliance. If you come, I will claſp 'you to my fond heart, with as much 'pleaſure as ever I preſſed you to it in 'my whole life. You don't know what 'I have ſuffered within theſe few weeks 'paſt; nor ever will be able to gueſs, 'till you come to be in my ſituation; 'which is that of a fond and indulgent 'mother, praying night and day, and 'ſtruggling to preſerve, againſt the at-'tempts of more ungovernable ſpirits, 'the peace and union of her family.

'But you know the terms. Come 'not near us, if you reſolve to be undu-'tiful: but this, after what I have writ-'ten, I hope you cannot be.

'If you come directly, and, as I ſaid, 'cheerfully, as if your heart were in your 'duty, (and you told me it was free, you 'know) I ſhall then, as I ſaid, give you 'the moſt tender proofs, how much I am 'your truly affectionate mother.'

Think for me, my deareſt friend, how I muſt be affected by this letter; the contents of it are ſo ſurprizingly terrifying, yet ſo ſweetly urged!—'O 'why,' cried I to myſelf, 'am I obliged 'to undergo this ſevere conflict between 'a command that I cannot obey, and 'language ſo condeſcendingly moving! '—Could I have been ſure of being 'ſtruck dead at the altar before the ce-'remony had given the man I hate a title 'to my vows, I think I could have ſub-'mitted to have been led to it. But to 'think of living with and living for a 'man one abhors, what a ſad thing is 'that?'

And then, how could the glare of habit and ornament be ſuppoſed an inducement to one, who has always held, that the principal view of a good wife in the adorning of her perſon, ought to be, to preſerve the affection of her huſband, and to do credit to his choice; and that ſhe ſhould be even fearful of attracting the eyes of others?—In this view, muſt not the very richneſs of the patterns add to my diſguſts?—Great encouragement, indeed, to think of adorning one's ſelf to be the wife of Mr. Solmes!

Upon the whole, it was not poſſible for me to go down upon the preſcribed condition. Do you think it was?—And to write, if my letter would have been read, what could I write that would be admitted, and after what I had written and ſaid to ſo little effect?

I walked backward and forward. I threw down with diſdain the patterns. Now to my cloſet retired I; then quitting it, threw myſelf upon the ſettee; then upon this chair, then upon that; then into one window, then into another—I knew not what to do!—And while I was in this ſuſpence, having again taken up the letter to re-peruſe it, Betty came in, and reminded me, by order, that my papa and mamma waited for me in my father's ſtudy.

'Tell my mamma,' ſaid I, 'that I 'beg the favour of ſeeing her here for 'one moment; or to permit me to at-'tend her any-where by herſelf.'

I liſtened at the ſtairs-head—'You 'ſee, my dear, how it is,' cried my father, very angrily: 'all your conde-'ſcenſion (as your indulgence hereto-'fore) is thrown away. You blame your 'ſon's violence, as you call it;' [I had ſome pleaſure in hearing this] 'but nothing elſe 'will do with her. You ſhall not ſee 'her alone. Is my preſence an excep-'tion to the bold creature?'

'Tell her,' ſaid my mother to Betty, 'ſhe knows upon what terms ſhe may 'come down to us. Nor will I ſee her 'upon any other.'

The maid brought me this anſwer. I had recourſe to my pen and ink; but I trembled ſo, that I could not write, nor knew I what to ſay, had I had ſteadier fingers. At laſt Betty brought me theſe lines from my father.

'UNDUTIFUL AND PERVERSE CLARISSA,

'NO condeſcenſion, I ſee, will move 'you. Your mother ſhall not ſee you; 'nor will I. Prepare, however, to 'obey. You know our pleaſure. Your 'uncle Antony, your brother, and your 'ſiſter, and your favourite Mrs. Norton, 'ſhall ſee the ceremony performed pri-'vately at your uncle's chapel. And 'when Mr. Solmes can introduce you 'to us, in the temper we wiſh to behold 'you in, we may perhaps forgive his 'wife, although we never can, in any 'other character, our perverſe daughter. 'As it will be ſo privately performed, 'cloaths and equipage may be provi-'ded afterwards. So prepare to go to 'your uncle's for an early day in next 'week. We will not ſee you till all is 'over: and we will have it over the 'ſooner, in order to ſhorten the time of 'your deſerved confinement, and our 'own trouble in contending with ſuch 'a rebel as you have been of late. I will 'hear no pleas. I will receive no letter, 'nor expoſtulation. Nor ſhall you hear 'from me any more till you have changed 'your name to my liking. This from

'Your incenſed father.'

If this reſolution be adhered to, then will my father never ſee me more!—For I will never be the wife of that Solmes!—I will die firſt!

TUESDAY EVENING.

HE, this Solmes, came hither ſoon after I had received my father's letter. He ſent up to beg leave to wait upon me—I wonder at his aſſurance!

I ſaid to Betty, who brought me this meſſage, 'Let him reſtore an unhappy 'creature to her father and mother, and 'then I may hear what he has to ſay. 'But if my friends will not ſee me on 'his account, I will not ſee him upon his 'own.'

'I hope, Miſs,' ſaid Betty, 'you will 'not ſend me down with this anſwer. 'He is with your papa and mamma.

'I am driven to deſpair,' ſaid I. 'I can-'not be uſed worſe. I will not ſee him.'

Down ſhe went with my anſwer. She pretended, it ſeems, to be loth to repeat it: ſo was commanded out of her affected reſerves, and gave it in it's full force.

O how I heard my father ſtorm!

They were all together, it ſeems, in his ſtudy. My brother was for having me turned out of the houſe that moment, to Lovelace, and my evil deſtiny. My mother was pleaſed to put in a gentle word for me; I know not what it was; but thus ſhe was anſwered—'My dear, 'this is the moſt provoking thing in the 'world in a woman of your good ſenſe! '—To love a rebel, as well as if ſhe were 'dutiful. What encouragement for du-'ty is this?—Have I not loved her as 'well as ever you did? And why am I 'changed? Would to the Lord, your 'ſex knew how to diſtinguiſh! It is 'plain, that ſhe relies upon her power 'over you. The fond mother ever 'made a hardened child!'

She was pleaſed, however, to blame Betty, as the wench owned, for giving my anſwer it's full force. But my father praiſed her for it.

The wench ſays, that he would have come up in his wrath, at my refuſing to ſee Mr. Solmes, had not my brother and ſiſter prevailed upon him to the contrary.

I wiſh he had!—And, were it not for his own ſake, that he had killed me!

Mr. Solmes condeſcended [I am mightily obliged to him, truly!] to plead for me.

They are all in tumults! How it will end, I know not—I am quite weary of my life—So happy, till within theſe few weeks!—So miſerable now!

Well, indeed, might my mother ſay, that I ſhould have ſevere trials.

P. S. The

P. S. The idiot [ſuch a one am I treated like!] is begged, as I may ſay, by my brother and ſiſter. They have deſired, that I may be conſigned over entirely to their management. If it be granted, [it is granted, on my father's part, I underſtand, but not yet on my mother's] what cruelty may I not expect from their envy, jealouſy, and ill-will!—I ſhall ſoon ſee, by it's effects, if I am to be ſo conſigned—This is a written intimation privately dropt in my woodhouſe-walk, by my couſin Dolly Hervey. The dear girl longs to ſee me, ſhe tells me: but is forbidden till ſhe ſee me as Mrs. Solmes, or as conſenting to be his. I will take example by their perſeverance!—Indeed I will!

LETTER XLII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

AN angry dialogue, a ſcolding-bout rather, has paſſed between my ſiſter and me. Did you think I could ſcold, my dear?

She was ſent up to me, upon my refuſal to ſee Mr. Solmes—Let looſe upon me, I think!—No intentton on their parts, to conciliate! It ſeems evident that I am given up to my brother and her, by general conſent.

I will do juſtice to every-thing ſhe ſaid againſt me, which carried any force with it. As I aſk for your approbation or diſapprobation of my conduct, upon the facts I lay before you, I ſhould think it the ſign of a very bad cauſe, if I endeavoured to miſlead my judge.

She began with repreſenting to me the danger I had been in, had my father come up, as he would have done had he not been hindered—by Mr. Solmes, among the reſt. She reflected upon my Norton, as if ſhe encouraged me in my perverſeneſs. She ridiculed me for my ſuppoſed eſteem for Mr. Lovelace.—'Was ſurprized that the witty, the prudent, nay, the dutiful and pi—ous [ſo ſhe ſneeringly pronounced the word] Clariſſa Harlowe, ſhould be ſo ſtrangely fond of a profligate man, that her parents were forced to lock her up, in order to hinder her from running into his arms. 'Let me aſk you, my dear,' ſaid ſhe, 'how you now keep your account of the 'diſpoſition of your time? How many 'hours in the twenty-four do you devote 'to your needle? How many to your 'prayers? How many to letter-writing? 'And how many to love?—I doubt, I 'doubt, my little dear,' was her arch expreſſion, 'the latter article is like 'Aaron's rod, and ſwallows up all the 'reſt!—Tell me; is it not ſo?'

To theſe I anſwered, that it was a double mortification to me to owe my ſafety from the effects of my father's indignation to a man I could never thank for any-thing. I vindicated the good Mrs. Norton with a warmth that was due to her merit.—With equal warmth I reſented her reflections upon me on Mr. Lovelace's account. As to the diſpoſition of my time in the twenty-four hours, I told her it would better have become her to pity a ſiſter in diſtreſs, than to exult over her—Eſpecially, when I could too juſtly attribute to the diſpoſition of ſome of her wakeful hours no ſmall part of that diſtreſs.

She raved extremely at this laſt hint: but reminded me of the gentle treatment of all my friends, my mother's in particular, before it came to this: ſhe ſaid, that I had diſcovered a ſpirit they never had expected; that, if they had thought me ſuch a championeſs, they would hardly have ventured to engage with me; but that now, the ſhort and the long was, that the matter had gone too far to be given up; that it was become a contention between duty and wilfulneſs; whether a parent's authority were to yield to a daughter's obſtinacy, or the contrary: that I muſt therefore bend or break; that was all, child.

I told her, that I wiſhed the ſubject were of ſuch a nature, that I could return her pleaſantry with equal lightneſs of heart: but that, if Mr. Solmes had ſuch merit in every-body's eyes, in hers particularly, why might he not be a brother to me, rather than a huſband?

'O child,' ſays ſhe, 'methinks you are 'as pleaſant to the full as I am: I be'gin to have ſome hopes of you now. 'But do you think I will rob my ſiſter 'of her humble ſervant? Had he firſt 'addreſſed himſelf to me,' proceeded ſhe, 'ſomething might have been ſaid: but to 'take my younger ſiſter's refuſal! No, 'no, child; it is not come to that nei'ther! Beſides, that would be to leave 'the door open in your heart for you 'know who, child; and we would fain 'bar him out, if poſſible. In ſhort,' [and then ſhe changed both her tone, and her looks] 'had I been as forward as ſome'body, to throw myſelf into the arms 'of one of the greateſt profligates in 'England, who had endeavoured to ſup'port his claim to me through the blood 'of my brother, then might all my fa-

'mily join together to save me from 'such a wretch, and to marry me as fast 'as they could, to some worthy man, 'who might opportunely offer himself. 'And now Clary, all's out, and make the 'most of it.'

Did not this deserve a severe return? Do say it did, to justify my reply.—'Alas! for my poor sister!' said I—'The 'man was not always so great a profli-'gate. How true is the observation, 'That unrequited love turns to deepest hate!'

I thought she would have beat me. But I proceeded—'I have heard often 'of my brother's danger, and my bro-'ther's murderer. When so little cere-'mony is made with me, why should I 'not speak out?—Did he not seek to kill 'the other, if he could have done it? 'Would my brother have given Love-'lace his life, had it been in his power? '—The aggressor should not complain.—'And, as to opportune offers, would to 'Heaven some one had offered oppor-'tunely to somebody! It is not my fault, 'Bella, the opportune gentleman don't 'come!'

Could you, my dear, have shewn more spirit? I expected to feel the weight of her hand. She did come up to me, with it held up: then, speechless with pas-sion, ran down half way of the stairs, and came up again.

When she could speak—'God give 'me patience with you!'

'Amen,' said I: 'but you see, Bella, 'how ill you bear the retort you pro-'voke. Will you forgive me; and let 'me find a sister in you, as I am sorry, if 'you have reason to think me unsisterly 'in what I have said?'

Then did she pour upon me, with greater violence; considering my gentleness as a triumph of temper over her. She was resolved, she said, to let every-body know how I took the wicked Lovelace's part against my brother.

I wished, I told her, I could make the plea for myself, which she might for her-self; to wit, That my anger was more inexcusable than my judgment. But I presumed she had some other view in coming to me, than she had hitherto ac-quainted me with. 'Let me,' said I, 'but know (after all that has passed) if 'you have any-thing to propose that I 'can comply with; any-thing that can 'make my only sister once more my 'friend?'

I had before, upon her ridiculing me on my supposed character of meekness, said, that although I wished to be thought meek, I would not be abject; although humble, not mean: and here, in a sneering way, she cautioned me on that head.

I replied, that her pleasantry was much more agreeable than her anger. But I wished she would let me know the end of a visit that had hitherto [between us] been so unsisterly.

She desired to be informed, in the name of every-body, was her word, what I was determined upon? And whether to comply or not?—One word for all: my friends were not to have patience with so perverse a creature for ever.

This then I told her I would do: ab-solutely break with the man they were all so determined against; upon condition, however, that neither Mr. Solmes, nor any other, were urged to me with the force of a command.

And what was this, more than I had offered before? What, but ringing my changes upon the same bells, and neither receding nor advancing one tittle?

If I knew what other proposals I could make, I told her, that would be accept-able to them all, and free me from the address of a man so disagreeable me, I would make them. I had indeed before offered, never to marry without my fa-ther's consent.

She interrupted me, That was because I depended upon my whining tricks to bring my father and mother to what I pleased.

'A poor dependence!' I said.—She knew those who would make that de-pendence vain—

And I should have brought them to my own beck, very probably, and my uncle Harlowe too, as also my aunt Hervey, had I not been forbidden their sight, and thereby hindered from play-ing my pug's tricks before them.

'At least, Bella,' said I, 'you have 'hinted to me to whom I am obliged, 'that my father and mother, and every 'body else, treat me thus harshly. But 'surely you make them all very weak. 'Indifferent persons, judging of us two 'from what you say, would either think 'me a very artful creature, or you a very 'spiteful one.'

'You are indeed a very artful one, for 'that matter,' interrupted she in a pas-'sion: 'one of the artfullest I ever 'knew!' And then followed an accusa-tion so low! so unsisterly!—That I half-bewitched people by my insinuating ad-dress: that nobody could be valued or respected, but must stand like cyphers wherever I came. 'How often,' said she. 'have I and my brother been talk-'ing upon a subject, and had every-bo-'dy's

'dy's attention, till you came in, with 'your bewitching meek pride, and humble 'significance? And then have we either 'been ſtopped by references to Miſs 'Clary's opinion, forſooth; or been 'forced to ſtop ourſelves, or muſt have 'talked on unattended to by every-'body.'

She pauſed: 'Dear Bella proceed.'

She indeed ſeemed only gathering breath.

'And ſo I will,' ſaid ſhe—'Did you 'not bewitch my grandfather? Could 'any-thing be pleaſing to him, that you 'did not ſay or do? How did he uſe to 'hang, till he ſlabbered again, poor 'doating old man! on your ſilver tongue! 'Yet what did you ſay, that we could not 'have ſaid? What did you do, that we 'did not endeavour to do?—And what 'was all this for? Why, truly, his laſt 'will ſhewed what effect your ſmooth o-'bligingneſs had upon him!—To leave 'the acquired part of his eſtate from the 'next heirs, his own ſons, to a grand-'child; to his youngeſt grandchild! a 'daughter too!—To leave his family-'pictures from his ſons to you, becauſe 'you could tiddle about them, and, 'though you now neglect their examples, 'could wipe and clean them with your 'dainty hands! The family-plate too, in 'ſuch quantities, of two or three gene-'rations ſtanding, muſt not be changed, 'becauſe his precious child, humouring 'his old fallal taſte, admired it, to make 'it all her own.'

This was too low to move me: 'O 'my poor ſiſter!' ſaid I; 'not to be able, 'or at leaſt willing, to diſtinguiſh be-tween 'art and nature! If I did oblige, I was 'happy in it: I looked for no further 'reward; my mind is above art, from 'the dirty motives you mention. I wiſh 'with all my heart my grandfather had 'not thus diſtinguiſhed me: he ſaw my 'brother likely to be amply provided 'for out of the family, as well as in it; 'he deſired that you might have the 'greater ſhare of my father's favour for 'it; and no doubt but you both will. 'You know, Bella, that the eſtate my 'grandfather bequeathed me was not half 'the real eſtate he left.'

'What's all that to an eſtate in poſ-'ſeſſion, and left you with ſuch diſtinc-'tions, as gave you a reputation of great-'er value than the eſtate itſelf?

'Hence my misfortune, Bella, in your 'envy, I doubt!—But have I not given 'up that poſſeſſion in the beſt manner I 'could?'

'Yes,' interrupting me, ſhe hated me for that beſt manner. Specious little witch! ſhe called me: 'Your beſt manner, ſo full 'of art and deſign, had never been ſeen 'through, if you, with your blandiſhing 'ways, had not been put out of ſight, 'and reduced to poſitive declarations! '—Hindered from playing your little 'whining tricks; curling, like a ſerpent, 'about your mamma; and making her 'cry to deny you any-thing your little 'obſtinate heart was ſet upon!'

'Obſtinate heart, Bella!'

'Yes, obſtinate heart! For did you 'ever give up any-thing? Had you not 'the art to make them think all was 'right you aſked, though my brother 'and I were frequently refuſed favours 'of no greater import?'

'I know not, Bella, that I ever aſked 'any-thing unfit to be granted. I ſel-'dom aſked favours for myſelf, but for 'others.'

I was a reflecting creature for this.

'All you ſpeak of, Bella, was a long 'time ago. I cannot go ſo far back into 'our childiſh follies. Little did I think 'of how long ſtanding this your late-ſhewn 'antipathy is.'

I was a reflecter again! Such a ſaucy meekneſs; ſuch a beſt manner; and ſuch venom in words!—'O Clary! Clary! 'Thou wert always a two-faced girl!'

'Nobody thought I had two faces 'when I gave up all into my father's ma-'nagement; taking from his bounty, as 'before, all my little pocket-money, 'without a ſhilling addition to my ſti-'pend, or deſiring it.'

'Yes, cunning creature!—And that 'was another of your fetches!—For did 'it not engage my fond father (as no 'doubt you thought it would) to tell 'you, that, ſince you had done ſo grate-'ful and dutiful a thing, he would keep 'entire, for your uſe, all the produce of 'the eſtate left you, and be but your ſtew-'ard in it; and that you ſhould be en-'titled to the ſame allowances as before? 'Another of your hook-in's, Clary!—So 'that all your extravagances have been 'ſupported gratis.'

'My extravagances, Bella!—But did 'my father ever give me any-thing he 'did not give you?'

'Yes, indeed; I got more by that 'means, than I ſhould have had the con-'ſcience to aſk. But I have ſtill the great-'er part to ſhew! But you! What have 'you to ſhew!—I dare ſay, not fifty 'pieces in the world!'

'Indeed I have not!'

'I believe you!—Your mamma Nor-'ton, I ſuppoſe—But mum for that!'

'Unworthy

'Unworthy Bella!—The good wo'man, although low in circumſtance, is 'great in mind! Much greater than
'thoſe who would impute meanneſs to a
'ſoul incapable of it.'

'What then have you done with the
'ſums given you from infancy to ſquan-
'der?—Let me aſk you,' [affecting archneſs] 'Has, has, has Lovelace, has your
'rake put it out at intereſt for you?'

'O that my ſiſter would not make me
'bluſh for her! It is, however, out at
'intereſt!—And I hope it will bring me
'intereſt upon intereſt!—Better than to 'lie uſeleſs in my cabinet.'

She underſtood me, ſhe ſaid. Were I a man, ſhe ſhould ſuppoſe I was aiming to carry the county—Popularity! A crowd to follow me with their bleſſings as I went to and from church, and nobody elſe to be regarded, were agreeable things. Houſe-top proclamations! I hid not my light under a buſhel, ſhe would ſay that for me. But was it not a little hard upon me, to be kept from blazing on a Sunday?—And to be hindered from my charitable oſtentations?

'This, indeed, Bella, is cruel in you,
'who have ſo largely contributed to my 'confinement.—But go on. You'll be 'out of breath by-and-by. I cannot
'wiſh to be able to return this uſage.—
'Poor Bella!' And I believe I ſmiled a little too contemptuouſly for a ſiſter to a ſiſter.

'None of your ſaucy contempts,' [riſing in her voice:] 'none of your poor
'Bella's with that air of ſuperiority in a 'younger ſiſter!'

'Well, then, rich Bella!' curtſeying—
'that will pleaſe you better—And it is 'due likewiſe to the hoards you boaſt of.'

'Look-ye, Clary,' holding up her hand, 'if you are not a little more ab- 'ject in your meekneſs, a little more mean
'in your humility, and treat me with the 'reſpect due to an elder ſiſter—you ſhall
'find—'

'Not that you will treat me worſe
'than you have done, Bella!—That can'not be; unleſs you were to let fall your
'uplifted hand upon me—And that 'would leſs become you to do, than me
'to bear.'

'Good, meek creature—But you were
'upon your overtures juſt now!—I ſhall
'ſurprize every-body by tarrying ſo
'long. They will think ſome good may 'be done with you—And ſupper will be 'ready.'

A tear would ſtray down my cheek—'How happy have I been,' ſaid I, ſighing, 'in the ſupper-time converſations,
'with all my dear friends in my eye
'round their hoſpitable board!'

I met only with inſult for this—Bella has not a feeling heart. The higheſt joy in this life ſhe is not capable of: but then ſhe ſaves herſelf many griefs, by her impenetrableneſs—Yet, for ten times the pain that ſuch a ſenſibility is attended with, would I not part with the pleaſure it brings with it.

She aſked me, upon my turning from her, If ſhe ſhould ſay any-thing below of my compliance?

'You may ſay, That I will do every'thing they would have me do, if they 'will free me from Mr. Solmes's addreſs.'

'This is all you deſire at preſent, creep-
'er on! inſinuator!' [What words ſhe has!] 'But will not t'other man flame
'out, and roar moſt horribly, upon the 'ſnatching from his paws a prey he 'thought himſelf ſure of?'

'I muſt let you talk in your own way,
'or we ſhall never come to a point. I
'ſhall not matter his roaring, as you call
'it. I will promiſe him, that, if I ever
'marry any other man, it ſhall not be till
'he is married. And if he be not ſatis-
'fied with ſuch a condeſcenſion, I ſhall
'think he ought: and I will give any aſ-
'ſurances, that I will neither correſpond
'with him, nor ſee him. Surely this 'will do.'

'But I ſuppoſe then you will have no
'objection to ſee and converſe, on a ci'vil foot, with Mr. Solmes—as your fa'ther's friend, or ſo?'

'No! I muſt be permitted to retire to 'my apartment whenever he comes. I 'would no more converſe with the one,
'than correſpond with the other. That 'would be to make Mr. Lovelace guil'ty of ſome raſhneſs, on a belief, that I
'broke with him, to have Mr. Solmes.'

'And ſo, that wicked wretch is to be 'allowed ſuch a controul over you, that 'you are not to be civil to your father's 'friends, at his own houſe, for fear of 'incenſing him!—When this comes to 'be repreſented, be ſo good as to tell
'me, what is it you expect from it?

Every-thing, I ſaid, or nothing, as ſhe was pleaſed to repreſent it.—'Be ſo
'good as to give it your intereſt, Bella,
'and ſay, further, that I will by any 'means I can, in the law or otherwiſe,
'make over to my father, to my uncles,
'or even to my brother, all I am en'titled to by my grandfather's will, as a
'ſecurity for the performance of my
'promiſes. And as I ſhall have no rea-
'ſon to expect any favour from my fa'ther, if I break them, I ſhall not be 'worth

'worth any-body's having. And further still, unkindly as my brother has 'used me, I will go down to Scotland 'privately, as his houſekeeper, [I now 'ſee I may be ſpared here] if he will pro-'miſe to treat me no worſe than he would 'do an hired one.—Or I will go to Flo-'rence, to my couſin Morden, if his ſtay 'in Italy will admit of it. In either caſe, 'it may be given out, that I am gone to 'the other; or to the world's end. I care 'not whither it is ſaid I am gone, or do 'go.'

'Let me aſk you, child, if you will 'give your pretty propoſal in writing?'

'Yes, with all my heart.' And I ſtepped to my cloſet, and wrote to the purpoſe I have mentioned; and, moreover, the following lines to my brother.

'MY DEAR BROTHER,

'I HOPE I have made ſuch propoſals 'to my ſiſter, as will be accepted. I am 'ſure they will, if you pleaſe to give 'them your ſanction. Let me beg of 'you for God's ſake, that you will. I 'think myſelf very unhappy in having 'incurred your diſpleaſure. No ſiſter can 'love a brother better than I love you. 'Pray do not put the worſt, but the beſt 'conſtructions upon my propoſals, when 'you have them reported to you. In-'deed I mean the beſt. I have no ſub-'terfuges, no arts, no intentions, but to 'keep to the letter of them. You ſhall 'yourſelf draw up every-thing into writ-'ing, as ſtrong as you can; and I will 'ſign it; and what the law will not do to 'enforce it, my reſolution and my will 'ſhall: ſo that I ſhall be worth nobody's 'addreſs, that has not my papa's con-'ſent; nor ſhall any perſon, nor any con-'ſideration, induce me to revoke it. You 'can do more than any-body to recon-'cile my parents and uncles to me. Let 'me owe this deſirable favour to your 'brotherly interpoſition, and you will for 'ever oblige your afflicted ſiſter,

'CL. HARLOWE.'

And how do you think Bella employed herſelf while I was writing?—Why, playing gently upon my harpſichord: and humming to it, to ſhew her unconcernedneſs.

When I approached her with what I had written, ſhe aroſe with an air of levity—'Why, love, you have not written 'already!—You have, I proteſt!—O 'what a ready penwoman!—And may I 'read it?'

'If you pleaſe. And let me beſeech 'you, my dear Bella, to back theſe pro-'poſals with your good offices: and,' [folding my uplifted hands; tears, I believe, ſtanding in my eyes] 'I will love 'you as never ſiſter loved another.'

'Thou art a ſtrange creature,' ſaid ſhe; 'there is no withſtanding thee.'

She took the propoſals and letter: and having read them, burſt into an affected laugh: 'How wiſe ones may be 'taken in!—Then you did not know, 'that I was jeſting with you all this 'time!—And ſo you would have me 'carry down this pretty piece of non-'ſenſe?'

'Don't let me be ſurprized at your 'ſeeming unſiſterlineſs, Bella. I hope 'it is but ſeeming. There can be no wit 'in ſuch a jeſting as this.'

'The folly of the creature!—How 'natural is it for people, when they ſet 'their hearts upon any-thing, to think 'every-body muſt ſee with their eyes! '—Pray, dear child, what becomes of 'your father's authority here?—Who 'ſtoops here, the parent, or the child?—'How does this ſquare with the engage-'ments actually agreed upon between 'your father and Mr. Solmes? What 'ſecurity, that your rake will not fol-'low you to the world's end?—Ne-'verthleſs, that you may not think 'that I ſtand in the way of a reconcili-'ation on ſuch fine terms as theſe, I 'will be your meſſenger this once, and 'hear what my papa will ſay to it; al-'though beforehand I can tell you, theſe 'propoſals will not anſwer the princi-'pal end.'

So down ſhe went. But, it ſeems, my aunt Hervey and my uncle Harlowe were not gone away: and as they have all engaged to act in concert, meſſengers were diſpatched to my uncle and aunt to deſire them to be there to breakfaſt in the morning.

MONDAY NIGHT, 11 O'CLOCK.

I AM afraid I ſhall not be thought worthy—

Juſt as I began not to fear I ſhould be thought worthy of an anſwer, Betty rapped at my door, and ſaid, if I were not in bed, ſhe had a letter for me. I had but juſt done writing the above dialogue, and ſtepped to the door, with the pen in my hand—'Always writing, 'Miſs!' ſaid the bold wench: 'it is 'admirable how you can get away what 'you write—But the fairies, they ſay, 'are always at hand to help lovers.'—She retired in ſo much haſte, that had I been diſpoſed, I could not take the notice of this inſolence which it deſerved.

I incloſe my brother's letter. He was reſolved to let me ſee, that I ſhould have nothing to expect from his kindness. But surely he will not be permitted to carry every point. The assembling of my friends to-morrow is a good sign: and I will hope something from that, and from proposals so reasonable. And now I will try if any repose will fall to my lot for the remainder of this night.

'TO MISS CLARY HARLOWE.'

[INCLOSED IN THE PRECEDING.]

'YOUR proposals will be considered 'by your father and mother, and all 'your friends, to-morrow morning. 'What trouble does your shameful for-'wardness give us all! I wonder you 'have the courage to write to me, upon 'whom you are so continually emptying 'your whole female quiver. I have no 'patience with you, for reflecting upon 'me as the aggressor in a quarrel which 'owed it's beginning to my consider-'ation for you.

'You have made such confessions in 'a villain's favour, as ought to cause 'all your relations to renounce you for 'ever. For my part, I will not believe 'any woman in the world, who pro-'mises against her avowed inclination. 'To put it out of your power to ruin 'yourself is the only way left to prevent 'your ruin. I did not intend to write; 'but your too-kind sister has prevailed 'upon me. As to your going into Scot-'land, that day of grace is over.—Nor 'would I advise, that you should go to 'grandfather-up your cousin Morden. 'Besides, that worthy gentleman might 'be involved in some fatal dispute upon 'your account; and then be called the 'aggressor.

'A fine situation you have brought 'yourself to, to propose to hide your-'self from your rake, and to have 'falsehoods told, to conceal you!— 'Your confinement, at this rate, is the 'happiest thing that could befal you. 'Your bravo's behaviour at church, 'looking out for you, is a sufficient in-'dication of his power over you, had 'you not so shamelessly acknowledged it.

'One word for all—Your parents and 'uncles may do as they will: but if, 'for the honour of the family, I cannot 'carry this point, I will retire to Scot-'land and never see the face of any one 'of it more. JA. HARLOWE.'

There's a brother!—There's flaming duty to a father, and mother, and uncles!—But he sees himself valued, and made of consequence; and he gives himself airs accordingly!—Nevertheless, as I said above, I will hope better things from those who have not the interest my brother has to keep open these unhappy differences.

LETTER XLIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

TUESDAY, MARCH 21.

WOULD you not have thought, my dear Miss Howe, as well as I, that my proposal must have been accepted: and that my brother, by the last article of his unbrotherly letter, (where he threatens to go to Scotland if it should be hearkened to) was of opinion that it would?

For my part, after I had read the unkind letter over and over, I concluded, upon the whole, that a reconciliation upon terms so disadvantageous to myself, as hardly any other person in my case, I dare say, would have proposed, must be the result of this morning's conference. And in that belief I had begun to give myself new trouble in thinking (this difficulty over) how I should be able to pacify Lovelace on that part of my engagement, by which I undertook to break off all correspondence with him, unless my friends should be brought by the interposition of his powerful friends, and any offers they might make, (which it was rather his part to suggest, than mine to intimate) to change their minds.

Thus was I employed, not very agreeably, you may believe, because of the vehemence of the tempers I had to conflict with; when breakfasting-time approached, and my judges began to arrive.

And oh! how my heart fluttered on hearing the chariot of the one, and then of the other, rattle through the court-yard, and the hollow-sounding footstep giving notice of each person's stepping out, to take his place on the awful bench which my fancy had formed for them and my other judges!

'That,' thought I, 'is my aunt Her-'vey's! That my uncle Harlowe's! Now 'comes my uncle Antony!' And my imagination made a fourth chariot for the odious Solmes, although it happened that he was not there.

'And now,' thought I, 'are they 'all assembled: and now my brother 'calls upon my sister to make her re-'port! Now the hard-hearted Bella in-'terlards her speech with invectives! 'Now has she concluded her report!

'Now they debate upon it!—Now does 'my brother flame! Now threaten to 'go to Scotland! Now is he chidden, 'and now ſoothed!'

And then I ran through the whole conference in my imagination, forming ſpeeches for this perſon and that, pro and con. till all concluded, as I flattered myſelf, in an acceptance of my conditions, and in giving directions to have an inſtrument drawn to tie me up to my good behaviour: while I ſuppoſed all agreed to give Solmes a wife every way more worthy of him, and with her the promiſe of my grandfather's eſtate, in caſe of my forfeiture, or dying unmarried, on the righteous condition he propoſes to entitle himſelf to it with me.

'And now,' thought I, 'am I to be 'ordered down to recognize my own 'propoſals. And how ſhall I look upon my awful judges? How ſhall I 'ſtand the queſtions of ſome, the ſet 'ſurlineſs of others, the returning love 'of one or two? How greatly ſhall I 'be affected!'

Then I wept. Then I dried my eyes: then I practiſed at my glaſs for a look more cheerful than my heart.

'And now' [as any-thing ſtirred] 'is my ſiſter coming to declare the iſ'ſue of all?' Tears guſhing again, my heart fluttering as a bird againſt it's wires; drying my eyes again and again to no purpoſe.

And thus, my Nancy, [Excuſe the fanciful prolixity] was I employed, and ſuch were my thoughts and imaginations, when I found a very different reſult from the hopeful conference.

For about ten o'clock up came my ſiſter, with an air of cruel triumph, waving her hand with a light flouriſh.

'Obedience without reſerve is re'quired of you, Clary. My papa is 'juſtly incenſed, that you ſhould pre'ſume to diſpute his will, and to make 'conditions with him. He knows what 'is beſt for you: and as you own mat'ters are gone a great way between this 'hated Lovelace and you, they will 'believe nothing you ſay; except you 'will give the one only inſtance, that 'will put them out of doubt of the ſin'cerity of your promiſes.

'What, child, are you ſurprized?—'Cannot you ſpeak?—Then, it ſeems, 'you had expected a different iſſue, 'had you?—Strange that you could! '—With all your acknowledgments and 'confeſſions, ſo creditable to your 'noted prudence!'

I was indeed ſpeechleſs for ſome time: my eyes were even fixed, and ceaſed to flow. But upon the hard-hearted Bella's proceeding with her airs of inſult, 'Indeed I was miſtaken,' ſaid I; 'indeed I was!—For in you, 'Bella, I expected, I hoped for, a 'ſiſter.'

'What!' interrupted ſhe, 'with all 'your mannerly flings, and your de'ſpiſing airs, did you expect, that I 'was capable of telling ſtories for you? '—Did you think, that when I was 'aſked my own opinion of the ſincerity 'of your declarations, I could not tell 'them, how far matters had gone between 'you and your fellow?—When the inten'tion is to bend that ſtubborn will of 'yours to your duty, do you think I 'would deceive them?—Do you think I 'would encourage them to call you 'down, to contradict all that I ſhould 'have invented in your favour?'

'Well, well, Bella; I am the leſs 'obliged to you; that's all. I was wil'ling to think, that I had ſtill a brother 'and ſiſter. But I find I am miſtaken.'

'Pretty mopſa-eyed ſoul!'—was her expreſſion—'And was it willing to think 'it had ſtill a brother and ſiſter? And 'why don't you go on, Clary?' [mocking my half-weeping accent] 'I thought 'too I had a father and mother, two un'cles, and an aunt: but I am miſ—taken, 'that's all—Come, Clary, ſay this, and 'it will in part be true, becauſe you 'have thrown off their authority, and 'becauſe you reſpect one vile wretch 'more than them all.'

'How have I deſerved this at your 'hands, ſiſter?—But I will only ſay, I 'pity you.'

'And with that diſdaining air too, 'Clary!—none of that bridled neck! 'None of your ſcornful pity, girl!—I 'beſeech you!'

'This ſort of behaviour is natural to 'you, ſurely, Bella!—What new talents 'does it diſcover in you!—But proceed '—If it be a pleaſure to you, proceed, 'Bella. And ſince I muſt not pity you, 'I will pity myſelf: for nobody elſe will.'

'Becauſe you don't—' ſaid ſhe.

'Huſh, Bella,' interrupting her; 'Becauſe I don't deſerve it—I know you 'were going to ſay ſo. I will ſay as you 'ſay in every-thing; and that's the way 'to pleaſe you.'

'Then ſay, Lovelace is a villain.'

'So I will, when I think him ſo.'

'Then you don't think him ſo?

'Indeed I don't. You did not always, 'Bella.'

'And what, Clary, mean you by that?'

[briſtling

[briſtling up to me]—'Tell me what you 'mean by that reflection?

'Tell me, why you call it a reflection? '—What did I ſay?

'Thou art a provoking creature—'But what ſay you to two or three duels 'of that wretch's?

'I can't tell what to ſay, unleſs I knew 'the occaſions.'

'Do you juſtify duelling at all?'

'I do not: neither can I help his 'duelling.'

'Will you go down, and humble 'that ſtubborn ſpirit of your's to your 'mamma?'

I ſaid nothing.

'Shall I conduct your ladyſhip down?' [offering to take my declined hand.]

'What! not vouchſafe to anſwer me?' I turned from her in ſilence.

'What! turn your back upon me 'too!—Shall I bring up your mamma 'to you, love?' [following me, and taking my ſtruggling hand] 'What! 'not ſpeak yet! Come, my ſullen, ſilent 'dear, ſpeak one word to me—You muſt 'ſay two very ſoon to Mr. Solmes, I can 'tell you that.'

'Then' [guſhing out into tears, which I could not hold in longer] 'they ſhall 'be the laſt two I will ever ſpeak.'

'Well, well,' [inſultingly wiping my averted face with her handkerchief, while her other hand held mine in a ridiculing tone] 'I am glad any-thing 'will make thee ſpeak: then you think 'you may be brought to ſpeak the two 'words—Only they are to be the laſt! '—How like a gentle lovyer from it's 'tender bleeding heart was that!'

'Ridiculous Bella!'

'Saucy Clary!' [changing her ſneering tone into an imperious one] 'But 'do you think you can humble yourſelf 'to go down to your mamma?'

'I am tired with ſuch ſtuff as this. 'Tell me, Bella, if my mamma will 'condeſcend to ſee me?'

'Yes, if you can be dutiful at laſt.'

'I can. I will.'

'But what call you dutiful?'

'To give up my own inclinations— 'That's ſomething more for you to tell 'of—in obedience to my parent's com-'mands; and to beg I may not be made 'miſerable with a man that is fitter for 'any-body than for me.'

'For me, do you mean, Clary?'

'Why not, ſince you have put the 'queſtion. You have a better opinion 'of him than I have. My friends, I 'hope, would not think him too good 'for me, and not good enough for you.

'But cannot you tell me, Bella, what 'is to become of me, without inſulting 'over me thus?—If I muſt be thus 'treated, remember, that if I am guilty 'of any raſhneſs, the uſage I meet with 'will juſtify it.'

'So, Clary, you are contriving an 'excuſe, I find, for ſomewhat that we 'have not doubted has been in your 'head a great while.'

'If it were ſo, you ſeem reſolved, for 'your part, and ſo does my brother for 'his, that I ſhall not want one.—But 'indeed, Bella, I can bear no longer 'this repetition of the worſt part of yeſ-'terday's converſation: I deſire I may 'throw myſelf at my father's and mo-'ther's feet, and hear from them what 'their ſentence is. I ſhall at leaſt avoid, 'by that means, the unmiſterly inſults I 'meet with from you.'

'Hey-dey! What, is this you? Is it 'you, my meek ſiſter Clary?

'Yes, it is I, Bella; and I will 'claim the protection due to a child of 'the family, or to know why I am to 'be thus treated, when I offer only to 'preſerve to myſelf the liberty of re-'fuſal, which belongs to my ſex, and, 'to pleaſe my parents, would give up 'my choice. I have contented myſelf 'till now to take ſecond-hand meſſengers, 'and firſt-hand inſults: you are but my 'ſiſter; my brother is not my ſove-'reign. And while I have a father and 'a mother living, I will not be thus 'treated by a brother and ſiſter, and 'their ſervants, all ſetting upon me, as 'it ſhould ſeem, to make me deſperate, 'and to do a raſh thing.—I will know, 'in ſhort, ſiſter Bella, why I am to be 'conſtrained thus?—What is intended 'by it?—And whether I am to be con-'ſidered as a child or a ſlave?'

She ſtood aghaſt all this time, partly with real, partly with affected ſurprize.

'And it it you? Is it indeed you?— 'Well, Clary, you amaze me! But 'ſince you are ſo deſirous to refer your-'ſelf to your father and mother, I will 'go down, and tell them what you ſay. 'Your friends are not yet gone, I be-'lieve: they ſhall aſſemble again; and 'then you may come down, and plead 'your own cauſe in perſon.'

'Let me then. But let my brother and 'you be abſent. You have made your-'ſelves too much parties againſt me, to 'ſit as my judges. And I deſire to have 'none of yours or his interpoſitions. 'I am ſure you could not have repre-'ſented what I propoſed fairly: I am 'ſure you could not. Nor is it poſſible

'you should be commissioned to treat me 'thus.'

'Well, well, I'll call up my brother 'to you.—I will indeed.—He shall justify himself, as well as me.'

'I desire not to see my brother, except he will come as a brother, laying 'aside the authority he has unjustly assumed over me.'

'And so, Clary, it is nothing to him, 'or to me, is it, that our sister shall disgrace her whole family?'

'As how, Bella, disgrace it?—The 'man whom you thus freely treat, is a 'man of birth and fortune: he is a man 'of parts, and nobly allied.—He was 'once thought worthy of you; and I 'wish to Heaven you had had him. I 'am sure it was not my fault you had 'not, although you treat me thus!'

This set her into a flame: I wish I had forborn it. O how the poor Bella raved! I thought she would have beat me once or twice: and she vowed, her fingers itched to do so—But I was not worth her anger. Yet she flamed on.

We were heard to be high.—And Betty came up from my mother to command my sister to attend her.—She went down accordingly, threatening me with letting every-one know what a violent creature I had shewn myself to be.

TUESDAY NOON, MARCH 21.

I HAVE as yet heard no more of my sister: and have not courage enough to insist upon throwing myself at the feet of my father and mother, as I thought in my heat of temper I should be able to do. And I am now grown as calm as ever; and were Bella to come up again, as fit to be played upon as before.

I am indeed sorry that I sent her from me in such disorder. But my papa's letter threatening me with my uncle Antony's house and chapel, terrifies me strangely; and by their silence I am afraid some new storm is gathering.

But what shall I do with this Lovelace? I have just now, by the unsuspected hole in the wall, (that I told you of in my letter by Hannah) got a letter from him—So uneasy is he for fear I should be prevailed upon in Solmes's favour; so full of menaces, if I am; so relenting the usage I receive; [for, how I cannot tell; but he has undoubtedly intelligence of all that is done in the family] such protestations of inviolable faith and honour; such vows of reformation; such pressing arguments to escape from this disgraceful confinement —O my Nancy, what shall I do with this Lovelace?

LETTER XLIV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, 9 O'CLOCK.

MY aunt Hervey lay here last night, and is but just gone from me. She came up to me with my sister. They would not trust my aunt without this ill-natured witness. When she entered my chamber, I told her, That this visit was a high favour to a poor prisoner, in her hard confinement. I kissed her hand. She, kindly saluting me, said, 'Why 'this distance to your aunt, my dear, 'who loves you so well?'

She owned, That she came to expostulate with me, for the peace-sake of the family: for that she could not believe it possible, if I did not conceive myself unkindly treated, that I, who had ever shewn such a sweetness of temper, as well as manners, should be thus resolute, in a point so very near to my father, and all my friends. My mother and she were both willing to impute my resolution to the manner I had been begun with; and to my supposing that my brother had originally more of a hand in the proposals made by Mr. Solmes, than my father or other friends. In short, fain would my aunt have furnished me with an excuse to come off my opposition; Bella all the while humming a tune, and opening this book and that, without meaning; but saying nothing.

After having shewed me that my opposition could not be of signification, my father's honour being engaged, my aunt concluded with enforcing upon me my duty, in stronger terms than I believe she would have done, (the circumstances of the case considered) had not my sister been present.

It would but be repeating what I have so often mentioned, to give you the arguments that passed on both sides.—So I will only recite what she was pleased to say, that carried with it a new face.

When she found me inflexible, as she was pleased to call it, she said, For her part, she could not but say, that if I were not to have either Mr. Solmes or Mr. Lovelace, and yet, to make my friends easy, must marry, she should not think amiss of Mr. Wyerley. What did I think of Mr. Wyerley?

'Aye, Clary,' put in my sister, 'what 'say you to Mr. Wyerley?'

I saw through this immediately. It was said, on purpose, I doubted not, to have an argument against me of absolute prepos-

prepoſſeſſion in Mr. Lovelace's favour: ſince Mr. Wyerley every-where avows his value, even to veneration, for me; and is far leſs exceptionable, both in perſon and mind, than Mr. Solmes: and I was willing to turn the tables, by trying how far Mr. Solmes's terms might be diſpenſed with; ſince the ſame terms could not be expected from Mr. Wyerley.

I therefore deſired to know, whether my anſwer, if it ſhould be in favour of Mr. Wyerley, would releaſe me from Mr. Solmes?—For I owned, that I had not the averſion to him, that I had to the other.

Nay, ſhe had no commiſſion to propoſe ſuch a thing. She only knew, that my father and mother would not be eaſy till Mr. Lovelace's hopes were entirely defeated.

'Cunning creature!' ſaid my ſiſter.

And this, and her joining in the queſtion before, convinced me, that it was a deſigned ſnare for me.

'Don't YOU, dear Madam,' ſaid I, 'put queſtions that can anſwer no end, 'but to ſupport my brother's ſchemes 'againſt me.—But are there any hopes 'of an end to my ſufferings and diſ'grace, without having this hated man 'impoſed upon me? Will not what I 'have offered be accepted? I am ſure it 'ought—I will venture to ſay that.'

'Why, niece, if there be not any ſuch 'hopes, I preſume you don't think your'ſelf abſolved from the duty due from 'a child to her parents?'

'Yes,' ſaid my ſiſter, 'I do not doubt 'but it is Miſs Clary's aim, if ſhe does 'not fly to her Lovelace, to get her 'eſtate into her own hands, and go to 'live at The Grove, in that independence 'upon which ſhe builds all her perverſe'neſs. And, dear heart! my little love, 'how you will then blaze away! Your 'mamma Norton, your oracle, with 'your poor at your gates, mingling ſo 'proudly and ſo meanly with the ragged 'herd! Reflecting, by your oſtentation, 'upon all the ladies in the county who 'do not do as you do. This is known 'to be your ſcheme! And the poor 'without-doors, and Lovelace within, 'with one hand building up a name, 'pulling it down with the other!—O 'what a charming ſcheme is this!—But 'let me tell you, my pretty little flighty 'one, that your father's living will ſhall 'controul your grandfather's dead one; 'and that eſtate will be diſpoſed of as 'your fond grandfather would have diſ'poſed of it, had he lived ſo ſee ſuch a 'change in his favourite. In a word, 'Miſs, it will be kept out of your hands, 'till my father ſees you diſcreet enough 'to have the management of it, or till 'you can dutifully, by law, tear it from 'him.'

'Fie, Miſs Harlowe!' ſaid my aunt; 'this is not pretty to your ſiſter.'

'O Madam, let her go on. This 'is nothing to what I have borne from 'Miſs Harlowe. She is either com'miſſioned to treat me ill by her envy, or 'by an higher authority, to which I muſt 'ſubmit.—As to revoking the eſtate, 'what hinders, if I pleaſed? I know 'my power; but have not the leaſt 'thought of exerting it. Be pleaſed to 'let my father know, that, whatever be 'the conſequence to myſelf, were he to 'turn me out of doors, (which I ſhould 'rather he would do, than to be con'fined and inſulted as I am) and were I 'to be reduced to indigence and want, I 'would ſeek no relief that ſhould be 'contrary to his will.

'For that matter, child,' ſaid my aunt, 'were you to marry, you muſt 'do as your huſband will have you. If 'that huſband be Mr. Lovelace, he will 'be glad of any opportunity of farther 'embroiling the families. And, let me 'tell you, niece, if he had the reſpect 'for you which he pretends to have, he 'would not throw out defiances as he 'does. He is known to be a very re'vengeful man; and were I you, Miſs 'Clary, I ſhould be afraid he would 'wreak upon me that vengeance, though 'I had not offended him, which he is 'continually threatening to pour upon 'the family.'

'Mr. Lovelace's threatened venge'ance is in return for threatened venge'ance. It is not every-body will bear 'inſult, as of late, I have been forced 'to bear it.'

O how my ſiſter's face ſhone with paſſion!

'But Mr. Lovelace,' proceeded I, 'as I have ſaid twenty and twenty times, 'would be quite out of the queſtion with 'me, were I to be generouſly treated!'

My ſiſter ſaid ſomething with great vehemence: but only raiſing my voice, to be heard, without minding her, 'Pray, Madam,' (provokingly interrogated I) 'was he not known to have 'been as wild a man, when he was at 'firſt introduced into our family, as he 'now is ſaid to be? Yet then, the com'mon phraſes of wild oats, and black ox'en, and ſuch-like, were qualifiers; and 'marriage, and the wife's diſcretion,

'were

'were to perform wonders—But,' (turning to my ſiſter) 'I find I have ſaid too 'much.'

'O thou wicked reflecter!—And what 'made me abhor him, think you, but the 'proof of thoſe villainous freedoms that 'ought to have had the ſame effect upon 'you, were you but half ſo good a crea'ture as you pretend to be?'

'Proof, did you ſay, Bella! I thought 'that you had not proof?—But you know 'beſt.'

Was not this very ſpiteful, my dear?

'Now, Clary,' ſaid ſhe, 'would I give 'a thouſand pounds to know all that is 'in thy little rancorous and reflecting 'heart, at this moment.'

'I might let you know for a much leſs ſum, and not be afraid of being 'worſe treated than I have been.'

'Well, young ladies, I am ſorry to 'ſee paſſion run ſo high between you.—'You know, niece,' (to me) 'you had 'not been confined thus to your apart'ment, could your mother by condeſcenſion, or your father by authority, 'have been able to move you. But how 'can you expect, when there muſt be a 'conceſſion on one ſide, that it ſhould be 'on theirs? If my Dolly, who has not 'the hundredth part of your underſtanding, were thus to ſet herſelf up in abſolute contradiction to my will, in a 'point ſo material, I ſhould not take it 'well of her—Indeed I ſhould not.'

'I believe not, Madam: and if Miſs 'Hervey had juſt ſuch a brother, and 'juſt ſuch a ſiſter, [you may look, Bella!] 'and if both were to aggravate her pa'rents, as my brother and ſiſter do mine '—Then, perhaps, you might uſe her 'as I am uſed: and if ſhe hated the man 'you propoſed to her, and with as much 'reaſon as I do Mr. Solmes—'

'And loved a rake and libertine, Miſs, 'as you do Lovelace,' ſaid my ſiſter.

'Then might ſhe' [continued I, not minding her] 'beg to be excuſed from 'obeying. But yet if ſhe did, and would 'give you the moſt ſolemn aſſurances, 'and ſecurity beſides, that ſhe never 'would have the man you diſliked, againſt 'your conſent—I dare ſay, Miſs Her'vey's father and mother would ſit 'down ſatisfied, and not endeavour to 'force her inclinations.'

'So!'—[ſaid my ſiſter, with uplifted hands] 'father and mother now come in 'for their ſhare!'

'But if, child,' replied my aunt, 'I 'knew ſhe loved a rake, and ſuſpected 'that ſhe ſought only to gain time, in 'order to wire-draw me into a conſent—'

'I beg pardon, Madam, for inter'rupting you: but if Miſs Hervey could 'obtain your conſent, what farther would 'be to be ſaid?'

'True, child; but ſhe never ſhould.'

'Then, Madam, it never would be.'

'That I doubt, niece.'

'If you do, Madam, can you think 'confinement and ill-uſage is the way 'to prevent the apprehended raſhneſs?'

'My dear, this ſort of intimation 'would make one but too apprehenſive 'that there is no truſting to yourſelf, 'when one knows your inclination.'

'That apprehenſion, Madam, ſeems 'to have been conceived before this in'timation, or the leaſt cauſe for it, was 'given. Why elſe the diſgraceful con'finement I have been laid under?—Let 'me venture to ſay, that my ſufferings 'ſeem to be rather owing to a concerted 'deſign to intimidate me,' [Bella held up her hands] '(knowing there were too 'good grounds for my oppoſition) than 'to doubt of my conduct; for when 'they were inflicted firſt, I had given no 'cauſe of doubt: nor ſhould there now 'be room for any, if my diſcretion might 'be truſted to.'

My aunt, after a little heſitation, ſaid, 'But, conſider, my dear, what confu'ſion will be perpetuated in your family, 'if you marry this hated Lovelace?'

'And let it be conſidered, what mi'ſery to me, Madam, if I marry that 'hated Solmes?'

'Many a young creature has thought 'ſhe could not love a man, with whom ſhe 'has afterwards been very happy. Few 'women, child, marry their firſt loves.'

'That may be the reaſon there are ſo 'few happy marriages.'

'But there are few firſt impreſſions fit 'to be encouraged.'

'I am afraid ſo too, Madam. I have 'a very indifferent opinion of light and 'firſt impreſſions. But, as I have often 'ſaid, all I wiſh for, is, to have leave 'to live ſingle.'

'Indeed you muſt not, Miſs. Your 'father and mother will be unhappy till 'they ſee you married, and out of Love'lace's reach.—I am told that you pro'poſe to condition with him (ſo far are 'matters gone between you) never to 'have any man, if you have not him.'

'I know no better way to prevent 'miſchief on all ſides, I freely own it '—And there is not, if he be out of the 'queſtion, another man in the world, I 'can think favourably of.—Nevertheleſs, I would give all I have in the 'world, that he were married to ſome other perſon—Indeed, I would, Bella, 'for all you put on that ſmile of incre-'dulity.'

'other

'May be ſo, Clary: but I will ſmile 'for all that.'

'If he be out of the queſtion!' repeated my aunt—'So, Miſs Clary, I 'ſee how it is—I will go down—[Miſs 'Harlowe, ſhall I follow you?]—And 'I will endeavour to perſuade your fa-'ther to let my ſiſter herſelf come up: 'and a happier event may then reſult.'

'Depend upon it, Madam,' ſaid my ſiſter, 'this will be the caſe: my mother 'and ſhe will be both in tears; but with 'this different effect; my mother will 'come down ſoftened, and cut to the 'heart; but will leave her favourite 'hardened, from the advantages ſhe will 'think ſhe has over my mother's ten-'derneſs—Why, Madam, it is for this 'very reaſon the girl is not admitted into 'her preſence.'

Thus ſhe ran on, as ſhe went down ſtairs.

LETTER XLV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE to MISS HOWE.

MY heart fluttered with the hope and the fear of ſeeing my mother, and with the ſhame and the grief of having given her ſo much uneaſineſs. But it needed not: ſhe was not permitted to come. But my aunt was ſo good as to return; yet not without my ſiſter: and, taking my hand, made me ſit down by her.

She came, ſhe muſt own, officiouſly, ſhe ſaid, this once more; though againſt the opinion of my father: but knowing and dreading the conſequence of my oppoſition, ſhe could not but come.

She then ſet forth to me my friends expectations from me: Mr. Solmes's riches; (three times as rich he came out to be, as any-body had thought him) the ſettlements propoſed; Mr. Lovelace's bad character; their averſion to him; all in a very ſtrong light; but not in a ſtronger than my mother had before placed them in. My mother, ſurely, could not have given the particulars of what had paſſed between herſelf and me: if ſhe had, my aunt would not have repeated many of the ſame ſentiments, as you will find ſhe did, that had been ſtill more ſtrongly urged, without effect, by her venerable ſiſter.

She ſaid it would break the heart of my father to have it imagined, that he had not a power over his child; and that, as he thought, for my own good: a child too, whom they had always doated upon!—'Deareſt, deareſt Miſs,' concluded ſhe, claſping her fingers with the moſt condeſcending earneſtneſs, 'let 'me beg of you, for my ſake, for your 'own ſake, for a hundred ſakes, to get 'over this averſeneſs, to give up your 'prejudices, and make every-one happy 'and eaſy once more.—I would kneel to 'you, my deareſt niece—Nay, I will 'kneel to you!'

And down ſhe dropt, and I with her, kneeling to her, and beſeeching her not to kneel; claſping my arms about her, and bathing her worthy boſom with my tears.

'O riſe! riſe! my beloved aunt,' ſaid I: 'you cut me to the heart with this 'condeſcending goodneſs.'

'Say then, my deareſt niece, ſay then, 'that you will oblige all your friends! '—If you love us, I beſeech you do—'

'How can I promiſe what I can ſoon-'er chuſe to die than perform!'

'Say then, my dear, you will conſider 'of it. Say you will but reaſon with 'yourſelf. Give us but hopes. Don't 'let me entreat, and thus entreat, in 'vain.' For ſtill ſhe kneeled, and I by her.

'What a hard caſe is mine!—Could 'I but doubt, I know I could conquer.—'That which is an inducement to my 'friends, is none at all to me—How of-'ten, my deareſt aunt, muſt I repeat 'the ſame thing?—Let me but be ſingle '—Cannot I live ſingle? Let me be 'ſent, as I have propoſed, to Scotland, 'to Florence; any-whither: let me be 'ſent a ſlave to the Indies; any-whi-'ther—Any of theſe I will conſent to. 'But I cannot, cannot think of giving 'my vows to a man I cannot endure!'

'Well then,' riſing, (Bella ſilently, with uplifted hands, reproaching my ſuppoſed perverſeneſs) 'I ſee nothing 'can prevail with you to oblige us.'

'What can I do, my deareſt aunt 'Hervey? What can I do? Were I ca-'pable of giving a hope I meant not to 'enlarge, then could I ſay, I would 'conſider of your kind advice. But I 'would rather be thought perverſe than 'inſincere. Is there, however, no medi-'um? Can nothing be thought of? Will 'nothing do, but to have a man who is 'the more diſguſtful to me, becauſe he is 'unjuſt in the very articles he offers?'

'Whom now, Clary,' ſaid my ſiſter, 'do you reflect upon? Conſider that.'

'Make not invidious applications of 'what I ſay, Bella. It may not be 'looked upon in the same light by every-one. The giver and the accepter are 'principally answerable in an unjust 'donation. While I think of it in this 'light, I should be inexcusable to be 'the latter. But why do I enter upon a 'supposition of this nature?—My heart, 'as I have often, often said, recoils at 'the thoughts of the man, in every light. '—Whose father, but mine, agrees upon articles where there is no prospect 'of a liking? Where the direct contrary 'is avowed, all along avowed, without 'the least variation, or shadow of a change 'of sentiment?—But it is not my father's 'doing originally. O my cruel, cruel 'brother, to cause a measure to be 'forced upon me, which he would not 'behave tolerably under, were the like 'to be offered to him!'

'The girl has got into her altitudes, 'aunt Hervey,' said my sister. 'You 'see, Madam, she spares nobody. Be 'pleased to let her know what she has to 'trust to. Nothing is to be done with 'her. Pray, Madam, pronounce her 'doom.'

My aunt retired to the window, weeping, with my sister in her hand: 'I cannot, indeed I cannot, Miss Harlowe,' said she, softly: (but yet I heard every word she said) 'there is great hardship 'in her case.' She is a noble child after 'all. What pity things are gone so far! '—But Mr. Solmes ought to be told to 'desist.'

'O Madam,' said my sister, in a kind of loud whisper, 'are you caught too by 'the little syren?—My mother did well 'not to come up!—I question whether 'my father himself, after his first indignation, would not be turned round by 'her. Nobody but my brother can do 'any-thing with her, I am sure.'

'Don't think of your brother's coming up,' said my aunt, still in a low voice—'He is too furious. I see no 'obstinacy, no perverseness, in her manner; If your brother comes, I will 'not be answerable for the consequences: for I thought twice or thrice she 'would have gone into fits.'

'O Madam, she has a strong heart! '—And you see there is no prevailing 'with her, though you were upon your 'knees to her.'

My sister left my aunt musing at the window, with her back towards us: and took that opportunity to insult me still more barbarously: for, stepping to my closet, she took up the patterns which my mother had sent me up, and bringing them to me, she spread them upon the chair by me; and, offering one, and then another, upon her sleeve and shoulder, thus she ran on, with great seeming tranquillity; but whisperingly, that my aunt might not hear her. 'This, 'Clary, is a pretty pattern enough: 'but this is quite charming! I would advise you to make your appearance in 'it. And this, were I you, should be 'my wedding night-gown—And this 'my second dressed suit! Won't you 'give orders, love, to have your grandmother's jewels new-set?—Or will you 'think to shew away in the new ones 'Mr. Solmes intends to present to you? 'He talks of laying out two or three 'thousand pounds in presents, child! 'Dear heart!—How gorgeously will 'you be arrayed!—What! silent, my 'dear! Mamma Norton's sweet dear! 'What! silent still?—But, Clary, won't 'you have a velvet suit? It would cut 'a great figure in a country church you 'know: and the weather may bear it 'for a month yet to come. Crimson 'velvet, suppose! Such a fine complexion as yours, how it would be set off 'by it! What an agreeable blush would 'it give you—High ho!' (mocking me! for I sighed to be thus fooled with) 'And do you sigh, love? Well then, 'as it will be a solemn wedding, what 'think you of black velvet, child?—Silent still, Clary!—Black velvet, so 'fair as you are, with those charming 'eyes gleaming through a wintry cloud, 'like an April sun!—Does not Lovelace tell you they are charming eyes! '—How lovely will you appear to every 'one!—What! silent still, love!—But 'about your laces, Clary!'—

She would have gone on still further, had not my aunt advanced towards us, wiping her eyes—'What! whispering, 'ladies! You seem so easy and so pleased, 'Miss Harlowe, with your private conference, that I hope I shall carry down 'good news.'

'I am only giving her my opinion of 'her patterns, here.—Unasked, indeed; 'but she seems, by her silence, to approve of my judgment.'

'O Bella!' said I, 'that Mr. Lovelace had not taken you at your word! '—You had before now been exercising 'your judgment on your own account: 'and I had been happy, as well as you! 'Was it my fault, I pray you, that it 'was not so?'

O how she raved!

'To be so ready to give, Bella, and so 'loth to take, is not very fair in you.'

The poor Bella descended to call names.

'Why,

'Why, ſiſter,' ſaid I, 'you are as 'angry, as if there were more in the 'hint, than poſſibly might be deſigned. 'My wiſh is ſincere, for both our ſakes! '—for the whole family's ſake!—And 'what (good now) is there in it?—Do 'not, do not, dear Bella, give me cauſe 'to ſuſpect, that I have found a reaſon 'for your behaviour to me; and which 'till now was wholly unaccountable 'from ſiſter to ſiſter.'

'Fie, fie, Clary!' ſaid my aunt.

My ſiſter was more and more outrageous.

'O how much fitter,' ſaid I, 'to be a 'jeſt, than a jeſter!—But now, Bella, 'turn the glaſs to you, and ſee how 'poorly fits the robe upon your own 'ſhoulders, which you have been ſo un'mercifully fixing upon mine!'

'Fie, fie, Miſs Clary!' repeated my aunt.

'And fie, fie, likewiſe, good Madam, 'to Miſs Harlowe, you would ſay, 'were you to have heard her barbarous 'inſults!'

'Let us go, Madam,' ſaid my ſiſter, with great violence; 'let us leave the 'creature to ſwell till ſhe burſts with 'her own poiſon.—The laſt time I will 'ever come near her, in the mind I am 'in!'

'It is ſo eaſy a thing,' returned I, 'were I to be mean enough to follow 'an example that is ſo cenſureable in 'the letter of it, to vanquiſh ſuch a 'teazing ſpirit as yours with its own 'blunt weapons, that I am amazed you 'will provoke me!—Yet, Bella, ſince 'you will go,' (for ſhe had hurried to 'the door) 'forgive me. I forgive you. 'And you have a double reaſon to do ſo, 'both from elderſhip, and from the of'fence ſo ſtudiouſly given to one in af'fliction.—But may you be happy, though 'I never ſhall! May you never have half 'the trials I have had! Be this your 'comfort, that you cannot have a ſiſter 'to treat you, as you have treated me!—'And ſo God bleſs you!'

'O thou art a ——' And down ſhe flung without ſaying what.

'Permit me, Madam,' ſaid I to my aunt, ſinking down, and claſping her knees with my arms, 'to detain you one 'moment—Not to ſay any-thing about 'my poor ſiſter—She is her own puniſh'er—Only to thank you for all your 'condeſcending goodneſs to me. I only 'beg of you not to impute to obſtinacy 'the immoveableneſs I have ſhewn to 'ſo tender a friend; and to forgive me 'every-thing I have ſaid or done amiſs 'in your preſence; for it has not pro'ceeded from inward rancour to the 'poor Bella. But I will be bold to ſay, 'that neither ſhe, nor my brother, nor 'even my father himſelf, knows what 'a heart they have ſet a bleeding.'

I ſaw, to my comfort, what effect my ſiſter's abſence wrought for me.—'Riſe, 'my noble-minded niece!—charming 'creature!'—[Thoſe were her kind 'words] 'kneel not me!—Keep to 'yourſelf what now I ſay to you.—I 'admire you more than I can expreſs—'And if you can forbear claiming your 'eſtate, and can reſolve to avoid Love'lace, you will continue to be the great'eſt miracle I ever knew at your years—'But I muſt haſten down after your 'ſiſter.—Theſe are my laſt words to 'you: Conform to your father's will, if 'you poſſibly can. How meritorious 'will it be in you to do ſo! Pray to 'God to enable you to conform. You 'don't know what may be done.'

'Only, my dear aunt, one word, one 'word more,' (for ſhe was going.)—'Speak all you can for my dear Mrs. 'Norton. She is but low in the world: 'ſhould ill health overtake her, ſhe 'may not know how to live without my 'mamma's favour. I ſhall have no 'means to help her: for I will want 'neceſſaries before I will aſſert my right: 'and I do aſſure you, ſhe has ſaid ſo 'many things to me in behalf of my 'ſubmitting to my father's will, that 'her arguments have not a little contri'buted to make me reſolve to avoid the 'extremities, which, nevertheleſs, I 'pray to God they do not at laſt force 'me upon. And yet they deprive me 'of her advice, and think unjuſtly of 'one of the moſt excellent of women.'

'I am glad to hear you ſay this: and 'take this and this, and this, my charm'ing niece,' (for ſo ſhe called me almoſt at every word; kiſſing me earneſtly, and claſping her arms about my neck:) 'and God protect you, and direct you! 'But you muſt ſubmit: indeed you muſt. 'Some one day in a month from this, is 'all the choice that is left you.'

And this, I ſuppoſe, was the doom my ſiſter called for; yet not worſe than what had been pronounced upon me before.

She repeated theſe laſt ſentences louder than the former. 'And remember, 'Miſs,' added ſhe, 'it is your duty to 'comply.'—And down ſhe went, leaving me with my heart full, and my eyes running over.

The very repetition of this, fills me with almoſt equal concern, to that which I felt at the time.

I muſt lay down my pen. Miſtineſſes which give to my deluged eye the appearance of all the colours in the rainbow, will not permit me to write on.

WEDNESDAY, FIVE O'CLOCK.

I WILL now add a few lines—My aunt, as ſhe went down from me, was met at the foot of the ſtairs by my ſiſter, who ſeemed to think ſhe had ſtaid a good while after her: and hearing her laſt words preſcribing to me implicit duty, praiſed her for it, and exclaimed againſt my obſtinacy. 'Did you ever hear of 'ſuch perverſeneſs, Madam?' ſaid ſhe. 'Could you have thought, that your 'Clariſſa, and every-body's Clariſſa, was 'ſuch a girl!—And who, as you ſaid, 'is to ſubmit, her father or ſhe?'

My aunt ſaid ſomething in anſwer to her, compaſſionating me, as I thought, by her accent: but I heard not the words.

Such a ſtrange perſeverance in a meaſure ſo unreaſonable!—But my brother and ſiſter are continually miſrepreſenting all I ſay and do: and I am deprived of the opportunity of defending myſelf!—My ſiſter ſays, that had they thought me ſuch a championeſs, they would not have engaged with me: and now, not knowing how to reconcile my ſuppoſed obſtinacy with my general character, and natural temper, they ſeem to hope to tire me out, and reſolve to vary their meaſures accordingly. My brother, you ſee, is determined to carry this point, or to abandon Harlowe-Place, and never to ſee it more.—So they are to loſe a ſon, or to conquer a daughter—the perverſeſt and moſt ungrateful that ever parents had!—This is the light he places things in: and has undertaken, it ſeems, to ſubdue me, if his advice be followed. It will be further tried; of that I am convinced; and what will be their next meaſure, who can divine?

I ſhall diſpatch, with this, my anſwer to yours of Sunday laſt, begun on Monday; but which is not yet quite finiſhed. It is too long to copy: I have not time for it. In it I have been very free with you, my dear, in more places than one. I cannot ſay, that I am pleaſed with all I have written—Yet will not now alter it.—My mind is not at eaſe enough for the ſubject.—Don't be angry with me. Yet, if you can excuſe one or two paſſages, it will be, becauſe they were written by your

THE HISTORY OF CLARISSA HARLOWE.

VOLUME THE SECOND.

LETTER I.

MISS HOWE. TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

WEDNESDAY NIGHT, MARCH 22.

ANGRY!—What ſhould I be angry for?—I am mightily pleaſed with your freedom, as you call it. I only wonder at your patience with me; that's all. I am ſorry I gave you the trouble of ſo long a letter upon the occaſion*, notwithſtanding the pleaſure I received in reading it.

I believe you did not intend reſerves to me; for two reaſons I believe you did not: firſt, becauſe you ſay you did not; next, becauſe you have not as yet been able to convince yourſelf how it is to be with you; and perſecuted as you are, how ſo to ſeparate the effects that ſpring from the two cauſes, [perſecution and love] as to give to each its particular due. But this I believe I hinted to you once before; and ſo will ſay no more upon this ſubject at preſent.

Robin ſays, you had but juſt depoſited your laſt parcel when he took it: for he was there but half an hour before, and found nothing. He had ſeen my impatience, and loitered about, being willing to bring me ſomething from you, if poſſible.

My couſin Jenny Fynnett is here, and deſires to be my bedfellow to-night. So I ſhall not have an opportunity to ſit down with that ſerioufneſs and attention which the ſubjects of yours require. For ſhe is all prate, you know, and loves to ſet me a prating; yet comes upon a very grave occaſion—To procure my mother to go with her to her grandmother Larkin, who has been long bedridden; and at laſt has taken it into her head that ſhe is mortal, and therefore will make her will; a work ſhe was till now extremely averſe to; but it muſt be upon condition that my mother, who is her diſtant relation, will go to her, and adviſe her as to the particulars of it: for ſhe has an high opinion, as every-one elſe has, of my mother's judgment in all matters relating to wills, ſettlements, and ſuch-like notable affairs.

Mrs. Larkin lives about ſeventeen miles off; and as my mother cannot endure to lie out of her own houſe, ſhe propoſes to ſet off early in the morning, that ſhe might be able to get back again at night. So, to-morrow I ſhall be at your devotion from day-light to day-light; nor will I be at home to anybody.

As to the impertinent man, I have put him upon eſcorting the two ladies, in order to attend my mother home at night. Such expeditions as theſe, and to give us women a little air of vanity and aſſuredneſs at public places, is all that I know theſe dangling fellows are good for.

I have hinted before, that I could almoſt wiſh my mother and Mr. Hickman would make a match of it: and I here repeat my wiſhes. What ſignifies a difference of fifteen or twenty years; eſpecially when the lady has ſpirits that will make her young a long time, and the lover is a mighty ſober man?—I think verily, I could like him better for a papa, than for a nearer relation:

* See Vol. I. Letter xxxvii. for the occaſion: and Letters xxxviii. xl. of the ſame volume, for the freedom Clariſſa apologizes for.

and they are strange admirers of one another.

But allow me perhaps a still better (and, as to years, more suitable and happier) disposal; for the man at least —What think you, my dear, of compromising with your friends, by rejecting both your men, and encouraging my parader?—If your liking one of the two go no farther than conditional, I believe it will do. A rich thought, if it obtain your approbation! In this light, I should have a prodigious respect for Mr. Hickman; more by half than I can have for the other. The vein is opened—Shall I let it flow? How difficult to withstand constitutional foibles!

Hickman is certainly a man more in your taste than any of those who have hitherto been brought to address you. He is mighty sober, mighty grave, and all that. Then you have told me, that he is your favourite. But that is because he is my mother's perhaps. The man would certainly rejoice at the transfer; or he must be a greater fool than I take him to be.

O but your fierce lover would knock him o' the head—I forgot that;—What makes me incapable of seriousness when I write about this Hickman?—Yet the man so good a sort of man in the main? —But who is perfect? This is one of my foibles. And it is something for you to chide me for.

You believe me to be very happy in my prospects in relation to him: because you are so very unhappy in the foolish usage you meet with, you are apt (as I suspect) to think that tolerable which otherwise would be far from being so. I dare say, you would not, with all your grave airs, like him for yourself; except, being addressed by Solmes and him, you were obliged to have one of them.—I have given you a test. Let me see what you will say to it.

For my own part, I confess to you, that I have great exceptions to Hickman. He and wedlock never yet once entered into my head at one time. Shall I give you my free thoughts of him?—Of his best and his worst; and that as if I were writing to one who knows him not?—I think I will. Yet it is impossible I should do it gravely. The subject won't bear to be so treated in my opinion. We are not come so far as that yet, if ever we shall: and to do it in another strain, ill becomes my present real concern for you.

Here I was interrupted on the honest man's account. He has been here these two hours—courting the mother for the daughter, I suppose—Yet she wants no courting neither: it is well one of us does; else the man would have nothing but halcyon; and be remiss, and saucy of course.

He was going. His horses at the door. My mother sent for me down, pretending to want to say something to me.

Something she said when I came that signified nothing—Evidently, for no reason called me, but to give me an opportunity to see what a fine bow her man could make; and that she might wish me a good-night. She knows I am not over-ready to oblige him with my company, if I happen to be otherwise engaged. I could not help an air a little upon the fretful, when I found she had nothing of moment to say to me, and when I saw her intention.

She smiled off the visible fretfulness, that the man might go away in good humour with himself.

He bowed to the ground, and would have taken my hand, his whip in the other. I did not like to be so companioned: I withdrew my hand, but touched his elbow with a motion, as if from his low bow I had supposed him falling, and would have helped him up—'A sad slip, it might have been!' said I.

'A mad girl!' smiled it off my mother.

He was put quite out; took his horse-bridle, stumped back, back, back, bowing till he run against his servant. I laughed. He mounted his horse. I mounted up stairs, after a little lecture. —And my head is so filled with him, that I must resume my intention; in hopes to divert you for a few moments.

Take it then—His best and his worst, as I said before.

Hickman is a sort of fiddling, busy, yet, to borrow a word from you, unbusy man; has a great deal to do, and seems to me to dispatch nothing. Irresolute and changeable in every-thing, but in teazing me with his nonsense; which yet, it is evident, he must continue upon my mother's interest more than upon his own hopes; for none have I given him.

Then I have a quarrel against his face, though in his person, for a well-thriven man, tolerably genteel—Not to his features so much neither; for what, as you have often observed, are features in a man?—But Hickman, with strong lines, and big cheek and chin-bones, has not the manliness in his aspect, which which Lovelace has with the moſt regular and agreeable features.

Then what a ſet and formal mortal he is in ſome things!—I have not been able yet to laugh him out of his long bib and beads. Indeed, that is, becauſe my mother thinks they become him; and I would not be ſo free with him, as to own I ſhould chuſe to have him leave it off. If he did, ſo particular is the man, he would certainly, if left to himſelf, fall into a King-William's-Cravat, or ſome ſuch antique chin-cuſhion, as by the pictures of that prince one ſees was then the faſhion.

As to his dreſs in general, he cannot indeed be called a ſloven, but ſometimes he is too gaudy, at other times too plain, to be uniformly elegant. And for his manners, he makes ſuch a buſtle with them, and about them, as would induce one to ſuſpect that they are more ſtrangers than familiar to him. You, I know, lay this to his fearfulneſs of diſobliging or offending. Indeed your over-doers generally give the offence they endeavour to avoid.

The man however is honeſt; is of family; has a clear and good eſtate; and may one day be a baronet, an't pleaſe you. He is humane and benevolent, tolerably generous, as people ſay; and as I might ſay too, if I would accept of his bribes; which he offers in hopes of having them all back again, and the bribed into the bargain. A method taken by all corrupters, from old Satan, to the loweſt of his ſervants. Yet, to ſpeak in the language of a perſon I am bound to honour, he is deemed a prudent man; that is to ſay, a good manager.

Then I cannot but confeſs, that now I like not any-body better, whatever I did once.

He is no fox-hunter: he keeps a pack indeed; but prefers not his hounds to his fellow-creatures. No bad ſign for a wife, I own. He loves his horſe; but diſlikes racing in a gaming way, as well as all ſorts of gaming. Then he is ſober; modeſt; they ſay, virtuous; in ſhort, has qualities that mothers would be fond of in a huſband for their daughters; and for which perhaps their daughters would be the happier could they judge as well for themſelves, as experience poſſibly may teach them to judge for their future daughters.

Nevertheleſs, to own the truth, I cannot ſay I love the man; nor, I believe, ever ſhall.

Strange! that theſe ſober fellows cannot have a decent ſprightlineſs, a modeſt aſſurance with them! Something debonnaire; which need not be ſeparated from that awe and reverence, when they addreſs a woman, which ſhould ſhew the ardor of their paſſion, rather than the ſneepiſhneſs of their nature; for who knows not that love delights in taming the lion-hearted? That thoſe of the ſex, who are moſt conſcious of their own defect in point of courage, naturally require, and therefore as naturally prefer, the man who has moſt of it, as the moſt able to give them the requiſite protection? That the greater their own cowardice, as it would be called in a man, the greater is their delight in ſubjects of heroiſm? As may be obſerved in their reading; which turns upon difficulties encountered, battles fought, and enemies overcome, four or five hundred by the proweſs of a ſingle hero, the more improbable the better: in ſhort, that their man ſhould be a hero to every-one living but themſelves; and to them know no bound to his humility. A woman has ſome glory in ſubduing a heart no man living can appall; and hence too often the bravo, aſſuming the hero, and making himſelf paſs for one, ſucceeds as only a hero ſhould.

But as for honeſt Hickman, the good man is ſo generally meek, as I imagine, that I know not whether I have any preference paid me in his obſequiouſneſs. And then, when I rate him, he ſeems to be ſo naturally fitted for rebuke, and ſo much expects it, that I know not how to diſappoint him, whether he juſt then deſerves it, or not. I am ſure, he has puzzled me many a time when I have ſeen him look penitent for faults he has not committed, whether to pity or laugh at him.

You and I have often retroſpected the faces and minds of grown people; that is to ſay, have formed images from their preſent appearances, outſide and in, (as far as the manners of the perſons would juſtify us in the latter) what ſort of figures they made when boys and girls. And I'll tell you the lights in which HICKMAN, SOLMES, and LOVELACE, our three heroes, have appeared to me, ſuppoſing them boys at ſchool.

Solmes I have imagined to be a little ſordid pilfering rogue, who would purloin from every-body, and beg every boy's bread and butter from him; while, as I have heard a reptile brag, he would in a winter-morning ſpit upon his thumbs, and ſpread his own with it, that he might keep it all to himſelf.

Hickman, a great overgrown, lank-haired, haired, chubby boy, who would be bunched and punched by every-body; and go home with his finger in his eye, and tell his mother.

While Lovelace I have ſuppoſed a curl-pated villain, full of fire, fancy, and miſchief; an orchard-robber, a wall-climber, a horſe-rider without ſaddle or bridle, neck or nothing: a ſturdy rogue, in ſhort, who would kick and cuff, and do no right, and take no wrong of any-body; would get his head broke, then a plaiſter for it, or let it heal of itſelf; while he went on to do more miſchief, and if not to get, to deſerve broken bones. And the ſame diſpoſitions have grown up with them, and diſtinguiſh them as men, with no very material alteration.

Only, that all men are monkeys more or leſs, or elſe that you and I ſhould have ſuch baboons as theſe to chuſe out of, is a mortifying thing my dear.

I am ſenſible, that I am a little out of ſeaſon in treating thus ludicrouſly the ſubject I am upon, while you are ſo unhappy; and if my manner does not divert you, as my flightineſs uſed to do, I am inexcuſable both to you, and to my own heart: which, I do aſſure you, notwithſtanding my ſeeming levity, is wholly in your caſe.

As this letter is entirely whimſical, I will not ſend it until I can accompany it with ſomething more ſolid and better ſuited to your unhappy circumſtances; that is to ſay, to the preſent ſubject of our correſpondence. To-morrow, as I told you, will be wholly my own, and of conſequence yours. Adieu, therefore, till then.

LETTER II.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

TUESDAY MORN. 7 O'CLOCK.

MY mother and couſin are already gone off in our chariot and four, attended by their doughty ſquire on horſeback, and by two of his own ſervants, and one of my mother's. They both love parade when they go abroad, at leaſt in compliment to one another; which ſhews, that each thinks the other does. Robin is your ſervant and mine, and nobody's elſe—And the day is all my own.

I muſt begin with blaming you, my dear, for your reſolution not to litigate for your right, if occaſion were to be given you. Juſtice is due to ourſelves, as well as to every-body elſe. Still more muſt I blame you for declaring to your aunt and ſiſter, that you will not: ſince (as they will tell it to your father and brother) the declaration muſt needs give advantage to ſpirits who have ſo little of that generoſity for which you are ſo much diſtinguiſhed.

There never was a ſpirit in the world that would inſult where it dared, but it would creep and cringe where it dared not. Let me remind you of a ſentence of your own, the occaſion for which I have forgotten: That little ſpirits will always accommodate themſelves to the temper of thoſe they would work upon—Will fawn upon a ſturdy-tempered perſon—Will inſult the meek—And another given to Miſs Biddulph, upon an occaſion you cannot forget—If we aſſume a dignity in what we ſay and do, and take care not to diſgrace by arrogance our own aſſumption, every-body will treat us with reſpect and deference.

I remember that you once made an obſervation, which you ſaid, you was obliged to Mrs. Norton for, and ſhe to her father, upon an excellent preacher, who was but an indifferent liver: That to excel in theory, and to excel in practice, generally required different talents; which did not always meet, in the ſame perſon. Do you, my dear, (to whom theory and practice are the ſame thing in almoſt every laudable quality) apply the obſervation to yourſelf, in this particular caſe, where reſolution is required; and where the performance of the will of the defunct is the queſtion—No more to be diſpenſed with by you in whoſe favour it was made, than by any-body elſe who have only themſelves in view by breaking through it.

I know how much you deſpiſe riches in the main: but it behoves you to remember, that in one inſtance you yourſelf have judged them valuable—In that they put it into our power to lay obligations; while the want of that power puts a perſon under the neceſſity of receiving favours—Receiving them perhaps from grudging and narrow ſpirits, who know not how to confer them with that grace, which gives the principal merit to a beneficent action.—Reflect upon this, my dear, and ſee how it agrees with the declaration you have made to your aunt and ſiſter, that you would not reſume your eſtate, were you to be turned out of doors, and reduced to indigence and want. Their very fears that you will reſume, point out to you the neceſſity of reſuming upon the treatment you meet with.

I own, that (at firſt reading) I was much much affected with your mother's letter ſent with the patterns. A ſtrange meaſure however from a mother; for ſhe did not intend to inſult you; and I cannot but lament that ſo ſenſible and ſo fine a woman ſhould ſtoop to ſo much art as that letter is written with: and which alſo appears in ſome of the converſations you have given me an account of. See you not in her paſſiveneſs, what boiſterous ſpirits can obtain from gentler, merely by teazing and ill-nature?

I know the pride they have always taken in calling you a Harlowe—Clariſſa Harlowe, ſo formal and ſo ſet, at every word, when they are grave or proudly ſolemn.—Your mother has learnt it of them—And as in marriage, ſo in will, has been taught to bury her own ſuperior name and family in theirs: I have often thought that the ſame ſpirit governed them, in this piece of affectation, and others of the like nature, (as Harlowe Place, and ſo-forth, though not the elder brother's or paternal ſeat) as governed the tyrant Tudor, (Henry VII.) who marrying Elizabeth, the heireſs of the houſe of York, made himſelf a title to a throne, which he would not otherwiſe have had; (being but a baſe deſcendant of the Lancaſter line) and proved a gloomy and vile huſband to her; for no other cauſe, than becauſe ſhe had laid him under obligations which his pride would not permit him to own.—Nor would the unprincely wretch marry her till he was in poſſeſſion of the crown, that he might not be ſuppoſed to owe it to her claim.

You have chidden me, and again will, I doubt not, for the liberties I take with ſome of your relations. But, my dear, need I tell you, that pride in ourſelves muſt, and for ever will, provoke contempt, and bring down upon us abaſement from others?—Have we not, in the caſe of a celebrated bard, obſerved, that thoſe who aim at more than their due, will be refuſed the honours they may juſtly claim?—I am very loth to offend you; yet I cannot help ſpeaking of your relations, as well as of others, as I think they deſerve. Praiſe or diſpraiſe, is the reward or punithment which the world confers or inflicts on merit or demerit; and for my part, I neither can nor will confound them in the application. I deſpiſe them all, but your mother: indeed I do. And as for her—But I will ſpare the good lady for your ſake—And one argument, indeed, I think may be pleaded in her favour, in the preſent contention—She who has for ſo many years, and with ſuch abſolute reſignanation, borne what ſhe has borne, to the ſacrifice of her own will, may think it an eaſier taſk than another perſon can imagine it, for her daughter to give up her's. But to think to whoſe inſtigation all this is originally owing—God forgive me; but with ſuch uſage I ſhould have been with Lovelace before now! Yet remember, my dear, that the ſtep which would not be wondered at from ſuch an haſty-tempered creature as me, would be inexcuſable in ſuch a conſiderate perſon as you.

After your mother has been thus drawn in againſt her judgment, I am the leſs ſurprized, that your aunt Hervey ſhould go along with her; ſince the two ſiſters never ſeparate. I have enquired into the nature of the obligation which Mr. Hervey's indifferent conduct in his affairs has laid him under—It is only, it ſeems, that your brother has paid off for him a mortgage upon one part of his eſtate, which the mortgagee was about to foreclooſe; and taken it upon himſelf. A ſmall favour (as he has ample ſecurity in his hands) from kindred to kindred: but ſuch a one, it is plain, as has laid the whole family of the Herveys under obligation to the ungenerous lender, who has treated him, and his aunt too, (as Miſs Dolly Hervey has privately complained) with the leſs ceremony ever ſince.

Muſt I, my dear, call ſuch a creature your brother?—I believe I muſt—Becauſe he is your father's ſon. There is no harm, I hope, in ſaying that.

I am concerned, that you ever wrote at all to him. It was taking too much notice of him: it was adding to his ſelf-ſignificance; and a call upon him to treat you with inſolence.—A call which you might have been aſſured he would not fail to anſwer.

But ſuch a pretty maſter as this, to run riot againſt ſuch a man as Lovelace; who had taught him to put his ſword into his ſcabbard, when he had pulled it out by accident!—Theſe in-door inſolents, who, turning themſelves into bugbears, frighten women, children, and ſervants, are generally cravens among men. Were he to come fairly croſs me, and ſay to my face ſome of the free things which I am told he has ſaid of me behind my back, or that (as by your account) he has ſaid of our ſex, I would take upon myſelf to aſk him two or three queſtions; although he were to ſend me a challenge likewiſe.

I repeat, You know that I will ſpeak my mind, and write it too. He is not my brother. Can you ſay, he is yours?—So, for your life, if you are juſt, you can't be angry with me: for would you ſide with a falſe brother againſt a true friend? A brother may not be a friend: but a friend will be always a brother—Mind that, as your uncle Tony ſays!

I cannot deſcend ſo low, as to take very particular notice of the epiſtles of theſe poor ſouls you call uncles. Yet I love to divert myſelf with ſuch groteſque characters too. But I know them, and love you; and ſo cannot make the jeſt of them which their abſurdities call for.

You chide me, my dear, for my freedoms with relations ſtill nearer and dearer to you, than either uncles or brother or ſiſter. You had better have permitted me (uncorrected) to have taken my own way. Do not thoſe freedoms naturally ariſe from the ſubject before us? And from whom ariſes that ſubject, I pray you? Can you for one quarter of an hour put yourſelf in my place, or in the place of thoſe who are ſtill more indifferent to the caſe than I can be—If you can—But although I have you not often at advantage, I will not puſh you.

Permit me, however, to ſubjoin, That well may your father love your mother, as you ſay he does. A wife who has no will but his! But were there not, think you, ſome ſtruggle between them at firſt, gout out of the queſtion?—Your mother, when a maiden, had, as I have heard, (and it is very likely) a good ſhare of thoſe lively ſpirits which ſhe liked in your father. She has none of them now. How came they to be diſſipated?—Ah! my dear!—She has been too long reſident in Trophonius's Cave, I doubt.

Let me add one reflection upon this ſubject, and ſo entitle myſelf to your correction for all at once.—It is upon the conduct of thoſe wives (for you and I know more than one ſuch) who can ſuffer themſelves to be out-bluſtered and out-gloomed of their own wills, inſtead of being fooled out of them by acts of tenderneſs and complaiſance.—I wiſh, that it does not demonſtrate too evidently, that with ſome of the ſex, inſolent controul is a more efficacious ſubduer than kindneſs or conceſſion. Upon my life, my dear, I have often thought, that many of us are mere babies in matrimony: perverſe fools, when too much indulged and humoured; creeping ſlaves, when treated harſhly. But ſhall it be ſaid, that fear makes us more gentle obligers than love?—Forbid it, honour! forbid it, gratitude! forbid it, juſtice! that any woman of ſenſe ſhould give occaſion to have this ſaid of her!

Did I think you would have any manner of doubt, from the ſtyle or contents of this letter, whoſe ſaucy pen it is that has run on at his rate, I would write my name at length; ſince it comes too much from my heart to diſavow it: but at preſent the initials ſhall ſerve; and I will go on again directly.

LETTER III.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

THURSDAY MORN. 10 O'CLOCK, (MAR. 23.)

I Will poſtpone, or perhaps paſs by, ſeveral obſervations which I had to make on other parts of your letters; to acquaint you, that Mr. Hickman, when in London, found an opportunity to enquire after Mr. Lovelace's town life and converſation.

At the Cocoa Tree in Pall Mall he fell in with two of his intimates, the one named Belton, the other Mowbray; both very free of ſpeech, and probably as free in their lives: but the waiters paid them great reſpect; and on Mr. Hickman's enquiry after their characters, called them men of fortune and honour.

They began to talk of Mr. Lovelace of their own accord; and upon ſome gentlemen in the room aſking, When they expected him in town, anſwered, That very day. Mr. Hickman (as they both went on praiſing Lovelace) ſaid, He had indeed heard, that Mr. Lovelace was a very fine gentleman—and was proceeding, when one of them, interrupting him, ſaid, 'Only, Sir, the fineſt 'gentleman in the world; that's all.'

And ſo he led them on to expatiate more particularly on his qualities; which they were very fond of doing: but ſaid not one ſingle word in behalf of his morals—Mind that alſo, in your uncle's ſtyle.

Mr. Hickman ſaid, That Mr. Lovelace was very happy, as he underſtood, in the eſteem of the ladies; and ſmiling, to make them believe he did not think amiſs of it, that he puſhed his good fortune as far as it would go.

'Well put, Mr. Hickman!' thought I; equally grave and ſage—'Thou 'ſeemeſt not to be a ſtranger to their 'dialect, as I ſuppoſe this is.' But I ſaid nothing; for I have often tried to find out this mighty ſober man of my mother's: but hitherto have only to ſay,

ſay, that he is either very moral, or very cunning.

'No doubt of it,' replied one of them; and out came an oath, with a 'Who 'would not?'—That he did as every young fellow would do.

'Very true!' ſaid my mother's puritan—'But I hear he is in treaty with 'a fine lady.'

So he was, Mr. Belton ſaid—'The 'devil fetch her!' [Vile brute!] for ſhe engroſſed all his time—But that the lady's family ought to be—ſomething—[Mr. Hickman deſired to be excuſed repeating what—though he had repeated what was worſe] and might dearly repent their uſage of a man of his family and merit.

'Perhaps they may think him too 'wild,' cried Hickman: 'and theirs is, 'I hear, a very ſober family.'

'SOBER!' ſaid one of them: 'a good 'honeſt word, Dick!—Where the de'vil has it lain all this time?—D—me 'if I have heard of it in this ſenſe, ever 'ſince I was at college! And then!' ſaid he, 'we bandied it about among 'twenty of us, as an obſolete.'

Theſe, my dear, are Mr. Lovelace's companions: you'll be pleaſed to take notice of that!

Mr. Hickman ſaid, This put him out of countenance.

I ſtared at him, and with ſuch a meaning in my eyes, as he knew how to take; and ſo was out of countenance again.

Don't you remember, my dear, who it was that told a young gentleman deſigned for the gown, who owned that he was apt to be too eaſily put out of countenance when he came into free company; That it was a bad ſign; that it looked as if his morals were not proof; but that his good diſpoſition ſeemed rather the effect of accident and education, than of ſuch a choice as was founded upon principle? And don't you know the leſſon the very ſame young lady gave him, To endeavour to ſtem and diſcountenance vice, and to glory in being an advocate in all companies for virtue; particularly obſerving, That it was natural for a man to ſhun or to give up what he was aſhamed of? Which ſhe ſhould be ſorry to think his caſe on this occaſion: adding, that vice was a coward, and would hide it's head, when oppoſed by ſuch a virtue as had preſence of mind, and a full perſuaſion of it's own rectitude to ſupport it. The lady, you may remember, modeſtly put her doctrine into the mouth of a worthy preacher, Dr. Lewen, as ſhe uſes to do, when ſhe has a mind not to be thought to be what ſhe is at ſo early an age; and that it may give more weight to any-thing ſhe hit upon, that might appear tolerable, was her modeſt manner of ſpeech.

Mr. Hickman, upon the whole, profeſſed to me, upon his ſecond recovery, that he had no reaſon to think well of Mr. Lovelace's morals, from what he heard of him in town: yet his two intimates talked of his being more regular than he uſed to be: that he had made a very good reſolution, that of old Tom Wharton was the expreſſion, That he would never give a challenge, nor refuſe one; which they praiſed in him highly: that, in ſhort, he was a very brave fellow, and the moſt agreeable companion in the world; and would one day make a great figure in his country; ſince there was nothing he was not capable of.

I am afraid that his laſt aſſertion is too true. And this, my dear, is all that Mr. Hickman could pick up about him: and is it not enough to determine ſuch a mind as yours, if not already determined?

Yet it muſt be ſaid too, that if there be a woman in the world that can reclaim him, it is you. And, by your account of his behaviour in the interview between you, I own I have ſome hope of him. At leaſt, this I will ſay, that all the arguments he then uſed with you, ſeem to be juſt and right: and if you are to be his—But no more of that: he cannot, after all, deſerve you.

LETTER IV.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

THURSDAY AFTER NOON, MARCH 23.

AN unexpected viſitor has turned the courſe of my thoughts, and changed the ſubject I had intended to purſue. The only one for whom I would have diſpenſed with my reſolution not to ſee any-body all the dedicated day: a viſitor, whom, according to Mr. Hickman's report from the expectations of his libertine friends, I ſuppoſed to be in town.—Now, my dear, have I ſaved myſelf the trouble of telling you, that it was your too-agreeable rake. Our ſex is ſaid to love to trade in ſurprizes: yet have I, by my promptitude, ſurprized myſelf out of mine. I had intended, you muſt know, to run twice the length, before I had ſuffered you ſo much as to gueſs who, and whether man or woman, my viſitor was: but ſince you have the diſcovery at ſo cheap a rate, you are welcome to it.

The end of his coming was, to engage my intereſt with my charming friend; and as he was ſure that I knew all your mind, to acquaint him what he had to truſt to.

He mentioned what had paſſed in the interview between you: but could not be ſatisfied with the reſult of it, and with the little ſatisfaction he had obtained from you; the malice of your family to him increaſing, and their cruelty to you not abating. His heart, he told me, was in tumults, for fear you ſhould be prevailed upon in favour of a man deſpiſed by every-body.

He gave me freſh inſtances of indignities caſt upon himſelf by your uncles and brother; and declared, that if you ſuffered yourſelf to be forced into the arms of the man for whoſe ſake he was loaded with undeſerved abuſes, you ſhould be one of the youngeſt, as you would be one of the loveliеſt widows in England: and that he would moreover call your brother to an account for the liberties he takes with his character to every-one he meets with.

He propoſed ſeveral ſchemes, for you to chuſe ſome one of them, in order to enable you to avoid the perſecutions you labour under: one I will mention, That you will reſume your eſtate; and if you find difficulties that can be no otherwiſe ſurmounted, that you will, either avowedly or privately, as he had propoſed to you, accept of Lady Betty Lawrance's or Lord M.'s aſſiſtance to inſtate you in it. He declared, that if you did, he would leave abſolutely to your own pleaſure afterwards, and to the advice which your couſin Morden on his arrival ſhould give you, whether to encourage his addreſs, or not, as you ſhould be convinced of the ſincerity of the reformation which his enemies make him ſo much want.

I had now a good opportunity to ſound him, as you wiſhed Mr. Hickman would Lord M. as to the continued or diminiſhed favour of the ladies, and of his lordſhip, towards you, upon their being acquainted with the animoſity of your relations to them, as well as to their kinſman. I laid hold of the opportunity, and he ſatisfied me, by reading ſome paſſages of a letter he had about him, from Lord M. That an alliance with you, and that on the foot of your own ſingle merit, would be the moſt deſirable event to them that could happen: and ſo far to the purpoſe of your wiſhed enquiry does his lordſhip go in this letter, that he aſſures him, that whatever you ſuffer in fortune from the violence of your relations on his account, he and Lady Sarah and Lady Betty will join to make it up to him. And yet that the reputation of a family ſo ſplendid, would, no doubt, in a caſe of ſuch importance to the honour of both, make them prefer a general conſent.

I told him, as you yourſelf I knew had done, that you were extremely averſe to Mr. Solmes; and that, might you be left to your own choice, it would be the ſingle life. As to himſelf, I plainly ſaid, That you had great and juſt objections to him on the ſcore of his careleſs morals: that it was ſurprizing, that men who gave themſelves the liberties he was ſaid to take, ſhould preſume to think, that, whenever they took it into their heads to marry, the moſt virtuous and worthy of the ſex were to fall to their lot: that as to the reſumption, it had been very ſtrongly urged by myſelf, and would be ſtill further urged; though you had been hitherto averſe to that meaſure: that your chief reliance and hopes were upon your couſin Morden: and that to ſuſpend or gain time till he arrived, was, as I believed, your principal aim.

I told him, That with regard to the miſchief he threatened, neither the act nor the menace could ſerve any end but theirs who perſecuted you; as it would give them a pretence for carrying into effect their compulſory projects; and that with the approbation of all the world; ſince he muſt not think the publick would not give it's voice in favour of a violent young man, of no extraordinary character as to morals, who ſhould ſeek to rob a family of eminence of a child ſo valuable; and who threatened, if he could not obtain her in preference to a man choſen by themſelves, that he would avenge himſelf upon them all by acts of violence.

I added, That he was very much miſtaken, if he thought to intimidate you by ſuch menaces: for that, though your diſpoſition was all ſweetneſs, yet I knew not a ſteadier temper in the world than yours: nor one more inflexible, (as your friends had found, and would ſtill farther find, if they continued to give occaſion for its exertion) whenever you thought yourſelf in the right; and that you were ungenerouſly dealt with in matters of too much moment to be indifferent about. 'Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe, 'Mr. Lovelace, let me tell you,' ſaid I, 'timid

I, 'timid as her foreſight and prudence 'may make her in ſome caſes, where 'ſhe apprehends dangers to thoſe ſhe 'loves, is above fear, in points where 'her honour, and the true dignity of 'her ſex, are concerned.—In ſhort, Sir, 'you muſt not think to frighten Miſs 'Clariſſa Harlowe into ſuch a mean or 'unworthy conduct as only a weak or 'unſteady mind can be guilty of.'

He was ſo very far from intending to intimidate you, he ſaid, that he beſought me not to mention one word to you of what had paſſed between us: that what he had hinted at, which carried the air of a menace, was owing to the fervor of his ſpirits, raiſed by his apprehenſions of loſing all hope of you for ever; and on a ſuppoſition, that you were to be actually forced into the arms of a man you hated: that were this to be the caſe, he muſt own, that he ſhould pay very little regard to the world or its cenſures; eſpecially as the menaces of ſome of your family now, and their triumph over him afterwards, would both provoke and warrant all the vengeance he could take.

He added, that all the countries in the world were alike to him, but on your account: ſo that whatever he ſhould think fit to do, were you loſt to him, he ſhould have nothing to apprehend from the laws of this.

I did not like the determined air he ſpoke this with: he is certainly capable of great raſhneſs.

He palliated a little this fierceneſs, (which by the way I warmly cenſured) by ſaying, That while you remain ſingle, he will bear all the indignities that ſhall be caſt upon him by your family. But would you throw yourſelf, if you were ſtill farther driven, into any other protection, if not Lord M.'s, or that of the ladies of his family, into my mother's*, ſuppoſe; or would you go to London to private lodgings, where he would never viſit you, unleſs he had your leave, (and from whence you might make your own terms with your relations;) he would be entirely ſatisfied; and would as he had ſaid before, wait the effect of your couſin's arrival, and your free determination as to his own fate.—Adding, That he knew the family ſo well, and how much fixed they were upon their meaſures, as well as the abſolute dependence they had upon your temper and principles, that he could not but apprehend the worſt, while you remained in their power, and under the influence of their perſuaſion and menaces.

We had a great deal of other diſcourſe: but as the reciting of the reſt would be but a repetition of many of the things that paſſed between you and him in the interview between you in the Wood Houſe, I refer myſelf to your memory on that occaſion †.

And now, my dear, upon the whole, I think it behoves you to make yourſelf independent: all then will fall right. This man is a violent man. I ſhould wiſh, methinks, that you ſhould not have either him or Solmes. You will find, if you get out of your brother's and ſiſter's way, what you can or cannot do, with regard to either. If your relations perſiſt in their fooliſh ſcheme, I think I will take his hint, and at a proper opportunity, found my mother. Mean time, let me have your clear opinion of the reſumption, which I join with Lovelace in adviſing. You can but ſee how your demand will work. To demand, is not to litigate. But be your reſolution what it will, do not by any means repeat to them, that you will not aſſert your right. If they go on to give you provocation, you may have ſufficient reaſon to change your mind: and let them expect that you will change it. They have not the generoſity to treat you the better for diſclaiming the power they know you have. That, I think, need not now be told you. I am, my deareſt friend, and will be ever, your moſt affectionate and faithful

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER V.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

WEDN. NIGHT, MARCH 22.

ON the report made by my aunt and ſiſter of my obſtinacy, my aſſembled relations have taken an unanimous reſolution (as Betty tells me it is) againſt me. This reſolution you will find ſignified to me in the incloſed letter from my brother, juſt now brought me. Be pleaſed

* Perhaps it will be unneceſſary to remind the reader, that although Mr. Lovelace propoſes (as above) to Miſs Howe, that her fair friend ſhould have recourſe to the protection of Mrs. Howe, if farther driven; yet he had artfully taken care, by means of his agent in the Harlowe family, not only to inflame the family againſt her, but to deprive her of Mrs. Howe's, and of every other protection, being from the firſt reſolved to reduce her to an abſolute dependence upon himſelf. See Vol. I. Letter XXXI.

† See Vol. I. Letter XXXVI.

to return it, when perused. I may have occasion for it, in the altercations between my relations and me.

'MISS CLARY,

'I AM commanded to let you know, 'that my father and uncles having heard 'your aunt Hervey's account of all that 'has passed between her and you: having heard from your sister what sort of 'treatment she has had from you: having recollected all that has passed between your mother and you: having weighed all your pleas and proposals: having taken into consideration their 'engagements with Mr. Solmes; that 'gentleman's patience, and great affection for you; and the little opportunity you have given yourself to be acquainted either with his merit or his 'proposals: having considered two 'points more; to wit, the wounded authority of a father; and Mr. Solmes's 'continual entreaties, (little as you have 'deserved regard from him) that you 'may be freed from a confinement to 'which he is desirous to attribute your 'perverseness to him, [averseness I should have said, but let it go] he being unable to account otherwise for so strong a 'one, supposing you told truth to your 'mother, when you asserted that your 'heart was free; and which Mr. Solmes 'is willing to believe, though nobody 'else does—For all these reasons, it is 'resolved, that you shall go to your uncle Antony's: and you must accordingly prepare yourself so to do. You 'will have but short notice of the day, 'for obvious reasons.

'I will honestly tell you the motive 'for your going: it is a double one; 'first, That they may be sure, that you 'shall not correspond with any-body 'they do not like, (for they find from 'Mrs. Howe, that, by some means or 'other, you do correspond with her 'daughter; and, through her, perhaps 'with somebody else:) and next, That 'you may receive the visits of Mr. 'Solmes; which you have thought fit to 'refuse to do here; by which means you 'have deprived yourself of the opportunity of knowing whom and what you 'have hitherto refused.

'If after one fortnight's conversation 'with Mr. Solmes, and after you have 'heard what your friends shall further 'urge in his behalf, unhardened by 'clandestine correspondences, you shall 'convince them, that Virgil's Amor omnibus idem (for the application of which 'I refer you to the Georgic as translated 'by Dryden) is verified in you, as well 'as in the rest of the animal creation; 'and that you cannot, or will not, forego 'your prepossession in favour of the moral, the virtuous, the pious Lovelace, [I 'would please you if I could!] it will 'then be considered, whether to humour 'you, or to renounce you for ever.

'It is hoped, that as you must go, you 'will go cheerfully. Your uncle Antony will make every-thing at his house 'agreeable to you. But indeed he won't 'promise, that he will not, at proper 'times, draw up the bridge.

'Your visitors, besides Mr. Solmes, 'will be myself, if you permit me that 'honour, Miss Clary; your sister; and, 'as you behave to Mr. Solmes, your 'aunt Hervey, and your uncle Harlowe; 'and yet the two latter will hardly come 'neither, if they think it will be to hear 'your whining vocatives.—Betty Barnes 'will be your attendant: and I must 'needs tell you, Miss, that we none of 'us think the worse of the faithful maid, 'for your dislike of her; although Betty, who would be glad to oblige you, 'laments it as a misfortune.

'Your answer is required, whether 'you cheerfully consent to go? And your 'indulgent mother bids me remind you 'from her, That a fortnight's visits 'from Mr. Solmes, are all that is meant 'at present.

'I am, as your shall be pleased to deserve, yours, &c.

'JAMES HARLOWE, JUN.'

So here is the master-stroke of my brother's policy! Called upon to consent to go to my uncle Antony's, avowedly to receive Mr. Solmes's visits!—A chapel! A moated-house!—Deprived of the opportunity of corresponding with you!—or of any possibility of escape, should violence be used to compel me to be that odious man's*!

Late as it was when I received this insolent letter, I wrote an answer to it directly, that it might be ready for the writer's time of rising. I inclose the rough draught of it. You will see by it how much his vile hint from the Georgick, and his rude one of my whining vocatives, have set me up. Besides, as the command to get ready to go to my uncle's is in the name of my father and uncles,

* These violent measures, and the obstinate perseverance of the whole family in them, will be the less wondered at, when it is considered, that all the time, they were but as so many puppets danced upon Mr. Lovelace's wires, as he boasts, Vol. I. Letter XXXI.

cles, it is but to shew a piece of the art they accuse me of, to resent the vile hint I have so much reason to resent in order to palliate my refusal of preparing to go to my uncle's; which refusal would otherwise be interpreted an act of rebellion by my brother and sister: for it seems plain to me, that they will work but half their ends, if they do not deprive me of my father's and uncles favour, even although it were possible for me to comply with their own terms.

'YOU might have told me, brother, 'in three lines, what the determination 'of my friends was; only, that then 'you would not have had room to dis-'play your pedantry by so detestable an 'allusion or reference to the Georgick. 'Give me leave to tell you, Sir, that if 'humanity were a branch of your studies 'at the university, it has not found a 'genius in you for mastering it. Nor is 'either my sex or myself, though a sister, 'I see, entitled to the least decency from 'a brother, who has studied, as it seems, 'rather to cultivate the malevolence of 'his natural temper, than any tendency 'which one would have hoped his pa-'rentage, if not his education, might 'have given him to a tolerable polite-'ness.

'I doubt not, that you will take amiss 'my freedom: but as you have deserved 'it from me, I shall be less and less con-'cerned on that score, as I see you are 'more and more intent to shew your wit 'at the expence of justice and compas-'sion.

'The time is indeed come that I can 'no longer bear those contempts and 'reflections which a brother least of all 'men is entitled to give. And let me 'beg of you one favour, officious Sir— 'It is this, That you will not give your-'self any concern about a husband for 'me, till I shall have the forwardness to 'propose a wife to you. Pardon me, 'Sir; but I cannot help thinking, that 'could I have the art to get my father of 'my side, I should have as much right 'to prescribe for you, as you have for me.

'As to the communication you make 'me, I must take upon me to say, that 'although I will receive, as becomes 'me, any of my father's commands; 'yet, as this signification is made by a 'brother, who has shewn of late so much 'of an unbrotherly animosity to me, '(for no reason in the world that I know 'of, but that he believes he has, in me, 'one sister too many for his interest) I 'think myself entitled to conclude, that 'such a letter as you have sent me, is 'all your own—And of course to declare, 'as I do, that I will not receive any more 'of your letters, unless commanded to 'do so by an authority I never will dis-'pute; except in a case where I think 'my future as well as present happiness 'concerned—And were such a case to 'happen, I am sure my father's harsh-'ness will be less owing to himself than 'to you; and to the specious absurdities 'of your ambitious and selfish schemes. '—Very true, Sir!

'One word more, provoked as I am, 'I will add: that had I been thought 'as really obstinate and perverse as of 'late I am said to be, I should not have 'been so disgracefully treated as I have 'been—Lay your hand upon your heart, 'brother, and say, By whose instiga-'tions—And examine what I have done 'to deserve to be made thus unhappy, 'and to be obliged to stile myself your 'injured sister,

'CL. HARLOWE.'

When, my dear, you have read my answer to my brother's letter, tell me what you think of me?—It shall go!

LETTER VI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

THURSDAY MORNING, MARCH 23.

MY letter has set them all in tumults: for, it seems, none of them went home last night; and they all were de-sired to be present to give their advice, if I should refuse compliance with a com-mand thought so reasonable as it seems this is.

Betty tells me, That at first my father, in a rage, was for coming up to me him-self, and for turning me out of his doors directly. Nor was he restrained, till it was hinted to him, that that was no doubt my wish, and would answer all my perverse views. But the result was, That my brother (having really, as my mother and aunt insisted, taken wrong measures with me) should write again in a more moderate manner: for nobody else was permitted or cared to write to such a ready scribbler. And, I having declared, that I would not receive any more of his letters, without command from a superior authority, my mother was to give it hers: and accordingly has done so in the following lines, written on the superscription of his letter to me; which letter also follows; together with my reply.

'CLARY

'CLARY HARLOWE,

'RECEIVE and read this, with the 'temper that becomes your ſex, your 'character, your education, and your 'duty: and return an anſwer to it, di-'rected to your brother.

'CHARLOTTE HARLOWE.'

'TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

'THURSDAY MORNING.

'ONCE more I write, although im-'periouſly prohibited by a younger ſiſter. 'Your mother will have me do ſo, that 'you may be deſtitute of all defence, if 'you perſiſt in your pervicacy. Shall I be 'a pedant, Miſs, for this word? She is 'willing to indulge in you the leaſt ap-'pearance of that delicacy for which ſhe 'once, as well as every-body elſe, ad-'mired you—before you knew Love-'lace; I cannot, however, help ſaying 'that: and ſhe, and your aunt Hervey, 'will have it—[They would fain favour 'you, if they could] that I may have 'provoked from you the anſwer they 'nevertheleſs own to be ſo exceedingly 'unbecoming. I am now learning, you 'ſee, to take up the ſofter language, 'where you have laid it down. This 'then is the caſe.

'They entreat, they pray, they beg, 'they ſupplicate, [Will either of theſe do, 'Miſs Clary?] That you will make no 'ſcruple to go to your uncle Antony's: 'and fairly I am to tell you, for the very 'purpoſe mentioned in my laſt—or, it is 'preſumable, they need not entreat, beg, 'pray, ſupplicate. Thus much is promiſ-'ed to Mr. Solmes, who is your advo-'cate, and very uneaſy that you ſhould 'be under conſtraint, ſuppoſing that 'your diſlike to him ariſes from that. 'And, if he finds that you are not to be 'moved in his favour, when you are ab-'ſolutely freed from what you call a 'controul, he will forbear thinking of you, 'whatever it coſts him. He loves you 'too well: and in this, I really think, 'his underſtanding, which you have re-'flected upon, is to be queſtioned.

'Only for one fortnight, therefore, 'permit his viſits. Your education [you 'tell me of mine, you know] ought to 'make you incapable of rudeneſs to any-'body. He will not, I hope, be the firſt 'man, myſelf excepted, whom you ever 'treated rudely, purely becauſe he is eſ-'teemed by us all. I am, what you have 'a mind to make me, friend, brother, 'or ſervant—I wiſh I could be ſtill more 'polite, to ſo polite, ſo delicate, a ſiſter.

'JA. HARLOWE.

'You muſt ſtill write to me, if you con-'deſcend to reply. Your mother 'will not be permitted to be diſturb-'ed with your nothing-meaning 'vocatives!—Vocatives, once more, 'Madam Clary, repeats the pedant 'your brother!'

'TO JAMES HARLOWE, JUNIOR, ESQ.

'PERMIT me, my ever-dear and 'honoured papa and mamma, in this 'manner to ſurprize you into an audience, '(preſuming this will be read to you) 'ſince I am denied the honour of writ-'ing to you directly. Let me beg of 'you to believe, that nothing but the 'moſt unconquerable diſlike could make 'me ſtand againſt your pleaſure. What 'are riches, what are ſettlements, to 'happineſs? Let me not thus cruelly be 'given up to a man my very ſoul is 'averſe to. Permit me to repeat, that 'I cannot honeſtly be his. Had I a ſlight-'er notion of the matrimonial duty than 'I have, perhaps I might. But when I 'am to bear all the miſery, and that for 'life; when my heart is leſs concerned in 'this matter, than my ſoul; my tempo-'rary, perhaps, than my future good; 'why ſhould I be denied the liberty of 'refuſing? That liberty is all I aſk.

'It were eaſy for me to give way to 'hear Mr. Solmes talk for the mention-'ed fortnight, although it is impoſſible 'for me, ſay what he would, to get over 'my diſlike to him. But the moated-'houſe, the chapel there, and the little 'mercy my brother and ſiſter, who are 'to be there, have hitherto ſhewn me, 'are what I am extremely apprehenſive 'of. And why does my brother ſay, my 'reſtraint is to be taken off, (and that too 'at Mr. Solmes's deſire) when I am to 'be a ſtill cloſer priſoner than before; 'the bridge threatened to be drawn up; 'and no dear papa and mamma near me 'to appeal to, in the laſt reſort?

'Tranſfer not, I beſeech you, to a 'brother and ſiſter your own authority, 'over your child—To a brother and ſiſ-'ter, who treat me with unkindneſs and 'reproach; and, as I have too much rea-'ſon to apprehend, miſrepreſent my 'words and behaviour; or, greatly fa-'voured as I uſed to be, it is impoſſible 'I ſhould be ſunk ſo low in your opini-'ons, as I unhappily am!

'Let but this my hard, my diſgrace-'ful confinement be put an end to. Per-'mit me, my dear mamma, to purſue 'my needleworks in your preſence, as 'one

'one of your maidens; and you shall be 'witness, that it is not either wilfulness 'or prepossession that governs me. Let 'me not, however, be put out of your 'own house. Let Mr. Solmes come and 'go, as my papa pleases: let me but 'stay or retire when he comes, as I can; 'and leave the rest to Providence.

'Forgive me, brother, that thus, with 'an appearance of art, I address myself 'to my father and mother, to whom I 'am forbidden to approach, or to write. 'Hard it is to be reduced to such a con-'trivance! Forgive likewise the plain 'dealing I have used in the above, with 'the nobleness of a gentleman, and the 'gentleness due from a brother to a sis-'ter. Although of late you have given 'me but little room to hope either for 'your favour or compassion; yet, hav-'ing not deserved to forfeit either, I pre-'sume to claim both: for I am confident 'it is at present much in your power, 'although but my brother, (my ho-'noured parents both, I bless God, in 'being) to give peace to the greatly dis-'turbed mind of your unhappy sister,

'CL. HARLOWE.'

Betty tells me, my brother has taken my letter all in pieces; and has under-taken to write such an answer to it, as shall confirm the wavering—So, it is plain, that I should have moved some-body by it, but for this hard-hearted brother—God forgive him!

LETTER VII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

THURSDAY NIGHT, MARCH 23.

I Send you the boasted confutation-letter, just now put into my hands—My brother and sister, my uncle Antony and Mr. Solmes, are, I understand, ex-ulting over the copy of it below, as an unanswerable performance.

'TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

'ONCE again, my inflexible sister, 'I write to you. It is to let you know, 'that the pretty piece of art you found 'out to make me the vehicle of your 'whining patheticks to your father and 'mother, has not had the expected 'effect.

'I do assure you, that your behaviour 'has not been misrepresented—Nor need 'it. Your mother, who is solicitous to 'take all opportunities of putting the 'most favourable constructions upon all 'you do, has been forced, as you well 'know, to give you up, upon full trial: 'no need then of the expedient of pur-'suing your needleworks in her sight. 'She cannot bear your whining pranks! 'and it is for her sake, that you are not 'permitted to come into her presence—'Nor will be, but upon her own terms.

'You had like to have made a simple-'ton of your aunt Hervey yesterday: she 'came down from you, pleading in your 'favour; but when she was asked, What 'concession she had brought you to? she 'looked about her, and knew not what 'to answer. So your mother, when 'surprized into the beginning of your 'cunning address to her and to your fa-'ther, under my name, (for I had be-'gun to read it, little suspecting such an 'ingenious subterfuge) and would then 'make me read it through, wrung her 'hands, Oh! her dear child, her dear 'child, must not be so compelled!—But 'when she was asked, Whether she would 'be willing to have for her son-in-law 'the man who bids defiance to her whole 'family; and who had like to have mur-'dered her son? And what concessions 'she had gained from her dear child to 'merit this tenderness? And that for 'one who had apparently deceived her, 'in assuring her that her heart was free? '—Then could she look about her, as 'her sister had done before: then was 'she again brought to herself, and to a 'resolution to assert her authority [not 'to transfer it, witty presumer!] over 'the rebel who of late has so ingratefully 'struggled to throw it off.

'You seem, child, to have a high no-'tion of the matrimonial duty; and I'll 'warrant, like the rest of your sex, (one 'or two, whom I have the honour to 'know, excepted) that you will go to 'church to promise what you will never 'think of afterwards. But, sweet child! 'as your worthy mamma Norton calls 'you, think a little less of the matrimo-'nial (at least till you come into that state) 'and a little more of the filial duty.

'How can you say, you are to bear 'all the misery, when you give so large a 'share of it to your parents, to your 'uncles, to your aunt, to myself, and to 'your sister; who all, for eighteen years 'of your life, loved you so well?

'If of late I have not given you room 'to hope for my favour or compassion, 'it is because of late you have not de-'served either. I know what you mean, 'little reflecting fool, by saying, it is 'much in my power, although but your 'brother, (a very slight degree of rela-'tionship with you) to give you that 'peace

'peace which you can give yourself whenever you please.

'The liberty of refusing, pretty Miss, is denied you, because we are all sensible, that the liberty of chusing, to every-one's dislike, must follow. The vile wretch you have set your heart upon speaks this plainly to every-body, though you won't. He says you are his, and shall be his, and he will be the death of any man who robs him of his PROPERTY. So, Miss, we have a mind to try this point with him. My father, supposing he has the right of a father in his child, is absolutely determined not to be bullied out of that right. And what must that child be, who prefers the rake to a father?

'This is the light in which this whole debate ought to be taken. Blush, then, Delicacy, that cannot bear the poet's amor omnibus idem!—Blush, then, Purity! Be ashamed, Virgin Modesty! And, if capable of conviction, surrender your whole will to the will of the honoured pair, to whom you owe your being: and beg of all your friends to forgive and forget the part you have of late acted.

'I have written a longer letter than ever I designed to write to you, after the insolent treatment and prohibition you have given me: and now I am commissioned to tell you, that your friends are as weary of confining you, as you are of being confined. And therefore you must prepare yourself to go in a very few days, as you have been told before, to your uncle Antony's; who, notwithstanding your apprehensions, will draw up his bridge when he pleases; will see what company he pleases, in his own house; nor will he demolish his chapel to cure you of your foolish late-commenced antipathy to a place of divine worship.—The more foolish, as, if we intended to use force, we could have the ceremony pass in your chamber, as well as any-where else.

'Prejudice against Mr. Solmes has evidently blinded you, and there is a charitable necessity to open your eyes: since no one but you thinks the gentleman so contemptible in his person; nor, for a plain country gentleman, who has too much solid sense to appear like a coxcomb, justly blameable in his manners.—And as to his temper, it is necessary you should speak upon fuller knowledge, than at present it is plain you can have of him.

'Upon the whole, it will not be amiss, 'that you prepare for your speedy removal, as well for the sake of your own conveniency, as to shew your readiness, in one point, at least, to oblige your friends; one of whom you may, if you please to deserve it, reckon, though but a brother,

'JAMES HARLOWE.'

'P. S. If you are disposed to see Mr. Solmes, and to make some excuses to him for your past conduct, in order to be able to meet him somewhere else with the less concern to yourself for your freedoms with him; he shall attend you where you please.

'If you have a mind to read the settlements, before they are read to you for your signing, they shall be sent you up—Who knows, but they will help you to some fresh objections?—Your heart is free, you know—It must—For, did you not tell your mother it was? And will the pious Clarissa fib to her mamma?

'I desire no reply. The case requires none. Yet I will ask you, Have you, Miss, no more proposals to make?'

I was so vexed when I came to the end of this letter, (the postscript to which, perhaps, might be written after the others had seen the letter) that I took up my pen, with an intent to write to my uncle Harlowe about resuming my own estate, in pursuance of your advice: but my heart failed me, when I recollected, that I had not one friend to stand by or support me in my claim; and that it would but the more incense them, without answering any good end. O that my cousin were but come!

Is it not a sad thing, beloved as I thought myself so lately by every-one, that now I have not one person in the world to plead for me, to stand by me, or who would afford me refuge, were I to be under the necessity of seeking for it!—I who had the vanity to think I had as many friends as I saw faces, and flattered myself too, that it was not altogether unmerited, because I saw not my Maker's image, either in man, woman, or child, high or low, rich or poor, whom, comparatively, I loved not as myself—Would to Heaven, my dear, that you were married! Perhaps, then, you could have induced Mr. Hickman to afford me protection, till these storms were over-blown. But then this might have involved him in difficulties and dangers; and that I would not have done for the world.

I don't know what to do, not I!—God forgive forgive me, but I am very impatient! I wiſh—but I don't know what to wiſh, without a ſin!—Yet I wiſh it would pleaſe God to take me to his mercy!—I can meet with none here—What a world is this! What is there in it deſireable? The good we hope for, ſo ſtrangely mixed, that one knows not what to wiſh for! And one half of mankind tormenting the other, and being tormented themſelves in tormenting!—For here in this my particular caſe, my relations cannot be happy, though they make me unhappy!—Except my brother and ſiſter, indeed—and they ſeem to take delight in and enjoy the miſchief they make.

But it is time to lay down my pen, ſince my ink runs nothing but gall.

LETTER VIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

FRIDAY MORNING, SIX O'CLOCK.

MRS. Betty tells me, there is now nothing talked of but of my going to my uncle Antony's. She has been ordered, ſhe ſays, to get ready to attend me thither: and, upon my expreſſing my averſeneſs to go, had the confidence to ſay, That having heard me often praiſe the romantickneſs of the place, ſhe was aſtoniſhed (her hands and eyes lifted up) that I ſhould ſet myſelf againſt going to a houſe ſo much in my taſte.

I aſked, if this was her own inſolence, or her young miſtreſs's obſervation?

She half-aſtoniſhed me by her anſwer; That it was hard ſhe could not ſay a good thing, without being robbed of the merit of it.

As the wench looked as if ſhe really thought ſhe had ſaid a good thing, without knowing the boldneſs of it, I let it paſs. But, to ſay the truth, this creature has ſurprized me on many occaſions with her ſmartneſs: for, ſince ſhe has been employed in this controuling office, I have diſcovered a great deal of wit in her aſſurance, which I never ſuſpected before. This ſhews, that inſolence is her talent; and that Fortune, in placing her as a ſervant to my ſiſter, had not done ſo kindly by her as Nature; for that ſhe would make a better figure as her companion. And indeed I can't help thinking ſometimes, that I myſelf was better fitted by Nature to be the ſervant of both, than the miſtreſs of the one, or the ſervant of the other. And within theſe few months paſt, Fortune has acted by me, as if ſhe were of the ſame mind.

FRIDAY, TEN O'CLOCK.

GOING down to my poultry-yard, juſt now, I heard my brother and ſiſter and that Solmes laughing and triumphing together. The high yew-hedge between us, which divides the yard from the garden, hindered them from ſeeing me.

My brother, as I found, had been reading part, or the whole perhaps, of the copy of his laſt letter—Mighty prudent and conſiſtent, you'll ſay, with their views to make me the wife of a man from whom they conceal not what, were I to be ſuch, it would be kind in them to endeavour to conceal, out of regard to my future peace!—But I have no doubt, that they hate me heartily.

'Indeed you was up with her there, 'brother,' ſaid my ſiſter. 'You need not 'have bid her not write to you. I'll 'engage, with all her wit, ſhe'll never 'pretend to anſwer it.'

'Why, indeed,' ſaid my brother, with an air of college-ſufficiency, with which he abounds, (for he thinks nobody writes like himſelf) 'I believe I have given her 'a choak-pear.—What ſay you, Mr. 'Solmes?'

'Why, Sir,' ſaid he, 'I think it is un-'anſwerable. But will it not exaſperate 'her more againſt me?'

'Never fear, Mr. Solmes,' ſaid my brother, 'but we'll carry our point, if 'ſhe do not tire you out firſt. We have 'gone too far in this method to recede. 'Her couſin Morden will ſoon be here: 'ſo all muſt be over before that time, 'or ſhe'll be made independent of us all.'

There, Miſs Howe, is the reaſon given for their Jehu-driving!

Mr. Solmes declared, that he was determined to perſevere while my brother gave him any hopes, and while my father ſtood firm.

My ſiſter told my brother, that he hit me charmingly on the reaſon why I ought to converſe with Mr. Solmes: but that he ſhould not be ſo ſmart upon the ſex, for the faults of this perverſe girl.

Some lively, and I ſuppoſe, witty anſwer, my brother returned; for he and Mr. Solmes laughed outrageouſly upon it, and Bella, laughing too, called him a naughty man: but I heard no more of what they ſaid; they walked on into the garden.

If you think, my dear, that what I have related did not again fire me, you will find yourſelf miſtaken when you read at this place the incloſed copy of my letter to my brother; ſtruck off—while the iron was red-hot.

No more call me meek and gentle, I beſeech you.

'TO MR. JAMES HARLOWE.

'SIR, 'FRIDAY MORNING.

'IF, notwithstanding your prohibition, 'I should be silent, on occasion of your 'last, you would, perhaps conclude, 'that I was consenting to go to my uncle 'Antony's upon the condition you men- 'tion. My father must do as he pleases 'with his child. He may turn me out 'of his doors, if he thinks fit, or give 'you leave to do it; but (loth as I am to 'say it) I should think it very hard to be 'carried by force to any-body's house 'when I have one of my own to go to.

'Far be it from me, notwithstanding 'yours and my sister's provocations, to 'think of taking my estate into my own 'hands, without my father's leave: but 'why, if I must not stay any longer here 'may I not be permitted to go thither: 'I will engage to see nobody they would 'not have me see, if this favour be per- 'mitted. Favour I call it, and am ready 'to receive and acknowledge it as such, 'although my grandfather's will has 'made it matter of right.

'You ask me, in a very unbrotherly 'manner, in the postscript to your letter, if 'I have not some new proposals to make? 'I HAVE (since you put the question) 'three or four; new ones all, I think; 'though I will be bold to say, that, 'submitting the case to any one person 'whom you have not set against me, my 'old ones ought not to have been re- 'jected. I think this; why then should 'I not write it?—Nor have you any more 'reason to storm at your sister for telling 'it you, (since you seem in your letter 'to make it your boast how you turned 'my mother and my aunt Hervey against 'me) than I have to be angry with my 'brother, for treating me as no brother 'ought to treat a sister.

'These, then, are my new proposals.

'That, as above, I may not be hin- 'dered from going to reside (under such 'conditions as shall be prescribed to me, 'which I will most religiously observe) 'at my grandfather's late house. I will 'not again in this place call it mine. I 'have reason to think it a great misfor- 'tune, that ever it was so—Indeed I 'have.

'If this be not permitted, I desire 'leave to go for a month, or for what 'time shall be thought fit, to Miss 'Howe's. I dare say her mother will 'consent to it, if I have my father's per- 'mission to go.

'If this, neither, be allowed, and I am 'to be turned out of my father's house 'I beg I may be suffered to go to my 'aunt Hervey's, where I will inviolably 'observe her commands, and those of 'my father and mother.

'But if this, neither, is to be granted, 'it is my humble request, that I may be 'sent to my uncle Harlowe's instead of 'my uncle Antony's. I mean not by this 'any disrespect to my uncle Antony: but 'his moat, with his bridge threatened to 'be drawn up, and perhaps the chapel 'there, terrify me beyond expression, 'notwithstanding your witty rid cule up- 'on me for that apprehension.

'If this likewise be refused, and if I 'must be carried to the moated-house, 'which used to be a delightful one to 'me, let it be promised me, that I shall 'not be compelled to receive Mr. 'Solmes's visits there; and then I will 'as cheerfully go, as ever I did.

'So here, Sir, are my new proposals. 'And if none of them answer your end, 'as each of them tends to the exclusion 'of that ungenerous persister's visits, be 'pleased to know, that there is no mis- 'fortune I will not submit to, rather 'than yield to give my hand to the man 'to whom I can allow no share in my 'heart.

'If I write in a style different from my 'usual, and different from what I wished 'to have occasion to write, an impartial 'person, who knew what I have acci- 'dentally within this hour past, heard 'from your mouth, and my sister's, and 'a third person's, (particularly the rea- 'son you give for driving on at this vio- 'lent rate; to wit, my cousin Morden's 'soon-expected arrival) would think I 'have but too much reason for it. Then 'be pleased to remember, Sir, that when 'my whining vocatives have subjected me 'to so much scorn and ridicule, it is 'time, were it but to imitate examples so 'excellent as you and my sister set me, 'that I should endeavour to assert my 'character, in order to be thought less 'an alien, and nearer of kin to you both, 'than either of you have of late seemed 'to suppose me.

'Give me leave, in order to empty my 'female quiver at once, to add, that I 'know no other reason which you can 'have for forbidding me to reply to you, 'after you have written what you pleased 'to me, than that you are conscious you 'cannot answer to reason and to justice 'the treatment you give me.

'If it be otherwise, I, an unlearned, 'un-logical girl, younger by near a third 'than yourself, will venture (so assured 'am I of the justice of my cause) to put

'my

'my fate upon an iſſue with you: with you, Sir, who have had the advantage of an academical education; whoſe mind muſt have been ſtrengthened by obſervation, and learned converſation, and who, pardon my going ſo low, have been accuſtomed to give cheek-pears to thoſe you vouchſafe to write againſt.

'Any impartial perſon, your late tutor, for inſtance, or the pious and worthy Dr. Lewen, may be judge between us: and if either give it againſt me, I will promiſe to reſign to my deſtiny; provided, if it be given againſt you, that my father will be pleaſed only to allow of my negative to the perſon ſo violently ſought to be impoſed upon me.

'I flatter myſelf, brother, that you will the readier come into this propoſal, as you ſeem to have a high opinion of your talents for argumentation; and not a low one of the cogency of the arguments contained in your laſt letter. And as I can poſſibly have no advantage in a contention with you, if the juſtice of my cauſe affords me not any; (as you have no opinion it will) it behoves you, methinks, to ſhew to an impartial moderator, that I am wrong, and you not ſo.

'If this be accepted, there is a neceſſity for it's being carried on by the pen; the facts to be ſtated, and agreed upon by both; and the deciſion to be given, according to the force of the arguments each ſhall produce in ſupport of their ſide of the queſtion: for, give me leave to ſay, I know too well the manlineſs of your temper, to offer at a perſonal debate with you.

'If it be not accepted, I ſhall conclude, that you cannot defend your conduct towards me; and ſhall only beg of you, that, for the future, you will treat me with the reſpect due to a ſiſter from a brother who would be thought as polite as learned.

'And now, Sir, if I have ſeemed to ſhew ſome ſpirit, not quite foreign to the relation I have the honour to bear to you, and to my ſiſter; and which may be deemed not altogether of a piece with that part of my character which once, it ſeems, gained me every-one's love; be pleaſed to conſider to whom, and to what it is owing; and that this part of that character was not diſpenſed with, till it ſubjected me to that ſcorn, and to thoſe inſults, which a brother, who has been ſo tenacious of an independence voluntarily given up by me, and who has appeared ſo exalted upon it, ought not to have ſhewn to any-body, much leſs to a weak and defenceleſs ſiſter: who is, notwithſtanding, an affectionate and reſpectful one, and would be glad to ſhew herſelf to be ſo upon all future occaſions; as ſhe has in every action of her paſt life, although of late ſhe has met with ſuch unkind returns.

'CL. HARLOWE.'

See, my dear, the force, and volubility, as I may ſay, of paſſion; for the letter I ſend you is my firſt draught, ſtruck off without a blot or eraſure.

FRIDAY, THREE O'CLOCK.

As ſoon as I had tranſcribed it, I ſent it down to my brother by Mrs. Betty.

The wench came up ſoon after, all aghaſt, with a 'Lord Miſs! What have 'you done?—What have you written? 'For you have ſet them all in a joyful 'uproar!'

MY ſiſter is but this moment gone from me: ſhe came up all in a flame; which obliged me abruptly to lay down my pen.—She ran to me—

'O ſpirit!' ſaid ſhe; tapping my neck a little too hard. 'And is it come to this 'at laſt!'

'Do you beat me, Bella?'

'Do you call this beating you? Only 'tapping your ſhoulder thus,' ſaid ſhe; tapping again more gently—'This is 'what we expected it would come to—'You want to be independent—My father has lived too long for you!'

I was going to ſpeak with vehemence; but ſhe put her handkerchief before my mouth, very rudely—'You have done 'enough with your pen, mean liſtener, 'as you are! But, know, that neither 'your independent ſcheme, nor any of 'your viſiting ones, will be granted you. 'Take your courſe, perverſe one! Call 'in your rake to help you to an inde-'pendence upon your parents, and a de-'pendence upon him!—Do ſo!—Prepare 'this moment—Reſolve what you will 'take with you—To-morrow you go—'Depend upon it to-morrow you go!—'No longer ſhall you ſtay here, watching and creeping about to hearken to 'what people ſay—'Tis determined, 'child!—you go to-morrow—My brother would have come up to tell you 'ſo; but I perſuaded him to the contrary—For I know not what had become of you, if he had—Such a letter! 'ſuch an inſolent, ſuch a conceited challenger!—O thou vain creature! But 'prepare yourſelf, I ſay—To-morrow 'you go—My brother will accept of 'your bold challenge; but it muſt be

'perſonal; and at my uncle Antony's—
'Or perhaps at Mr. Solmes's—'

Thus ſhe ran on, almoſt foaming with paſſion, till quite out of patience, I ſaid, 'No more of your violence, Bella—Had 'I known in what a way you deſigned to 'come up, you ſhould not have found 'my chamber-door open.—Talk to your 'ſervant in this manner. Unlike you, as 'I bleſs God I am, I am nevertheleſs 'your ſiſter—And let me tell you, that 'I won't go to-morrow, nor next day, 'nor next day to that—except I am 'dragged away by violence.'

'What! not if your father or your 'mother command it—Girl?' ſaid ſhe, intending another word by her pauſe and manner before it came out.

'Let it come to that, Bella, then I 'ſhall know what to ſay. But it ſhall 'be from their own mouths, if I do—'Not from yours, nor your Betty's—'And ſay another word to me, in this 'manner, and be the conſequence what 'it may, I will force myſelf into their 'preſence; and demand what I have 'done to be uſed thus!'

'Come along, child! Come along, 'meekneſs!'—taking my hand and leading me towards the door—'Demand it 'of them now—You'll find both your 'deſpiſed parents together!—'What! 'Does your heart fail you?'—for I reſiſted, being thus inſolently offered to be led, and pulled my hand from her.

'I want not to be led,' ſaid I; 'and 'ſince I can plead your invitation, I will 'go:' and was poſting to the ſtairs accordingly in my paſſion—But ſhe got between me and the door, and ſhut it—

'Let me firſt, bold one,' ſaid ſhe, 'apprize them of your viſit—For your own 'ſake let me—For my brother is with 'them.' But yet opening it again, ſeeing me ſhrink back—'Go, if you will! '—Why don't you go? Why don't you 'go, Miſs?'—following me to my cloſet, whither I retired, with my heart full, and pulled the ſaſh door after me; and could no longer hold in my tears.

Nor would I anſwer one word to her repeated aggravations, nor to her demands upon me to open my door; (for the key was on the inſide) nor ſo much as turn my head towards her, as ſhe looked through the glaſs at me. And at laſt, which vexed her to the heart, I drew the ſilk curtain, that ſhe ſhould not ſee me, and down ſhe went muttering all the way.

Is not this uſage enough to provoke a raſhneſs never before thought of?

As it is but too probable that I may be hurried away to my uncle's without being able to give you previous notice of it; I beg that as ſoon as you ſhall hear of ſuch a violence, you would ſend to the uſual place, to take back ſuch of your letters as may not have reached my hands, or to fetch any of mine that may be there.

May you, my dear, be always happy, prays your CLARISSA HARLOWE.

I have received your four letters. But am in ſuch a ferment, that I cannot at preſent write to them.

LETTER IX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

FRIDAY NIGHT, MARCH 24.

I Have a moſt provoking letter from my ſiſter. I might have ſuppoſed, ſhe would reſent the contempt ſhe brought upon herſelf in my chamber. Her conduct ſurely can only be accounted for by the rage inſtigated by a ſuppoſed rivalry.

'TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

'I AM to tell you, that your mother 'has begged you off for the morrow: 'but that you have effectually done your 'buſineſs with her, as well as with 'every-body elſe.

'In your propoſals, and letter to 'your brother, you have ſhewn your'ſelf ſo ſilly, and wiſe; ſo young, and 'ſo old; ſo gentle, and ſo obſtinate; ſo 'meek, and ſo violent; that never was 'there ſo mixed a character.

'We all know of whom you have bor'rowed this new ſpirit. And yet the 'ſeeds of it muſt be in your heart, or it 'could not all at once ſhew itſelf ſo ram'pant. It would be doing Mr. Solmes 'a ſpite to wiſh him ſuch a ſhy, un-ſhy 'girl; another of your contradictory 'qualities—I leave you to make out 'what I mean by it.

'Here, Miſs, your mother will not let 'you remain: ſhe cannot have any 'peace of mind while ſuch a rebel of a 'child is ſo near her; your aunt Hervey 'will not take a charge which all the 'family put together cannot manage; 'your uncle Harlowe will not ſee you 'at his houſe, till you are married—So, 'thanks to your own ſtubbornneſs, you 'have nobody that will receive you but 'your uncle Antony. Thither you 'muſt go in a very few days; and when 'there, your brother will ſettle with 'you in my preſence, all that relates to

'your modeſt challenge:—for it is ac'cepted, I aſſure you. Dr. Lewen will
'poſſibly be there, ſince you make choice
'of him. Another gentleman likewiſe,
'were it but to convince you, that he is
'another ſort of man than you have ta'ken him to be. Your two uncles will
'poſſibly be there too, to ſee that the poor,
'weak, and defenceleſs ſiſter, has fair
'play. So, you ſee, Miſs, what com'pany your ſmart challenge will draw
'together.

'Prepare for the day. You'll ſoon
'be called upon. Adieu, mamma
'Norton's ſweet child!

'ARAB. HARLOWE.'

I tranſcribed this letter, and ſent it to my mother with theſe lines—

'A VERY FEW WORDS, MY EVER-
'HONOURED MAMMA!

'IF my ſiſter wrote the incloſed by
'my father's direction, or yours, I muſt
'ſubmit to the uſage ſhe gives me in it.
'with this only obſervation, That it is
'ſhort of the perſonal treatment I have 'received from her. If it be of her 'own head—Why then, Madam—But
'I knew, that when I was baniſhed
'from your preſence—Yet, till I know
'if ſhe has or has not authority for this
'uſage, I will only write further, that 'I am your very unhappy child,

'CL. HARLOWE.'

This anſwer I received in an open ſlip of paper; but it was wet in one place. I kiſſed the place; for I am ſure it was bliſtered, as I may ſay, by a mother's tear!—She muſt (I hope ſhe muſt) have written it reluctantly.

'TO apply for protection, where au'thority is defied, is bold. Your ſiſter,
'who would not in your circumſtances
'have been guilty of your perverſeneſs,
'may allowably be angry at you for it.
'However, we have told her to mode'rate her zeal for our inſulted authority.
'See if you can deſerve another behavi-
'our, than that you complain of: which 'cannot however, be ſo grievous to you,
'as the cauſe of it is to

'Your more unhappy Mother.

'How often muſt I forbid you any ad-
'dreſs to me!'

Give me, my deareſt Miſs Howe, your opinion, what I can, what I ought to do. Not what you would do (puſhed as I am puſhed) in reſentment or paſſion—ſince, ſo inſtigated, you tell me, that you ſhould have been with ſomebody before now—And ſteps taken in paſſion hardly ever fail of giving cauſe for repentance: but acquaint me with what you think cool judgment, and after reflection, whatever were to be the event, will juſtify.

I doubt not your ſympathizing love: but yet you cannot poſſibly feel indignity and perſecution ſo very ſenſibly as the immediate ſufferer feels them—Are ſitter therefore to adviſe me, than I am myſelf.

I will here reſt my cauſe. Have I, or have I not, ſuffered or borne enough? And if they will ſtill perſevere; if that ſtrange perſiſter againſt an antipathy ſo ſtrongly avowed, will ſtill perſiſt; ſay, what can I do?—What courſe purſue? Shall I fly to London, and endeavour to hide myſelf from Lovelace, as well as from all my own relations, till my couſin Morden arrives? Or ſhall I embark for Leghorn in my way to my couſin? Yet, my ſex, my youth, conſidered, how full of danger is this laſt meaſure!—And may not my couſin be ſet out for England, while I am getting thither?—What can I do?—Tell me, tell me, my deareſt Miſs Howe, [for I dare not truſt myſelf] tell me, what I can do.

ELEVEN O'CLOCK AT NIGHT.

I HAVE been forced to try to compoſe my angry paſſions at my harpſichord; having firſt ſhut cloſe my doors and windows, that I might not be heard below. As I was cloſing the ſhutters of the windows, the diſtant whooting of the bird of Minerva, as from the often-viſited Wood Houſe, gave the ſubject in that charming ODE to WISDOM, which does honour to our ſex, as it was written by one of it. I made an eſſay, a week ago, to ſet the three laſt ſtanzas of it, as not unſuitable to my unhappy ſituation; and after I had re-peruſed the ode, thoſe were my leſſon: and, I am ſure, in the ſolemn addreſs they contain to the All-wiſe and All-powerful Deity, my heart went with my fingers.

I incloſe the ode, and my effort with it. The ſubject is ſolemn: my circumſtances are affecting; and I flatter myſelf, that I have not been quite unhappy in the performance. If it obtain your approbation, I ſhall be out of doubt: and ſhould be ſtill more aſſured, could I hear it tried by your voice and finger.

'ODE

'ODE TO WISDOM. BY A LADY.

I.

'THE ſolitary bird of night
'Through the thick ſhades now wings his flight,
'And quits his time-ſhook tower;
'Where ſhelter'd from the blaze of day,
'In philoſophick gloom he lay,
'Beneath his ivy-bower.

II.

'With joy I hear the ſolemn ſound,
'Which midnight echoes waft around,
'And ſighing gales repeat.
'Fav'rite of Pallas! I attend,
'And, faithful to thy ſummons, bend
'At Wiſdom's awful ſeat.

III.

'She loves the cool, the ſilent eve,
'Where no falſe ſhews of life deceive,
'Beneath the lunar ray.
'Here folly drops each vain diſguiſe;
'Nor ſport her gaily colour'd dyes,
'As in the beam of day.

IV.

'O Pallas! queen of ev'ry art
'That glads the ſenſe and mends the heart,
'Bleſt ſource of purer joys!
'In ev'ry form of beauty bright,
'That captivates the mortal ſight
'With pleaſure and ſurprize;

V.

'To thy unſpotted ſhrine I bow:
'Attend thy modeſt ſuppliant's vow,
'That breathes no wild deſires;
'But, taught by thy unerring rules,
'To ſhun the fruitleſs wiſh of fools,
'To nobler views aſpires.

VI.

'Not Fortune's gem, Ambition's plume,
'Nor Cytherea's fading bloom,
'Be objects of my prayer:
'Let avarice, vanity, and pride,
'Thoſe envy'd glitt'ring toys divide,
'The dull rewards of care.

VII.

'To me thy better gifts impart,
'Each moral beauty of the heart,
'By ſtudious thought refin'd;
'For Wealth, the ſmiles of glad content;
'For Power, it's ampleſt, beſt extent,
'An empire o'er my mind.

VIII.

'When Fortune drops her gay parade,
'When Pleaſure's tranſient roſes fade,
'And wither in the tomb,
'Unchang'd is thy immortal prize;
'Thy ever-verdant laurels riſe
'In undecaying bloom.

IX.

'By thee protected, I defy
'The coxcomb's ſneer the ſtupid lye
'Of ignorance and ſpite:
'Alike contemn the leaden fool,
'And all the pointed ridicule
'Of undiſcerning wit.

X.

'From envy, hurry, noiſe, and ſtrife,
'The dull impertinence of life,
'In thy retreat I reſt:
'Purſue thee to the peaceful groves,
'Where Plato's ſacred ſpirit roves,
'In all thy beauties dreſt.

XI.

'He bade Ilyſſus' tuneful ſtream
'Convey thy philoſophick theme
'Of PERFECT, FAIR, and GOOD:
'Attentive Athens caught the ſound,
'And all her liſt'ning ſons around
'In awful ſilence ſtood:

XII.

'Reclaim'd her wild licentious youth,
'Confeſs'd the potent voice of Truth,
'And felt it's juſt controul.
'The Paſſions ceas'd their loud alarms,
'And Virtue's ſoft perſuaſive charms
'O'er all their ſenſes ſtole.

XIII.

'Thy breath in ſpires the POET'S ſong,
'The PATRIOT'S free, unbiaſs'd tongue,
'The HERO'S gen'rous ſtrife;
'Thine are RETIREMENT'S ſilent joys,
'And all the ſweet engaging ties
'Of STILL, DOMESTICK life.'

Andante. XIV.

XV.

' O ſend her ſure, her ſteady ray,
' To regulate my doubtful way
' Thro' life's perplexing road:
' The miſts of error to controul,
' And thro' it's gloom direct my ſoul
' To happineſs and good.

No. 40.

XVI.

' Beneath her clear diſcerning eye
' The viſionary ſhadows fly
' Of Folly's painted ſhow.
' She ſees thro' ev'ry fair diſguiſe,
' That all but VIRTUE's ſolid joys
' Is vanity and woe.'

LETTER X.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE TO MISS HOWE.

FRIDAY, MIDNIGHT.

I Have now a calmer moment. Envy, ambition, high and ſelfiſh reſentment, and all the violent paſſions, are now, moſt probably, aſleep all around me; and ſhall not my own angry ones give way to the ſilent hour, and ſubſide likewiſe?—They have given way to it; and I have made uſe of the gentler ſpace to re-peruſe your laſt letters I will touch upon ſome paſſages in them. And that I may the leſs endanger the but juſt recovered calm, I will begin with what you write about Mr. Hickman.

Give me leave to ſay, that I am ſorry you cannot yet perſuade yourſelf to think better, that is to ſay, more juſtly, of that gentleman, than your whimſical picture of him ſhews you do; or, at leaſt, than the humerouſneſs of your natural vein would make one think you do.

I do not imagine, that you yourſelf will ſay, he ſat for the picture you have drawn. And yet, upon the whole, it is not greatly to his diſadvantage. Were I at eaſe in my mind, I would venture to draw a much more amiable and juſt likeneſs.

If Mr. Hickman has not that aſſurance which ſome men have, he has that humanity and gentleneſs which many want: and which, with the infinite value he has for you, will make him one of the fitteſt huſbands in the world for a perſon of your vivacity and ſpirit.

Although you ſay I would not like him myſelf, I do aſſure you, if Mr. Solmes were ſuch a man as Mr. Hickman, in perſon, mind, and behaviour, my friends and I had never diſagreed about him, if they would not have permitted me to live ſingle; Mr. Lovelace (having ſuch a character as he has) would have ſtood no chance with me. This I can the more boldly aver, becauſe I plainly perceive, that of the two paſſions, love and fear, this man will be able to inſpire one with a much greater proportion of the latter, than I imagine is compatible with the former to make a happy marriage.

I am glad you own, that you like no one better than Mr. Hickman. In a little while, I make no doubt, you will be able, if you challenge your heart upon it, to acknowledge, that you like not any man ſo well: eſpecially, when you come to conſider, that the very faults you find in Mr. Hickman, admirably fit him to make you happy; that is to ſay, if it be neceſſary to your happineſs, that you ſhould have your own will in every thing.

But let me add one thing: and that is this.—You have ſuch a ſprightly turn, that, with your admirable talents, you would make any man in the world, who loved you, look like a fool, except he were ſuch a one as Lovelace.

Forgive me, my dear, for my frankneſs: and forgive me alſo, for ſo ſoon returning to ſubjects ſo immediately relative to myſelf, as thoſe I now muſt touch upon.

You again inſiſt (ſtrengthened by Mr. Lovelace's opinion) upon my aſſuming my own eſtate: [I cannot call it reſuming, having never been in poſſeſſion of it] and I have given you room to expect, that I will conſider this ſubject more cloſely than I have done before. I muſt however own, that the reaſons which I had to offer againſt taking your advice, were ſo obvious, that I thought you would have ſeen them yourſelf, and been determined by them, againſt your own haſtier counſel.—But ſince this has not been ſo, and that both you and Mr. Lovelace call upon me to aſſume my own eſtate, I will enter briefly into the ſubject.

In the firſt place, let me aſk you, my dear, ſuppoſing I were inclined to follow your advice, whom have I to ſupport me in my demand? My uncle Harlowe is one of my truſtees—He is againſt me. My couſin Morden is the other—He is in Italy, and very probably may be ſet againſt me too. My brother has declared, that they are reſolved to carry their point before he arrives: ſo that, as they drive on, all will probably be decided before I can have an anſwer from him, were I to write. And, confined as I am, were the anſwer to come in time, and they did not like it, they would keep it from me.

In the next place, parents have great advantages in every eye over the child, if ſhe diſpute their pleaſure in the diſpoſing of her: and ſo they ought; ſince out of twenty inſtances, perhaps two could not be produced, when they were not in the right, the child in the wrong.

You would not, I am ſure, have me accept of Mr. Lovelace's offered aſſiſtance in ſuch a claim. If I would embrace any other perſon's, who elſe would care to appear for a child againſt parents, ever, till of late, ſo affectionate? —But were ſuch a protector to be found, what a length of time would it take up in a courſe of litigation? The will and the deeds deeds have flaws in them, they ſay. My brother ſometimes talks of going to reſide at the Grove: I ſuppoſe, with a deſign to make ejectments neceſſary, were I to offer at aſſuming; or, were I to marry Mr. Lovelace, in order to give him all the oppoſition and difficulty the law would help him to give.

Theſe caſes I have put to myſelf, for argument-ſake: but they are all out of the queſtion, although any-body were to be found who would eſpouſe my cauſe: for I do aſſure you, I would ſooner beg my bread, than litigate for my right with my father; ſince I am convinced, that whether the parent do his duty by the child or not, the child cannot be excuſed from doing hers to him. And to go to law with my father, what a ſound has that? You will ſee, that I have mentioned my wiſh (as an alternative, and as a favour) to be permitted, if I muſt be put out of his houſe, to go thither: but not one ſtep further can I go. And you ſee how this is reſented.

Upon the whole, then, what have I to hope for, but a change in my father's reſolution?—And is there any probability of that; ſuch an aſcendency as my brother and ſiſter have obtained over every-body; and ſuch an intereſt to purſue the enmity they have now openly avowed againſt me?

As to Mr. Lovelace's approbation of your aſſumption-ſcheme, I wonder not at. He very probably penetrates the difficulties I ſhould have to bring it to effect, without his aſſiſtance. Were I to find myſelf as free as I would wiſh myſelf to be, perhaps Mr. Lovelace would ſtand a worſe chance with me than his vanity may permit him to imagine; notwithſtanding the pleaſure you take in rallying me on his account. How know you, but all that appears to be ſpecious and reaſonable in his offers; ſuch as, ſtanding his chance for my favour, after I became independent, as I may call it; [by which I mean no more, than to have the liberty of refuſing for my huſband a man whom it hurts me but to think of in that light] and ſuch as his not viſiting me but by my leave; and till Mr. Morden come; and till I am ſatisfied of his reformation—How know you, I ſay, that he gives not himſelf theſe airs purely to ſtand better in your graces as well as mine, by offering of his own accord conditions which he muſt needs think would be inſiſted on, were the caſe to happen?

Then am I utterly diſpleaſed with him. To threaten as he threatens; yet to pretend, that it is not to intimidate me; and to beg of you not to tell me, when he muſt know you would, and no doubt intended that you ſhould, is ſo meanly artful!—The man muſt think he has a frighted fool to deal with.—I, to join my hands with ſuch a man of violence! my own brother the man whom he threatens!—And what has Mr. Solmes done to him?—Is he to be blamed, if he thinks a perſon would make a wife worth having, to endeavour to obtain her?—O that my friends would but leave me to my own way in this one point! For have I given the man ſufficient encouragement to ground theſe threats upon? Were Mr. Solmes a man to whom I could be but indifferent, it might be found, that to have the merit of a ſufferer given him from ſuch a flaming ſpirit, would very little anſwer the views of that ſpirit. It is my fortune to be treated as a fool by my brother: but Mr. Lovelace ſhall find—Yet I will let him know my mind; and then it will come with a better grace to your knowledge.

Mean time, give me leave to tell you, that it goes againſt me, in my cooler moments, unnatural as my brother is to me, to have you, my dear, who are my other ſelf, write ſuch very ſevere reflections upon him, in relation to the advantage Lovelace had over him. He is not indeed your brother: but remember, that you write to his ſiſter.—Upon my word, my dear Miſs Howe, you dip your pen in gall whenever you are offended: and I am almoſt ready to queſtion, when I read ſome of your expreſſions againſt others of my relations as well as him, (although in my favour) whether you are ſo thoroughly warranted by your own patience, as you think yourſelf, to call other people to account for their warmth. Should we not be particularly careful to keep clear of the faults we cenſure?—And yet I am ſo angry at my brother and ſiſter, that I ſhould not have taken this liberty with my dear friend, notwithſtanding I know you never loved them, had you not made ſo light of ſo ſhocking a tranſaction, where a brother's life was at ſtake: when his credit in the eye of the miſchievous ſex has received a ſtill deeper wound than he perſonally ſuſtained; and when a revival of the ſame wicked reſentments (which may end more fatally) is threatened.

His credit, I ſay, in the eye of the miſchievous ſex: who is not warranted to call it ſo; when it is reckoned among the men ſuch an extraordinary piece of ſelf-conqueſt (as the two libertines his companions gloried) to reſolve never to give a challenge; and among whom duelling is ſo faſhionable a part of brutal bravery, that the man of temper, who is, moſtly, I believe, the truly brave man, is often at a loſs ſo to behave as to avoid incurring either a mortal guilt, or a general contempt?

To enlarge a little upon this ſubject, may we not infer, that thoſe who would be guilty of throwing theſe contempts upon a man of temper, who would rather paſs by a verbal injury, than to embrue his hands in blood, know not the meaſure of true magnanimity? nor how much nobler it is to forgive, and even how much more manly to deſpiſe, than to reſent an injury? Were I a man, methinks, I ſhould have too much ſcorn for a perſon, who could wilfully do me a mean wrong, to put a value upon his life, equal to what I put upon my own. What an abſurdity, becauſe a man had done me a ſmall injury, that I ſhould put it in his power (at leaſt to an equal riſque) to do me, and thoſe who love me, an irreparable one?—Were it not a wilful injury, nor avowed to be ſo, there could not be room for reſentment.

How willingly would I run away from myſelf, and what moſt concerns myſelf, if I could! This digreſſion brings me back again to the occaſion of it.—And that to the impatience I was in, when I ended my laſt letter, for my ſituation is not altered. I renew therefore my former earneſtneſs, as the new day approaches, and will bring with it perhaps new trials, that you will (as undiveſtedly as poſſible of favour or reſentment) tell me what you would have me do:—for, if I am obliged to go to my uncle Antony's, all, I doubt, will be over with me. Yet how to avoid it—That's the difficulty!

I ſhall depoſit this the firſt thing. When you have it, loſe no time, I pray you, to adviſe (leſt it be too late) your ever-obliged CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XI.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

SATURDAY, MARCH 25.

WHAT can I adviſe you to do, my noble creature? Your merit is your crime. You can no more change your nature, than your perſecutors can theirs. Your diſtreſs is owing to the vaſt diſparity between you and them. What would you have of them? Do they not act in character?—And to whom? To an alien. You are not one of them. They have two dependencies in their hope to move you to compliance—Upon their impenetrableneſs one; [I'd give it a more proper name, if I dared] the other, on the regard you have always had for your character, [Have they not heretofore owned as much?] and upon your apprehenſions from that of Lovelace, which would diſcredit you, ſhould you take any ſtep by his means to extricate yourſelf. Then they know, that reſentment and unperſuadableneſs are not natural to you; and that the anger they have wrought you up to, will ſubſide; as all extraordinaries ſoon do; and that once married, you will make the beſt of it.

But ſurely your father's ſon and eldeſt daughter have a view (by communicating to ſo narrow a ſoul all they know of your juſt averſion to him) to entail unhappineſs for life upon you, were you to have the man who is already more nearly related to them, than ever he can be to you, although the ſhocking compulſion ſhould take place.

As to that wretch's perſeverance, thoſe only, who know not the man, will wonder at it. He has not the leaſt delicacy. His principal view to marriage is not to the mind. How ſhall thoſe beauties be valued, which cannot be comprehended? Were you to be his, and ſhew a viſible want of tenderneſs to him, it is my opinion, he would not be much concerned at it. I have heard you well obſerve, from your Mrs. Norton, That a perſon who has any overruling paſſion, will compound by giving up twenty ſecondary or under-ſatisfactions, though more laudable ones, in order to have that gratified.

I'll give you the ſubſtance of a converſation [No fear you can be made to like him worſe than you do already] that paſſed between Sir Harry Downeton and this Solmes, but three days ago, as Sir Harry told it but yeſterday to my mother and me. It will confirm to you that what your ſiſter's inſolent Betty reported he ſhould ſay, of governing by fear, was not of her own head.

Sir Harry told him, he wondered he ſhould wiſh to obtain you ſo much againſt your inclination, as every-body knew it would be, if he did.

He mattered not that, he ſaid: coy maids made the fondeſt wives. [A ſorry fellow!] It would not at all grieve him to ſee a pretty woman make wry faces, if ſhe gave him cauſe to vex her. And your eſtate, by the convenience of it's ſituation, ſituation, would richly pay him for all he could bear with your ſhyneſs.

He ſhould be ſure, he ſaid, after a while, of your complaiſance, if not of your love: and in that ſhould be happier that nine parts in ten of his married acquaintance.

What a wretch is this!

For the reſt, your known virtue would be as great a ſecurity to him, as he could wiſh for.

'She will look upon you,' ſaid Sir Harry, 'if ſhe be forced to marry you, 'as Elizabeth of France did upon Philip II. of Spain, when he received her 'on his frontiers as her huſband, who 'was to have been but her father-in-'law: that is, with fear and terror, rather than with complaiſance and love. 'And you will perhaps be as ſurly to 'her, as that old monarch was to his 'young bride.'

Fear and terror, the wretch, the horrid wretch, ſaid, looked pretty in a bride as well as in a wife: and, laughing, [Yes, my dear, the hideous fellow laughed immoderately, as Sir Harry told us, when he ſaid it] It ſhould be his care to perpetuate the occaſion for that fear, if he could not think he had the love. And, truly, he was of opinion, that if LOVE and FEAR muſt be ſeparated in matrimony, the man who made himſelf feared, fared beſt.

If my eyes would carry with them the execution which the eyes of the baſiliſk are ſaid to do, I would make it my firſt buſineſs to ſee this creature.

My mother, however, ſays, it would be a prodigious merit in you, if you could get over your averſion to him. 'Where,' aſks ſhe, [as you have been aſked before] 'is the praiſe-worthineſs 'of obedience, if it be only paid in-in-'ſtances where we give up nothing?'

What a fatality, that you have no better an option—Either a Scylla or a Charybdis.

Were it not you, I ſhould know how (barbarouſly uſed as you are uſed) to adviſe you in a moment. But ſuch a noble character to ſuffer from a (ſuppoſed) raſhneſs and indiſcretion of ſuch a nature, would, as I have heretofore obſerved, be a wound to the ſex.

While I was in hope, that the aſſerting of your own independence would have helped you, I was pleaſed, that you had one reſource, as I thought: but now, that you have ſo well proved, that ſuch a ſtep would not avail you, I am entirely at a loſs what to ſay.

I will lay down my pen, and think.

I HAVE conſidered, and conſidered again; but, I proteſt, I know no more what to ſay now, than before Only this, that I am young, like yourſelf; and have a much weaker judgment, and ſtronger paſſions, than you have.

I have heretofore ſaid, that you have offered as much as you ought, in offering to live ſingle. If you were never to marry, the eſtate they are ſo loth ſhould go out of their name, would, in time, I ſuppoſe, revert to your brother: and he or his would have it, perhaps, much more certainly this way, than by the precarious reverſions which Solmes makes them hope for. Have you put this into their odd heads, my dear?—The tyrant word AUTHORITY, as they uſe it, can be the only objection againſt this offer.

One thing you muſt conſider, that, if you leave your parents, your duty and love will not ſuffer you to juſtify yourſelf by an appeal againſt them; and ſo you'll have the world againſt you. And ſhould Lovelace continue his wild life, and behave ungratefully to you, will not his baſeneſs ſeem to juſtify their cruel treatment of you, as well as their diſlike of him?

May Heaven direct you for the beſt!—I can only ſay, that, for my own part, I would do any-thing, go any-whither, rather than be compelled to marry the man I hate; and (were he ſuch a man as Solmes) muſt always hate—Nor could I have borne what you have borne, if from father and uncles, not from brother and ſiſter.

My mother will have it, that after they have tried their utmoſt efforts to bring you into their meaſures, and find them ineffectual, they will recede. But I cannot ſay I am of her mind. She does not own, ſhe has any other authority for this, but her own conjecture. I ſhould otherwiſe have hoped, that your uncle Antony and ſhe had been in one ſecret, and that favourable to you: woe be to one of them at leaſt [To your uncle to be ſure I mean] if they ſhould be in any other!

You muſt, if poſſible, avoid being carried to that uncle's. The man, the parſon, your brother and ſiſter preſent!—they'll certainly there marry you to the wretch. Nor will your newly-raiſed ſpirit ſupport you in your reſiſtance on ſuch an occaſion. Your meekneſs will return; and you will have nothing for it but tears [Tears deſpiſed by them all] and ineffectual appeals and lamentations:—and theſe tears, when the ceremony mony is profaned, you muſt ſuddenly dry up; and endeavour to diſpoſe yourſelf to ſuch an humble frame of mind, as may induce your new-made lord to forgive all your paſt declarations of averſion.

In ſhort, my dear, you muſt then blandiſh him over with a confeſſion, that all your paſt behaviour was maidenly reſerve only: and it will be your part to convince him of the truth of his impudent ſarcaſm, That the coyeſt maids make the fondeſt wives. Thus will you enter the ſtate with a high ſenſe of obligation to his forgiving goodneſs: and if you will not be kept to it by that fear, by which he propoſes to govern, I am much miſtaken.

Yet, after all, I muſt leave the point undetermined, and only to be determined, as you find they recede from their avowed purpoſe, or reſolve to remove you to your uncle Antony's. But I muſt repeat my wiſhes, that ſomething may fall out, that neither of theſe men may call you his!—And may you live ſingle, my deareſt friend, till ſome man ſhall offer, that may be worthy of you, as man can be!

But yet, methinks, I would not, that you, who are ſo admirably qualified to adorn the married ſtate, ſhould be always ſingle. You know I am incapable of flattery; and that I always ſpeak and write the ſincere dictates of my heart. Nor can you, from what you muſt know of your own merit, (taken only in a comparative light with others) doubt my ſincerity. For why ſhould a perſon who delights to find out and admire every-thing that is praiſe-worthy in another, be ſuppoſed ignorant of like perfections in herſelf, when ſhe could not ſo much admire them in another, if ſhe had them not herſelf? And why may not I give her thoſe praiſes, which ſhe would give to any other, who had but half of her excellencies?—Eſpecially when ſhe is incapable of pride and vainglory; and neither deſpiſes others for the want of her fine qualities, nor overvalues herſelf upon them?—Over-values, did I ſay!—How can that be?

Forgive me, my beloved friend. My admiration of you (increaſed, as it is, by every letter you write) will not always be held down in ſilence; although, in order to avoid offending you, I generally endeavour to keep it from flowing to my pen, when I write to you, or to my lips, whenever I have the happineſs to be in your company.

I will add nothing (though I could an hundred things on account of your lateſt communications) but that I am your ever affectionate and faithful,

ANNA HOWE.

I hope I have pleaſed you with my diſpatch. I wiſh I had been able to pleaſe you with my requeſted advice.

You have given new beauties to the charming ode which you have tranſmitted to me. What pity that the wretches you have to deal with, put you out of your admirable courſe; in the purſuit of which, like the ſun, you was wont to cheer and illuminate all you ſhone upon!

LETTER XII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 26.

HOW ſoothing a thing is praiſe from thoſe we love!—Whether conſcious or not of deſerving it, it cannot but give us great delight, to ſee ourſelves ſtand high in the opinion of thoſe whoſe favour we are ambitious to cultivate. An ingenuous mind will make this farther uſe of it, that if he be ſenſible, that it does not already deſerve the charming attributes, it will haſten (before it's friend finds herſelf miſtaken) to obtain the graces it is complimented for: and this it will do, as well in honour to itſelf, as to preſerve it's friend's opinion, and juſtify her judgment. May this be always my aim!—And then you will not only give the praiſe, but the merit; and I ſhall be more worthy of that friendſhip, which is the only pleaſure I have to boaſt of.

Moſt heartily I thank you for the kind diſpatch of your laſt favour. How much am I indebted to you! and even to your honeſt ſervant!—Under what obligations does my unhappy ſituation lay me!

But let me anſwer the kind contents of it as well as I may.

As to getting over my diſguſts to Mr. Solmes, it is impoſſible to be done; while he wants generoſity, frankneſs of heart, benevolence, manners, and every qualification that diſtinguiſhes the worthy man. O my dear! what a degree of patience, what a greatneſs of ſoul, is required in the wife, not to deſpiſe a huſband who is more ignorant, more illiterate, more low-minded, than herſelf!—The wretch, veſted with prerogatives, who will claim rule in virtue of them; (and not to permit whoſe claim will be as diſgraceful to the preſcribing wife as to the governed huſband) how ſhall ſhall ſuch a huſband as this be borne, were he, for reaſons of convenience and intereſt, even to be our CHOICE? But, to be compelled to have ſuch a one, and that compulſion to ariſe from motives as unworthy of the preſcribers as of the preſcribed, who can think of getting over an averſion ſo juſtly founded? How much eaſier to bear the temporary perſecutions I labour under, becauſe temporary, than to reſolve to be ſuch a man's for life? Were I to comply, muſt I not leave my relations, and go to him? A month will decide the one, perhaps: but what a duration of woe will the other be!—Every day, it is likely, riſing to witneſs to ſome new breach of an altar-vowed duty!

Then, my dear, the man ſeems already to be meditating vengeance againſt me for an averſion I cannot help: for yeſterday my fancy goalereſs aſſured me, That all my oppoſitions would not ſignify that pinch of ſnuff, holding out her genteel finger and thumb: that I muſt have Mr. Solmes: that, therefore, I had not beſt carry my jeſt too far; for that Mr. Solmes was a man of ſpirit, and had told HER, that as I ſhould ſurely be his, I acted very unpolitely; ſince, if he had not more mercy [that was her word; I know not if it were his] than I had, I might have cauſe to repent the uſage I gave him to the laſt day of my life.

But enough of this man; who by what you repeat from Sir Harry Downeton, has all the inſolence of his ſex, without any one quality to make that inſolence tolerable.

I have received two letters from Mr. Lovelace, ſince his viſit to you; which make three that I have not anſwered. I doubt not his being very uneaſy; but in his laſt he complains in high terms of my ſilence; not in the ſtill ſmall voice, or rather ſtile of an humble lover, but in a ſtile like that which would probably be uſed by a ſlighted protector. And his pride is again touched, that like a thief, or eves-dropper, he is forced to dodge about in hopes of a letter, and return five miles (and then to an inconvenient loding) without any.

His letters, and the copy of mine to him, ſhall ſoon attend you: till when, I will give you the ſubſtance of what I wrote him yeſterday.

I take him ſeverely to taſk for his freedom in threatening me, through you, with a viſit to Mr. Solmes, or to my brother. I ſay, That, ſurely, I muſt be thought to be a creature fit to bear anything; that violence and menaces from ſome of my own family are not enough for me to bear, in order to make me avoid him; but that I muſt have them from him too, if I oblige thoſe to whom it is both my inclination and duty to oblige in every-thing that is reaſonable, and in my power.

Very extraordinary, I tell him, that a violent ſpirit ſhall threaten to do a raſh and unjuſtifiable thing, which concerns me but a little, and himſelf a great deal, if I do not ſomething as raſh, my character and ſex conſidered, to divert him from it.

I even hint, that, however it would affect me, were any miſchief to happen on my account, yet there are perſons, as far as I know, who in my caſe would not think there would be reaſon for much regret, were ſuch a committed raſhneſs as he threatens Mr. Solmes with, to rid her of two perſons whom had ſhe never known, ſhe had never been unhappy.

This is plain-dealing, my dear: and I ſuppoſe he will put it into ſtill plainer Engliſh for me.

I take his pride to taſk, on his diſdaining to watch for my letters; and for his eves-dropping language: and ſay, That, ſurely he has the leſs reaſon to think ſo hardly of his ſituation; ſince his faulty morals are the cauſe of all; and ſince faulty morals deſervedly level all diſtinction, and bring down rank and birth to the Canaille, and to the neceſſity which he ſo much regrets, of appearing (if I muſt deſcend to his language) as an eves-dropper and a thief. And then I forbid him ever to expect another letter from me that is to ſubject him to ſuch diſgraceful hardſhips.

As to the ſolemn vows and proteſtations he is ſo ready, upon all occaſions, to make, they have the leſs weight with me, I tell him, as they give a kind of demonſtration, that he himſelf, from his own character, thinks there is reaſon to make them. Deeds are to be the only evidence of intentions. And I am more and more convinced of the neceſſity of breaking off a correſpondence with a perſon, whoſe addreſſes I ſee it is impoſſible either to expect my friends to encourage, or him to appear to wiſh that they ſhould think him worthy of encouragement.

What, therefore, I repeatedly deſire is, That ſince his birth, alliances, and expectations, are ſuch as will at any time, if his immoral character be not an objection, procure him at leaſt equal advantages in a woman whoſe taſte and inclinations inclinations moreover might be better adapted to his own; I inſiſt upon it, as well as adviſe it, that he give up all thoughts of me: and the rather, as he has all along (by his threatening and unpolite behaviour to my friends, and whenever he ſpeaks of them) given me reaſon to conclude, that there is more malice to them, than regard to me, in his perſeverance.

This is the ſubſtance of the letter I have written to him.

The man, to be ſure, muſt have the penetration to obſerve, that my correſpondence with him hitherto is owing more to the ſeverity I meet with, than to a very high value for him. And ſo I would have him think. What a worſe than Moloch deity is that, which expects an offering of reaſon, duty, and diſcretion, to be made to it's ſhrine!

Your mother is of opinion, you ſay, that at laſt my friends will relent. Heaven grant that they may!—But my brother and ſiſter have ſuch an influence over every-body, and are ſo determined; ſo pique themſelves upon ſubduing me, and carrying their point; that I deſpair that they will—And yet, if they do not, I frankly own, I would not ſcruple to throw myſelf upon any not diſreputable protection, by which I might avoid my preſent perſecutions, on one hand, and not give Mr. Lovelace advantage over me, on the other—That is to ſay, were there manifeſtly no other way left me: for, if there were, I ſhould think the leaving my father's houſe, without his conſent, one of the moſt inexcuſeable actions I could be guilty of, were the protection to be ever ſo unexceptionable; and this notwithſtanding the independent fortune willed me by my grandfather. And indeed I have often reflected with a degree of indignation and diſdain, upon the thoughts of what a low, ſelfiſh creature that child muſt be, who is to be reined in only by the hopes of what a parent can or will do for her.

But notwithſtanding all this, I owe it to the ſincerity of friendſhip to confeſs, that I know not what I ſhould have done, had your advice been concluſive anyway. Had you, my dear, been witneſs to my different emotions, as I read your letter, when, in one place, you adviſe me of my danger, if I am carried to my uncle's; in another, when you own you could not bear what I bear, and would do any-thing rather than marry the man you hate; yet, in another, repreſent to me my reputation ſuffering in the world's eye; and the neceſſity I ſhould be under to juſtify my conduct, at the expence of my friends, were I take a raſh ſtep; in another, inſinuate the diſhoneſt figure I ſhould be forced to make, in ſo compelled a matrimony; endeavouring to cajole, fawn upon, and play the hypocrite with a man to whom I have an averſion; who would have reaſon to believe me an hypocrite, as well from my former avowals, as from the ſenſe he muſt have (if common ſenſe he has) of his own demerits—The neceſſity you think there would be for me, the more averſe I really was, to ſeem the fonder of him: a fondneſs (were I capable of ſo much diſſimulation) that would be imputable to diſgraceful motives; as it would be too viſible, that love, either of perſon or mind, could be neither of them—Then his undoubted, his even conſtitutional narrowneſs; his too probable jealouſy, and unforgivingneſs, bearing in his mind my declared averſion, and the unfeigned deſpights I took all opportunities to do him, in order to diſcourage his addreſs: a preference avowed againſt him from the ſame motive: with the pride he profeſſes to take in curbing and ſinking the ſpirits of a woman he had acquired a right to tyrannize over: had you, I ſay, been witneſs of my different emotions as I read; now leaning this way, now that; now perplexed; now apprehenſive; now angry at one, then at another; now reſolving; now doubting—you would have ſeen the power you have over me; and would have had reaſon to believe, that, had you given your advice in any determined or poſitive manner, I had been ready to have been concluded by it. So, my dear, you will find, from theſe acknowledgments, that you muſt juſtify me to thoſe laws of friendſhip, which require undiſguiſed frankneſs of heart; although your juſtification of me in that particular, will perhaps be at the expence of my prudence.

But, upon the whole, this I do repeat—That nothing but the laſt extremity ſhall make me abandon my father's houſe, if they will permit me to ſtay; and if I can, by any means, by any honeſt pretences, but keep off my evil deſtiny in it till my couſin Morden arrives. As one of my truſtees, his is a protection, into which I may without diſcredit throw myſelf, if my other friends ſhall remain determined. And this (although they ſeem too well aware of it) is all my hope: for, as to Lovelace, were I to be ſure of his tenderneſs, and even of his reformation, muſt not the thoughts of embracing the offered protection of his family, be the same thing in the world's eye, as accepting of his own?—Could I avoid receiving his visits at his own relations? Must I not be his, whatever (on seeing him in a nearer light) I should find him out to be? For you know, it has always been my observation, that very few people in courtship see each other as they are. Oh! my dear! how wise have I endeavoured to be! how anxious to chuse, and to avoid everything, precautiously, as I may say, that might make me happy, or unhappy; yet all my wisdom now, by a strange fatality, likely to become foolishness!

Then you tell me, in your usual kindly-partial manner, what is expected of me, more than would be of some others. This should be a lesson to me. Whatever my motives were, the world would not know them: to complain of a brother's unkindness, that, indeed, I might do; differences between brothers and sisters, where interests clash, but too commonly arise; but where the severe father cannot be separated from the faulty brother; who could bear to lighten herself, by loading a father?—Then, in this particular case, must not the hatred Mr. Lovelace expresses to every one of my family, (although in return for their hatred of him) shock one extremely? Must it not shew, that there is something implacable, as well as highly unpolite in his temper?—And what creature can think of marrying so as to be out of all hopes ever to be well with her own nearest and tendrest relations?

But here, having tired myself, and I dare say you, I will lay down my pen.

Mr. Solmes is almost continually here: so is my aunt Hervey; so are my two uncles. Something is working against me, I doubt. What an uneasy state is suspence!—When a naked sword, too, seems hanging over one's head!

I hear nothing but what this confident creature Betty throws out in the wantonness of office. Now it is, 'Why, 'Miss, don't you look up your things? 'You'll be called upon, depend upon 'it, before you are aware.' Another time she intimates darkly, and in broken sentences, (as if on purpose to teaze me) what one says, what another; with their enquiries how I dispose of my time? And my brother's insolent question comes frequently in, Whether I am not writing a history of my sufferings?

But I am now used to her pertness; and as it is only through that, that I can hear of any-thing intended against me, before it is to be put in execution; and as, when she is most impertinent, she pleads a commission for it; I bear with her; yet, now-and-then, not without a little of the heart-burn.

I will depositt thus far. Adieu, my dear. Cl. Harlowe.

Written on the cover, after she went down, with a pencil:

On coming down, I found your second letter of yesterday's date. I have read it; and am in hopes that the inclosed will in a great measure answer your mother's expectations of me.

My most respectful acknowledgments to her for it, and for her very kind admonitions.

You'll read to her what you please of the inclosed.

LETTER XIII.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

SAT. MARCH 25.

I Follow my last of this date by command. I mentioned in my former, my mother's opinion of the merit you would have, if you could oblige your friends against your own inclination. Our conference upon this subject was introduced by the conversation we had had with Sir Harry Downeton; and my mother thinks it of so much importance, that she enjoins me to give you the particulars of it. I the rather comply, as I was unable in my last to tell what to advise you to; and as you will in this recital have my mother's opinion at least; and, perhaps, in hers, what the world's would be, were it only to know what she knows; and not so much as I know.

My mother argues upon this case in a most discouraging manner for all such of our sex as look forward for happiness in marriage with the man of their choice.

Only, that I know, she has a side-view to her daughter; who, at the same time that she now prefers no one to another, values not the man her mother most regards, of one farthing; or I should lay it more to heart.

'What is there in it,' says she, 'that 'all this bustle is about? Is it such a 'mighty matter for a young woman to 'give up her inclinations to oblige her 'friends?'

'Very well, mamma!' thought I. 'Now, may you ask this—At FORTY,

'you may—But what would you have 'said at EIGHTEEN, is the queſtion?'

'Either,' ſaid ſhe, 'the lady muſt be 'thought to have very violent inclina-'tions, [and what nice young creature 'would have that ſuppoſed?] which ſhe 'could not give up; or a very ſtubborn 'will, which ſhe would not; or, thirdly, 'have parents ſhe was indifferent about 'obliging.'

You know my mother now-and-then argues very notably; always very warmly at leaſt. I happen often to differ from her; and we both think ſo well of our own arguments, that we very ſeldom are ſo happy as to convince one another. A pretty common caſe, I believe, in all vehement debatings. She ſays, I am too witty; Anglicé, too pert: I, that ſhe is too wiſe; that is to ſay, being likewiſe put into Engliſh, Not ſo young as ſhe has been: in ſhort, is grown ſo much into mother, that ſhe has forgotten ſhe ever was a daughter. So, generally, we call another cauſe by conſent—Yet fall into the old one half a dozen times over, without conſent—Quitting and reſuming, with half-angry faces, forced into a ſmile, that there might be ſome room to piece together again: but go to-bed, if bed-time, a little ſullen nevertheleſs; or, if we ſpeak, her ſilence is broken with an 'Ah, Nancy! You are 'ſo lovely! ſo quick! I wiſh you were 'leſs like your papa, child!'

I pay it off with thinking, that my mother has no reaſon to diſclaim her ſhare in her Nancy: and if the matter go off with greater ſeverity on her ſide than I wiſh for, then her favourite Hickman fares the worſe for it next day.

I know I am a ſaucy creature. I know, if I do not ſay ſo, you will think ſo. So no more of this juſt now. What I mention it for, is to tell you, that on this ſerious occaſion I will omit, if I can, all that paſſed between us, that had an air of flippancy on my part, or quickneſs on my mother's, to let you into the cool and the cogent of the converſation.

'Look through the families,' ſaid ſhe, 'which we both know, where the man 'and woman have been ſaid to marry 'for love; which (at the time it is ſo 'called) is perhaps no more than a paſ-'ſion begun in folly or thoughtleſſneſs, 'and carried on from a ſpirit of perverſe-'neſs and oppoſition,' [Here we had a parenthetical debate, which I omit;] 'and ſee, if they appear to be happier 'than thoſe whoſe principal inducement 'to marry has been convenience, or to 'oblige their friends; or even whether 'they are generally ſo happy: for conve-

'nience and duty, where obſerved, will 'afford a permanent and even an increaſ-'ing ſatisfaction, (as well at the time, 'as upon the reflection) which ſeldom 'fail to reward themſelves: while love, 'if love be the motive, is an idle paſſion.' [Idle in ONE SENSE my mother cannot ſay; for love is as buſy as a monkey, and as miſ-chievous as a ſchool-boy]—'It is a fervor, 'that, like all other fervors, laſts but a 'little while after marriage; a bow over-'ſtrained, that ſoon returns to it's na-'tural bent.

'As it is founded generally upon mere 'notional excellences, which were un-'known to the perſons themſelves till 'attributed to either by the other; one, 'two, or three months, uſually ſets all 'right on both ſides; and then with 'opened eyes they think of each other—'juſt as every-body elſe thought of them 'before.

'The lovers imaginaries' [her own notable word!] 'are by that time gone 'off; nature and old habits (painfully 'diſpenſed with or concealed) return: 'diſguiſes thrown aſide, all the moles, 'freckles, and defects in the minds of 'each, diſcover themſelves; and 'tis 'well if each do not ſink in the opinion 'of the other, as much below the com-'mon ſtandard, as the blinded imagina-'tion of both had ſet them above it. 'And now,' ſaid ſhe, 'the fond pair, 'who knew no felicity out of each 'other's company, are ſo far from 'finding the never-ending variety each 'had propoſed in an unreſtrained con-'verſation with the other, (when they 'ſeldom were together; and always 'parted with ſomething to ſay; or, on 'recollection, when parted, wiſhing 'they had ſaid) that they are continually 'on the wing in purſuit of amuſements 'out of themſelves; and thoſe,' concluded my ſage mamma, [did you think her wiſdom ſo very modern?] 'will perhaps 'be the livelier to each, in which the 'other has no ſhare.'

I told my mother, that if you were to take any raſh ſtep, it would be owing to the indiſcreet violence of your friends. I was afraid, I ſaid, that theſe reflections upon the conduct of people in the married ſtate, who might ſet out with better hopes, were but too well grounded: but that this muſt be allowed me, that if children weighed not theſe matters ſo thoroughly as they ought, neither did parents make thoſe allowances for youth, inclination, and inexperience, which had been found neceſſary to be made for themſelves at their childrens time of life.

I remembered a letter, I told her, hereupon, which you wrote a few months ago, perſonating an anonymous elderly lady, (in Mr. Wyerley's day of plaguing you) to Miſs Drayton's mother, who, by her ſeverity and reſtraints, had like to have driven the young lady into the very fault againſt which her mother was moſt ſolicitous to guard her. And I dared to ſay, ſhe would be pleaſed with it.

I fetched the firſt draught of it, which, at my requeſt, you obliged me with at the time; and read the whole letter to my mother. But the following paſſage ſhe made me read twice. I think you once told me you had not a copy of this letter.

'Permit me, Madam,' [ſays the perſonated grave writer] 'to obſerve, that 'if perſons of your experience would 'have young people look forward, in 'order to be wiſer and better by their 'advice, it would be kind in them to 'look backward, and allow for their 'childrens youth, and natural vivacity; 'in other words, for their lively hopes, 'unabated by time, unaccompanied by 'reflection, and unchecked by diſap-'pointment. Things appear to us all 'in a very different light at our entrance 'upon a favourite party, or tour; when, 'with golden proſpects, and high ex-'pectations, we riſe vigorous and freſh, 'like the ſun beginning it's morning 'courſe; from what they do, when we 'ſit down at the end of our views, tired, 'and preparing for our journey home-'ward: for then we take into our re-'flection, what we had left out in proſpect, 'the fatigues, the checks, the hazards, 'we had met with; and make a true 'eſtimate of pleaſures, which from our 'raiſed expectations muſt neceſſarily 'have fallen miſerably ſhort of what we 'had promiſed ourſelves at ſetting out— 'Nothing but experience can give us a 'ſtrong and efficacious conviction of this 'difference: and when we would incul-'cate the fruits of that upon the minds 'of thoſe we love, who have not lived 'long enough to find thoſe fruits; and 'would hope, that our advice ſhould 'have as much force upon them, as expe-'rience has upon us; and which, per-'haps, our parents advice had not upon 'ourſelves at our daughters time of life; 'ſhould we not proceed by patient rea-'ſoning and gentleneſs, that we may not 'harden, where we would convince? 'For, Madam, the tendereſt and moſt 'generous minds, when harſhly treated, 'become generally the moſt inflexible. 'If the young lady knows her heart to be 'right, however defective her head may 'be for want of years and experience, 'ſhe will be apt to be very tenacious. 'And if ſhe believes her friends to be 'wrong, although perhaps they may be 'only ſo in their methods of treating her, 'how much will every unkind circum-'ſtance on the parent's part, or heedleſs 'one on the child's, though ever ſo 'ſlight in itſelf, widen the difference! 'The parent's prejudice in diſ-favour, 'will confirm the daughter's in favour, 'of the ſame perſon; and the beſt reaſon-'ings in the world on either ſide, will 'be attributed to that prejudice. In 'ſhort, neither of them will be convinc-'ed: a perpetual oppoſition enſues; the 'parent grows impatient; the child deſ-'perate, and, as a too natural conſe-'quence, that falls out which the mo-'ther was moſt afraid of, and which 'poſſibly had not happened, if the child's 'paſſions had been only led, not driven.'

My mother was pleaſed with the whole letter; and ſaid, It deſerved to have the ſucceſs it met with. But aſked me what excuſe could be offered for a young lady capable of making ſuch reflections, (and who at her time of life could ſo well aſ-ſume the character of one of riper years) if ſhe ſhould ruſh into any fatal miſtake herſelf?

She then touched upon the moral cha-racter of Mr. Lovelace; and how rea-ſonable the averſion of your relations is, to a man who gives himſelf the liberties he is ſaid to take; and who indeed him-ſelf denies not the accuſation; having been heard to declare, that he will do all the miſchief he can to the ſex, in re-venge for the ill-uſage and broken vows of his firſt love, at a time when he was too young [his own expreſſion it ſeems] to be inſincere.

I replied, That I had heard every one ſay, that the lady meant, really uſed him ill; that it affected him ſo much at the time, that he was forced to travel upon it; and to drive her out of his heart, ran into courſes which he had ingenu-ouſneſs enough himſelf to condemn: that, however, he had denied that he had thrown out ſuch menaces againſt the ſex when charged with them by me in your preſence; and declared himſelf in-capable of ſo unjuſt and ungenerous a reſentment againſt all, for the perfidy of one.

You remember this, my dear; as I do your innocent obſervation upon it, That you could believe his ſolemn aſſe-veration and denial: 'For ſurely,' ſaid you, 'the man who would reſent, as the 'higheſt indignity that could be offered 'to a gentleman, the imputation of a

'wilful falſhood, would not be guilty of 'one.'

I inſiſted upon the extraordinary circumſtances in your caſe; particularizing them. I took notice, that Mr. Lovelace's morals were at one time no objection with your relations for Arabella: that then much was built upon his family, and more upon his parts and learning, which made it out of doubt, that he might be reclaimed by a woman of virtue and prudence: and [pray forgive me for mentioning it] I ventured to add, that although your family might be good ſort of folks, as the world went, yet nobody but you imputed to any of them, a very punctilious concern for religion or piety—therefore were they the leſs entitled to object to defects of that kind in others. Then, 'What an odious man,' ſaid I, 'have they picked out to ſupplant in a 'lady's affections one of the fineſt fi'gures of a man, and one noted for his 'brilliant parts, and other accompliſh'ments, whatever his morals may be!'

Still my mother inſiſted, that there was the greater merit in your obedience on that account; and urged, that there hardly ever was a very handſome and very ſprightly man who made a tender and affectionate huſband: for that they were generally ſuch Narciſſuſes, as to imagine every woman ought to think as highly of them, as they did of themſelves.

There was no danger from that conſideration here, I ſaid, becauſe the lady had ſtill greater advantages, both of perſon and mind, than the man; graceful and elegant, as he muſt be allowed to be, beyond moſt of his ſex.

She cannot endure to hear me praiſe any man but her favourite Hickman: upon whom, nevertheleſs, ſhe generally brings a degree of contempt which he would eſcape, did ſhe not leſſen the little merit he has, by giving him, on all occaſions, more than I think he can deſerve, and entering him into compariſons in which it is impoſſible but he muſt be a ſufferer. And now [prepoſterous partiality!] ſhe thought, for her part, that Mr. Hickman, 'bating that his face indeed was not ſo ſmooth, nor his complexion quite ſo good, and ſaying that he was not ſo preſuming and ſo bold, (which ought to be no fault with a modeſt woman) equalled Mr. Lovelace at any hour of the day.

To avoid entering further into ſuch an incomparable compariſon, I ſaid, I did not believe, had they left you to your own way, and treated you generouſly, that you would have had the thought of encouraging any man whom they diſliked.

'Then, Nancy,' catching me up, 'the 'excuſe is leſs—For, if ſo, muſt there 'not be more of contradiction, than love, 'in the caſe?'

'Not ſo, neither, Madam: for I 'know Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe would 'prefer Mr. Lovelace to all men, if 'morals—'

'IF, Nancy! —That if is every'thing.—Do you really think ſhe loves 'Mr Lovelace?'

What would you have had me to ſay, my dear?—I won't tell you what I did ſay: but had I not ſaid what I did, who would have believed me?

Beſides, I know you love him!—Excuſe me, my dear: yet, if you deny it, what do you but reflect upon yourſelf, as if you thought you ought not to allow yourſelf in what you cannot help doing?

'Indeed, Madam,' ſaid I, 'the man 'is worthy of any woman's love,'—[if, again, I could ſay] 'But her parents—'

'Her parents, Nancy!'—[You know, my dear, how my mother, who accuſes her daughter of quickneſs, is evermore interrupting one!]

'May take wrong meaſures,' ſaid I.

'Cannot do wrong—They have rea'ſon, I'll warrant,' ſaid ſhe.

'By which they may provoke a young 'woman,' ſaid I, 'to do raſh things, 'which otherwiſe ſhe would not do.'

'But if it be a raſh thing,' [returned ſhe] 'ſhould ſhe do it? A prudent 'daughter will not wilfully err, becauſe 'her parents err, if they were to err: 'if ſhe do, the world which blames the 'parents, will not acquit the child. All 'that can be ſaid, in extenuation of a 'daughter's error in this caſe, ariſes 'from a kind conſideration, which Miſs 'Clary's letter to Lady Drayton pleads 'for, to be paid to her daughter's youth 'and inexperience. And will ſuch an 'admirable young perſon as Miſs Cla'riſſa Harlowe, whoſe prudence, as we 'ſee, qualifies her to be an adviſer of 'perſons much older than herſelf, take 'ſhelter under ſo poor a covert?

'Let her know, Nancy, out of hand, 'what I ſay; and I charge you to repre'ſent farther to her, That let her diſ'like one man and approve of ano'ther ever ſo much, it will be expected 'of a young lady of her unbounded 'generoſity and greatneſs of mind, that 'ſhe ſhould deny herſelf, when ſhe can 'oblige

'oblige all her family by ſo doing—No 'leſs than ten or a dozen perhaps the 'neareſt and deareſt to her of all the 'perſons in the world, an indulgent 'father and mother at the head of them. 'It may be fancy only on her ſide; but 'parents look deeper: and will not 'Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe give up her 'fancy to her parents judgment?'

I ſaid a great deal upon this judgment ſubject: all that you could wiſh I ſhould ſay; and all that your extraordinary caſe allowed me to ſay. And my mother was ſo ſenſible of the force of it, that ſhe charged me not to write to you any part of my anſwer to what ſhe ſaid; but only what ſhe herſelf had advanced; leſt, in ſo critical a caſe, it ſhould induce you to take meaſures which might give us both reaſon (me for giving it, you for following it) to repent it as long as we lived.

And thus, my dear, have I ſet my mother's arguments before you. And the rather, as I cannot myſelf tell what to adviſe you to do—You know beſt your own heart; and what that will let you do.

Robin undertakes to depoſit this very early, that you may have an opportunity to receive it by your firſt morning airing.

Heaven guide and direct you for the beſt, is the inceſſant prayer of your ever-affectionate ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XIV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON.

I AM in great apprehenſions. Yet cannot help repeating my humble thanks to your mother and you, for your laſt favour. I hope her kind end is anſwered by the contents of my laſt. Yet I muſt not think it enough to acknowledge her goodneſs to me, with a pencil only, on the cover of a letter ſealed up. A few lines give me leave to write with regard to my anonymous letter to Lady Drayton. If I did not at that time tell you, as I believe I did, that my excellent Mrs. Norton gave me her aſſiſtance in that letter, I now acknowledge that ſhe did.

Pray let your mother know this, for two reaſons: one, that I may not be thought to arrogate to myſelf a diſcretion which does not belong to me; the other, that I may not ſuffer by the ſevere, but juſt inference ſhe was pleaſed to draw; doubling my faults upon me, if I myſelf ſhould act unworthy of the advice I was ſuppoſed to give.

Before I come to what moſt nearly affects me, I muſt chide you, once more, for the ſevere, the very ſevere things you mention of our family, to the diſparagement of their MORALS. Indeed, my dear, I wonder at you!—A ſlighter occaſion might have paſſed me, after I have written to you ſo often to ſo little purpoſe, on this topick. But, affecting as my own circumſtances are, I cannot paſs by without animadverſion the reflection I need not repeat in words.

There is not a worthier woman in England than my mother, Nor is my father that man you ſometimes make him. Excepting in one point, I know not any family which lives up more to their duty, than the principals of ours. A little too uncommunicative for their great circumſtances—that is all.—Why, then, have they not reaſon to inſiſt upon unexceptionable morals in a man whoſe ſought-for relationſhip to them, by a marriage in their family, they have certainly a right either to allow of, or to diſallow?

Another line or two, before I am engroſſed by my own concerns—Upon your treatment of Mr. Hickman. Is it, do you think, generous to revenge upon an innocent perſon, the diſpleaſure you receive from another quarter, where I doubt you are a treſpaſſer too?—But one thing I could tell him; and you had not beſt provoke me to it: it is this, That no woman uſes ill the man ſhe does not abſolutely reject, but ſhe has it in her heart to make him amends when her tyranny has had it's run, and he has compleated the meaſure of his ſervices and patience. My mind is not enough at eaſe, to puſh this matter farther.

I will now give you the occaſion of my preſent apprehenſions.

I had reaſon to fear, as I mentioned in mine of this morning, that a ſtorm was brewing. Mr. Solmes came home from church this afternoon with my brother. Soon after, Betty brought me up a letter, without ſaying from whom. It was in a cover, and directed by a hand I never ſaw before; as if it were ſuppoſed that I would not receive and open it, had I known from whom it came.

Theſe are the contents—

'TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

'SUNDAY, MARCH 26.

'DEAREST MADAM,

'I THINK myſelf a moſt unhappy 'man, in that I have never yet been 'able to pay my reſpects to you with , your

'youre conſent, for one halfe-hour. I 'have ſomething to communicat to you 'that concernes you much, if you be 'pleaſed to admit me to youre ſpeech. 'Youre honour is concerned in it, and 'the honour of all youre familly. It 'relates to the deſignes of one whom 'you are ſed to valew more than he de-'ſarves; and to ſome of his reprobat 'actions; which I am reddie to give 'you convincing proofes of the truth of. 'I may appear to be intereſted in it: 'but nevertheleſſe, I am reddie to make 'oathe, that every tittle is true: and 'you will ſee what a man you are ſed to 'favour. But I hope not ſo, for your 'owne honour.

'Pray, Madam, vouchſafe me a hear-'ing, as you valew your honour and 'familly: which will oblidge, deareſt 'Miſs, your moſt humble and moſt faithful 'ſervant,' ROGER SOLMES.

'I waite below for the hope of ad-'mittance.'

I have no manner of doubt, that this is a poor device to get this man into my company. I would have ſent down a verbal anſwer; but Betty refuſed to carry any meſſage, which ſhould prohibit his viſiting me. So I was obliged either to ſee him, or to write to him. I wrote therefore an anſwer, of which I ſhall ſend you the rough draught. And now my heart aches for what may follow from it; for I hear a great hurry below.

'TO ROGER SOLMES, ESQ.

'SIR,

'WHATEVER you have to com-'municate to me, which concerns my 'honour, may as well be done by 'writing as by word of mouth. If Mr. 'Lovelace is any of my concern, I know 'not that therefore he ought to be yours: 'for the uſage I receive on your account '[I muſt think it ſo!] is ſo harſh, that were 'there not ſuch a man in the world as 'Mr. Lovelace, I would not wiſh to ſee 'Mr. Solmes, no, not for one half-hour, 'in the way he is pleaſed to be deſirous 'to ſee me. I never can be in any dan-'ger from Mr. Lovelace (and of conſe-'quence, cannot be affected by any of 'your diſcoveries) if the propoſal I 'made be accepted. You have been 'acquainted with it, no doubt. If not, 'be pleaſed to let my friends know, 'that if they will rid me of my appre-'henſions of one gentleman, I will rid 'them of theirs of another: and then of 'what conſequence to them, or to me, 'will it be, whether Mr. Lovelace be 'a good man, or a bad? And if not 'to them, nor to me, I ſee not how it can 'be of any to you. But if you do, I 'have nothing to ſay to that; and it will 'be a chriſtian part, if you will expoſ-'tulate with him upon the errors you 'have diſcovered, and endeavour to 'make him as good a man, as, no doubt, 'you are yourſelf, or you would not be 'ſo ready to detect and expoſe him.

'Excuſe me, Sir: but after my for-'mer letter to you, and your ungene-'rous perſeverance; and after this at-'tempt to avail yourſelf at the expence 'of another man's character, rather 'than by your own proper merit; I ſee 'not that you can blame any aſperity in 'her, whom you have ſo largely con-'tributed to make unhappy.

'CL. HARLOWE.'

SUNDAY NIGHT.

MY father was for coming up to me, in great wrath, it ſeems; but was perſuaded to the contrary. My aunt Hervey was permitted to ſend me this that follows.—Quick work, my dear!

'TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

'NIECE,

'EVERY-BODY is now convinced, 'that nothing is to be done with you 'by way of gentleneſs or perſuaſion. 'Your mother will not permit you to 'ſtay in the houſe; for your father is ſo 'incenſed by your ſtrange letter to his 'friend, that ſhe knows not what will be 'the conſequence if you do. So, you are 'commanded to get ready to go to your 'uncle Antony's out of hand.

'Your uncle thinks he has not de-'ſerved of you ſuch an unwillingneſs as 'you ſhew to go to his houſe.

'You don't know the wickedneſs of 'the man for whoſe ſake you think it 'worth while to quarrel with all your 'friends.

'You muſt not anſwer me. There 'will be no end of that.

'You know not the affliction you give 'to every-body; but to none more than 'to your affectionate aunt,

'DOROTHY HERVEY.'

Forbid to write to my aunt, I took a bolder liberty. I wrote a few lines to my mother; beſeeching her to procure me leave to throw myſelf at my father's feet, and hers, if I muſt go, (nobody elſe preſent) to beg pardon for the trouble I had given them both, and their bleſſings; and to receive their commands as to my removal, and the time of it, from their own lips.

'What

'What new boldneſs this!—Take it 'back; and bid her learn to obey,' was my mother's angry anſwer, with my letter returned, unopened.

But that I might omit nothing, that had an appearance of duty, I wrote a few lines to my father himſelf to the ſame purpoſe; begging that he would not turn me out of his houſe without his bleſſing. But this, torn in two pieces, and unopened, was brought me up again by Betty, with an air, one hand held up, the other extended, the torn letter in her open palm; and a 'See here!—What a 'ſad thing this is! Nothing will do but 'duty, Miſs!—Your papa ſaid, "Let "her tell me of deeds!—I'll receive no "words from her:" and ſo he tore the 'letter, and flung the pieces at my head.'

So deſperate my caſe, I was reſolved not to ſtop even at this repulſe. I took my pen and addreſſed myſelf to my uncle Harlowe, incloſing that which my mother had returned unopened, and the torn unopened one ſent to my father; having firſt hurried off a tranſcript for you.

My uncle was going home, and it was delivered to him juſt as he ſtepped into his chariot. What may be the fate of it therefore I cannot know till to-morrow.

The following is a copy of it—

'TO JOHN HARLOWE, ESQ.

'MY DEAR AND EVER-HONOURED 'UNCLE,

'I HAVE nobody now, but you to 'whom I can apply, with hope, ſo much 'as to have my humble addreſſes opened 'and read. My aunt Hervey has given 'me commands which I want to have 'explained; but ſhe has forbid me writ-'ing to her. Hereupon I took the li-'berty to write to my father and mo-'ther: you will ſee, Sir, by the torn one, 'and by the other (both unopened) 'what has been the reſult. This, Sir, 'perhaps you already know: but, as 'you know not the contents of the diſ-'graced letters, I beſeech you to read 'them both, that you may be a witneſs 'for me, that they are not filled either 'with complaints or expoſtulations, nor 'contain any-thing undutiful. Give me 'leave to ſay, Sir, that if deaf-eared an-'ger will neither grant me a hearing, nor, 'what I write a peruſal, ſome time hence 'the hard-heartedneſs may be regretted. 'I beſeech you, dear, good Sir, to let me 'know what is meant by ſending me to 'my uncle Antony's houſe, rather than 'to yours, or to my aunt Hervey's, or 'elſe-where? If it be for what I ap-'prehend it to be, life will not be ſup-'portable upon the terms. I beg alſo 'to know, WHEN I am to be turned out 'of doors!—My heart ſtrongly gives me, 'that if once I am compelled to leave this 'houſe, I ſhall never ſee it more.

'It becomes me, however, to declare, 'that I write not this through perverſe-'neſs, or in reſentment. God knows 'my heart, I do not! But the treatment 'I apprehend I ſhall meet with, if car-'ried to my other uncle's will, in all 'probability, give the finiſhing ſtroke to 'the diſtreſſes, the undeſerved diſtreſſes 'I will be bold to call them, of your once 'highly-favoured, but now unhappy,

'CL. HARLOWE.'

LETTER XV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 27.

THIS morning early my uncle Harlowe came hither. He ſent up the incloſed very tender letter. It has made me wiſh I could oblige him. You will ſee how Mr. Solmes's ill qualities are gloſſed over in it. What blemiſhes does affection hide!—But perhaps they may ſay to me, 'What faults does antipathy 'bring to light!'

Be pleaſed to ſend me back this letter of my uncle by the firſt return.

'SUNDAY NIGHT, OR RATHER 'MONDAY MORNING.

'I MUST anſwer you, though againſt 'my own reſolution. Every-body loves 'you; and you know they do. The very 'ground you walk upon is dear to moſt 'of us. But how can we reſolve to ſee 'you? There is no ſtanding againſt your 'looks and language. It is our love 'makes us decline to ſee you. How can 'we, when you are reſolved not to do 'what we are reſolved you ſhall do? I 'never, for my part, loved any creature, 'as I loved you from your infancy till 'now. And indeed, as I have often 'ſaid, never was there a young creature 'ſo deſerving of love. But what is 'come to you now! Alas! alas! my dear 'kinſwoman, how you fail in the trial!

'I have read the letters you incloſed. 'At a proper time, I may ſhew them to 'my brother and ſiſter. But they will 'receive nothing from you at preſent.

'For my part, I could not read your 'letter to me, without being unmanned. 'How can you be ſo unmoved yourſelf, 'yet be ſo able to move every-body 'elſe? How could you ſend ſuch a letter 'to Mr. Solmes? Fie upon you! How 'ſtrangely are you altered!

'Then to treat your brother and ſiſ-

'ter as you did, that they don't care to 'write to you, or to ſee you! Don't you 'know where it is writ'en, That ſoft an-'ſwers turn away wrath? But if you will 'truſt to your ſharp-pointed wit, you 'may wound: yet a club will beat down 'a ſword. And how can you expect, 'that they who are hurt by you will not 'hurt you again? Was this the way you 'uſed to take to make us all adore you, 'as we did?—No, it was your gentle-'neſs of heart and manners, that made 'every-body, even ſtrangers, at firſt 'ſight, treat you as a lady, and call you 'a lady, though not born one, while 'your elder ſiſter had no ſuch diſtinc-'tions paid her. If you were envied, why 'ſhould you ſharpen Envy, and file up 'it's teeth to an edge?—You ſee I write 'like an impartial man, and as one that 'loves you ſtill.

'But ſince you have diſplayed your 'talents, and ſpared nobody, and moved 'every-body, without being moved, you 'have but made us ſtand the cloſer and 'firmer together. This is what I li-'kened to an embattled phalanx, once be-'fore. Your aunt Hervey forbids your 'writing, for the ſame reaſon that I muſt 'not countenance it. We are all afraid 'to ſee you, becauſe we know we ſhall 'be made as ſo many fools. Nay, your 'mother is ſo afraid of you, that once 'or twice, when ſhe thought you was 'coming to force yourſelf into her pre-'ſence, ſhe ſhut the door, and locked 'herſelf in, becauſe ſhe knew ſhe muſt 'not ſee you upon your terms, and you 'are reſolved you will not ſee her upon 'hers.

'Reſolve but to oblige us all, my 'deareſt Miſs Clary, and you ſhall ſee 'how we will claſp you every-one by 'turns to our rejoicing hearts. If the 'one man has not the wit, and the parts, 'and the perſon, of the other, no one 'breathing has a worſe heart than that 'other: and is not the love of all your 'friends, and a ſober man (if he be not 'ſo poliſhed) to be preferred to a de-'bauchee, though ever ſo fine a man to 'look at? You have ſuch talents, that 'you will be adored by the one: but the 'other has as much advantage in thoſe 'reſpects, as you have yourſelf, and will 'not ſet by them one ſtraw. For huſ-'bands are ſometimes jealous of their 'authority with witty wives. You will 'have in one, a man of virtue. Had 'you not been ſo rudely affronting to 'him, he would have made you ears 'tingle with what he could have told 'you of the other.

'Come, my dear niece, let me have 'the honour of doing with you what no-'body elſe yet has been able to do. 'Your father, mother, and I, will di-'vide the pleaſure, and the honour, I will 'again call it, between us; and all paſt 'offences ſhall be forgiven; and Mr. 'Solmes, we will engage, ſhall take 'nothing amiſs hereafter, of what has 'paſſed.

'He knows, he ſays, what a jewel that 'man will have, who can obtain your 'favour; and he will think light of all 'he has ſuffered, or ſhall ſuffer, in ob-'taining you.

'Dear, ſweet creature, oblige us: 'and oblige us with a grace. It muſt be 'done, whether with a grace or not. I 'do aſſure you it muſt. You muſt not 'conquer father, mother, uncles, every-'body: depend upon that.

'I have ſat up half the night to write 'this. You do not know how I am 'touched at reading yours, and writing 'this. Yet will I be at Harlowe Place 'early in the morning. So, upon read-'ing this, if you will oblige us all, ſend 'me word to come up to your apart-'ment: and I will lead you down, and 'preſent you to the embraces of every-'one. And you will then ſee, you have 'more of a brother and ſiſter in them 'both, than of late your prejudices will 'let you think you have. This from 'one who uſed to love to ſtile himſelf, 'your paternal uncle,

'JOHN HARLOWE.'

In about an hour after this kind letter was given me, my uncle ſent up to know, if he ſhould be a welcome viſitor, upon the terms mentioned in his letter? He bid Betty bring him down a verbal anſwer: a written one, he ſaid, would be a bad ſign; and he bid her therefore not bring a letter. But I had juſt finiſhed the incloſed tranſcription of one I had been writing. She made a difficulty to carry it; but was prevailed upon to oblige me by a token which theſe Mrs. Bettys cannot withſtand.

'DEAR AND HONOURED SIR,

'HOW you rejoice me by your con-'deſcending goodneſs!—So kind, ſo pa-'ternal a letter!—ſo ſoothing to a 'wounded heart; and of late what I 'have been ſo little uſed to!—How am 'I affected with it! Tell me not, dear 'Sir, of my way of writing: your letter 'has more moved me, than I have been 'able to move any-body!—It has made 'me wiſh with all my heart, that I could 'entitle myſelf to be viſited upon your 'own

'own terms; and to be led down to my 'father and mother by ſo good and ſo 'kind an uncle.

'I will tell you, deareſt Sir, what I 'will do to make my peace. I have no 'doubt that Mr. Solmes, upon conſide-'ration, would greatly prefer my ſiſter 'to ſuch a ſtrange averſe creature as me. 'His chief, or one of his chief motives 'in his addreſs to me, is, as I have rea-'ſon to believe, the contiguity of my 'grandfather's eſtate to his own. I will 'reſign it; for ever I will reſign it: and 'the reſignation muſt be good, becauſe 'I will never marry at all. I will make 'it over to my ſiſter and her heirs for 'ever. I ſhall have no heirs, but my 'brother and her; and I will receive, 'as of my father's bounty, ſuch an an-'nuity (not in lieu of the eſtate, but as 'of his bounty) as he ſhall be pleaſed to 'grant me, if it be ever ſo ſmall: and 'whenever I diſoblige him, he to with-'draw it, at his pleaſure.

'Will not this be accepted?—Surely 'it muſt—Surely it will!—I beg of 'you, deareſt Sir, to propoſe it; and 'ſecond it with your intereſt. This will 'anſwer every end. My ſiſter has a 'high opinion of Mr. Solmes. I never 'can have any in the light he is propoſed 'to me. But as my ſiſter's huſband, he 'will be always entitled to my reſpect; 'and ſhall have it.

'If this be accepted, grant me, Sir, 'the honour of a viſit; and do me then 'the inexpreſſible pleaſure of leading me 'down to the feet of my honoured pa-'rents, and they ſhall find me the moſt 'dutiful of children; and to the arms of 'my brother and ſiſter, and they ſhall 'find me the moſt obliging and moſt af-'fectionate of ſiſters.

'I wait, Sir, for your anſwer to this 'propoſal, made with the whole heart 'of your dutiful and moſt obliged niece,

'CL. HARLOWE.'

MONDAY NOON.

I HOPE this will be accepted: for Betty tells me, that my uncle Antony and my aunt Hervey are ſent for; and not Mr. Solmes; which I look upon as a favourable circumſtance. With what cheerfulneſs will I aſſign over this en-vied eſtate!—What a much more valu-able conſideration ſhall I part with it for!—The love and favour of all my relations! That love and favour which I uſed for eighteen years together to re-joice in, and be diſtinguiſhed by!—And what a charming pretence will this afford me of breaking with Mr. Lovelace! And how eaſy will it poſſibly make him to part with me!

I found this morning, in the uſual place, a letter from him, in anſwer, I ſuppoſe, to mine of Friday, which I de-poſited not till Saturday. But I have not opened it; nor will I, till I ſee what effect this new offer will have.

Let me but be permitted to avoid the man I hate; and I will give up with cheerfulneſs, the man I could prefer. To renounce the one, were I really to value him as much as you ſeem to ima-gine, can give but a temporary concern, which time and diſcretion will alleviate. This is a ſacrifice which a child owes to parents and friends, if they inſiſt upon it's being made. But the other, to marry a man one cannot endure, is not only a diſhoneſt thing, as to the man; but it is enough to make a creature who wiſhes to be a good wife, a bad or indif-ferent one, as I once wrote to the man himſelf: and then ſhe can hardly be ei-ther a good miſtreſs, or a good friend; or any-thing but a diſcredit to her family, and a bad example to all around her.

Methinks I am loth, in the ſuſpence I am in at preſent, to depoſit this, be-cauſe it will be leaving you in one as great: but having been prevented by Betty's officiouſneſs twice, I will now go down to my little poultry; and if I have an opportunity, will leave it in the uſual place, where I hope to find ſome-thing from you.

LETTER XVI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

MONDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 27.

I Have depoſited my narrative down to this day noon; but I hope ſoon to follow it with another letter, that I may keep you as little a while as poſſible in that ſuſpence which I am ſo much af-fected by at this moment: for my heart is diſturbed at every foot I hear ſtir; and at every door below that I hear open or ſhut.

They have been all aſſembled ſome time, and are in cloſe debate I believe: but can there be room for long debate upon a propoſal, which, if accepted, will ſo effectually anſwer all their views? —Can they inſiſt a moment longer upon my having Mr. Solmes, when they ſee what ſacrifices I am ready to make to be freed from his addreſſes?—O but I ſup-poſe the ſtruggle is, firſt, with Bella's nicety, to perſuade her to accept of the eſtate, and of the huſband; and next, with her pride, to take her ſiſter's refuſals, as ſhe once phraſed it!—Or, it may be, my brother is inſiſting upon equivalents for his reverſion in the eſtate: and theſe ſort of things take up but too much the attention of ſome of our family. To theſe, no doubt, one or both, it muſt be owing, that my propoſal admits of conſideration.

I want, methinks, to ſee what Mr. Lovelace, in his letter ſays. But I will deny myſelf this piece of curioſity till that which is raiſed by my preſent ſuſpence is anſwered.—Excuſe me, my dear, that I thus trouble you with my uncertainties: but I have no employment, nor heart, if I had, to purſue any other but what my pen affords me.

MONDAY EVENING.

WOULD you believe it?—Betty, by anticipation, tells me, that I am to be refuſed. I am a vile, artful creature. Every-body is too good to me. My uncle Harlowe has been taken-in, that's the phraſe. They knew how it would be, if he either wrote to me, or ſaw me. He has, however, been made aſhamed to be ſo wrought upon. A pretty thing truly in the eye of the world would it be, were they to take me at my word! It would look as if they treated me thus hardly, as I think it, for this very purpoſe. My peculiars, particularly Miſs Howe, would give it that turn; and I myſelf could mean nothing by it, but to ſee if it would be accepted in order to ſtrengthen my own arguments againſt Mr. Solmes. It was amazing, that it could admit of a moment's deliberation: that any-thing could be ſuppoſed to be done in it. It was equally againſt law and equity: and a fine ſecurity Miſs Bella would have, or Mr. Solmes, when I could reſume it when I would!—My brother and ſhe my heirs! 'O the artful 'creature!'—I to reſolve to live ſingle, when Lovelace is ſo ſure of me—and every-where declares as much!—and can whenever he pleaſes, if my huſband, claim under the will!—Then the inſolence—the confidence—[as Betty mincingly told me, that one ſaid; you may eaſily gueſs who] that ſhe, who was ſo juſtly in diſgrace for downright rebellion, ſhould pretend to preſcribe to the whole family!—ſhould name a huſband for her elder ſiſter!—What a triumph would her obſtinacy go away with, to delegate her commands, not as from a priſon, as ſhe called it, but as from her throne, to her elders and betters; and to her father and mother too!—Amazing, perfectly amazing, that any-body could argue upon ſuch a propoſal as this!—It was a maſter-ſtroke of fineſſe—It was ME in perfection—Surely my uncle Harlowe will never again be ſo taken in!

All this was the readier told me, becauſe it was againſt me, and would teaze and vex me. But as ſome of this fine recapitulation implied, that ſomebody ſpoke up for me, I was curious to know who it was: but Betty would not tell me, for fear I ſhould have the conſolation to find that all were not againſt me.

But do you not ſee, my dear, what a ſad creature ſhe is whom you honour with your friendſhip?—You could not doubt your influence over me: why did you not let me know myſelf a little better?—Why did you not take the friendly liberty I have always taken with you, and tell me my faults, and what a ſpecious hypocrite I am? For if my brother and ſiſter could make ſuch diſcoveries, how is it poſſible, that faults ſo enormous [You could ſee others, you thought, of a more ſecret nature!] could eſcape your penetrating eye?

Well, but now, it ſeems, they are debating how and by whom to anſwer me: for they know not, nor are they to know, that Mrs. Betty has told me all theſe fine things. One deſires to be excuſed, it ſeems: another chuſes not to have any-thing to ſay to me; another has enough of me; and of writing to ſo ready a ſcribbler, there will be no end.

Thus are thoſe imputed qualifications, which uſed ſo lately to gain me applauſe, now become my crimes: ſo much do diſguſt and anger alter the property of things.

The reſult of their debate, I ſuppoſe, will ſomehow or other be communicated to me by-and-by. But let me tell you, my dear, that I am made ſo deſperate, that I am afraid to open Mr. Lovelace's letter, leſt, in the humour I am in, I ſhould do ſomething (if I find it not exceptionable) that may give me repentance as long as I live.

MONDAY NIGHT.

THIS moment the following letter is brought me by Betty.

'MONDAY, FIVE O'CLOCK.

'MISS CUNNING-ONES,

'YOUR fine new propoſal is thought 'unworthy of a particular anſwer. Your 'uncle Harlowe is aſhamed to be ſo ta-'ken-in. Have you no new fetch for 'your uncle Antony? Go round with 'us, child, now your hand's in. But I 'was bid to write only one line, that you 'might

'might not complain, as you did of your 'worthy ſiſter, for the freedoms you 'provoked: it is this—Prepare your-'ſelf. To-morrow you go to my un-'cle Antony's. That's all, child.

'JAMES HARLOWE.'

I was vexed to the heart at this: and immediately, in the warmth of reſentment, wrote the incloſed to my uncle Harlowe; who it ſeems ſtays here this night.

'TO JOHN HARLOWE, ESQ.

'MONDAY NIGHT.

'HONOURED SIR,

'I FIND I am a very ſad creature, 'and did not know it. I wrote not to 'my brother. To you, Sir, I wrote. 'From you I hope the honour of an an-'ſwer. No one reveres her uncle more 'than I do. Nevertheleſs, I will be 'bold to ſay, that the diſtance, great as 'it is, between uncle and niece, ex-'cludes not ſuch a hope: and I think I 'have not made a propoſal that deſerves 'to be treated with ſcorn.

'Forgive me, Sir—My heart is full. 'Perhaps one day you may think you 'have been prevailed upon (for that is 'plainly the caſe!) to join to treat me—'as I do not deſerve to be treated. If 'you are aſhamed, as my brother hints, 'of having expreſſed any returning ten-'derneſs to me, God help me! I ſee I 'have no mercy to expect from any-'body! But, Sir, from your pen let me 'have an anſwer; I humbly implore it 'of you—Till my brother can recollect 'what belongs to a ſiſter, I will take 'from him no anſwer to the letter I 'wrote to you, nor any commands what-'ever.

'I move every-body!—This, Sir, is 'what you are pleaſed to mention—But 'whom have I moved?—One perſon in 'the family has more moving ways than 'I have, or he could never ſo undeſer-'vedly have made every-body aſhamed 'to ſhew tenderneſs to a poor diſtreſſed 'child of the ſame family.

'Return me not this with contempt, 'or torn, or unanſwered, I beſeech you. 'My father has a title to do that, or 'any-thing, by his child: but from no 'other perſon in the world of your ſex, 'Sir, ought a young creature of mine '(while ſhe preſerves a ſupplicating ſpi-'rit) to be ſo treated.

'When what I have before written 'in the humbleſt ſtrain has met with 'ſuch ſtrange conſtructions, I am afraid 'that this unguarded ſcrawl will be ve-'ry ill received. But I beg, Sir, you 'will oblige me with one line, be it ever 'ſo harſh, in anſwer to my propoſal. I 'ſtill think it ought to be attended to. I 'will enter into the moſt ſolemn engage-'ments to make it valid by a perpetual 'ſingle life. In a word, any thing I 'can do, I will do, to be reſtored to all 'your favours. More I cannot ſay, 'but that I am, very undeſervedly,

'A moſt unhappy Creature.'

Betty ſcrupled again to carry this letter; and ſaid, ſhe ſhould have anger; and I ſhould but have it returned in ſcraps and bits.

'I muſt take that chance,' ſaid I: 'I 'only deſire that you will deliver it as 'directed.'

Sad doings! very ſad! ſhe ſaid, that young ladies ſhould ſo violently ſet themſelves againſt their duty.

I told her, ſhe ſhould have the liberty to ſay what ſhe pleaſed, ſo ſhe would but be my meſſenger that one time—And down ſhe went with it.

I bid her, if ſhe could, ſlide it into my uncle's hand, unſeen; at leaſt unſeen by my brother or ſiſter, for fear it ſhould meet, through their good offices, with the fate ſhe had beſpoken for it.

She would not undertake for that, ſhe ſaid.

I am now in expectation of the reſult. But having ſo little ground to hope for either favour or mercy, I opened Mr. Lovelace's letter.

I would ſend it to you, my dear, (as well as thoſe I ſhall incloſe) by this conveyance; but not being able at preſent to determine in what manner I ſhall anſwer it, I will give myſelf the trouble of abſtracting it here, while I am waiting for what may offer from the letter juſt carried down.

He laments, as uſual, my ill opinion of him, and readineſs to believe every-thing to his diſadvantage. He puts into plain Engliſh, as I ſuppoſed he would, my hint, that I might be happier, if, by any raſhneſs he might be guilty of to Solmes, he ſhould come to an untimely end himſelf.

He is concerned, he ſays, that the violence he had expreſſed on his extreme apprehenſiveneſs of loſing me, ſhould have made him guilty of any-thing I had ſo much reaſon to reſent.

He owns, that he is paſſionate: all good-natured men, he ſays, are ſo; and a ſincere man cannot hide it. But appeals to me, Whether, if any occaſion in the world could excuſe the raſhneſs of his expreſſion, it would not be his preſent dreadful ſituation, through my indifference, and the malice of his enemies?

He ſays, he has more reaſon than ever, from the contents of my laſt, to apprehend, that I ſhall be prevailed upon by force, if not by fair means, to fall in with my brother's meaſures; and ſees but too plainly, that I am preparing him to expect it.

Upon this preſumption, he ſupplicates, with the utmoſt earneſtneſs, that I will not give way to the malice of his enemies.

Solemn vows of reformation, and everlaſting truth and obligingneſs, he makes; all in the ſtile of deſponding humility: yet calls it a cruel turn upon him, to impute his proteſtations to a conſciouſneſs of the neceſſity there is for making them from his bad character.

He deſpiſes himſelf, he ſolemnly proteſts, for his paſt follies: he thanks God he has ſeen his error; and nothing but my more particular inſtructions, is wanting to perfect his reformation.

He promiſes, that he will do everything that I ſhall think he can do with honour, to bring about a reconciliation with my father; and even will, if I inſiſt upon it, make the firſt overtures to my brother, and treat him as his own brother, becauſe he is mine, if he will not by new affronts revive the remembrance of the paſt.

He begs, in the moſt earneſt and humble manner, for one half-hour's interview; undertaking by a key, which he owns he has to the garden-door, leading into the coppice, as we call it, (if I will but unbolt the door) to come into the garden at night, and wait till I have an opportunity to come to him, that he may re-aſſure me of the truth of all he writes, and of the affection, and, if needful, protection, of all his family.

He preſumes not, he ſays, to write by way of menace to me; but, if I refuſe him this favour, he knows not (ſo deſperate have ſome ſtrokes in my letter made him) what his deſpair may make him do.

He aſks me, Determined as my friends are, and far as they have already gone, and declare they will go, what can I propoſe to do, to avoid having Mr. Solmes, if I am carried to my uncle Antony's; unleſs I reſolve to accept of the protection he has offered to procure me; or except I will eſcape to London, or elſewhere, while I can eſcape?

He adviſes me, to ſue to your mother, for her private reception of me; only till I can obtain poſſeſſion of my own eſtate, and procure my friends to be reconciled to me; which he is ſure they will be deſirous to be, the moment I am out of their power.

He apprizes me, [it is ſtill my wonder how he comes by his intelligence!] that my friends have written to my couſin Morden to repreſent matters to him in their own partial way; nor doubt they to influence him on their ſide of the queſtion.

That all this ſhews I have but one way; if none of my own friends or intimates will receive me.

If I will tranſport him with the honour of my choice of this one way, ſettlements ſhall be drawn, with proper blanks, which I ſhall fill up as I pleaſe. Let him but have my commands from my own mouth, all my doubts and ſcruples from my own lips; and only a repetition, that I will not, on any conſideration, be Solmes's wife; and he ſhall be eaſy. But, after ſuch a letter as I have written, nothing but an interview can make him ſo. He beſeeches me, therefore, to unbolt the door, as that very night; or, if I receive not this time enough, this night—and he will in a diſguiſe that ſhall not give a ſuſpicion who he is, if he ſhould be ſeen, come to the garden door, in hopes to open it with his key; nor will he have any other lodging than in the coppice both nights; watching every wakeful hour for the propitious unbolting, unleſs he has a letter with my orders to the contrary, or to make ſome other appointment.

This letter was dated yeſterday, ſo he was there laſt night, I ſuppoſe; and will be there this night; and I have not written a line to him; and now it is too late, were I determined what to write.

I hope he will not go to Mr. Solmes.—I hope he will not come hither.—If he do either, I will break with him for ever.

What have I to do with ſuch headſtrong ſpirits? I wiſh I had never—But what ſignifies wiſhing?—I am ſtrangely perplexed—But I need not have told you this, after ſuch a repreſentation of my ſituation.

LETTER XVII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

TUESDAY MORNING, 7 O'CLOCK.

MY uncle has vouchſafed to anſwer me. Theſe that follow are the contents contents of his letter; but juſt now brought me, although written laſt night—Late I ſuppoſe.

'MONDAY NIGHT.

'MISS CLARY,

'SINCE you are grown ſuch a bold 'challenger, and teach us all our duty, 'though you will not practice your own, 'I muſt anſwer you. Nobody wants your 'eſtate from you. Are you, who refuſe 'every-body's advice, to preſcribe a 'huſband to your ſiſter? Your letter to 'Mr. Solmes is inexcuſable. I blamed 'you for it before. Your parents will be 'obeyed. It is fit they ſhould. Your 'mother has, nevertheleſs, prevailed to 'have your going to your uncle Anto-'ny's put off till Thurſday: yet owns 'you deſerve not that, or any other fa-'vour from her. I will receive no more 'of your letters. You are too artful for 'me. You are an ungrateful and un-'reaſonable child: muſt you have your 'will paramount to every-body's? How 'are you altered! Your diſpleaſed uncle,

'JOHN HARLOWE.'

To be carried away on Thurſday—To the moated-houſe—To the chapel!—To Solmes!—How can I think of this!—They will make me deſperate.

TUESDAY MORNING, EIGHT O'CLOCK.

I HAVE another letter from Mr. Lovelace. I opened it with the expectation of it's being filled with bold and free complaints, on my not writing to prevent his two nights watching, in weather not extremely agreeable. But inſtead of complaints, he is full of tender concern leſt I may have been prevented by indiſpoſition, or by the cloſer confinement which he has frequently cautioned me that I may expect.

He ſays, he had been in different diſguiſes loitering about our garden and park-wall, all the day on Sunday laſt; and all Sunday night was wandering about the coppice, and near the back-door. It rained; and he has got a great cold, attended with feveriſhneſs, and ſo hoarſe, that he has almoſt loſt his voice.

Why did he not flame out in his letter?—Treated as I am treated by my friends, it is dangerous to be laid under the ſenſe of an obligation to an addreſſer's patience; eſpecially when ſuch a one ſuffers in health for my ſake.

He had no ſhelter, he ſays, but under the great overgrown ivy, which ſpreads wildly round the heads of two or three oaklings; and that was ſoon wet through.

You remember the ſpot. You and I, my dear, once thought ourſelves obliged to the natural ſhade which thoſe ivy-covered oaklings afforded us, in a ſultry day.

I can't help ſaying, I am ſorry he has ſuffered for my ſake—But it is his own ſeeking.

His letter is dated laſt night at eight: and indiſpoſed as he is, he tells me that he will watch till ten, in hopes of my giving him the meeting he ſo earneſtly requeſts. And after that, he has a mile to walk to his horſe and ſervant; and four miles then to ride to his inn.

He owns, that he has an intelligencer in our family; who has failed him for a day or two paſt: and not knowing how I do, or how I may be treated, his anxiety is increaſed.

This circumſtance gives me to gueſs who this intelligencer is; Joſeph Leman: the very creature employed and confided in, more than any other, by my brother.

This is not an honourable way of proceeding in Mr. Lovelace. Did he learn this infamous practice of corrupting the ſervants of other families at the French court, where he reſided a great while?

I have been often jealous of this Leman in my little airings and poultry viſits. Doubly obſequious as he was always to me, I have thought him my brother's ſpy upon me; and although he obliged me by his haſtening out of the garden and poultry-yard, whenever I came into either, have wondered, that from his reports my liberties of thoſe kinds have not been abridged. So, poſſibly, this man may be bribed by both, and yet betray both. Worthy views want not ſuch obliquities as theſe on either ſide. An honeſt mind muſt riſe into indignation both at the traitor-maker and the traitor.

He preſſes with the utmoſt earneſtneſs for an interview. He would not preſume, he ſays, to diſobey my laſt perſonal commands, that he ſhould not endeavour to attend me again in the Wood Houſe. But ſays, he can give me ſuch reaſons for my permiting him to wait upon my father or uncles, as he hopes will be approved by me: for he cannot help obſerving, that it is no more ſuitable to my own ſpirit than to his, that he, a man of fortune and family, ſhould be obliged to purſue ſuch a clandeſtine addreſs, as would only become a vile fortune-hunter. But, if I will give my conſent for his viſiting me like a man, and a gentleman, no ill-treatment ſhall provoke him to forfeit his temper.

Lord M. will accompany him, if I pleaſe: or, Lady Betty Lawrance will

firſt make the viſit to my mother, or to my aunt Hervey, or even to my uncles, if I chuſe it. And ſuch terms ſhall be offered, as ſhall have weight upon them.

He begs, that I will not deny him making a viſit to Mr. Solmes. By all that's good, he vows, that it ſhall not be with the leaſt intention either to hurt or affront him; but only to ſet before him, calmly, and rationally, the conſequences that may poſſibly flow from ſo fruitleſs a perſeverance, as well as the ungenerous folly of it, to a mind ſo noble as mine. He repeats his own reſolution to attend my pleaſure, and Mr. Morden's arrival and advice, for the reward of his own patience.

It is impoſſible, he ſays, but one of theſe methods muſt do. Preſence, he obſerves even of a diſliked perſon, takes off the edge of reſentments which abſence whets, and makes keen.

He therefore moſt earneſtly repeats his importunities for the ſupplicated interview. He ſays, he has buſineſs of conſequence in London: but cannot ſtir from the inconvenient ſpot where he has for ſome time reſided, in diſguiſes unworthy of himſelf, until he can be abſolutely certain, that I ſhall not be prevailed upon, either by force or otherwiſe; and until he find me delivered from the inſults of my brother. Nor ought this to be an indifferent point to one, for whoſe ſake all the world reports me to be uſed unworthily.—But one remark, he ſays, he cannot help making; That did my friends know the little favour I ſhew him, and the very great diſtance I keep him at, they would have no reaſon to confine me on his account: and another, that they themſelves ſeem to think him entitled to a different uſage, and expect that he receives it; when, in truth, what he meets with from me is exactly what they wiſh him to meet with, excepting in the favour of the correſpondence I honour him with; upon which, he ſays, he puts the higheſt value, and for the ſake of which he has ſubmitted to a thouſand indignities.

He renews his profeſſions of reformation: he is convinced, he ſays, that he has already run a long and dangerous courſe; and that it is high time to think of returning: it muſt be from proper convictions, he ſays, that a perſon who has lived too gay a life, reſolves to reclaim, before age or ſufferings come upon him.

All generous ſpirits, he obſerves, hate compulſion. Upon this obſervation he dwells; but regrets, that he is likely to owe all his hopes to this compulſion; this injudicious compulſion, he juſtly calls it; and none of my eſteem for him. Although he preſumes upon ſome merit—In his implicit regard to my will—In the hearing the daily indignities offered not only to him, but to his relations, by my brother—In the nightly watchings, and riſques which he runs, in all weathers; and which his preſent indiſpoſition makes him mention, or he had not debaſed the nobleneſs of his paſſion for me, by ſuch a ſelfiſh inſtance.

I cannot but ſay, I am ſorry the man is not well.

I am afraid to aſk you, my dear, what you would have done, thus ſituated. But what I have done, I have done. In a word, I wrote, That I would, if poſſible, give him a meeting to-morrow night, between the hours of nine and twelve, by the ivy ſummer-houſe, or in it, or near the great caſcade, at the bottom of the garden; and would unbolt the door, that he might come in by his own key. But that, if I found the meeting impracticable, or ſhould change my mind, I would ſignify as much by another line; which he muſt wait for until it were dark.

TUESDAY, ELEVEN O'CLOCK.

I AM juſt returned from depoſiting my billet. How diligent is this man! It is plain he was in waiting: for I had walked but a few paces, after I had depoſited it, when, my heart miſgiving me, I returned, to have taken it back, in order to reconſider it as I walked, and whether I ſhould, or ſhould not, let it go. But I found it gone.

In all probability, there was but a brick-wall, of a few inches thick, between Mr. Lovelace and me, at the very time I put the letter under the brick.

I am come back diſſatisfied with myſelf. But I think, my dear, there can be no harm in meeting him. If I do not, he may take ſome violent meaſures. What he knows of the treatment I meet with in malice to him, and with the view to fruſtrate all his hopes, may make him deſperate. His behaviour laſt time I ſaw him, under the diſadvantages of time and place, and ſurprized as I was, gives me no apprehenſion of any thing but diſcovery. What he requires is not unreaſonable, and cannot affect my future choice and determination: it is only to aſſure him from my own lips, that I never will be the wife of a man I hate. If I have not an opportunity to meet without hazard or detection, he muſt once more bear the diſappointment. All his trouble, and mine too, is owing to his faulty faulty character. This, although I hate tyranny and arrogance in all ſhapes, makes me think leſs of the riſques he runs, and the fatigues he undergoes, than otherwiſe I ſhould do; and ſtill leſs, as my ſufferings (derived from the ſame ſource) are greater than his.

Betty confirms the intimation, that I muſt go to my uncle's on Thurſday. She was ſent on purpoſe to direct me to prepare myſelf for going, and to help me to get every-thing up in order for my removal.

LETTER XVIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

TUESDAY, THREE O'CLOCK, MARCH 28.

I Have mentioned ſeveral times the pertneſs of Mrs. Betty to me; and now, having a little time upon my hands, I will give you a ſhort dialogue that paſſed juſt now between us. It may, perhaps, be a little relief to you from the dull ſubjects with which I am perpetually teazing you.

As ſhe attended me at dinner ſhe took notice, That nature is ſatisfied with a very little nouriſhment: and thus ſhe complimentally proved it—'For, Miſs,' ſaid ſhe, 'you eat nothing; yet never 'looked more charmingly in your life.'

'As to the former part of your ſpeech, 'Betty,' ſaid I, 'you obſerve well; and 'I have often thought, when I have ſeen 'how healthy the children of the la-'bouring poor look, and are, with empty 'ſtomachs, and hardly a good meal in 'a week, that God Almighty is very 'kind to his creatures, in this reſpect, 'as well as in all others, in making much 'not neceſſary to the ſupport of life; 'when three parts in four of his crea-'tures, if it were, would not know how 'to obtain it. It puts me in mind of 'two proverbial ſentences, which are 'full of admirable meaning.'

'What, pray, Miſs, are they? I love 'to hear you talk, when you are ſo ſe-'date as you ſeem now to be.'

'The one is to the purpoſe we are 'ſpeaking of; Poverty is the mother of 'health: and let me tell you, Betty, if 'I had a better appetite, and were to 'encourage it, with ſo little reſt, and 'ſo much diſtreſs and perſecution, I 'don't think I ſhould be able to pre-'ſerve my reaſon.'

'There's no inconvenience but has it's con-'venience,' ſaid Betty, giving me proverb for proverb. 'But what is the 'other, Madam?'

'That the pleaſures of the mighty are 'obtained by the tears of the poor: it is 'but reaſonable, therefore, methinks, 'that the plenty of the one ſhould be 'followed by diſtempers; and that the 'indigence of the other ſhould be at-'tended with that health, which makes 'all it's other diſcomforts light on the 'compariſon. And hence a third pro-'verb, Betty, ſince you are an admirer 'of proverbs; Better a bare foot than none 'at all, that is to ſay, than not to be 'able to walk.'

She was mightily taken with what I ſaid: 'See,' returned ſhe, 'what a fine 'thing ſcholarſhip is!—I,' ſaid ſhe, 'had always, from a girl, a taſte for 'reading, though it were but in Mother 'Gooſe, and concerning the Fairies.' [And then ſhe took genteelly a pinch of ſnuff.] 'Could but my parents have let 'go as faſt as I pulled, I ſhould have 'been a very happy creature.'

'Very likely, you would have made 'great improvements, Betty: but as it 'is, I cannot ſay, but ſince I had the 'favour of your attendance in this in-'timate manner, I have heard ſmarter 'things from you, than I have heard at 'table from ſome of my brother's fellow-'collegians.'

'Your ſervant, dear Miſs;' dropping me one of her beſt curtſeys: 'ſo fine a 'judge as you are!—it is enough to make 'one very proud.' Then, with another pinch—'I cannot indeed but ſay,' bridling upon it, 'that I have heard 'famous ſcholars often and often ſay 'very ſilly things: things I ſhould be 'aſhamed myſelf to ſay—But I thought 'they did it out of humility, and in 'condeſcenſion to thoſe who had not 'their learning.'

That ſhe might not be too proud, I told her, I could obſerve, that the live-lineſs or quickneſs ſhe ſo happily diſ-covered in herſelf, was not ſo much an honour to her, as what ſhe owed to her ſex; which, as I had obſerved in many inſtances, had great advantage over the other, in all the powers that related to imagination: 'And hence, Mrs. Betty, 'you'll take notice, as I have of late 'had opportunity to do, that your own 'talent at repartee and ſmartneſs, when 'it has ſomething to work upon, diſplays 'itſelf to more advantage, than could 'well be expected from one whoſe 'friends, to ſpeak in your own phraſe, 'could not let go ſo faſt as you pulled.'

The wench gave me a proof of the truth of my obſervation, in a manner ſtill more alert than I had expected:

'If,'

'If,' said she, 'our sex had so much advantage in smartness, it is the less to be wondered at, that you, Miss, who have had such an education should outdo all the men and women too, that come near you.'

'Bless me, Betty,' said I, 'what a proof do you give me of your wit and your courage at the same time! This is outdoing yourself. It would make young ladies less proud, and more apprehensive, were they generally attended by such smart servants, and their mouths permitted to be unlocked upon them as yours has been lately upon me.—But, take away, Mrs. Betty.'

'Why, Miss, you have eat nothing at all—I hope you are not displeased with your dinner for any-thing I have said.'

'No, Mrs. Betty, I am pretty well used to your freedoms now, you know. —I am not displeased in the main, to observe, that, were the succession of modern fine ladies to be extinct, it might be supplied from those whom they place in the next rank to themselves, their chambermaids and confidantes. Your young mistress has contributed a great deal to this quickness of yours. She always preferred your company to mine. As you pulled, she let go; and so, Mrs. Betty, you have gained by her conversation what I have lost.'

'Why, Miss, if you come to that, nobody says better things than Miss Harlowe. I could tell you one, if I pleased, upon my observing to her, that you lived of late upon the air, and had no stomach to any-thing; yet looked as charmingly as ever.'

'I dare say, it was a very good-natured one, Mrs. Betty! Do you then please that I shall hear it?'

'Only this, Miss, That your stomachfulness had swallowed up your stomach; and, That obstinacy was meat, drink, and cloth to you.'

'Aye, Mrs. Betty; and did she say this?—I hope she laughed when she said it, as she does at all her good things, as she call them. It was very smart, and very witty. I wish my mind were so much at ease, as to aim at being witty too. But if you admire such sententious sayings, I'll help you to another; and that is, Encouragement and approbation make people shew talents they were never suspected to have; and this will do both for mistress and maid: and another I'll furnish you with, the contrary of the former, that will do only for me; That persecution and discouragement depress ingenuous minds, and blunt the edge of lively imaginations. —And hence may my sister's brilliancy and my stupidity be both accounted for. Ingenuous, you must know, Mrs. Betty, and ingenious, are two things; and I would not arrogate the latter to myself.'

'Lord, Miss,' said the foolish, 'you know a great deal for your years.— You are a very learned young lady!— What pity——'

'None of your pities, Mrs. Betty. I know what you'd say. But tell me, if you can, Is it resolved that I shall be carried to my uncle Antony's on Thursday?'

I was willing to reward myself for the patience she had made me exercise, by getting at what intelligence I could from her.

'Why, Miss,' seating herself at a little distance, ('Excuse my sitting down,') with the snuff-box tapped very smartly, the lid opened, and a pinch taken with a dainty finger and thumb, the other three fingers distendedly bent, and with a fine flourish—'I cannot but say, that it is my opinion, you will certainly go on Thursday; and this noles, voles, as I have heard my young lady say in FRENCH.'

'Whether I am willing or not willing, you mean, I suppose, Mrs. Betty?'

'You have it, Miss.'

'Well, but, Betty, I have no mind to be turned out of doors so suddenly. Do you think I could not be permitted to tarry one week longer?'

'How can I tell, Miss!'

'O Mrs. Betty, you can tell a great deal, if you please. But here I am forbid writing to any one of my family; none of it now will come near me; nor will any of it permit me to see them; how shall I do to make known my request, to stay here a week or fortnight longer?'

'Why, Miss, I fancy if you were to shew a compliable temper, your friends would shew a compliable one too. But would you expect favours, and grant none?'

'Smartly put, Betty! But who knows what may be the result of my being carried to my uncle Antony's?'

'Who knows, Miss!—Why any-body will guess what may be the result.'

'As how, Betty?'

'As how!' repeated the pert wench, 'Why, Miss, you will stand in your own light,

'light, as you have hitherto done: and 'your parents, as ſuch good parents 'ought, will be obeyed.'

'If, Mrs. Betty, I had not been uſed 'to your oughts, and to have my duty 'laid down to me by your oraculous 'wiſdom, I ſhould be apt to ſtare at the 'liberty of your ſpeech.'

'You ſeem angry, Miſs. I hope I 'take no unbecoming liberty.'

'If thou really think'ſt thou doſt not, 'thy ignorance is more to be pitied, than 'thy pertneſs reſented. I wiſh thou 'wouldſt leave me to myſelf.'

'When young ladies fall out with 'their own duty, it is not much to be 'wondered at, that they are angry at 'any-body who does theirs.'

'That's a very pretty ſaying, Mrs. 'Betty!—I ſee plainly what thy duty is 'in thy notion, and am obliged to thoſe 'who taught it thee.'

'Every-body takes notice, Miſs, that 'you can ſay very cutting words in a 'cool manner, and yet not call names, 'as I have known ſome gentlefolks as well 'as others do when in a paſſion. But 'I wiſh you had permitted 'Squire 'Solmes to ſee you: he would have 'told you ſuch ſtories of 'Squire Love-'lace, as would have turned your heart 'againſt him for ever.'

'And know you any of the particu-'lars of thoſe ſad ſtories?'

'Indeed I don't; but you'll hear all 'at your uncle Antony's, I ſuppoſe; 'and a great deal more perhaps than 'you will like to hear.'

'Let me hear what I will, I am de-'termined againſt Mr. Solmes, were it 'to coſt me my life.'

'If you are, Miſs, the Lord have 'mercy on you! For what with this let-'ter of yours to 'Squire Solmes, whom 'they ſo much value, and what with 'their antipathy to 'Squire Lovelace, 'whom they hate, they will have no 'patience with you.'

'What will they do, Betty? They 'won't kill me? What will they do?

'Kill you!—No!—But you will not 'be ſuffered to ſtir from thence, till you 'have complied with your duty. And 'no pen and ink will be allowed you as 'here; where they are of opinion you 'make no good uſe of it: nor would it 'be allowed here, only as they intend ſo 'ſoon to ſend you away to your uncle's. 'Nobody will be permitted to ſee you, 'or to correſpond with you. What 'farther will be done, I can't ſay; and, 'if I could, it may not be proper. But 'you may prevent it all, by one word: 'and I wiſh you would, Miſs. All then 'would be eaſy and happy. And, if I 'may ſpeak my mind, I ſee not why 'one man is not as good as another: 'why, eſpecially, a ſober man is not as 'good as a rake.'

'Well, Betty,' ſaid I, ſighing, 'all 'thy impertinence goes for nothing. 'But I ſee I am deſtined to be a very 'unhappy creature. Yet I will ven-'ture upon one requeſt more to them.'

And ſo, quite ſick of the pert crea-ture and of myſelf, I retired to my cloſet, and wrote a few lines to my uncle Harlowe, notwithſtanding his prohibition; in order to get a reprieve from being carried away ſo ſoon as Thurſday next, if I muſt go. And this, that I might, if complied with, ſuſpend the appointment I have made with Mr. Lovelace; for my heart miſgives me as to meeting him; and that more and more; I know not why. Under the ſuperſcription of the letter, I wrote theſe words. 'Pray, dear Sir, be pleaſed 'to give this a reading.'

This is the copy of what I wrote.

'TUESDAY AFTERNOON.

'HONOURED SIR,

'LET me this once be heard with 'patience, and have my petition grant-'ed. It is only, that I may not be 'hurried away ſo ſoon as next Thurſ-'day.

'Why ſhould the poor girl be turned 'out of doors ſo ſuddenly, ſo diſgrace-'fully? Procure for me, Sir, one fort-'night's reſpite. In that ſpace of time, 'I hope you will all relent. My mam-'ma ſhall not need to ſhut her door in 'apprehenſion of ſeeing her diſgraced 'child. I will not preſume to think 'of entering her preſence, or my papa's, 'without leave. One fortnight's re-'ſpite is but a ſmall favour for them to 'grant, except I am to be refuſed every 'thing I aſk; but it is of the higheſt im-'port to my peace of mind. Procure 'it for me, therefore, dear Sir; and 'you will exceedingly oblige your duti-'ful, though greatly afflicted niece,

'CL. HARLOWE.'

I ſent this down: my uncle was not gone. And he now ſtays to know the reſult of the queſtion put to me in the incloſed anſwer which he has given to mine.

'YOUR going to your uncle's was 'abſolutely concluded upon for next 'Thurſday. Nevertheleſs, your mother, 'ſeconded by Mr. Solmes, pleaded ſo 'ſtrongly

'ſtrongly to have you indulged, that 'your requeſt for a delay will be com-'plied with, upon one condition; and 'whether for a fortnight, or a ſhorter 'time, that will depend upon yourſelf. 'If you refuſe this condition, your mo-'ther declares, ſhe will give over all 'further interceſſion for you.—Nor do 'you deſerve this favour, as you put it 'upon our yielding to you, not you to us.

'This condition is, That you admit 'of a viſit from Mr. Solmes, for one 'hour, in company of your brother, 'your ſiſter, or your uncle Antony, 'chuſe which you will.

'If you comply not, you go next 'Thurſday to a houſe which is become 'ſtrangely odious to you of late, whe-'ther you get ready to go or not. An-'ſwer therefore directly to the point. 'No evaſion. Name your day and hour. 'Mr. Solmes will neither eat you, nor 'drink you. Let us ſee, whether we 'are to be complied with in any-thing, 'or not. 'JOHN HARLOWE.'

After a very little deliberation, I reſolved to comply with this condition. All I fear is, that Mr. Lovelace's intelligencer may inform him of it; and that his apprehenſions upon it may make him take ſome deſperate reſolution: eſpecially as now (having more time given me here) I think to write to him to ſuſpend the interview he is poſſibly ſo ſure of. I ſent down the following to my uncle.

'HONOURED SIR,

'ALTHOUGH I ſee not what end 'the propoſed condition can anſwer, I 'comply with it. I wiſh I could with 'every-thing expected of me. If I 'muſt name one, in whoſe company I 'am to ſee the gentleman, and that one 'not my mamma, whoſe preſence I could 'wiſh to be honoured by on the occa-'ſion, let my uncle, if he pleaſes, be 'the perſon. If I muſt name the day, '(a long day, I doubt, will not be per-'mitted me) let it be next Tueſday. 'The hour, four in the afternoon. The 'place, either the ivy ſummer-houſe, or 'in the little parlour I uſed to be per-'mitted to call mine.

'Be pleaſed, Sir, nevertheleſs, to 'prevail upon my mamma to vouchſafe 'me her preſence on the occaſion. I 'am, Sir, your ever-dutiful

CL. HARLOWE.'

A reply is juſt ſent me. I thought it became my averſeneſs to this meeting, to name a diſtant day: but I did not expect they would have complied with it. So here is one week gained!

This is the reply.

'YOU have done well to comply. 'We are willing to think the beſt of 'every ſlight inſtance of duty from you. 'Yet have you ſeemed to conſider the 'day as an evil day, and ſo put it far 'off. This nevertheleſs is granted you, 'as no time need to be loſt, if you are 'as generous after the day, as we are 'condeſcending before it. Let me ad-'viſe you, not to harden your mind; 'nor take up your reſolution before-'hand. Mr. Solmes has more awe, 'and even terror, at the thoughts of 'ſeeing you, than you can have at the 'thoughts of ſeeing him. His motive is 'love; let not yours be hatred. My bro-'ther Antony will be preſent, in hopes 'you will deſerve well of him, by be-'having well to the friend of the family. 'See you uſe him as ſuch. Your mo-'ther had permiſſion to be there, if ſhe 'thought fit: but ſays, ſhe would not 'for a thouſand pounds, unleſs you 'would encourage her beforehand as 'ſhe wiſhes to be encouraged. One hint 'I am to give you mean time. It is 'this: to make a diſcreet uſe of your pen 'and ink. Methinks a young creature 'of your niceneſs ſhould be leſs ready to 'write to one man, when ſhe is deſigned 'to be another's.

'This compliance, I hope, will pro-'duce greater; and then the peace of 'the family will be reſtored: which is 'what is heartily wiſhed by your loving 'uncle, JOHN HARLOWE.

'Unleſs it be to the purpoſe our 'hearts are ſet upon, you need not 'write again.'

This man have more terror at ſeeing me, than I can have at ſeeing him!—How can that be? If he had half as much, he would not wiſh to ſee me!—His motive love!—Yes indeed! Love of himſelf! He knows no other; for love, that deſerves the name, ſeeks the ſatisfaction of the beloved object more than it's own.—Weighed in this ſcale, what a profanation is this man guilty of!

Not to take up my reſolution beforehand!—That advice comes too late.

But I muſt make a diſcreet uſe of my pen. That, I doubt, as they have managed it, in the ſenſe they mean it, is as much out of my power, as the other.

But to write to one man, when I am deſigned for another!—What a ſhocking expreſſion is that!

Repent-

Repenting of my appointment with Mr. Lovelace before I had this favour granted me, you may believe I hesitated not a moment to revoke it now that I had gained such a respite. Accordingly, I wrote, That I found it inconvenient to meet him, as I had intended: that the risque I should run of a discovery, and the mischiefs that might flow from it, could not be justified by any end that such a meeting could answer; that I found one certain servant more in my way, when I took my morning and evening airings, than any other; that the person who might reveal the secrets of a family to him, might, if opportunity were given him, betray me, or him, to those whom it was his duty to serve; that I had not been used to a conduct so faulty, as to lay myself at the mercy of servants; and was sorry he had measures to pursue, that made steps necessary in his own opinion, which, in mine, were very culpable, and which no end could justify; that things drawing towards a crisis between my friends and me, an interview could avail nothing; especially as the method by which this correspondence was carried on, was not suspected, and he could write all that was in his mind to write; that I expected to be at liberty to judge of what was proper and fit upon this occasion; especially as he might be assured, that I would sooner chuse death, than Mr. Solmes.

TUESDAY NIGHT.

I HAVE deposited my letter to Mr. Lovelace. Threatening as things look against me, I am much better pleased with myself for declining the interview than I was before. I suppose he will be a little out of humour upon it, however: but as I reserved to myself the liberty of changing my mind; and as it is easy for him to imagine there may be reasons for it within doors, which he cannot judge of without; besides those I have suggested, which of themselves are of sufficient weight to engage his acquiescence; I should think it strange, if he acquiesces not on this occasion, and that with a chearfulness, which may shew me, that his last letter is written from his heart: for if he be really so much concerned at his past faults, as he pretends, and has for some time pretended, must he not, of course, have corrected in some degree, the impetuosity of his temper? The first step to reformation, as I conceive, is to subdue sudden gusts of passion, from which frequently the greatest evils arise, and to learn to bear disappointments. If the irascible passions cannot be overcome, what opinion can we have of the person's power over those to which bad habit, joined to greater temptation, gives stronger force?

Pray, my dear, be so kind, as to make enquiry by some safe hand, after the disguises Mr. Lovelace assumes at the inn he puts up at in the poor village of Neale, he calls it. If it be the same I take it to be, I never knew it was considerable enough to have a name; nor that it has an inn in it.

As he must, to be so constantly near us, be much there, I would be glad to have some account of his behaviour; and what the people think of him. In such a length of time, he must by his conduct either give scandal, or hope of reformation. Pray, my dear, humour me in this enquiry. I have reasons for it, which you shall be acquainted with another time, if the result of the enquiry discover them not.

LETTER XIX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, NINE O'CLOCK.

I AM just returned from my morning walk, and already have received a letter from Mr. Lovelace in answer to mine deposited last night. He must have had pen, ink, and paper with him; for it was written in the coppice; with this circumstance: 'On one knee, 'kneeling with the other.' Not from reverence to the written to, however, as you'll find!

Well we are instructed early to keep these men at distance. An undesigning open heart, where it is loth to disoblige, is easily drawn in, I see, to oblige more than ever it designed. It is too apt to govern itself by what a bold spirit is encouraged to expect of it. It is very difficult for a good natured young person to give a negative where it disesteems not.

Our hearts may harden and contract, as we gain experience, and when we have smarted perhaps for our easy folly: and so they ought, or we should be upon very unequal terms with the world.

Excuse these grave reflections. This man has vexed me heartily. I see his gentleness was art: fierceness, and a temper like what I have been too much used to at home, are nature in him. Nothing, I think, shall ever make me forgive him; for surely, there can be no good reason for his impatience on an expectation given with reserve, and revocable.—I so much to suffer through him; yet, to be treated as if I were obliged to bear insults from him!

But here you will be pleased to read his letter; which I shall inclose.

'TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

'GOOD GOD!

'WHAT is now to become of me! —How shall I support this disappointment!—No new cause!—On one knee, kneeling with the other, I write!—My feet benumbed with midnight wanderings through the heaviest dews that ever fell: my wig and my linen dripping with the hoar frost dissolving on them!—Day but just breaking—Sun not risen to exhale—May it never rise again!—Unless it bring healing and comfort to a benighted soul! In proportion to the joy you had inspired (ever lovely promiser!) in such proportion is my anguish!

'O my beloved creature! But are not your very excuses confessions of excuses inexcusable? I know not what I write!—That servant in your way! By the great God of Heaven, that servant was not, dared not, could not be in your way!—Curse upon the cool caution that is pleaded to deprive me of an expectation so transporting!

'And are things drawing towards a crisis between your friends and you?—Is not this a reason for me to expect, the rather to expect, the promised interview?

'CAN I write all that is in my mind, say you? — Impossible! — Not the hundredth part of what is in my mind, and in my apprehension, can I write!

'O the wavering, the changeable sex!—But can Miss Clarissa Harlowe—

'Forgive me, Madam!—I know not what I write!

'Yet I must, I do, insist upon your promise—Or that you will condescend to find better excuses for the failure—Or convince me, that stronger reasons are imposed upon you, than those you offer. A promise once given (upon deliberation given) the promis'd only can dispense with—except in cases of a very apparent necessity imposed upon the promiser, which leaves no power to perform it.

'The first promise you ever made me! Life and death perhaps depending upon it—My heart desponding from the barous methods resolved to be taken with you in malice to me!

'You would sooner chuse death than Solmes! (How my soul spurns the competition!) O my beloved creature, what are these but words?—Whose words?—Sweet and ever-adorable — What? — Promise-breaker—must I call you?—How shall I believe the asseveration (your supposed duty in the question! Persecution so flaming! Hatred to me so strongly avowed!) after this instance of your so lightly dispensing with your promise?

'If, my dearest life! you would prevent my distraction, or, at least, distracted consequences, renew the promised hope!—My fate is indeed upon it's crisis.

'Forgive me, dearest creature, forgive me!—I know I have written in too much anguish of mind!—Writing this, in the same moment that the just dawning light has imparted to me the heavy disappointment.

'I dare not re-peruse what I have written.—I must deposit it—It may serve to shew you my distracted apprehension that this disappointment is but a prelude to the greatest of all.—Nor, having here any other paper, am I able to write again if I would on this gloomy spot—(Gloomy is my soul; and all nature round me partakes of my gloom!) I trust it therefore to your goodness—If it's fervor excites your displeasure rather than your pity, you wrong my passion; and I shall be ready to apprehend, that I am intended to be the sacrifice of more miscreants than one! [Have patience with me, dearest creature!—I mean Solmes and your brother only.] But if, exerting your usual generosity, you will excuse and re-appoint, may that God, whom you profess to serve, and who is the God of truth and of promises, protect and bless you, for both; and for restoring to himself, and to hope, *your ever-adoring, yet almost despondin*g

'LOVELACE!

'IVY-CAVERN, IN THE COPPICE.'

This is the answer I shall return.

'WEDNESDAY MORNING.

'I AM amazed, Sir, at the freedom of your reproaches. Pressed and teazed, against convenience and inclination, to give you a private meeting, am I to be thus challenged and upbraided, and my sex reflected upon, because I thought it prudent to change my mind? —A liberty I had reserved to myself, when I made the appointment, as you call it.

'it. I wanted not inſtances of your im-
'patient ſpirit to other people: yet
'may it be happy for me, that I have
'this new one; which ſhews, that you
'can as little ſpare me, when I purſue
'the dictates of my own reaſon, as you
'do others, for acting up to theirs. Two 'motives you muſt be governed by in 'this exceſs. The one my eaſineſs; the 'other your own preſumption. Since you 'think you have found out the firſt, and
'have ſhewn ſo much of the laſt upon it,
'I am too much alarmed, not to wiſh
'and deſire, that your letter of this day
'may conclude all the trouble you had
'from, or for, your humble ſervant,

'CL. HARLOWE.'

I believe, my dear, I may promiſe myſelf your approbation, whenever I write or ſpeak with ſpirit, be it to whom it will. Indeed, I find but too much reaſon to exert it, ſince I have to deal with people, who govern themſelves in their conduct to me, not by what is fit or decent, right or wrong, but by what they think my temper will bear. I have, till very lately, been praiſed for mine; but it has always been by thoſe who never gave me opportunity to return the compliment to them. Some people have acted, as if they thought forbearance on one ſide abſolutely neceſſary for them and me to be upon good terms together; and in this caſe have ever taken care rather to owe that obligation than to lay it. You have hinted to me, that reſentment is not natural to my temper, and that therefore it muſt ſoon ſubſide: it may be ſo with reſpect to my relations; but not to Mr. Lovelace, I aſſure you.

WEDNESDAY NOON, MARCH 29.

WE cannot always anſwer for what we can do: but to convince you, that I can keep my above reſolution, with regard to Mr. Lovelace, angry as my letter is, and three hours as it is ſince it was written, I aſſure you, that I repent it not; nor will ſoften it, although I find it is not taken away. And yet I hardly ever before did any-thing in anger, that I did not repent in half an hour; and queſtion myſelf in leſs than that time, whether I were right or wrong.

In this reſpite till Tueſday, I have a little time to look about me, as I may ſay, and to conſider of what I have to do, and can do. And Mr. Lovelace's inſolence will make me go very home with myſelf. Not that I think I can conquer my averſion to Mr. Solmes. I am ſure I cannot. But, if I abſolutely break with Mr. Lovelace, and give my friends convincing proofs of it, who knows but they will reſtore me to their favour, and let their views in relation to the other man go off by degrees?—Or, at leaſt, that I may be ſafe till my couſin Morden arrives: to whom, I think, I will write; and the rather, as Mr. Lovelace has aſſured me, that my friends have written to him to make good their ſide of the queſtion.

But, with all my courage, I am exceedingly apprehenſive about the Tueſday next, and about what may reſult from my ſtedfaſtneſs; for ſtedfaſt I am ſure I ſhall be. They are reſolved, I am told, to try every means to induce me to comply with what they are determined upon. And I am reſolved to do all I can to avoid what they would force me to do. A dreadful contention between parents and child!—Each hoping to leave the other without excuſe, whatever the conſequence may be.

What can I do? Adviſe me, my dear. Something is ſtrangely wrong ſomewhere! to make parents, the moſt indulgent till now, ſeem cruel in a child's eye; and a daughter, till within theſe few weeks, thought unexceptionably dutiful, appear in their judgment, a rebel!—O my ambitious and violent brother! What may he have to anſwer for to both!

Be pleaſed to remember, my dear, that your laſt favour was dated on Saturday. This is Wedneſday: and none of mine have been taken away ſince. Don't let me want your advice. My ſituation is extremely difficult.—But I am ſure you love me ſtill: and not the leſs on that account. Adieu, my beloved friend. CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XX.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

THURS. MORN. DAY BREAK, MAR. 30.

AN accident, and not remiſſneſs, has occaſioned my ſilence.

My mother was ſent for on Sunday night by her couſin Larkin, whom I mentioned in one of my former, and who was extremely earneſt to ſee her.

This poor woman was always afraid of death, and was one of thoſe weak perſons who imagine that the making of their will muſt be an undoubted forerunner of it.

She had always ſaid, when urged to the neceſſary work, That whenever ſhe made it, ſhe ſhould not live long after; and one would think, imagined ſhe was under under an obligation to prove her words: for, though she had been long bed-rid, and was, in a manner, worn out before, yet she thought herself better, till she was persuaded to make it: and from that moment, remembering what she used to prognosticate, (her fears helped on what she feared, as is often the case, particularly in the small-pox) grew worse; and had it in her head once to burn her will, in hopes to grow better upon it.

She sent my mother word, that the doctors had given her over: but that she could not die till she saw her. I told my mother, that if she wished her a chance for recovery, she should not, for that reason, go. But go she would; and, what was worse, would make me go with her; and that, at an hour's warning; for she said nothing of it to me, till she was rising in the morning early, resolving to return at night. Had there been more time for argumentation, to be sure I had not gone; but as it was, there was a kind of necessity that my preparation to obey her, should, in a manner, accompany her command.—A command so much out of the way, on such a solemn occasion! And this I represented; but to no purpose: there never was such a contradicting girl in the world—My wisdom always made her a fool!—But she would be obliged this time, proper or improper.

I have but one way of accounting for this sudden whim of my mother; and that is this. She had a mind to accept of Mr. Hickman's offer to escort her—And I verily believe [I wish I were quite sure of it] had a mind to oblige him with my company—As far as I know, to keep me out of worse.

For, would you believe it?—As sure as you are alive, she is afraid for her favourite Hickman, because of the long visit your Lovelace, though so much by accident, made me in her absence, last time she was at the same place. I hope, my dear, you are not jealous too. But indeed I now-and-then, when she teazes me with praises which Hickman cannot deserve, in return fall to praising those qualities and personalities in Lovelace, which the other never will have. Indeed I do love to teaze a little bit, that I do—My mamma's girl—I had like to have said.

As you know she is as passionate, as I am pert, you will not wonder to be told, that we generally fall out on these occasions. She flies from me at the long run. It would be undutiful in me to leave her first—And then I get an opportunity to pursue our correspondence.

For, now I am rambling, let me tell you, that she does not much favour that;—for two reasons, I believe:—one, that I don't shew her all that passes between us; the other, that she thinks I harden your mind against your duty, as it is called. And with her, for a reason at home, as I have hinted more than once, parents cannot do wrong; children cannot oppose, and be right. This obliges me now-and-then to steal an hour, as I may say, and not let her know how I am employed.

You may guess from what I have written, how averse I was to comply with this unreasonable stretch of motherly authority—But it came to be a test of duty; so I was obliged to yield, though with a full persuasion of being in the right.

I have always your reproofs upon these occasions: in your late letters stronger than ever. A good reason why, you'll say, because more deserved than ever. I thank you kindly for your correction. I hope to make correction of it—But let me tell you, that your stripes, whether deserved or not, have made me sensible deeper than the skin—But of this another time.

It was Monday afternoon before we reached the old lady's house. That fiddling, parading fellow [you know who I mean] made us wait for him two hours, and I to go a journey I disliked! only for the sake of having a little more tawdry upon his housings; which he had hurried his sadler to put on, to make him look fine, being to escort his dear Madam Howe, and her fair daughter. I told him, that I supposed he was afraid, that the double solemnity in the case (that of the visit to a dying woman, and that of his own countenance) would give him the appearance of an undertaker; to avoid which, he ran into as bad an extreme, and I doubted would be taken for a mountebank.

The man was confounded. He took it as strongly, as if his conscience gave assent to the justice of the remark: otherwise he would have borne it better; for he is used enough to this sort of treatment. I thought he would have cried. I have heretofore observed, that on this side of the contract, he seems to be a mighty meek sort of creature.—And though I should like it in him hereafter perhaps, yet I can't help despising him a little in my heart for it now. I believe, my dear, we all love your bluftering fellows best; could we but direct the bluster, and bid it roar when, and at whom we pleased.

The

The poor man looked at my mother. She was ſo angry, (my airs upon it, and my oppoſition to the journey, have all helped) that for half the way ſhe would not ſpeak to me. And when ſhe did, it was, 'I wiſh I had not brought you! 'You know not what it is to condeſcend. 'It is my fault, not Mr. Hickman's, that 'you are here ſo much againſt your will. 'Have you no eyes for this ſide of the 'chariot?'

And then he fared the better from her, as he always does, for faring worſe from me: for there was, 'How do you now, 'Sir?' And 'How do you now, Mr. 'Hickman?' as he ambled now on this ſide of the chariot, now on that, ſtealing a prim look at me; her head half out of the chariot, kindly ſmiling as if married to the man but a fortnight herſelf; while I always ſaw ſomething to divert myſelf on the ſide of the chariot where the honeſt man was not, were it but old Robin at a diſtance, on his Roan Keffel.

Our courtſhip days, they ſay, are our beſt days. Favour deſtroys courtſhip. Diſtance increaſes it. It's eſſence is diſtance. And to ſee how familiar theſe men wretches grow upon a ſmile, what an awe they are ſtruck into when we frown; who would not make them ſtand off? Who would not enjoy a power, that is to be ſo ſhort-lived?

Don't chide me one bit for this, my dear. It is in nature. I can't help it. Nay, for that matter, I love it, and with not to help it. So ſpare your gravity, I beſeech you, on this ſubject. I ſet not up for a perfect character. The man will bear it. And what need you care? My mother overbalances all he ſuffers: and if he thinks himſelf unhappy, he ought never to be otherwiſe.

Then did he not deſerve a fit of the ſullens, think you, to make us loſe our dinner for his parade, ſince in ſo ſhort a journey my mother would not 'bate and loſe the opportunity of coming back that night, had the old lady's condition permitted it? To ſay nothing of being the cauſe, that my mamma was in the glout with her poor daughter all the way.

At our alighting I gave him another dab; but it was but a little one. Yet the manner, and the air, made up (as I intended they ſhould) for that defect. My mother's hand was kindly put into his, and with a ſimpering altogether bridal; and with another 'How do you now, 'Sir?'—All his plume muſcles were in motion, and a double charge of care and obſequiouſneſs fidgetted up his whole form, when he offered to me his officious palm. My mother, when I was a girl, always bid me hold up my head. I juſt then remembered her commands, and was dutiful—I never held up my head ſo high. With an averted ſupercilious eye, and a rejecting hand, half-flouriſhing—'I have no need of help, 'Sir!—You are in my way.'

He ran back, as if on wheels; with a face exceſſively mortified: I had thoughts elſe to have followed the too gentle touch, with a declaration, that I had as many hands and feet as himſelf. But this would have been telling him a piece of news, as to the latter, that I hope he had not the preſumption to gueſs at.

We found the poor woman, as we thought, at the laſt gaſp. Had we come ſooner, we could not have got away, as we intended, that night. You ſee I am for excuſing the man all I can; and yet, I aſſure you, I have not ſo much as a conditional liking to him. My mother ſat up moſt part of the night, expecting every hour would have been her poor couſin's laſt. I bore her company till two.

I never ſaw the approaches of death in a grown perſon before; and was extremely ſhocked. Death, to one in health, is a very terrible thing. We pity the perſon for what ſhe ſuffers: and we pity ourſelves for what we muſt ſome time hence in like ſort ſuffer; and ſo are doubly affected.

She held out till Tueſday morning, eleven. As ſhe had told my mother that ſhe had left her an executrix, and her and me rings and mourning; we were employed all that day in matters of the will; [by which, by the way, my couſin Jenny Fynnett is handſomely provided for] ſo that it was Wedneſday morning early, before we could ſet out on our return.

It is true, we got home (having no houſings to ſtay for) by noon: but though I ſent Robin away before he diſmounted, (who brought me back a whole packet, down to the ſame Wedneſday noon) yet was I really ſo fatigued, and ſhocked, as I muſt own, at the hard death of the old lady; my mother likewiſe (who has no reaſon to diſlike this world) being indiſpoſed from the ſame occaſion; that I could not ſet about writing time enough for Robin's return that night.

But having recruited my ſpirits, my mother having alſo had a good night, I aroſe with the dawn to write this, and get get it diſpatched time enough for your breakfaſt-airing; that your ſuſpence might be as ſhort as poſſible.

I WILL ſoon follow this with another. I will employ a perſon directly to find out how Lovelace behaves himſelf at his inn. Such a buſy ſpirit muſt be traceable.

But, perhaps, my dear, you are indifferent now about him. or his employments; for this requeſt was made before he mortally offended you. Nevertheleſs, I will have enquiry made. The reſult, it is very probable, will be of uſe to confirm you in your preſent unforgiving temper.—And yet, if the poor man [ſhall I pity him for you, my dear?] ſhould be deprived of the greateſt bleſſing any man on earth can receive, and to which he has the preſumption, with ſo little merit, to aſpire; he will have run great riſques; caught great colds; hazarded fevers; ſuſtained the higheſt indignities; braved the inclemencies of ſkies, and all for—nothing!—Will not this move your generoſity (if nothing elſe) in his favour!—Poor Mr. Lovelace!

I would occaſion no throb; nor half-throb; no flaſh of ſenſibility, like lightning darting in, and as ſoon ſuppreſſed by a diſcretion that no one of the ſex ever before could give ſuch an example of—I would not, I ſay; and yet, for a trial of you to yourſelf, rather than as an impertinent overflow of raillery in your friend, as money-takers try a ſuſpected guinea by the ſound, let me, on ſuch a ſuppoſition, ſound you, by repeating, 'Poor Mr. Lovelace!'—

And now, my dear, how is it with you? How do you now? as my mother ſays to Mr. Hickman, when her pert daughter has made him look ſorrowful.

LETTER XXI.

MR. HICKMAN, TO MRS. HOWE.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 29.

MADAM,

IT is with infinite regret that I think myſelf obliged, by pen and ink, to repeat my apprehenſions, that it is impoſſible for me ever to obtain a ſhare in the affections of your beloved daughter. O that it were not too evident to everyone, as well as to myſelf, even to our very ſervants, that my love for her, and my aſſiduities, expoſe me rather to her ſcorn [Forgive me, Madam, the hard word!] than to the treatment due to a man whoſe propoſals have met with your approbation, and who loves her above all the women in the world!

Well might the merit of my paſſion be doubted, if, like Mr. Solmes to the truly admirable Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe, I could continue my addreſſes to Miſs Howe's diſtaſte. Yet what will not the diſcontinuance coſt me!

Give me leave, nevertheleſs, deareſt, worthieſt lady, to repeat, what I told you, on Monday night, at Mrs. Larkin's, with a heart even burſting with grief, that I wanted not the treatment of that day to convince me, that I am not, nor ever can be, the object of Miſs Howe's voluntary favour. What hopes can there be, that a lady will ever eſteem, as a huſband, the man, whom as a lover, ſhe deſpiſes? Will not every act of obligingneſs from ſuch a one, be conſtrued an unmanly tameneſs of ſpirit, and entitle him the more to her diſdain?—My heart is full: forgive me if I ſay, that Miſs Howe's treatment of me does no credit either to her education, or fine ſenſe.

Since then it is too evident, that ſhe cannot eſteem me; and ſince, as I have heard it juſtly obſerved by the excellent Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe, that love is not a voluntary paſſion; would it not be ungenerous to ſubject the dear daughter to the diſpleaſure of a mother ſo juſtly fond of her; and you, Madam, while you are ſo good as to intereſt yourſelf in my favour, to uneaſineſs? And why, were I to be even ſure, at laſt, of ſucceeding by means of your kind partiality to me, ſhould I wiſh to make the beſt-beloved of my ſoul unhappy; ſince mutual muſt be our happineſs, or miſery for life the conſequence to both?

My beſt wiſhes will for ever attend the dear, the ever-dear lady! May her nuptials be happy! They muſt be ſo, if ſhe marry the man ſhe can honour with her love. Yet I will ſay, that whoever be the happy, the thrice happy man, he never can love her with a paſſion more ardent and more ſincere than mine.

Accept, dear Madam, of my moſt grateful thanks for a diſtinction that has been the only ſupport of my preſumption in an addreſs I am obliged, as utterly hopeleſs, to diſcontinue. A diſtinction, on which (and not on my own merits) I had entirely relied; but which, I find can avail me nothing. To the laſt hour of my life, it will give me pleaſure to think, that had your favour, your recommendation, been of ſufficient weight to conquer what ſeems to be an invincible invincible averſion, I had been the happieſt of men.

I am, dear Madam, with inviolable reſpect, your ever obliged and faithful humble ſervant,

CHARLES HICKMAN.

LETTER XXII.

MRS. HOWE, TO CHARLES HICKMAN, ESQ.

THURSDAY, MARCH 30.

I Cannot but ſay, Mr. Hickman, but you have cauſe to be diſſatisfied—to be out of humour—to be diſpleaſed—with Nancy—But, upon my word; but indeed—What ſhall I ſay?—Yet this I will ſay, that you good young gentlemen know nothing at all of our ſex. Shall I tell you—But why ſhould I? and yet I will ſay, that if Nancy did not think well of you in the main, ſhe is too generous to treat you ſo freely as ſhe does.—Don't you think ſhe has courage enough to tell me, ſhe would not ſee you, and to refuſe at any time ſeeing you, as ſhe knows on what account you come, if ſhe had not ſomething in her head favourable to you? Fie! that I am forced to ſay thus much in writing, when I have hinted it to you twenty and twenty times by word of mouth!

But if you are ſo indifferent, Mr. Hickman—If you think you can part with her for her ſkittiſh tricks—If my intereſt in your favour—Why, Mr. Hickman, I muſt tell you, that my Nancy is worth bearing with. If ſhe be fooliſh—what is that owing to?—Is it not to her wit? Let me tell you, Sir, you cannot have the convenience without the inconvenience. What workman loves not a ſharp tool to work with? But is there not more danger from a ſharp tool, than from a blunt one? And what workman will throw away a ſharp tool, becauſe it may cut his fingers? Wit may be likened to a ſharp tool. And there is ſomething very pretty in wit, let me tell you. Often and often have I been forced to ſmile at her arch turns upon me, when I could have beat her for them. And, pray, don't I bear a great deal from her?—And why? Becauſe I love her. And would you not wiſh me to judge of your love for her by my own? And would not you bear with her?—Don't you love her (what though with another ſort of love?) as well as I do? I do aſſure you, Sir, that if I thought you did not—Well, but it is plain that you don't!—And is it plain that you don't?—Well, then, you muſt do as you think beſt.

Well might the merit of your paſſion be doubted, you ſay, if, like Mr. Solmes—Fiddle-faddle!—Why, you are a captious man, I think!—Has Nancy been ſo plain in her repulſes of you as Miſs Clary Harlowe has been to Mr. Solmes?—Does Nancy love any man better than you, although ſhe may not ſhew ſo much love to you as you wiſh for?—If ſhe did, let me tell you, ſhe would have let us all hear of it.—What idle compariſons then!

But it may be you are tired out. It may be you have ſeen ſomebody elſe—It may be you would wiſh to change miſtreſſes with that gay wretch Mr. Lovelace. It may be too, that, in that caſe, Nancy would not be ſorry to change lovers—The truly admirable Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe! And the excellent Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe!—Good lack!—But take care, Mr. Hickman, that you do not praiſe any woman living, let her be as admirable and as excellent as ſhe will, above your own miſtreſs. No polite man will do that, ſurely. And take care too, that you do not make her or me think you are in earneſt in your anger—Juſt though it may be, as anger only—I would not for a thouſand pounds that Nancy ſhould know that you can ſo eaſily part with her, if you have the love for her which you declare you have. Be ſure, if you are not abſolutely determined, that you do not ſo much as whiſper the contents of this your letter to your own heart, as I may ſay.

Her treatment of you, you ſay, does no credit either to her education or fine ſenſe. Very home put, truly! Nevertheleſs, ſo ſay I. But is not hers the diſgrace, more than yours? I can aſſure you, that every-body blames her for it. And why do they blame her?—Why? Becauſe they think you merit better treatment at her hands: and is not this to your credit? Who but pities you, and blames her? Do the ſervants, who, as you obſerve, ſee her ſkittiſh airs, diſreſpect you for them? Do they not, at ſuch times, look concerned for you? Are they not then doubly officious in their reſpects and ſervices to you? I have obſerved with pleaſure, that they are.

But you are afraid you ſhall be thought tame, perhaps, when married. That you ſhall not be thought manly enough, I warrant!—And this was poor Mr. Howe's fear. And many a tug did this lordly fear coſt us both, God knows!—Many more than needed, I am ſure:—and more than ought to have been, had he be known how to bear and forbear, as is the duty of thoſe who pretend to have moſt ſenſe—And, pray, which would you have to have moſt ſenſe, the woman or the man?

Well, Sir, and now what remains, if you really love Nancy ſo well as you ſay you do?—Why, I leave that to you. You may, if you pleaſe, come to breakfaſt with me in the morning. But with no full heart, nor reſenting looks, I adviſe you; except you can brave it out. That have I, when provoked, done many a time with my huſband, but never did I get any-thing by it with my daughter: much leſs will you. Of which, for your obſervation, I thought fit to advertiſe you. As from your friend,

ANNABELLA HOWE.

LETTER XXIII.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

THURSDAY MORNING.

I Will now take ſome notice of your laſt favour. But being ſo far behind-hand with you, muſt be brief.

In the firſt place, as to your reproofs, thus ſhall I diſcharge myſelf of that part of my ſubject. Is it likely, think you, that I ſhould avoid deſerving them now-and-then, occaſionally, when I admire the manner in which you give me your rebukes, and love you the better for them? And when you are ſo well entitled to give them? For what faults can you poſſibly have, unleſs your relations are ſo kind as to find you a few to keep their many in countenance?—But they are as kind to me in this, as to you; for I may venture to affirm, that any one who ſhould read your letters, and would ſay you were right, would not on reading mine condemn me for being quite wrong.

Your reſolution not to leave your father's houſe is right—if you can ſtay in it, and avoid being Solmes's wife.

I think you anſwered Solmes's letter, as I ſhould have anſwered it—Will you not compliment me and yourſelf at once, by ſaying, that that was right?

You have, in your letters to your uncle and the reſt, done all that you ought to do. You are wholly guiltleſs of the conſequence, be it what it will. To offer to give up your eſtate!—That would not I have done! You ſee this offer ſtaggered them: they took time to conſider of it. They made my heart ache in the time they took. I was afraid they would have taken you at your word: and ſo but for ſhame, and for fear of Lovelace, I dare ſay they would. You are too noble for them. This, I repeat, is an offer I would not have made. Let me beg of you, my dear, never to repeat the temptation to them.

I freely own to you, that their uſage of you upon it, and Lovelace's different treatment of you in his laſt letter received at the ſame time, would have made me his, paſt redemption. The deuce take the man, I was going to ſay, for not having had ſo much regard to his character and morals, as would have entirely juſtified ſuch a ſtep in a CLARISSA, perſecuted as ſhe is!

I wonder not at your appointment with him. I may further touch upon ſome part of this ſubject by-and-by.

Pray—pray—I pray you now, my deareſt friend, contrive to ſend your Betty Barnes to me!—Does the Coventry Act extend to women, know ye?—The leaſt I will do, ſhall be, to ſend her home well ſouſed in and dragged through our deepeſt horſe-pond. I'll engage, if I get her hither, that ſhe will keep the anniverſary of her deliverance as long as ſhe lives.

I wonder not at Lovelace's ſaucy anſwer, ſaucy as it really is. If he loves you as he ought, he muſt be vexed at ſo great a diſappointment. The man muſt have been a deteſtable hypocrite, I think, had he not ſhewn his vexation. Your expectations of ſuch a chriſtian command of temper in him, in a diſappointment of this nature eſpecially, are too early by almoſt half a century in a man of his conſtitution. But nevertheleſs I am very far from blaming you for your reſentment.

I ſhall be all impatience to know how this matter ends between you and him. But a few inches of brick-wall between you ſo lately; and now ſuch mountains!—And you think to hold it?—May be ſo!

You ſee, you ſay, that the temper he ſhewed in his preceding letter was not natural to him. And did you before think it was? Wretched creepers and inſinuators! Yet when opportunity ſerves, as inſolent encroachers!—This very Hickman, I make no doubt, would be as ſaucy as your Lovelace, if he dared. He has not half the arrogant bravery of the other, and can better hide his horns; that's all. But whenever he has the power, depend upon it, he will butt at one as valiantly as the other.

If ever I ſhould be perſuaded to have him, I ſhall watch how the obſequious lover goes off; and how the imperative huſband comes upon him; in ſhort, how he he aſcends, and how I deſcend, in the matrimonial wheel, never to take my turn again, but by fits and ſtarts, like the feeble ſtruggles of a ſinking ſtate for it's dying liberty.

All good-natured men are paſſionate, ſays Mr. Lovelace. A pretty plea to a beloved object in the plenitude of her power! As much as to ſay, 'Greatly as 'I value you, Madam, I will not take 'pains to curb my paſſions to oblige 'you.'—Methinks I ſhould be glad to hear from Mr. Hickman ſuch a plea for good-nature as this.

Indeed, we are too apt to make allowances for ſuch tempers as early indulgence has made unconroulable; and therefore habitually evil. But if a boiſterous temper, when under obligation, is to be thus allowed for, what when the tables are turned, will it expect? You know a huſband, who, I fancy, had ſome of theſe early allowances made for him: and you ſee that neither himſelf nor any-body elſe is the happier for it.

The ſuiting of the tempers of two perſons who are to come together, is a great matter; and yet there ſhould be boundaries fixed between them, by conſent as it were, beyond which neither ſhould go: and each ſhould hold the other to it; or there would probably be encroachments in both. To illuſtrate my aſſertion by a very high, and by a more manly (as ſome would think it) than womanly inſtance—If the boundaries of the three eſtates that conſtitute our political union were not known, and occaſionally aſſerted, what would become of the prerogatives and privileges of each? The two branches of the legiſlature would encroach upon each other; and the executive power would ſwallow up both.

But if two perſons of diſcretion, you'll ſay, come together—

Aye, my dear, that's true: but, if none but perſons of diſcretion were to marry—And would it not ſurprize you if I were to advance, that the perſons of diſcretion are generally ſingle?—Such perſons are apt to conſider too much, to reſolve.—Are not you and I complimented as ſuch?—And would either of us marry, if the fellows, and our friends, would let us alone?

But to the former point—Had Lovelace made his addreſſes to me, (unleſs indeed I had been taken with a liking for him more than conditional) I would have forbid him, upon the firſt paſſionate inſtance of his good-nature, as he calls it, ever to ſee me more; 'Thou muſt bear 'with me, honeſt friend,' might I have ſaid, [had I condeſcended to ſay anything to him] 'an hundred times more 'than this—Be gone therefore!—I bear 'with no paſſions that are predominant 'to that thou haſt pretended for me!'

But to one of your mild and gentle temper, it would be all one, were you married, whether the man were a Lovelace or a Hickman in his ſpirit.—You are ſo obediently principled, that perhaps you would have told a mild man, that he muſt not entreat, but command; and that it was beneath him not to exact from you the obedience you had ſo ſolemnly vowed to him at the altar.—I know of old, my dear, your meek regard to that little piddling part of the marriage-vow which ſome prerogative-monger foiſted into the office, to make that a duty, which he knew was not a right.

Our way of training up, you ſay, makes us need the protection of the brave. Very true: and how extremely brave and gallant is it, that this brave man will free us from all inſults but thoſe which will go neareſt to our hearts; that is to ſay, His own!

How artfully has Lovelace, in the abſtract you give me of one of his letters, calculated to your meridian! Generous ſpirits hate compulſion!—He is certainly a deeper creature by much than once we thought him. He knows, as you intimate, that his own wild pranks cannot be concealed; and ſo owns juſt enough to palliate (becauſe it teaches you not to be ſurprized at) any new one, that may come to your ears; and then, truly, he is, however faulty, a mighty ingenuous man; and by no means an hypocrite: a character the moſt odious of all others, to our ſex, in a lover, and the leaſt to be forgiven, were it only becauſe, when detected, it makes us doubt the juſtice of thoſe praiſes which we are willing to believe he thought to be our due.

By means of this ſuppoſed ingenuity, Lovelace obtains a praiſe, inſtead of a merited diſpraiſe; and, like an abſolved confeſſionaire, wipes off as he goes along one ſcore, to begin another; for an eye favourable to him will not ſee his faults through a magnifying glaſs; nor will a woman, willing to hope the beſt, forbear to impute to ill-will and prejudice all that charity can make ſo imputable. And if ſhe even give credit to ſuch of the unfavourable imputations as may be too flagrant to be doubted, ſhe will be very apt to take-in the future hope, which he inculcates, and which to queſ-tion would be to queſtion her own power, and perhaps merit: and thus may a woman be inclined to make a ſlight, even a fancied merit atone for the moſt glaring vice.

I have a reaſon, a new one, for this preachment upon a text you have given me. But, till I am better informed, I will not explain myſelf. If it come out, as I ſhrewdly ſuſpect it will, the man, my dear, is a devil; and you muſt rather think of—I proteſt I had like to have ſaid Solmes than him.

But let this be as it will, ſhall I tell you, how, after all his offences, he may creep in with you again?

I will. Thus then: it is but to claim for himſelf the good-natured character; and this, granted, will blot out the fault of paſſionate inſolence; and ſo he will have nothing to do, but this hour to accuſtom you to inſult; the next, to bring you to forgive him, upon his ſubmiſſion: the conſequence muſt be, that he will by this teazing break your reſentment all to pieces; and then, a little more of the inſult, and a little leſs of the ſubmiſſion, on his part, will go down, till nothing elſe but the firſt will be ſeen, and not a bit of the ſecond: you will then be afraid to provoke ſo offenſive a ſpirit; and at laſt will be brought ſo prettily, and ſo audibly, to pronounce the little reptile word OBEY, that it will do one's heart good to hear you. The Muſcovite wife then takes place of the managed miſtreſs. —And if you doubt the progreſſion, be pleaſed, my dear, to take your mother's judgment upon it.

But no more of this juſt now. Your ſituation is become too critical to permit me to dwell upon theſe ſorts of topicks. And yet this is but an affected levity with me. My heart, as I have heretofore ſaid, is a ſincere ſharer in all your diſtreſſes. My ſun-ſhine darts but through a drizly cloud. My eye, were you to ſee it, when it ſeems to you ſo gladdened, as you mentioned in a former, is more than ready to overflow, even at the very paſſages perhaps upon which you impute to me the archneſs of exultation.

But now the unheard of cruelty and perverſeneſs of ſome of your friends; [Relations, I ſhould ſay—I am always blundering thus!] the as ſtrange determinedneſs of others; your preſent quarrel with Lovelace; and your approaching interview with Solmes, from which you are right to apprehend a great deal; are ſuch conſiderable circumſtances in your ſtory, that it is fit they ſhould engroſs all my attention.

You aſk me to adviſe you how to behave upon Solmes's viſit. I cannot for my life. I know they expect a great deal from it: you had not elſe had your long day complied with. All I will ſay is, that if Solmes cannot be prevailed for, now, that Lovelace has ſo much offended you, he never will. When the interview is over, I doubt not but that I ſhall have reaſon to ſay, that all you did, that all you ſaid, was right, and could not be better: yet, if I don't think ſo, I won't ſay ſo; that I promiſe you.

Only let me adviſe you to pull up a ſpirit, even to your uncle, if there be occaſion. Reſent the vile and fooliſh treatment you meet with, in which he has taken ſo large a ſhare, and make him aſhamed of it, if you can.

I know not, upon recollection, but this interview may be a good thing for you, however deſigned. For when Solmes ſees (if that be to be ſo) that it is impoſſible he ſhould ſucceed with you; and your relations ſee it too; the one muſt, I think, recede, and the other come to terms with you, upon offers, that it is my opinion, will go hard enough with you to comply with; when the ſtill harder are diſpenſed with.

There are ſeveral paſſages in your laſt letters, as well as in your former, which authoriſe me to ſay this. But it would be unſeaſonable to touch this ſubject further juſt now.

But, upon the whole, I have no patience to ſee you thus made the ſport of your brother's and ſiſter's cruelty: for what, after ſo much ſteadineſs on your part, in ſo many trials, can be their hope? Except indeed it be to drive you to extremity, and to ruin you in the opinion of your uncles, as well as father.

I urge you by all means to ſend out of their reach all the letters and papers you would not have them ſee. Methinks, I would wiſh you to depoſit likewiſe a parcel of cloaths, linen, and the like, before your interview with Solmes; leſt you ſhould not have an opportunity for it afterwards. Robin ſhall fetch it away on the firſt orders, by day or by night.

I am in hopes to procure from my mother, if things come to extremity, leave for you to be privately with us.

I will condition to be good-humoured, and even kind, to HER favourite, if ſhe will ſhew me an indulgence that ſhall make me ſerviceable to MINE.

This alternative has been a good while in my head. But as your fooliſh uncle has ſo ſtrangely attached my mother to their their views, I cannot promiſe that I ſhall ſucceed as I wiſh.

Do not abſolutely deſpair, however. What though the contention will be between woman and woman? I fancy I ſhall be able to manage it, by the help of a little female perſeverance. Your quarrel with Lovelace, if it continue, will ſtrengthen my hands. And the offers you made in your anſwer to your uncle Harlowe's letter of Sunday night laſt, duly dwelt upon, muſt add force to my pleas.

I depend upon your forgiveneſs of all the perhaps unſeaſonable flippancies of your naturally too lively, yet moſt ſincerely ſympathizing, ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XXIV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

FRIDAY, MARCH 31.

YOU have very kindly accounted for your ſilence. People in misfortune are always in doubt. They are too apt to turn even unavoidable accidents into ſlights and neglects; eſpecially in thoſe whoſe favourable opinion they wiſh to preſerve.

I am ſure I ought evermore to exempt my Anna Howe from the ſuppoſed poſſibility of her becoming one of thoſe who baſk only in the ſunſhine of a friend: but, nevertheleſs, her friendſhip is too precious to me, not to doubt my own merits on the one hand, and not to be anxious for the preſervation of it, on the other.

You ſo generouſly give me liberty to chide you, that I am afraid of taking it, becauſe I could ſooner miſtruſt my own judgment, than that of a beloved friend, whoſe ingenuouſneſs in acknowledging an imputed error ſeems to ſet her above the commiſſion of a wilful one. This makes me half-afraid to aſk you, if you think you are not too cruel, to ungenerous ſhall I ſay? in your behaviour to a man who loves you ſo dearly, and is ſo worthy and ſo ſincere a man?

Only it is by YOU, or I ſhould be aſhamed to be outdone in that true magnanimity, which makes one thankful for the wounds given by a true friend. I believe I was guilty of a petulance which nothing but my uneaſy ſituation can excuſe; if that can. I am almoſt afraid to beg of you, and yet I repeatedly do, to give way to that charming ſpirit, whenever it riſes to your pen, which ſmiles, yet goes to the quick of my fault. What patient ſhall be afraid of a probe in ſo delicate a hand?—I ſay, I am almoſt afraid to pray you to give way to it, for fear you ſhould, for that very reaſon, reſtrain it. For the edge may be taken off, if it does not make the ſubject of its raillery wince a little. Permitted or deſired ſatire may be apt, in a generous ſatiriſt, mending as it rallies, to turn too ſoon into panegyrick. Yours is intended to inſtruct; and though it bites, it pleaſes at the ſame time: no fear of a wound's wrankling or feſtering by ſo delicate a point as you carry; not envenomed by perſonality, not intending to expoſe, or ridicule, or exaſperate. The moſt admired of our moderns know nothing of this art: why? Becauſe it muſt be founded in good-nature, and directed by a right heart. The man, not the fault, is generally the ſubject of their ſatire: and were it to be juſt, how ſhould it be uſeful; how ſhould it anſwer any good purpoſe; when every gaſh (for their weapon is a broad-ſword, not a lancet) lets in the air of public ridicule, and exaſperates where it ſhould heal? Spare me not therefore becauſe I am your friend. For that very reaſon ſpare me not. I may feel your edge, fine as it is. I may be pained: you would loſe your end if I were not; but after the firſt ſenſibility, (as I have ſaid more than once before) I will love you the better, and my amended heart ſhall be all yours; and it will then be more worthy to be yours.

You have taught me what to ſay to, and what to think of, Mr. Lovelace. You have, by agreeable anticipation, let me know how it is probable he will apply to me to be excuſed. I will lay every thing before you that ſhall paſs on the occaſion, if he do apply, that I may take your advice, when it can come in time; and when it cannot, that I may receive your correction, or approbation, as I may happen to merit either.—Only one thing muſt be allowed for me; that whatever courſe I ſhall be permitted or be forced to ſteer, I muſt be conſidered as a perſon out of her own direction. Toſt to and fro by the high winds of paſſionate controul, (and, as I think, unſeaſonable ſeverity) I behold the deſired port, the ſingle ſtate, into which I would fain ſteer; but am kept off by the foaming billows of a brother's and ſiſter's envy, and by the raging winds of a ſuppoſed invaded authority; while I ſee in Lovelace, the rocks on one hand, and in Solmes, the ſands on the other; and tremble leſt I ſhould ſplit upon the former, or ſtrike upon the latter.

But you, my better pilot, to what a charming hope do you bid me aſpire, if things come to extremity! I will not, as you caution me, too much depend upon your ſucceſs with your mother in my favour; for I well know her high notions of implicit duty in a child: but yet I will hope too; becauſe her ſeaſonable protection may ſave me perhaps from a greater raſhneſs. And in this caſe, ſhe ſhall direct me in all my ways; I will do nothing but by her orders, and by her advice and yours; not ſee any-body; not write to any-body; nor ſhall any living ſoul, but by her direction and yours, know where I am. In any cottage place me, I will never ſtir out, unleſs, diſguiſed as your ſervant, I am now-and-then permitted an evening walk with you; and this private protection to be granted for no longer time than till my couſin Morden comes; which, as I hope, cannot be long.

I am afraid I muſt not venture to take the hint you give me, to depoſit ſome of my cloaths; although I will ſome of my linen, as well as papers.

I will tell you why—Betty had for ſome time been very curious about my wardrobe, whenever I took out any of my things before her.

Obſerving this, I once, on taking one of my garden-airings, left my keys in the locks; and on my return ſurprized the creature with her hand upon the keys, as if ſhutting the door.

She was confounded at my ſudden coming back. I took no notice: but, on her retiring, I found my cloaths were not in the uſual order.

I doubted not, upon this, that her curioſity was owing to the orders ſhe had received; and being afraid they would abridge me of my airings, if their ſuſpicions were not obviated, it has ever ſince been my cuſtom (among other contrivances) not only to leave my keys in the locks; but to employ the wench now-and-then in taking out my cloaths, ſuit by ſuit, on pretence of their being rumpled or creaſed, and to ſee that the flowered ſilver ſuit did not tarniſh; ſometimes declaredly to give myſelf employment, having little elſe to do: with which employment (ſuperadded to the delight taken by the low as well as by the high of our ſex in ſeeing fine cloaths) ſhe ſeemed always, I thought, as well pleaſed as if it anſwered one of the offices ſhe had in charge.

To this, and to the confidence they have in a ſpy ſo diligent, and to their knowing, that I have not one confidante in a family in which nevertheleſs I believe every ſervant loves me; nor have attempted to make one; I ſuppoſe, I owe the freedom I enjoy of my airings: and perhaps (finding I make no movements towards going away) they are the more ſecure, that I ſhall at laſt be prevailed upon to comply with their meaſures. Since they muſt think, that, otherwiſe, they give me provocation enough to take ſome raſh ſtep in order to free myſelf from a treatment ſo diſgraceful; and which [God forgive me, if I judge amiſs!] I am afraid my brother and ſiſter would not be ſorry to drive me to take.

If therefore ſuch a ſtep ſhould become neceſſary, (which I yet hope will not) I muſt be contented to go away with the cloaths I ſhall have on at the time. My cuſtom to be dreſſed for the day, as ſoon as breakfaſt is over, when I have no houſhold employments to prevent me, will make ſuch a ſtep (if I am forced to take it) leſs ſuſpected. And the linen I ſhall depoſit, in purſuance of your kind hint, cannot be miſſed.

This cuſtom, although a priſoner (as I may too truly ſay) and neither viſited nor viſiting, I continue. We owe to ourſelves, and to our ſex, you know, to be always neat; and never to be ſurprized in a way we ſhould be pained to be ſeen in.

Beſides, people in adverſity (which is the ſtate of trial of every good quality) ſhould endeavour to preſerve laudable cuſtoms, that, if ſunſhine return, they may not be loſers by their trial.

Does it not, moreover, manifeſt a firmneſs of mind, in an unhappy perſon, to keep hope alive? To hope for better days, is half to deſerve them: for could we have juſt ground for ſuch a hope, if we did not reſolve to deſerve what that hope bids us aſpire to?—Then who ſhall befriend a perſon who forſakes herſelf?

Theſe are reflections by which I ſometimes endeavour to ſupport myſelf.

I know you don't deſpiſe my grave airs, although (with a view no doubt to irradiate my mind in my misfortunes) you rally me upon them. Every-body has not your talent of introducing ſerious and important leſſons, in ſuch a happy manner as at once to delight and inſtruct.

What a multitude of contrivances may not young people fall upon, if the mind be not engaged by acts of kindneſs and condeſcenſion! I am not uſed by my friends of late as I always uſed their ſervants.

When

When I was entruſted with the family-management, I always found it right, as well in policy as generoſity, to repoſe a truſt in them. Not to ſeem to expect or depend upon juſtice from them, is in a manner to bid them take opportunities, whenever they offer, to be unjuſt.

Mr. Solmes (to expatiate a little on this low, but not unuſeful ſubject) in his more trifling ſolicitudes, would have had a ſorry key-keeper in me. Were I miſtreſs of a family, I would not either take to myſelf, or give to ſervants, the pain of keeping thoſe I had reaſon to ſuſpect. People low in ſtation have often minds not ſordid. Nay, I have ſometimes thought, that (even take number for number) there are more honeſt low people, than honeſt high. In the one, honeſty is their chief pride. In the other, love of power, of grandeur, of pleaſure, miſlead; and that and their ambition induce a paramount pride, which too often ſwallows up the more laudable one.

Many of the former would ſcorn to deceive a confidence. But I have ſeen, among the moſt ignorant of their claſs, a ſuſceptibility of reſentment, if their honeſty has been ſuſpected: and have more than once been forced to put a ſervant right, whom I have heard ſay, That, although ſhe valued herſelf upon her honeſty, no maſter or miſtreſs ſhould ſuſpect her for nothing.

How far has the compariſon I had in my head, between my friends treatment of me, and my treatment of their ſervants, carried me!—But we always allowed ourſelves to expatiate on ſuch ſubjects, whether low or high, as might tend to enlarge our minds, or mend our management, whether notional or practical, and whether ſuch expatiating reſpected our preſent or might reſpect our probable future ſituations.

What I was principally leading to, was to tell you, how ingenious I am in my contrivances and pretences to blind my gaolereſs, and to take off the jealouſy of her principals on my going down ſo often into the garden and poultry-yard. People ſuſpiciouſly treated are never I believe at a loſs for invention. Sometimes I want air, and am better the moment I am out of my chamber—Sometimes ſpirits; and then my bantams or pheaſants or the caſcade divert me; the former, by their inſpiriting livelineſs; the latter, more ſolemly, by it's echoing daſhings, and hollow murmurs.—Sometimes ſolitude is of all things my wiſh; and the awful ſilence of the night, the ſpangled element, and the riſing and ſetting ſun, how promotive of contemplation!—Sometimes, when I intend nothing, and expect no letters, I am officious to take Betty with me; and at others, beſpeak her attendance, when I know ſhe is otherwiſe employed, and cannot give it me.

Theſe more capital artifices I branch out into leſſer ones, without number. Yet all have not only the face of truth, but are real truth; although not my principal motive. How prompt a thing is will!—What impediments does diſlike furniſh!—How ſwiftly, through every difficulty, do we move with the one!—How tardily with the other!—Every trifling obſtruction weighing us down, as if lead were faſtened to our feet!

FRIDAY MORNING, ELEVEN O'CLOCK.

I HAVE already made up my parcel of linen. My heart ached all the time I was employed about it; and ſtill aches, at the thoughts of it's being a neceſſary precaution.

When the parcel comes to your hands, as I hope it ſafely will, you will be pleaſed to open it. You will find in it two parcels ſealed up; one of which contains the letters you have not yet ſeen, being thoſe written ſince I left you: in the other are all the letters and copies of letters that have paſſed between you and me ſince I was laſt with you; with ſome other papers on ſubjects ſo much above me, that I cannot wiſh them to be ſeen by any-body whoſe indulgence I am not ſo ſure of, as I am of yours. If my judgment ripen with my years, perhaps I may review them.

Mrs. Norton uſed to ſay, from her reverend father, that youth was the time of life for imagination and fancy to work in: then, were a writer to lay by his works till riper years and experience ſhould direct the fire rather to glow, than to flame out; ſomething between both might perhaps be produced that would not diſpleaſe a judicious eye.

In a third diviſion folded up ſeparately, are all Mr. Lovelace's letters written to me ſince he was forbidden this houſe, and copies of my anſwers to them. I expect that you will break the ſeals of this parcel, and when you have peruſed them all, give me your free opinion of my conduct.

By the way, not a line from that man!—Not one line!—Wedneſday I depoſited mine. It remained there on Wedneſday neſday night. What time it was taken away yeſterday I cannot tell: for I did not concern myſelf about it till towards night; and then it was not there. No return at ten this day. I ſuppoſe he is as much out of humour, as I.—With all my heart!

He may be mean enough perhaps, if ever I ſhould put it into his power, to avenge himſelf for the trouble he has had with me.—But that now, I dare ſay, I never ſhall.

I ſee what a ſort of man the encroacher is. And I hope we are equally ſick of one another.—My heart is vexedly eaſy, if I may ſo deſcribe it.—Vexedly—becauſe of the apprehended interview with Solmes, and the conſequences it may be attended with: or elſe I ſhould be quite eaſy; for why? I have not deſerved the uſage I receive: and could I be rid of Solmes, as I preſume I am of Lovelace, their influence over my father, mother, and uncles, againſt me, could not hold.

The five guineas tied up in one corner of a handkerchief under the linen, I beg you will let paſs as an acknowledgment for the trouble I give your truſty ſervant. You muſt not chide me for this. You know I cannot be eaſy unleſs I have my way in theſe little matters.

I was going to put up what little money I have, and ſome of my ornaments; but they are portable, and I cannot forget them. Beſides, ſhould they (ſuſpecting me) deſire to ſee any of the jewels, and were I not able to produce them, it would amount to a demonſtration of an intention which would have a guilty appearance to them.

FRIDAY, ONE O'CLOCK, IN THE WOOD HOUSE.

No letter yet from this man! I have luckily depoſited my parcel, and have your letter of laſt night. If Robert takes this without the parcel, pray let him return immediately for it. But he cannot miſs it, I think; and muſt conclude that it is put there for him to take away. You may believe, from the contents of yours, that I ſhall immediately write again.

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XXV.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

THURSDAY NIGHT, MARCH 30.

THE fruits of my enquiry after your abominable wretch's behaviour and baſeneſs at the paltry alehouſe, which he calls an inn, prepare to hear.

Wrens and ſparrows are not too ignoble a quarry for this villainous goſhawk!—His aſſiduities; his watchings; his night riſques; the inclement weather he journeys in; muſt not be all placed to your account. He has opportunities of making every-thing light to him of that ſort. A ſweet pretty girl, I am told—Innocent till he went thither—Now! (Ah! poor girl!) who knows what?

But juſt turned of ſeventeen!—His friend and brother rake, (a man of humour and intrigue) as I am told, to ſhare the ſocial bottle with. And ſometimes another diſguiſed rake or two. No ſorrow comes near their hearts. Be not diſturbed, my dear, at his hoarſeneſſes! His pretty Betſey, his roſebud, as the vile wretch calls her, can hear all he ſays.

He is very fond of her. They ſay ſhe is innocent even yet—Her father, her grandfather, believe her to be ſo. He is to fortune her out to a young lover!—Ah! the poor young lover!—Ah! the poor ſimple girl!

Mr. Hickman tells me, that he heard in town, that he uſed to be often at plays, and at the opera, with women; and every time with a different one—Ah! my ſweet friend!—But I hope he is nothing to you, if all this were truth—But this intelligence, in relation to this poor girl, will do his buſineſs, if you had been ever ſo good friends before.

A vile wretch! Cannot ſuch purity in purſuit, in view, reſtrain him? But I leave him to you!—There can be no hope of him. More of a fool, than of ſuch a man. Yet I wiſh I may be able to ſnatch the poor young creature out of his villainous paws. I have laid a ſcheme to do ſo; if indeed ſhe be hitherto innocent and heart-free.

He appears to the people as a military man, in diſguiſe, ſecreting himſelf on account of a duel fought in town; the adverſary's life in ſuſpence. They believe he is a great man. His friend paſſes for an inferior officer; upon a foot of freedom with him. He, accompanied by a third man, who is a ſort of ſubordinate companion to the ſecond. The wretch himſelf with but one ſervant.

O my dear! How pleaſantly can theſe devils, as I muſt call them, paſs their time, while our gentle boſoms heave with pity for their ſuppoſed ſufferings for us!

I HAVE ſent for this girl and her father; and am juſt now informed, that I ſhall ſee them. I will ſift them thoroughly. I ſhall ſoon find out ſuch a ſimple thing as this, if he has not corrupted her already—And if he has, I ſhall ſoon find that out too. If more art than nature appears either in her or her father, I ſhall give them both up—But depend upon it, the girl's undone.

He is ſaid to be fond of her. He places her at the upper-end of his table. He ſets her a-prattling. He keeps his friend at a diſtance from her. She prates away. He admires for nature all ſhe ſays. Once was heard to call her 'Charming little creature!' An hundred has he called ſo, no doubt. He puts her upon ſinging. He praiſes her wild note.—O, my dear, the girl's undone!—muſt be undone!—The man, you know, is LOVELACE.

Let them bring Wyerley to you, if they will have you married—Any-body but Solmes and Lovelace be yours!—So adviſes your ANNA HOWE.

My deareſt friend, conſider this alehouſe as his garriſon; him as an enemy: his brother-rakes as his aſſiſtants and abettors. Would not your brother, would not your uncles, tremble, if they knew how near them he is, as they paſs to and fro?—I am told, he is reſolved you ſhall not be carried to your uncle Antony's.—What can you do, with or without ſuch an enterprizing— Fill up the blank I leave.—I cannot find a word bad enough.

LETTER XXVI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

FRIDAY, THREE O'CLOCK.

YOU incenſe, alarm, and terrify me, at the ſame time—Haſten, my deareſt friend, haſten to me. what further intelligence you can gather about this vileſt of men.

But never talk of innocence, of ſimplicity, and this unhappy girl, together! Muſt ſhe not know, that ſuch a man as that, dignified in his very aſpect; and no diſguiſe able to conceal his being of condition; muſt mean too much, when he places her at the upper-end of his table, and calls her by ſuch tender names? Would a girl, modeſt as ſimple, above ſeventeen, be ſet a ſinging at the pleaſure of ſuch a man as that? A ſtranger, and profeſſedly in diſguiſe! Would her father and grandmother, if honeſt people, and careful of their ſimple girl, permit ſuch freedoms?

Keep his friend at diſtance from her!—To be ſure his deſigns are villainous, if they have not been already effected.

Warn, my dear, if not too late, the unthinking father, of his child's danger. There cannot be a father in the world, who would ſell his child's virtue. No mother!—The poor thing!

I long to hear the reſult of your intelligence. You ſhall ſee the ſimple creature, you tell me.—Let me know what ſort of a girl ſhe is.—'A ſweet pretty girl!' you ſay. A ſweet pretty girl, my dear!—They are ſweet pretty words from your pen. But are they yours or his of her?—If ſhe be ſo ſimple, if ſhe have eaſe and nature in her manner, in her ſpeech, and warbles prettily her wild notes, why, ſuch a girl as that muſt engage ſuch a profligate wretch, (as now indeed I doubt this man is) accuſtomed, perhaps, to town women, and their confident ways—Muſt deeply and for a long ſeaſon engage him: ſince perhaps when her innocence is departed, ſhe will endeavour by art to ſupply the loſs of the natural charms which now engage him.

Fine hopes of ſuch a wretch's reformation! I would not, my dear, for the world have any thing to ſay—But I need not make reſolutions. I have not opened, nor will I open, his letter.—A ſycophant creature!—With his hoarſeneſſes—got perhaps by a midnight revel, ſinging to his wild-note ſinger, and only increaſed in the coppice!

To be already on a toaſt!—In his eſteem, I mean: for myſelf, I deſpiſe him. I hate myſelf almoſt for writing ſo much about him, and of ſuch a ſimpleton as this ſweet pretty girl as you call her: but no one can be either ſweet or pretty, that is not modeſt, that is not virtuous.

And now, my dear, I will tell you, how I came to put you upon this enquiry.

This vile Joſeph Leman had given a hint to Betty, and ſhe to me, as if Lovelace would be found out to be a very bad man, at a place where he had been lately ſeen in diſguiſe. But he would ſee further, he ſaid, before he told her more; and ſhe promiſed ſecreſy, in hope to get at further intelligence. I thought it could be no harm, to get you to inform yourſelf, and me, of what could be gathered. And now I ſee, his enemies are but too well warranted in their reports of him: and, if the ruin of this poor poor young creature be his aim, and if he had not known her but for his viſits to Harlowe Place, I ſhall have reaſon to be doubly concerned for her; and doubly incenſed againſt ſo vile a man.

I think I hate him worſe than I do Solmes himſelf.

But I will not add one other word about him; after I have told you, that I with to know, as ſoon as poſſible, what further occurs from your enquiry. I have a letter from him; but ſhall not open it till I do: and then, if it come out as I dare ſay it will, I will directly put the letter unopened into the place I took it from, and never trouble myſelf more about him. Adieu, my deareſt friend. CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XXVII.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

FRIDAY NOON, MARCH 31.

JUSTICE obliges me to forward this after my laſt on the wings of the wind, as I may ſay. I really believe the man is innocent. Of this one accuſation, I think, he muſt be acquitted; and I am ſorry I was ſo forward in diſpatching away my intelligence by halves.

I have ſeen the girl. She is really a very pretty, a very neat, and, what is ſtill a greater beauty, a very innocent young creature. He who could have ruined ſuch an undeſigning home-bred, muſt have been indeed infernally wicked. Her father is an honeſt ſimple man; entirely ſatisfied with his child, and with her new acquaintance.

I am almoſt afraid for your heart, when I tell you, that I find, now I have got to the bottom of this enquiry, ſomething noble come out in this Lovelace's favour.

The girl is to be married next week; and this promoted and brought about by him. He is reſolved, her father ſays, to make one couple happy, and wiſhes he could make more ſo. [There's for you, my dear!] And having taken a liking alſo to the young fellow whom ſhe profeſſes to love, he has given her an hundred pounds: the grandmother actually has it in her hands, to anſwer to the like ſum given to the youth by one of his own relations. While Mr. Lovelace's companion, attracted by the example, has given twenty-five guineas to the father, who is poor, towards cloaths to equip the pretty ruſtick.

Mr. Lovelace and his friend, the poor man ſays, when they firſt came to his houſe, affected to appear as perſons of low degree; but now he knows the one (but mentioned it in confidence) to be Colonel Barrow, the other Captain Sloane. The colonel he owns was at firſt very ſweet upon his girl: but upon her grandmother's begging of him to ſpare her innocence, he vowed, that he never would offer any-thing but good counſel to her. He kept his word; and the pretty fool acknowledged, that ſhe never could have been better inſtructed by the miniſter himſelf from the Bible-book!—The girl pleaſed me ſo well, that I made her viſit to me worth her while.

But what, my dear, will become of us now?—Lovelace not only reformed, but turned preacher!—What will become of us now?—Why, my ſweet friend, your generoſity is now engaged in his favour!—Fie upon this generoſity! I think in my heart, that it does as much miſchief to the noble-minded, as love to the ignobler. What before was only a conditional liking, I am now afraid will turn to liking unconditional.

I could not endure to change my invective into panegyrick all at once, and ſo ſoon. We, or ſuch as I at leaſt, love to keep ourſelves in countenance for a raſh judgment, even when we know it to be raſh. Every-body has not your generoſity in confeſſing a miſtake. It requires a greatneſs of ſoul frankly to do it. So I made ſtill farther enquiry after his life and manners, and behaviour there, in hopes to find ſomething bad: but all uniform!

Upon the whole, Mr. Lovelace comes out with ſo much advantage from this enquiry, that were there the leaſt room for it, I ſhould ſuſpect the whole to be a plot ſet on foot to waſh a blackamore white. Adieu, my dear. ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XXVIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE TO MISS HOWE.

SATURDAY, APRIL 1.

HASTY cenſures do indeed ſubject themſelves to the charge of variableneſs and inconſiſtency in judgment: and ſo they ought; for if you, even you, my dear, were ſo loth to own a miſtake, as in the inſtance before us you pretend you were, I believe I ſhould not have loved you ſo well as I really do love you. Nor could you, in that caſe, have ſo frankly thrown the reflection I hint at upon yourſelf, had not your mind been one of the moſt ingenuous that ever woman boaſted.

Mr. Lovelace

Mr. Lovelace has faults enow to deſerve very ſevere cenſure, although he be not guilty of this. If I were upon ſuch terms with him as he could wiſh me to be, I ſhould give him a hint, that this treacherous Joſeph Leman cannot be ſo much attached to him, as perhaps he thinks him to be. If he were, he would not have been ſo ready to report to his diſadvantage (and to Betty Barnes too) this ſlight affair of the pretty ruſtick. Joſeph has engaged Betty to ſecreſy; promiſing to let her, and her young maſter too, know more, when he knows the whole of the matter: and this hinders her from mentioning it, as ſhe is nevertheleſs agog to do, to my ſiſter or brother. And then ſhe does not chuſe to diſoblige Joſeph; for although ſhe pretends to look above him, ſhe liſtens, I believe, to ſome love-ſtories he tells her.

Women having it not in their power to begin a courtſhip, ſome of them very frequently, I believe, lend an ear where their hearts incline not.

But to ſay no more of theſe low people, neither of whom I think tolerably of; I muſt needs own, that as I ſhould for ever have deſpiſed this man, had he been capable of ſuch a vile intrigue in his way to Harlowe Place, and as I believed he was capable of it, it has indeed [I own it has] proportionably engaged my generoſity, as you call it, in his favour: perhaps more than I may have reaſon to wiſh it had. And, rally me as you will, pray tell me fairly, my dear, would it not have had ſuch an effect upon you?

Then the real generoſity of the act.—I proteſt, my beloved friend, if he would be good for the reſt of his life from this time, I would forgive him a great many of his paſt errors, were it only for the demonſtration he has given in this, that he is capable of ſo good and bountiful a manner of thinking.

You may believe I made no ſcruple to open his letter, after the receipt of your ſecond on this ſubject: nor ſhall I of anſwering it, as I have no reaſon to find fault with it.—An article in his favour, procured him, however, ſo much the eaſier (I muſt own) by way of amends for the undue diſpleaſure I took againſt him; though he knows it not.

It is lucky enough that this matter was cleared up to me by your friendly diligence ſo ſoon: for had I written before it was, it would have been to reinforce my diſmiſſion of him; and perhaps I ſhould have mentioned the very motive; for it affected me more than I think it ought: and then, what an advantage would that have given him, when he could have cleared up the matter ſo happily for himſelf!

When I ſend you this letter of his, you will ſee how very humble he is: what acknowledgments of natural impatience; what confeſſion of faults, as you prognoſticated.

A very different appearance, I muſt own, all theſe make, now the ſtory of the pretty ruſtick is cleared up, to what they would have made, had it not.

You will ſee how he accounts to me, That he could not, by reaſon of indiſpoſition, come for my letter in perſon: and the forward creature labours the point, as if he thought I ſhould be uneaſy that he did not. I am indeed ſorry he ſhould be ill on my account; and I will allow, that the ſuſpence he has been in for ſome time paſt, muſt have been vexatious enough to ſo impatient a ſpirit. But all is owing originally to himſelf.

You will find him (in the preſumption of being forgiven) full of contrivances and expedients for my eſcaping the threatened compulſion.

I have always ſaid, that next to being without fault is the acknowledgment of a fault; ſince no amendment can be expected where an error is defended: but you will ſee in this very letter, an haughtineſs even in his ſubmiſſions. 'Tis true, I know not where to find fault as to the expreſſion; yet cannot I be ſatisfied, that his humility is humility; or even an humility upon ſuch conviction as one ſhould be pleaſed with.

To be ſure he is far from being a polite man: yet is not directly and characteriſtically, as I may ſay, unpolite. But his is ſuch a ſort of politeneſs, as has by a careleſsneſs founded on very early indulgence, and perhaps on too much ſucceſs in riper years, and an arrogance built upon both, grown into aſſuredneſs, and of courſe, as I may ſay, into indelicacy.

The diſtance you recommend at which to keep theſe men, is certainly right in the main: familiarity deſtroys reverence; but with whom?—Not with thoſe, ſurely, who are prudent, grateful, and generous.

But it is very difficult for perſons, who would avoid running into one extreme, to keep clear of another. Hence Mr. Lovelace, perhaps, thinks it the mark of a great ſpirit to humour his pride, though at the expence of his politeneſs: but can the man be a deep man, who knows not how to make ſuch diſtinctions as a perſon of but moderate parts cannot miſs?

He complains heavily of my readineſs to take mortal offence at him, and to diſmiſs him for ever: it is a high conduct, he ſays, he muſt be frank enough to tell me; a conduct that muſt be very far from contributing to allay his apprehenſinoſ the poſſibility that I may be proſecuted into my relations meaſures in behalf of Mr. Solmes.

You will ſee how he puts his preſent and his future happineſs, with regard to both worlds, entirely upon me. The ardour with which he vows and promiſes, I think the heart only can dictate: how elſe can one gueſs at a man's heart?

You will alſo ſee, that he has already heard of the interview I am to have with Mr. Solmes; and with what vehemence and anguiſh he expreſſes himſelf on the occaſion.—I intend to take proper notice of the ignoble means he ſtoops to, to come at his early intelligence out of our family. If perſons pretending to principle bear not their teſtimony againſt unprincipled actions, what check can they have?

You will ſee, how paſſionately he preſſes me to oblige him with a few lines, before the interview between Mr. Solmes and me take place, (if, as he ſays, it muſt take place) to confirm his hope, that I have no view, in my preſent diſpleaſure againſt him, to give encouragement to Solmes. An apprehenſion, he ſays, that he muſt be excuſed for repeating; eſpecially as the interview is a favour granted to that man, which I have refuſed to him; ſince, as he infers, were it not with ſuch an expectation, why ſhould my friends preſs it?

I HAVE written; and to this effect—That I had never intended to write another line to a man, who could take upon himſelf to reflect upon my ſex and myſelf, for having thought fit to make uſe of my own judgment.

I tell him, That I have ſubmitted to this interview with Mr. Solmes, purely as an act of duty, to ſhew my friends, that I will comply with their commands as far as I can; and that I hope, when Mr. Solmes himſelf ſhall ſee how determined I am, he will ceaſe to proſecute a ſuit, in which it is impoſſible he ſhould ſucceed with my conſent.

I aſſure him, That my averſion to Mr. Solmes is too ſincere to permit me to doubt myſelf on this occaſion. But, nevertheleſs, he muſt not imagine, tha my rejecting of Mr. Solmes is in favour to him. That I value my freedom and independency too much, if my friends will but leave me to my own judgment, to give them up to a man ſo uncontroulable, and who ſhews me beforehand what I have to expect from him, were I in his power.

I expreſs my high diſapprobation of the methods he takes to come at what paſſes in a private family: the pretence of corrupting other people's ſervants by way of reprisal for the ſpies they have ſet upon him, I tell him is a very poor excuſe; and no more than an attempt to juſtify one meanneſs by another.

There is, I obſerve to him, a right and a wrong in every thing, let people put what gloſſes they pleaſe upon their actions. To condemn a deviation, and to follow it by as great a one, what, I aſk him, is this, but propagating a general corruption? A ſtand muſt be made by ſomebody, turn round the evil as many as may, or virtue will be loſt: and ſhall it not be I, a worthy mind would aſk, that ſhall make this ſtand?

I leave him to judge, whether his be a worthy one, tried by this rule: and whether, knowing the impetuoſity of his own diſpoſition, and the improbability there is that my father and family will ever be reconciled to him, I ought to encourage his hopes?

Theſe ſpots and blemiſhes, I further tell him, gave me not earneſtneſs enough for any ſake but his own, to wiſh him in a juſter and nobler train of thinking and acting; for that I truly deſpiſe many of the ways he allows himſelf in: our minds are therefore infinitely different: and as to his profeſſions of reformation, I muſt tell him, that profuſe acknowledgments, without amendment, are but to me as ſo many anticipating conceſſions, which he may find much eaſier to make, than either to defend himſelf, or amend his errors.

I inform him, that I have been lately made acquainted [and ſo I have by Betty, and ſhe by my brother] with the weak and wanton airs he gives himſelf of declaiming againſt matrimony. I ſeverely reprehend him on this occaſion: aſk him, with what view he can take ſo witleſs, ſo deſpicable a liberty, in which only the moſt abandoned of men allow themſelves, and yet preſume to addreſs me?

I tell him, That if I am obliged to go to my uncle Antony's, it is not to be inferred, that I muſt therefore neceſſarily be Mr. Solmes's wife: ſince I may not be ſo ſure perhaps that the ſame exceptions lie ſo ſtrongly againſt my quitting a houſe to which I ſhall be forcibly carried, as if I left my father's houſe: and, at the worſt, I may be able to keep them in ſuſpence till my couſin Morden comes, who will have a right to put me in poſſeſſion of my grandfather's eſtate, if I inſiſt upon it. This, I doubt, is ſomewhat of an artifice; which can only be excuſable, as it is principally deſigned to keep him out of miſchief. For I have but little hope, if carried thither, whether ſenſible or ſenſeleſs, if I am left to the mercy of my brother and ſiſter, but they will endeavour to force the ſolemn obligation upon me. Otherwiſe, were there but any proſpect of avoiding this, by delaying (or even by taking things to make me ill, if nothing elſe would do) till my couſin comes, I hope I ſhould not think of leaving even my uncle's houſe. For I ſhould not know how to ſquare it to my own principles, to diſpenſe with the duty I owe to my father, wherever it ſhall be his will to place me.

But while you give me the charming hope, that, in order to avoid one man, I ſhall not be under the neceſſity of throwing myſelf upon the friends of the other; I think my caſe not abſolutely deſperate.

I SEE not any of my family, nor hear from them in any way of kindneſs. This looks as if they themſelves expected no great matters from that Tueſday's conference which makes my heart flutter every time I think of it.

My uncle Antony's preſence on the occaſion I do not much like: but I had rather meet him than my brother or ſiſter; yet my uncle is very impetuous. I can't think Mr. Lovelace can be much more ſo: at leaſt he cannot look anger, as my uncle, with his harder features, can. Theſe ſea-proſpered gentlemen, as my uncle has often made me think, not uſed to any but elemental controul, and even ready to buffet that, bluſter often as violently as the winds they are accuſtomed to be angry at.

I believe Mr. Solmes will look as much like a fool as I ſhall do, if it be true, as my uncle Harlowe writes, and as Betty often tells me, that he is as much afraid of ſeeing me, as I am of ſeeing him.

Adieu, my happy, thrice happy Miſs Howe, who have no hard terms affixed to your duty!—Who have nothing to do, but to fall in with a choice your mother has made for you, to which you have not, nor can have, a juſt objection: except the frowardneſs of our ſex, as our free cenſurers would perhaps take the liberty to ſay, makes it one, that the choice was your mother's, at firſt hand. Perverſe nature, we know, loves not to be preſcribed to; although youth is not ſo well qualified, either by ſedateneſs or experience, to chuſe for itſelf.

To know your own happineſs, and that it is now, nor to leave it to after-reflection to look back upon the preferable paſt with a heavy and ſelf-accuſing heart, that you did not chuſe it when you might have choſen it, is all that is neceſſary to complete your felicity!—And this power is wiſhed you by your

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XXIX.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

SUNDAY, APRIL 2.

I Ought yeſterday to have acknowledged the recept of your parcel: Robin tells me, that the Joſeph Leman whom you mention as the traitor, ſaw him. He was in the poultry-yard, and ſpoke to Robin over the bank which divides that from the Green Lane. 'What 'brings you hither, Mr. Robert?—But 'I can tell. Hie away, as faſt as you 'can.'

No doubt but their dependence upon this fellow's vigilance, and upon Betty's, leaves you more at liberty in your airings, than you would otherwiſe be. But you are the only perſon I ever heard of, who in ſuch circumſtances had not ſome faithful ſervant to truſt little offices to. A poet, my dear, would not have gone to work for an Angelica, without giving her her Violetta, her Cleanthe, her Clelia, or ſome ſuch pretty-named confidante—An old nurſe at the leaſt.

I read to my mother ſeveral paſſages of your letters. But your laſt paragraph, in your yeſterday's, quite charmed her. You have won her heart by it, ſhe told me. And while her fit of gratitude for it laſted, I was thinking to make my propoſal, and to preſs it with all the earneſtneſs I could give it, when Hickman came in, making his legs, and ſtroking his cravat and ruffles.

I could moſt freely have ruffled him for it. As it was—'Sir,' ſaid I, 'ſaw 'you not ſome of the ſervants?—Could 'not one of them have come in before 'you?'

He begged pardon; looked as if he knew not whether he had beſt keep his ground, ground, or withdraw:—till my mother, his faſt friend, interpoſed—'Why, 'Nancy, we are not upon particu-'lars.—Pray, Mr. Hickman, ſit down.'

'By your le—ave, good Madam,' to me. You know his drawl, when his muſcles give him the reſpectful heſitation.

'Aye, aye, pray ſit down, honeſt 'man, if you are weary—But by my 'mamma, if you pleaſe. I deſire my hoop 'may have it's full circumference. All 'they're good for, that I know, is to 'clean dirty ſhoes, and to keep fellows 'at a diſtance.'

'Strange girl!' cried my mother, diſpleaſed; but with a milder turn, 'Aye, 'aye, Mr. Hickman, ſit down by me: I 'have no ſuch forbidding folly in my 'dreſs.'

I looked ſerious; and in my heart was glad this ſpeech of hers was not made to your uncle Antony.

My mother, with the true widow's freedom, would mighty prudently have led into the ſubject we had been upon; and would have read to him, I queſtion not, that very paragraph in your letter which is ſo much in his favour. He was highly obliged to dear Miſs Harlowe, ſhe would aſſure him; that ſhe did ſay.

But I aſked him, if he had any news by his laſt letters from London—A queſtion which he always underſtands to be a ſubject changer; for otherwiſe I never put it. And ſo if he be but ſilent, I am not angry with him that he anſwers it not.

I chuſe not to mention my propoſal before him, till I know how it will be reliſhed by my mother. If it be not well received, perhaps I may employ him on the occaſion. Yet I don't like to owe him an obligation, if I could help it. For men who have his views in their heads, do ſo parade it. ſo ſtrut about, if a woman condeſcend to employ them in her affairs, that one has no patience with them.

However, if I find not an opportunity this day, I will make one to-morrow.

I ſhall not open either of your ſealed-up parcels, but in your preſence. There is no need. Your conduct is out of all queſtion with me: and by the extracts you have given me from his letters and your own, I know all that relates to the preſent ſituation of things between you.

I was going to give you a little flippant hint or two. But ſince you wiſh to be thought ſuperior to all our ſex in the command of yourſelf; and ſince indeed you deſerve to be thought ſo; I will ſpare you. You are, however, at times, more than half inclined to ſpeak out. That you do not, is only owing to a little baſhful ſtruggle between you and yourſelf, as I may ſay. When that is quite got over, I know you will favour me undiſguiſedly with the reſult.

I cannot forgive your taking upon you (at ſo extravagant a rate too) to pay my mother's ſervant. Indeed I am, and I will be, angry with you for it. A year's wages at once, well nigh! only as unknown to my mother, I make it better for the ſervants according to their merits—How it made the man ſtare!—And it may be his ruin too, as far as I know. If he ſhould buy a ring, and marry a ſorry body in the neighbourhood with the money, one would be loth, a twelvemonth hence, that the poor old fellow ſhould think he had reaſon to wiſh the bounty never conferred.

I MUST give you your way in theſe things, you ſay.—And I know there is no contradicting you: for you were ever putting too great a value upon little offices done for you, and too little upon the great ones you do for others. The ſatisfaction you have in doing ſo, I grant it, repays you. But why ſhould you, by the nobleneſs of your mind, throw reproaches upon the reſt of the world? Particularly upon your own family and upon ours too?

If, as I have heard you ſay, it is a good rule to give WORDS the hearing, but to form our judgments of men and things by DEEDS ONLY; what ſhall we think of one, who ſeeks to find palliatives in words, for narrowneſs of heart in the very perſons her deeds ſo ſilently, yet ſo forcibly, reflect upon? Why bluſh you not, my dear friend, to be thus ſingular?—When you meet with another perſon whoſe mind is like your own, then diſplay your excellences as you pleaſe: but till then, for pity's ſake, let your heart and your ſpirit ſuffer a little contraction.

I intended to write but a few lines; chiefly to let you know, your parcels are come ſafe. And accordingly I began in a large hand; and I am already come to the end of my ſecond ſheet. But I could write a quire without heſitation upon a ſubject ſo copious and ſo beloved as is your praiſe.—Not for this ſingle inſtance of your generoſity; ſince I am already angry with you for it; but for the benevolence exemplified in the whole tenor of your life and actions; of which this is but a common inſtance.

Heaven

Heaven direct you, in your own arduous trials, is all I have room to add; and make you happy, as you think to be your own ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XXX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SUNDAY NIGHT, APRIL 2.

I Have many new particulars to acquaint you with, that ſhew a great change in the behaviour of my friends to me. I did not think we had ſo much art among us, as I find we have. I will give theſe particulars to you as they offered.

All the family was at church in the morning. They brought good Dr. Lewen with them, in purſuance of a previous invitation. And the doctor ſent up to deſire my permiſſion to attend me in my own apartment.

You may believe it was eaſily granted. So the doctor came up.

We had a converſation of near an hour before dinner: but, to my ſurprize, he waved every-thing that would have led to the ſubject I ſuppoſed he wanted to talk about. At laſt, I aſked him, If it were not thought ſtrange I ſhould be ſo long abſent from church? He made me ſome handſome compliments upon it: but ſaid, for his part, he had ever made it a rule, to avoid interfering in the private concerns of families, unleſs deſired to do ſo.

I was prodigiouſly diſappointed: but ſuppoſing that he was thought too juſt a man to be made a judge of in this cauſe; I led no more to it: nor, when he was called down to dinner, did he take the leaſt notice of leaving me behind him there.

But this was not the firſt time ſince my confinement that I thought it a hardſhip not to dine below. And when I parted with him on the ſtairs, a tear would burſt it's way; and he hurried down; his own good-natured eyes gliſtening; for he ſaw it.—Nor truſted he his voice, leſt the accent I ſuppoſe ſhould have diſcovered his concern; departing in ſilence, though with his uſual graceful obligingneſs.

I hear, that he praiſed me, and my part in the converſation that paſſed between us.—To ſhew them, I ſuppoſe, that it was not upon the intereſting ſubjects which I make no doubt he was deſired not to enter upon.

He left me ſo diſſatisfied, yet ſo perplexed with this new way of treatment, that I never found myſelf ſo much diſconcerted, and out of my train.

But I was to be more ſo. This was to be a day of puzzle to me. Pregnant puzzle, if I may ſo ſay: for there muſt great meaning lie behind it.

In the afternoon, all but my brother and ſiſter went to church with the good doctor; who left his compliments for me. I took a walk in the garden: my brother and ſiſter walked in it too, and kept me in their eye a good while, on purpoſe, as I thought, that I might ſee how gay and good-humoured they were together. At laſt they came down the walk that I was coming up, hand-in-hand, lover-like.

'Your ſervant, Miſs!'—'Your ſer-'vant, Sir!'—paſſed between my brother and me.

'Is it not cold-iſh, ſiſter Clary?' in a kinder voice than uſual, ſaid my ſiſter, and ſtopped.—I ſtopped and curtſeyed low to her half-curtſey.—'I think not, 'ſiſter,' ſaid I.

She went on. I curtſeyed without return; and proceeded, turning to my poultry-yard.

By a ſhorter turn, arm-in-arm, they were there before me.

'I think, Clary,' ſaid my brother, 'you muſt preſent me with ſome of this 'breed, for Scotland.'

'If you pleaſe, brother.'

'I'll chuſe for you,' ſaid my ſiſter.

And while I fed them, they pointed to half a dozen: yet intending nothing by it, I believe, but to ſhew a deal of love and good-humour to each other before me.

My uncles next, (at their return from church) were to do me the honour of their notice. They bid Betty tell me, they would drink tea with me in my own apartment. 'Now,' thought I, 'ſhall 'I have the ſubject of next Tueſday en-'forced upon me.'

But they contradicted the order for tea, and only my uncle Harlowe came up to me.

Half-diſtant, half-affectionate, at his entering my chamber, was the air he put on to his daughter-niece, as he uſed to call me; and I threw myſelf at his feet, and beſought his favour.

'None of theſe diſcompoſures, child. 'None of theſe apprehenſions. You 'will now have every body's favour. All 'is coming about, my dear. I was im-'patient to ſee you. I could no longer 'deny myſelf this ſatisfaction.' He then raiſed me, and kiſſed me, and called me 'Charming creature!'

But

But he waved entering into any intereſting ſubject. 'All will be well now. 'All will be right.—No more complain-'ings! Every-body loves you!—I only 'came to make my earlieſt court to you!' [were his condeſcending words] 'and 'to ſit and talk of twenty fond things, as 'I uſed to do.—And let every paſt diſ-'agreeable thing be forgotten, as if no-'thing had happened.'

He underſtood me as beginning to hint at the diſgrace of my confinement —'No diſgrace, my dear, can fall to 'your lot: your reputation is too well 'eſtabliſhed.—I longed to ſee you,' repeated he—'I have ſeen nobody half ſo 'amiable ſince I ſaw you laſt.'

And again he kiſſed my cheek, my glowing cheek; for I was impatient, I was vexed, to be thus, as I thought, played upon: and how could I be thankful for a viſit, that (it now was evident) was only a too humble artifice, to draw me in againſt the next Tueſday, or to leave me inexcuſable to them all?

O my cunning brother!—This is his contrivance. And then my anger made me recollect the triumph in his and my ſiſter's fondneſs for each other, as practiſed before me; and the mingled indignation flaſhing from their eyes, as arm-in-arm they ſpoke to me, and the forced condeſcenſion playing upon their lips, when they called me Clary, and Siſter.

Do you think I could, with theſe reflections, look upon my uncle Harlowe's viſit as the favour he ſeemed deſirous I ſhould think it to be?—Indeed I could not; and ſeeing him ſo ſtudiouſly avoid all recrimination, as I may call it, I gave into the affectation; and followed him in his talk of indifferent things: while he ſeemed to admire this thing and that, as if he had never ſeen them before; and now-and-then condeſcendingly kiſſed the hand that wrought ſome of the things he fixed his eyes upon; not ſo much to admire them, as to find ſubjects to divert what was moſt in his head, and in my heart.

At his going away—'How can I leave 'you here by yourſelf, my dear? You, 'whoſe company uſed to enliven us all. 'You are not expected down indeed: 'but I proteſt I had a good mind to ſur-'prize your father and mother!—If I 'thought nothing would ariſe that would 'be diſagreeable—My dear! my love!' [O the dear artful gentleman! How could my uncle Harlowe ſo diſſemble?] 'What ſay you? Will you give me your 'hand? Will you ſee your father? Can 'you ſtand his diſpleaſure, on firſt ſeeing 'the dear creature who has given him 'and all of us ſo much diſturbance? Can 'you promiſe future—'

He ſaw me riſing in my temper—'Nay, my dear,' interrupting himſelf, 'if you cannot be all reſignation, I would 'not have you think of it.'

My heart, ſtruggling between duty and warmth of temper, was full. You know, my dear, I never could bear to be dealt meanly with!—'How—how 'can you, Sir! You, my papa-uncle—'How can you, Sir!—The poor girl!' For I could not ſpeak with connexion.

'Nay, my dear, if you cannot be all 'duty, all reſignation—better ſtay where 'you are.—But after the inſtance you 'have given—'

'Inſtance I have given!—What inſtance, 'Sir?'

'Well, well, child, better ſtay where 'you are, if your paſt confinement hangs 'ſo heavy upon you—But now there will 'be a ſudden end to it—Adieu, my dear! '—Three words only—Let your com-'pliance be ſincere!—And love me, as 'you uſed to love me—Your grandfather 'did not do ſo much for you, as I will 'do for you.'

Without ſuffering me to reply, he hurried away, as I thought, like one who had been employed to act a part againſt his will, and was glad it was over.

Don't you ſee, my dear Miſs Howe, how they are all determined!—Have I not reaſon to dread next Tueſday?

Up preſently after came my ſiſter:—to obſerve, I ſuppoſe, the way I was in. She found me in tears.

'Have you not a Thomas à Kempis, 'ſiſter?' with a ſtiff air.

'I have, Madam.'

'Madam!—How long are we to be at 'this diſtance, Clary?'

'No longer, my dear Bella, if you al-'low me to call you ſiſter.' And I took her hand.

'No fawning neither, girl!'

I withdrew my hand as haſtily, as you may believe I ſhould have done, had I, in feeling for one of your parcels under the wood, been bitten by a viper.

'I beg pardon,' ſaid I—'Too-too 'ready to make advances, I am always 'ſubjecting myſelf to contempts.'

'People who know not how to keep 'a middle behaviour,' ſaid ſhe, 'muſt 'ever-more do ſo.'

'I will fetch you the Kempis, ſiſter.' I did. 'Here it is. You will find ex-'cellent things, Bella, in that little book.'

'I wiſh,' retorted ſhe, 'you had pro-'fited by them.'

'I wiſh

'I wish you may,' said I. 'Example 'from a sister older than one's self is a 'fine thing.'

'Older! Saucy little fool!'—And away she flung.

What a captious old woman will my sister make, if she live to be one!—demanding the reverence, perhaps, yet not aiming at the merit; and ashamed of the years that can only entitle her to the reverence.

It is plain from what I have related, that they think they have got me at some advantage by obtaining my consent to this interview: but if it were not, Betty's impertinence just now would make it evident. She has been complimenting me upon it; and upon the visit of my uncle Harlowe. She says, The difficulty now is more than half over with me. She is sure I would not see Mr. Solmes, but to have him. Now shall she be soon better employed than of late she has been. All hands will be at work. She loves dearly to have weddings go forward!—Who knows, whose turn will be next?

I found in the afternoon a reply to my answer to Mr. Lovelace's letter. It is full of promises, full of vows of gratitude, of eternal gratitude, is his word, among others still more hyperbolick. Yet Mr. Lovelace, the least of any man whose letters I have seen, runs into those elevated absurdities. I should be apt to despise him for it, if he did. Such language looks always to me, as if the flatterer thought to find a woman a fool, or hoped to make her one.

He regrets my indifference to him; which puts all the hope he has in my favour upon the shocking usage I receive from my friends.

As to my charge upon him of unpoliteness and uncontroulableness—What [he asks] can he say? Since being unable absolutely to vindicate himself, he has too much ingenuousness to attempt to do so: yet is struck dumb by my harsh construction, that his acknowledging temper is owing more to his carelessness to defend himself, than to his inclination to amend. He had never before met with the objections against his morals which I had raised, justly raised: and he was resolved to obviate them. What is it, he asks, that he has promised, but reformation by my example? And what occasion for the promise, if he had not faults, and those very great ones, to reform? He hopes, acknowledgment of an error is no bad sign; although my severe virtue has interpreted it into one.

He believes, I may be right (severely right, he calls it) in my judgment against making reprisals in the case of the intelligence he receives from my family: he cannot charge himself to be of a temper that leads him to be inquisitive into anybody's private affairs; but hopes, that the circumstances of my case, and the strange conduct of my friends, will excuse him; especially, when so much depends upon his knowing the movements of a family so violently bent, by measures right or wrong, to carry their point against me, in malice to him. People, he says, who act like angels, ought to have angels to deal with. For his part, he has not learned the difficult lesson of returning good for evil: and shall think himself the less encouraged to learn it by the treatment I have met with from the very persons, who would trample upon him, as they do upon me, were he to lay himself under their feet.

He excuses himself for the liberties he owns he has heretofore taken in ridiculing the marriage-state. It is a subject, he says, that he has not of late treated so lightly. He owns it to be so trite, so beaten a topick with all libertines and witlings; so frothy, so empty, so nothing-meaning, so worn-out a theme, that he is heartily ashamed of himself, ever to have made it his. He condemns it as a stupid reflection upon the laws and good order of society, and upon a man's own ancestors: and in himself who has some reason to value himself upon his descent and alliances, more censurable, than in those who have not the same advantage to boast of. He promises to be more circumspect than ever, both in his words and actions, that he may be more and more worthy of my approbation; and that he may give an assurance beforehand, that a foundation is laid in his mind for my example to work upon with equal reputation and effect to us both—If he may be so happy to call me his.

He gives me up as absolutely lost, if I go to my uncle Antony's: the close confinement; the moated house; the chapel; the implacableness of my brother and sister, and their power over the rest of my family, he sets forth in strong lights; and plainly says, that he must have a struggle to prevent my being carried thither.

Your kind, your generous endeavours to interest your mother in my behalf, will, I hope, prevent those farther extremities to which I might be otherwise driven. And to you I will fly, if permitted, and keep all my promises, of not cor-correſponding with any-body, not ſeeing any-body, but by your mother's direction and yours.

I will cloſe and depoſit at this place. It is not neceſſary to ſay, how much I am your ever affectionate and obliged,

LETTER XXXI.

MISS CLARISSA HALLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

I Am glad my papers are ſafe in your hands. I will make it my endeavour to deſerve your good opinion, that I may not at once diſgrace your judgment and my own heart.

I have another letter from Mr. Lovelace. He is extremely apprehenſive of the meeting I am to have with Mr. Solmes to-morrow. He ſays, That the airs that wretch gives himſelf on the occaſion, add to his concern; and it is with infinite difficulty that he prevails upon himſelf not to make him a viſit to let him know what he may expect, if compulſion be uſed towards me in his favour. He aſſures he, That Solmes has actually talked with tradeſmen of new equipages, and names the people in town with whom he has treated: that he has even [Was there ever ſuch a horrid wretch!] allotted this and that apartment in his houſe, for a nurſery, and other offices.

How ſhall I bear to hear ſuch a creature talk of love to me? I ſhall be out of all patience with him. Beſides, I thought that he did not dare to make or talk of theſe impudent preparations—So inconſiſtent as ſuch are with my brother's views—But I fly the ſubject.

Upon this confidence of Solmes, you will leſs wonder at that of Lovelace, in preſſing me in the name of all his family, to eſcape from ſo determined a violence as is intended to be offered to me at my uncle's: that the forward contriver ſhould propoſe Lord M.'s chariot and ſix to be at the ſtile that leads up to the lonely coppice adjoining to our paddock. You will ſee how audaciouſly he mentions ſettlements ready drawn; horſemen ready to mount; and one of his couſins Montague to be in the chariot, or at the George in the neighbouring village, waiting to accompany me to Lord M.'s, or to Lady Betty's, or Lady Sarah's, or to town, as I pleaſe; and upon ſuch orders, or conditions, and himſelf under ſuch reſtrictions as I ſhall preſcribe.

You will ſee how he threatens, To watch and way-lay them, and to reſcue me as he calls it, by an armed force of friends and ſervants, if they attempt to carry me againſt my will to my uncle's; and this, whether I give my conſent to the enterprize, or not:—ſince he ſhall have no hopes if I am once there.

O my dear friend! Who can think of theſe things and not be extremely miſerable in her apprehenſions!

This miſchievous ſex! What had I to do with any of them; or they with me?—I had deſerved this, were it by my own ſeeking, by my own giddineſs, that I had brought myſelf into this ſituation—I wiſh with all my heart—But how fooliſhly we are apt to wiſh when we find ourſelves unhappy, and know not how to help ourſelves!

On your mother's goodneſs, however, is my reliance. If I can but avoid being precipitated on either hand, till my couſin Morden arrives, a reconciliation muſt follow; and all will be happy.

I have depoſited a letter for Mr. Lovelace; in which I charge him, as he would not diſoblige me for ever, to avoid any raſh ſtep, any viſit to Mr. Solmes, which may be followed by acts of violence.

I re-aſſure him, That I will ſooner die than be that man's wife.

Whatever be my uſage, whatever ſhall be the reſult of the apprehended interview, I inſiſt upon it that he preſume not to offer violence to any of my friends: and expreſs myſelf highly diſpleaſed, that he ſhould preſume upon ſuch an intereſt in my eſteem, as to think himſelf entitled to diſpute my father's authority in my removal to my uncle's; although I tell him, that I will omit neither prayers nor contrivance, even to the making of myſelf ill, to avoid going.

To-morrow is Tueſday! How ſoon comes upon us the day we dread!—O that a deep ſleep of twenty-four hours would ſeize my faculties!—But then the next day would be Tueſday, as to all the effects and purpoſes for which I ſo much dread it. If this reach you before the event of the ſo much apprehended interview can be known, pray for your

LETTER XXXII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

TUESDAY MORNING, SIX O'CLOCK.

THE day is come!—I wiſh it were happily over. I have had a wretched night. Hardly a wink have I ſlept, ruminating upon the approaching interview. The very diſtance of time to which they conſented, has added ſolemnity to the meeting, which otherwiſe it would not have had.

A thoughtful mind is not a bleſſing to be coveted, unleſs it had ſuch a happy vivacity with it as yours: a vivacity, which enables a perſon to enjoy the preſent, without being over-anxious about the future.

TUESDAY, ELEVEN O'CLOCK.

I HAVE had a viſit from my aunt Hervey. Betty, in her alarming way, told me, I ſhould have a lady to breakfaſt with me, whom I little expected; giving me to believe it was my mother. This fluttered me ſo much, on hearing a lady coming up-ſtairs, ſuppoſing it was ſhe, (and not knowing how to account for her motives in ſuch a viſit, after I had been ſo long baniſhed from her preſence) that my aunt, at her entrance, took notice of my diſorder, and after her firſt ſalutation—

'Why, Miſs,' ſaid ſhe, 'you ſeem ſurprized.—Upon my word, you thoughtful young ladies have ſtrange apprehenſions about nothing at all. What,' taking my hand, 'can be the matter with you?—Why, my dear, tremble, tremble, tremble at this rate? You'll not be fit to be ſeen by any body. Come, my love,' kiſſing my cheek, 'pluck up a courage. By this needleſs flutter on the approaching interview, when 't is over, you will judge of your other antipathies, and laugh at yourſelf for giving way to ſo apprehenſive an imagination.'

I ſaid, that whatever we ſtrongly imagined, was, in it's effects at the time, more than imaginary, although to others it might not appear ſo: that I had not reſted one hour all night; that the impertinent ſet over me, by giving me room to think my mother was coming up, had ſo much diſconcerted me, that I ſhould be very little qualified to ſee any-body I diſliked to ſee.

There was no accounting for theſe things, ſhe ſaid. Mr. Solmes laſt night ſuppoſed he ſhould be under as much agitation as I could be.

'Who is it, then, Madam, that ſo reluctant an interview on both ſides, is to pleaſe?'

'Both of you, my dear, I hope, after the firſt flurries are over. The moſt apprehenſive beginnings, I have often known, make the happieſt concluſions.'

'There can be but one happy concluſion to the intended viſit; and that is, That both ſides may be ſatisfied it will be the laſt.'

She then repreſented, how unhappy it would be for me, if I did not ſuffer myſelf to be prevailed upon: ſhe preſſed me to receive Mr. Solmes as became my education; and declared, that his apprehenſions on the expectation he had of ſeeing me, were owing to his love and his awe; intimating, That true love is ever accompanied by fear and reverence; and that no bluſtering, braving lover, could deſerve encouragement.

To this I anſwered, That conſtitution was to be conſidered: that a man of ſpirit would act like one, and could do nothing meanly; that a creeping mind would creep in every thing, where it had a view to obtain a benefit by it; and inſult, where it had power, and nothing to expect: that this was not a point now to be determined with me: that I had ſaid as much as I could poſſibly ſay on this ſubject: that this interview was impoſed upon me: by thoſe, indeed, who had a right to impoſe it: but that it was ſorely againſt my will complied with; and for this reaſon, that there was averſion, not wilfulneſs, in the caſe; and ſo nothing could come of it, but a pretence, as I much apprehended, to uſe me ſtill more ſeverely than I had been uſed.

She was then pleaſed to charge me with prepoſſeſſion and prejudice. She expatiated upon the duty of a child. She imputed to me abundance of fine qualities; but told me, that, in this caſe, that of perſuadableneſs was wanting to crown all. She inſiſted upon the merit of obedience, although my will were not in it. From a little hint I gave of my ſtill greater diſlike to ſee Mr. Solmes on account of the freedom I had treated him with, ſhe talked to me of his forgiving diſpoſition; of his infinite reſpect for me; and I cannot tell what of this ſort.

I never found myſelf ſo fretful in my life: and ſo I told my aunt; and begged her pardon for it. But ſhe ſaid, it was well diſguiſed then; for ſhe ſaw nothing but little tremors, which were uſual with young ladies when they were to ſee their admirers for the firſt time: and this might be called ſo, with reſpect to me; ſince it was the firſt time I had conſented to ſee Mr. Solmes in that light —But that the next—

'How, Madam,' interrupted I—'Is it then imagined, that I give this meeting on that foot?'—

'To be ſure it is, child.'

'To be ſure it is, Madam! Then I do yet deſire to decline it.—I will not, I 'cannot, ſee him, if he expects me to 'ſee him upon thoſe terms.'

'Niceneſs, punctilio—Mere punctilio, niece!—Can you think that your 'appointment, (day, place, hour) and 'knowing what the intent of it was, is 'to be interpreted away as a mere ceremony, and to mean nothing?—Let me 'tell you, my dear, your father, mother, uncles, every-body, reſpect this 'appointment as the firſt act of your 'compliance with their wills: and 'therefore recede not, I deſire you; 'but make a merit of what cannot be 'avoided.

O the hideous wretch!—'Pardon me, 'Madam—I to be ſuppoſed to meet ſuch 'a man as that, with ſuch a view! and 'he to be armed with ſuch an expectation!—But it cannot be that he expects 'it, whatever others may do.—It is plain 'he cannot, by the fear he tells you all, 'he ſhall have to ſee. If his hope were ſo 'audacious, he could not fear ſo much.'

'Indeed, he has his hope; and juſtly 'founded too. But his fear ariſes from 'his reverence, as I told you before.'

'His reverence!—his unworthineſs!—'Tis ſo apparent, that even he himſelf 'ſees it, as well as every-body elſe. 'Hence his offers to purchaſe me! 'Hence it is, that ſettlements are to 'make up for acknowledged want of 'merit!'

'His unworthineſs, ſay you!—Not ſo faſt, my dear. Does not this look like 'ſetting a high value upon yourſelf?—'We all have exalted notions of your 'merit, niece; but nevertheleſs it would 'not be wrong, if you were to arrogate 'leſs to yourſelf; though more were to 'be your due than your friends attribute 'to you.'

'I am ſorry, Madam, it ſhould be 'thought arrogance in me, to ſuppoſe 'I am not worthy of a better man than 'Mr. Solmes, both as to perſon and 'mind: and as to fortune, I thank God 'I deſpiſe all that can be inſiſted upon 'in his favour from ſo poor a plea.'

She told me it ſignified nothing to talk: I knew the expectation of every-one.

Indeed I did not. It was impoſſible I could think of ſuch a ſtrange expectation, upon a compliance made only to ſhew I would comply in all that was in my power to comply with.

I might eaſily, ſhe ſaid, have ſuppoſed, that every-one thought I was beginning to oblige them all, by the kind behaviour of my brother and ſiſter to me in the garden, laſt Sunday; by my ſiſter's viſit to me afterwards in my chamber; (although both more ſtiffly received by me, than were either wiſhed or expected) by my uncle Harlowe's affectionate viſit to me the ſame afternoon, not indeed ſo very gratefully received as I uſed to receive his favours:—but this he kindly imputed to the diſpleaſure I had conceived at my confinement, and to my intention to come off by degrees, that I might keep myſelf in countenance for my paſt oppoſition.

See, my dear, the low cunning of that Sunday-management, which then ſo much ſurprized me! And ſee the reaſon why Dr. Lewen was admitted to viſit me, yet forbore to enter upon a ſubject about which I thought he came to talk to me!—For it ſeems there was no occaſion to diſpute with me on the point I was to be ſuppoſed to have conceded to.—See, alſo, how unfairly my brother and ſiſter muſt have repreſented their pretended kindneſs, when (though they had an end to anſwer by appearing kind) their antipathy to me ſeems to have been ſo ſtrong, that they could not help inſulting me by their arm-in-arm lover-like behaviour to each other; as my ſiſter afterwards likewiſe did, when ſhe came to borrow my Kempis.

I lifted up my hands and eyes! 'I 'cannot,' ſaid I, 'give this treatment a 'name! The end ſo unlikely to be anſwered by means ſo low! I know whoſe 'the whole is! He that could get my 'uncle Harlowe to contribute his part, 'and procure the acquieſcence of the 'reſt of my friends to it, muſt have the 'power to do any-thing with them 'againſt me.'

Again my aunt told me, that talking and invective, now I had given the expectation, would ſignify nothing. She hoped I would not ſhew every-one, that they had been too forward in their conſtructions of my deſire to oblige them. She could aſſure me, that it would be worſe for me, if now I receded, than if I had never advanced.

'Advanced, Madam! How can you 'ſay advanced? Why, this is a trick 'upon me! A poor low trick! Pardon 'me, Madam, I don't ſay you have a 'hand in it.—But, my deareſt aunt, tell 'me, Will not my mother be preſent at 'this dreadful interview? Will ſhe not 'ſo far favour me? were it but to 'qualify—'

'Qualify, my dear,' interrupted ſhe '—your mother, and your uncle Harlowe, would not be preſent on this occaſion for the world.'

'O then,

'O then, Madam, how can they look 'upon my conſent to this interview as 'an advance?'

My aunt was diſpleaſed at this home puſh. 'Miſs Clary,' ſaid ſhe, 'there is 'no dealing with you. It would be hap-'py for you, and for every-body elſe, 'were your obedience as ready as your 'wit. I will leave you.'

'Not in anger, I hope, Madam,' interrupted I—'All I meant was, to ob-'ſerve, that let the meeting iſſue as it 'may, and as it muſt iſſue, it cannot be 'a diſappointment to any-body.'

'O Miſs! you ſeem to be a very de-'termined young creature. Mr. Solmes 'will be here at your time: and remem-'ber once more, that upon the coming 'afternoon depend the peace of your 'whole family, and your own happi-'neſs.'

And ſo ſaying, down ſhe hurried.

Here I will ſtop. In what way I ſhall reſume, or when, is not left to me to conjecture; much leſs determine. I am exceſſively uneaſy!—No good news from your mother, I doubt!—I will depoſit thus far, for fear of the worſt —Adieu, my beſt, rather, my only friend!

CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XXXIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

TUESDAY EVENING; AND CONTINUED THROUGH THE NIGHT.

WELL, my dear, I am alive, and here! But how long I ſhall be either here, or alive, I cannot ſay. I have a vaſt deal to write; and perhaps ſhall have little time for it. Nevertheleſs, I muſt tell you how the ſaucy Betty came up with this Solmes's meſſage; although, as you will remember from my laſt, I was in a way before that wanted no additional ſurprizes.

'Miſs! Miſs! Miſs!' cried ſhe, as faſt as ſhe could ſpeak, with her arms ſpread abroad, and all her fingers diſtended, and held up, 'Will you be 'pleaſed to walk down into your own 'parlour?—There is every-body, I 'will aſſure you, in full congregation!—'And there is Mr. Solmes, as fine as 'a lord, with a charming white peruke, 'fine laced ſhirt and ruffles, coat trim-'med with ſilver, and a waiſtcoat ſtand-'ing an end with lace!—Quite handſome, 'believe me!—You never ſaw ſuch an 'alteration!—Ah! Miſs,' ſhaking her head, 'tis pity you have ſaid ſo much 'againſt him!—But you know how to 'come off for all that!—I hope it will 'not be too late!'

'Impertinence!' ſaid I—'Wert thou 'bid to come up in this fluttering way?'—And I took up my fan, and fanned myſelf.

'Bleſs me!' ſaid ſhe, 'how ſoon theſe 'fine young ladies will be put into fluſ-'terations!—I meant not either to offend 'or frighten you, I am ſure.'

'Every-body there, do you ſay?—'Who do you call every-body?'

'Why, Miſs,' holding out her left-palm opened, and with a flouriſh, and a ſaucy leer, patting it with the fore-finger of the other, at every mentioned perſon, 'There is your papa!—There 'is your mamma!—There is your uncle 'Harlowe!—There is your uncle An-'tony!—Your aunt Hervey!—My 'young lady!—And my young maſter! '—And Mr. Solmes, with the air of a 'great courtier, ſtanding up, becauſe 'he named you:—"Mrs. Betty," ſaid 'he,' [Then the ape of a wench bowed and ſcraped, as awkwardly as I ſuppoſe the perſon did whom ſhe endeavoured to imitate] "Pray give my humble ſer-"vice to Miſs, and tell her, I wait her "commands."

Was not this a wicked wench?—I trembled ſo, I could hardly ſtand. I was ſpiteful enough to ſay, that her young miſtreſs, I ſuppoſed, bid her put on theſe airs, to frighten me out of a capacity of behaving ſo calmly as ſhould procure me my uncles compaſſion.

'What a way do you put yourſelf in, 'Miſs,' ſaid the inſolent!—'Come, 'dear Madam,' taking up my fan, which 'I had laid down, and approaching me 'with it, fanning, 'ſhall I—'

'None of thy impertinence!—But ſay 'you, all my friends are below with 'him? And I am to appear before 'them all?'

'I can't tell if they'll ſtay when you 'come. I think they ſeemed to be 'moving when Mr. Solmes gave me his 'orders.—But what anſwer ſhall I carry 'to the 'ſquire?'

'Say, I can't go!—But yet when 'tis 'over, 'tis over!—Say, I'll wait upon '—I'll attend—I'll come preſently—'Say any thing; I care not what—But 'give me my fan, and fetch me a glaſs 'of water.'

She went, and I fanned myſelf all the time; for I was in a flame; and hemmed, and ſtruggled with myſelf all I could; and, when ſhe returned, drank my water; and finding no hope preſently of a quieter heart, I ſent her down and followed her with precipitation; trembling ſo, that, had I not hurried, I queſtion if I could have got down at all.—O my dear, what a poor, paſſive machine is the body when the mind is diſordered!

There are two doors to my parlour, as I uſed to call it. As I entered at one, my friends hurried out at the other. I juſt ſaw the gown of my ſiſter, the laſt who ſlid away. My uncle Antony went out with them; but he ſtaid not long, as you ſhall hear: and they all remained in the next parlour, a wainſcot partition only parting the two. I remember them both in one: but they were ſeparated in favour of us girls, for each to receive her viſitors in at her pleaſure.

Mr. Solmes approached me as ſoon as I entered, cringing to the ground, a viſible confuſion in every feature of his face. After half a dozen choaked-up Madams—He was very ſorry—He was very much concerned—It was his misfortune—And there he ſtopped, being unable preſently to complete a ſentence.

This gave me a little more preſence of mind. Cowardice in a foe begets courage in one's-ſelf—I ſee that plainly now—Yet, perhaps, at bottom, the new-made bravo is a greater coward than the other.

I turned from him, and ſeated myſelf in one of the fire-ſide chairs, fanning myſelf. I have ſince recollected, that I muſt have looked very ſaucily. Could I have had any thoughts of the man, I ſhould have deſpiſed myſelf for it. But what can be ſaid in the caſe of an averſion ſo perfectly ſincere?

He hemmed five or ſix times, as I had done above; and theſe produced a ſentence—That I could not but ſee his confuſion. This ſentence produced two or three more. I believe my aunt had been his tutoreſs; for it was his awe, his reverence for ſo ſuperlative a lady [I aſſure you!] And he hoped—he hoped—three times he hoped, before he told me what—At laſt he came out, that I was too generous (Generoſity, he ſaid, was my character) to deſpiſe him for ſuch—for ſuch—for ſuch—true tokens of his love.

'I do indeed ſee you under ſome con-
'fuſion, Sir; and this gives me hope,
'that although I have been compelled,
'as I may call it, to give way to this 'interview, it may be attended with
'happier effects than I had apprehend-
'ed from it.'

He had hemmed himſelf into more courage.

'You could not, Madam, imagine
'any creature ſo blind to your merits,
'and ſo little attracted by them, as ea-
'ſily to forego the intereſt and appro'bation he was honoured with by your 'worthy family, while he had any hope
'given him, that one day he might, by 'his perſeverance and zeal, expect your 'favour.'

'I am but too much aware, Sir, that 'it is upon the intereſt and approbation
'you mention, that you build ſuch hope.
'It is impoſſible otherwiſe, that a man,
'who has any regard for his own happi-
'neſs, would perſevere againſt ſuch de-
'clarations as I have made, and think
'myſelf obliged to make, in juſtice to
'you as well as to myſelf.'

He had ſeen many inſtances, he told me, and had heard of more, where ladies had ſeemed as averſe, and yet had been induced, ſome by motives of compaſſion, others by perſuaſion of friends, to change their minds; and had been very happy afterwards: and he hoped this might be the caſe here.

'I have no notion, Sir, of compli-
'ment, in an article of ſuch importance
'as this: yet I am ſorry to be obliged 'to ſpeak my mind ſo plainly, as I am 'going to do. Know then, that I have
'invincible objections, Sir, to your ad-
'dreſs. I have avowed them with an 'earneſtneſs that I believe is without
'example: and why?—Becauſe I be'lieve it is without example, that any 'young creature, circumſtanced as I 'am, was ever treated as I have been 'treated on your account.'

'It is hoped, Madam, that your con-
'ſent may in time be obtained—That is
'the hope; and I ſhall be a miſerable
'man if it cannot.'

'Better, Sir, give me leave to ſay,
'you were miſerable by yourſelf, than
'that you ſhould make two ſo.'

'You may have heard, Madam,
'things to my diſadvantage. No man
'is without enemies. Be pleaſed to let 'me know what you have heard, and I
'will either own my faults, and amend;
'or I will convince you that I am baſely
'beſpattered: and once I underſtand you
'overheard ſomething that I ſhould ſay,
'that gave you offence: unguardedly,
'perhaps; but nothing but what ſhewed
'my value, and that I would perſiſt ſo
'long as I could have hope.'

'I have indeed heard many things to
'your diſadvantage:—and I was far 'from being pleaſed with what I over-
'heard ſa I from your lips: but as you
'were not any-thing to me, and never 'could

'could be, it was not for me to be concerned about the one or the other.'

'I am ſorry, Madam, to hear this. I 'am ſure you ſhould not tell me of any 'fault, that I would be unwilling to 'correct in myſelf.'

'Then, Sir, correct this fault—Do not 'with to have a young creature compelled in the moſt material article of her 'life, for the ſake of motives ſhe deſpiſes; and in behalf of a perſon ſhe 'cannot value: one that has, in her 'own right, ſufficient to ſet her above 'all your offers, and a ſpirit that craves 'no more than what it has, to make it'ſelf eaſy and happy.'

'I dont't ſee, Madam, how you would 'be happy, if I were to diſcontinue my 'addreſs: for——'

'That is nothing to you, Sir,' interrupted I: 'do you but withdraw your 'pretenſions; and if it be thought fit to 'ſtart up another man for my puniſh'ment, the blame will not lie at your 'door. You will be entitled to my 'thanks; and moſt heartily will I thank 'you.'

He pauſed, and ſeemed a little at a loſs: and I was going to give him ſtill ſtronger and more perſonal inſtances of my plain-dealing; when in came my uncle Antony.

'So, niece, ſo!—Sitting in ſtate like a 'queen, giving audience! haughty audi'ence!—Mr. Solmes, why ſtand you 'thus humbly?—Why this diſtance, 'man? I hope to ſee you upon a more 'intimate footing before we part.'

I aroſe, as ſoon as he entered—and approached him with a bent knee: 'Let 'me, Sir, reverence my uncle, whom I 'have not for ſo long time ſeen!—Let 'me, Sir, beſpeak your favour and com'paſſion.'

'You will have the favour of every'body, niece, when you know how to 'deſerve it.'

'If ever I deſerve it, I deſerve it now. '—I have been hardly uſed!—I have 'made propoſals that ought to be accept'ed, and ſuch as would not have been 'aſked of me. What have I done, that 'I muſt be baniſhed and confined thus 'diſgracefully? That I muſt not be al'lowed to have any free-will in an arti'cle that concerns my preſent and future 'happineſs?'

'Miſs Clary,' replied my uncle, 'you 'have had your will in every-thing till 'now; and this makes your parents 'wills ſit ſo heavy upon you.'

'My will, Sir! Be pleaſed to allow 'me to aſk, What was my will till now, 'but my father's will, and yours and my 'uncle Harlowe's will?—Has it not 'been my pride to obey and oblige?—'I never aſked a favour, that I did not 'firſt ſit down and conſider, if it were 'fit to be granted. And now, to ſhew 'my obedience, have I not offered to live 'ſingle?—Have I not offered to diveſt 'myſelf of my grandfather's bounty, 'and to caſt myſelf upon my father's; 'and that to be withdrawn whenever I 'diſoblige him? Why, dear good Sir, 'am I to be made unhappy in a point ſo 'concerning my happineſs?'

'Your grandfather's eſtate is not wiſh'ed from you. You are not deſired to 'live a ſingle life. You know our mo'tives, and we gueſs at yours. And, let 'me tell you, well as we love you, we 'ſhould much ſooner chuſe to follow 'you to the grave, than that yours ſhould 'take place.'

'I will engage never to marry any 'man without my father's conſent, and 'yours, Sir, and every-body's. Did I 'ever give you cauſe to doubt my word? 'And here I will take the ſolemneſt oath 'that can be offered me——'

'That is the matrimonial one,' interrupted he, with a big voice—'And to 'this gentleman.—It ſhall, it ſhall, cou'ſin Clary!—And the more you oppoſe 'it, the worſe it ſhall be for you.'

This, and before the man, who ſeemed to aſſume courage upon it, highly provoked me.

'Then, Sir, you ſhall ſooner follow 'me to the grave indeed.—I will under'go the cruelſt death—I will even con'ſent to enter into the awful vault of 'my anceſtors, and have that bricked 'up upon me, rather than conſent to be 'miſerable for life.—And, Mr. Solmes,' turning to him, 'take notice of what I 'ſay: this or any death, I will ſooner 'undergo, [that will quickly be over] 'than be yours, and for ever unhappy!'

My uncle was in a terrible rage upon this. He took Mr. Solmes by the hand, ſhocked as the man ſeemed to be, and drew him to the window—'Don't be 'ſurprized, Mr. Solmes, don't be con'cerned at this. We know,' and rapped out a ſad oath, 'what women will 'ſay in their wrath: the wind is not 'more boiſterous, nor more changeable;' and again he ſwore to that.—'If you 'think it worth your while to wait for 'ſuch an ungrateful girl as this, I'll 'engage ſhe'll veer about; I'll engage 'ſhe ſhall.' And a third time violently ſwore to it.

Then coming up to me, (who had thrown thrown myſelf, very much diſordered by my vehemence, into the moſt diſtant window) as if he would have beat me; his face violently working, his hands clenched, and his teeth ſet—'Yes, yes, 'yes,' hiſſed the poor gentleman, 'you 'ſhall, you ſhall, you ſhall, couſin Cla-'ry, be Mr. Solmes's wife; we will ſee 'that you ſhall; and this in one week 'at fartheſt.'—And then a fourth time he confirmed it!—Poor gentleman! how he ſwore!

'I am ſorry, Sir,' ſaid I, 'to ſee you 'in ſuch a paſſion. All this, I am but 'too ſenſible, is owing to my brother's 'inſtigation; who would not himſelf 'give the inſtance of duty that is fought 'to be exacted from me. It is beſt for 'me to withdraw. I ſhall but provoke 'you farther, I fear: for although I 'would gladly obey you, if I could, yet 'this is a point determined with me; 'and I cannot ſo much as wiſh to get it 'over.'

How could I avoid making theſe ſtrong declarations, the man in preſence?

I was going out at the door I came in at; the gentlemen looking upon one another, as if referring to each other what to do, or whether to engage my ſtay, or ſuffer me to go; and whom ſhould I meet at the door but my brother, who had heard all that had paſſed!

He bolted upon me ſo unexpectedly, that I was ſurprized. He took my hand, and graſped it with violence: 'Return, 'pretty Miſs,' ſaid he; 'return, if you 'pleaſe. You ſhall not yet be bricked up. '—Your inſtigating brother ſhall ſave 'you from that!—O thou fallen angel!' ſaid he, peering up to my downcaſt face —'ſuch a ſweetneſs here!—and ſuch an 'obſtinacy there!' tapping my neck— 'O thou true woman—though ſo young! '—But you ſhall not have your rake: 'remember that;' in a loud whiſper, as if he would be decently indecent before the man. 'You ſhall be redeemed, and 'this worthy gentleman,' raiſing his voice, 'will be ſo good as to redeem 'you from ruin—and hereafter you 'will bleſs him, or have reaſon to bleſs 'him, for his condeſcenſion;' that was the brutal brother's word!

He had led me up to meet Mr. Solmes, whoſe hand he took, as he held mine. 'Here, Sir,' ſaid he, 'take the rebel 'daughter's hand; I give it you now: 'ſhe ſhall confirm the gift in a week's 'time; or will have neither father, 'mother, nor uncles, to boaſt of.'

I ſnatched my hand away.

'How now, Miſs!'

'And how now, Sir!—What right 'have you to diſpoſe of my hand?—If 'you govern every-body elſe, you ſhall 'not govern me; eſpecially in a point ſo 'immediately relative to myſelf, and in 'which you neither have, nor ever ſhall 'have, any-thing to do.'

I would have broken from him; but he held my hand too faſt.

'Let me go, Sir!—Why am I thus 'treated?—You deſign, I doubt not, 'with your unmanly gripings, to hurt 'me, as you do:' but again I aſked, 'Wherefore is it that I am to be thus 'treated by you?'

He toſſed my hand from him with a whirl, that pained my very ſhoulder. I wept, and held my other hand to the part.

Mr. Solmes blamed him. So did my uncle.

He had no patience, he ſaid, with ſuch a perverſe one; and to think of the reflections upon himſelf, before he entered. He had only given me back the hand I had not deſerved he ſhould touch. It was one of my arts to pretend to be pained.

Mr. Solmes ſaid, he would ſooner give up all his hopes of me, than that I ſhould be uſed unkindly: and he offered to plead in my behalf to them both; and applied himſelf with a bow, as if for my approbation of his interpoſition.

'Interpoſe not, Mr. Solmes,' ſaid I, 'to ſave me from my brother's violence. 'I cannot wiſh to owe an obligation to 'a man whoſe ungenerous perſeverance 'is the occaſion of that violence, and of 'all my diſgraceful ſufferings.'

'How generous in you, Mr. Solmes,' ſaid my brother, 'to interpoſe ſo kind-'ly in behalf of ſuch an immoveable 'ſpirit! I beg of you to perſiſt in your 'addreſs!'—The unnatural brother called it addreſs!—'For all our family's 'ſake, and for her ſake too, if you love 'her, perſiſt!—Let us ſave her, if poſ-'ſible, from ruining herſelf. Look at her perſon!' [And he gazed at me, from head to foot, pointing at me, as he referred to Mr. Solmes] Think of her fine 'qualities!—All the world confeſſes 'them, and we all gloried in her till now. 'She is worth ſaving; and, after two 'or three more ſtruggles, ſhe will be 'yours, and take my word for it, will 'reward your patience. Talk not, there-'fore, of giving up your hopes, for a 'little whining folly. She has entered 'upon a parade, which ſhe knows not 'how to quit with a female grace. You 'have only her pride and her obſtinacy

'to encounter: and, depend upon it, 'you will be as happy a man in a fort-'night, as a married man can be.'

You have heard me say, my dear, that my brother has always taken a liberty to reflect upon our sex, and upon matrimony!—He would not, if he did not think it wit to do so!—Just as poor Mr. Wyerley, and others, whom we both know, profane and ridicule Scripture; and all to evince their pretensions to the same pernicious talent, and to have it thought, that they are too wise to be religious.

Mr. Solmes, with a self-satisfied air, presumptuously said, he would suffer every-thing, to oblige my family, and to save me: and doubted not to be amply rewarded, could he be so happy as to succeed at last.

'Mr. Solmes,' said I, 'if you have 'any regard for your own happiness, '(mine is out of the question with you: 'you have not generosity enough to make 'that any part of your scheme) prose-'cute no farther your address, as my 'brother calls it. It is but just to tell 'you, that I could not bring my heart 'so much as to think of you, without the 'utmost disapprobation, before I was used 'as I have been—And can you think I 'am such a slave, such a poor slave, as to 'be brought to change my mind by the 'violent usage I have met with?

'And you, Sir,' turning to my brother, 'if you think that meekness always 'indicates tameness; and that there is no 'magnanimity without bluster; own your-'self mistaken for once: for you shall 'have reason to judge from henceforth, 'that a generous mind is not to be forc-'ed; and that——'

'No more,' said the imperious wretch, 'I charge you,' lifting up his hands and eyes. Then turning to my uncle, 'Do 'you hear, Sir? This is your once fault-'less niece! This is your favourite!'

Mr. Solmes looked as if he knew not what to think of the matter; and had I been left alone with him, I saw plainly I could have got rid of him easily enough.

My uncle came to me, looking up also to my face, and down to my feet, 'And 'is it possible this can be you? All this 'violence from you, Miss Clary?'

'Yes, it is possible, Sir—And, I will 'presume to say, this vehemence on my 'side is but the natural consequence of 'the usage I have met with, and the 'rudeness I am treated with, even in 'your presence, by a brother, who has 'no more right to controul me, than I 'have to controul him.'

'This usage, cousin Clary, was not 'till all other means were tried with 'you.'

'Tried! to what end, Sir?—Do I 'contend for any-thing more than a 'mere negative? You may, Sir,' [turning to Mr. Solmes] 'possibly you may, be 'induced the rather to persevere thus 'ungenerously, as the usage I have met 'with for your sake, and what you have 'now seen offered to me by my brother, 'will shew you what I can bear, were my 'evil destiny ever to make me yours.'

'Lord, Madam,' cried Solmes, [all this time distorted into twenty different attitudes, as my brother and my uncle were blessing themselves, and speaking only to each other by their eyes, and by their working features;] 'Lord, Ma-'dam, what a construction is this!'

'A fair construction, Sir,' interrupted I: 'for he that can see a person whom 'he pretends to value, thus treated, and 'approve of it, must be capable of treat-'ing her thus himself. And that you do 'approve of it, is evident by your de-'clared perseverance, when you know I 'am confined, banished, and insulted, in 'order to make me consent to be what 'I never can be.—And this, let me tell 'you, as I have often told others, not 'from motives of obstinacy, but aver-'sion.

'Excuse me, Sir,' turning to my uncle—'To you, as to my father's brother, 'I owe duty. I beg your pardon, that I 'cannot obey you: but as for my brother, 'he is but my brother; he shall not con-'strain me—and,' [turning to the unnatural wretch—I will call him wretch] 'knit your brows, Sir, and frown as you 'will, I will ask you, Would you, in my 'case, make the sacrifices I am willing 'to make, to obtain every-one's favour? 'If not, what right have you to treat 'me thus; and to procure me to be 'treated as I have been for so long a 'time past?'

I had put myself by this time into great disorder: they were silent, and seemed by their looks to want to talk to one another, walking about in violent disorders too, between whiles. I sat down fanning myself, (as it happened, against the glass) and I could perceive my colour go and come; and being sick to the very heart, and apprehensive of fainting, I rung.

Betty came in. I called for a glass of water, and drank it: but nobody minded me. I heard my brother pronounce the words, 'Art! female art!' to Solmes; which, together with the apprehenſion that he would not be welcome, I ſuppoſe kept him back. Elſe I could ſee the man was affected. And (ſtill fearing I ſhould faint) I aroſe, and taking hold of Betty's arm, 'Let me hold by 'you, Betty,' ſaid I: 'let me withdraw.' And moved with trembling feet towards the door, and then turned about, and made a curtſey to my uncle—'Permit 'me, Sir,' ſaid I, 'to withdraw.'

'Whither go you, niece?' ſaid my uncle: 'we have not done with you yet. 'I charge you depart not. Mr. Solmes 'has ſomething to open to you, that will 'aſtoniſh you—And you ſhall hear it.'

'Only, Sir, by your leave, for a few 'minutes into the air. I will return, if 'you command it. I will hear all that 'I am to hear; that it may be over now 'and for ever—You will go with me, 'Betty?'

And ſo, without any farther prohibition, I retired into the garden; and there, caſting myſelf upon the firſt ſeat, and throwing Betty's apron over my face, leaning againſt her ſide, my hands between hers, I gave way to a violent burſt of grief, or paſſion, or both; which, as it ſeemed, ſaved my heart from breaking, for I was ſenſible of an immediate relief.

I have already given you ſpecimens of Mrs. Betty's impertinence. I ſhall not, therefore, trouble you with more: for the wench, notwithſtanding this my diſtreſs, took great liberties with me, after ſhe ſaw me a little recovered, and as I walked farther into the garden; inſomuch that I was obliged to ſilence her by an abſolute prohibition of ſaying another word to me; and then ſhe dropped behind me ſullen and gloomy.

It was near an hour before I was ſent for in again. The meſſenger was my couſin Dolly Hervey, who, with an eye of compaſſion and reſpect, (for Miſs Hervey always loved me, and calls herſelf my ſcholar, as you know) told me, my company was deſired.

'Who commands my attendance, 'Miſs?' ſaid I—'Have you not been in 'tears, my dear?'

'Who can forbear tears?' ſaid ſhe.

'Why, what is the matter, couſin 'Dolly?—Sure, nobody is entitled to 'weep in this family, but me!'

'Yes, I am, Madam,' ſaid ſhe, 'be-'cauſe I love you.'

I kiſſed her: 'And is it for me, my 'ſweet couſin, that you ſhed tears?—'There never was love loſt between us: 'but tell me, what is deſigned to be done 'with me, that I have this kind inſtance 'of your compaſſion for me?'

'You muſt take no notice of what I 'tell you,' ſaid the dear girl: 'but my 'mamma has been weeping for you, too, 'with me; but durſt not let any-body 'ſee it: "O my Dolly!" ſaid my mam-'ma, "there never was ſo ſet a malice "in man as in your couſin James Har-"lowe. They will ruin the flower and "ornament of their family."

'As how, Miſs Dolly?—Did ſhe not 'explain herſelf?—As how, my dear?'

'Yes; ſhe ſaid, Mr. Solmes would 'have given up his claim to you: for he 'ſaid, you hated him, and there were 'no hopes; and your mamma was wil-'ling he ſhould; and to have you taken 'at your word, to renounce Mr. Love-'lace, and to live ſingle: my mamma 'was for it too; for they heard all that 'paſſed between you and uncle Antony, 'and couſin James; ſaying, it was im-'poſſible to think of prevailing upon you 'to have Mr. Solmes. Uncle Harlowe 'ſeemed in the ſame way of thinking; 'at leaſt, my mamma ſays, he did not 'ſay any-thing to the contrary. But 'your papa was immoveable, and was 'angry at your mamma and mine upon 'it: and hereupon your brother, your 'ſiſter, and my uncle Antony, joined in, 'and changed the ſcene entirely. In ſhort, 'ſhe ſays, that Mr. Solmes had great 'matters engaged to him. He owned, 'that you were the fineſt young lady in 'England, and he would be content to 'be but little beloved, if he could not, 'after marriage, engage your heart, for 'the ſake of having the honour to call 'you his but for one twelvemonth—I 'ſuppoſe he would break your heart the 'next—For he is a cruel-hearted man, 'I am ſure.'

'My friends may break my heart, 'couſin Dolly; but Mr. Solmes will 'never have it in his power to break it.'

'I do not know that, Miſs: you will 'have good luck to avoid having him, by 'what I can find; for my mamma ſays, 'they are all now of one mind, herſelf 'excepted; and ſhe is forced to be ſilent, 'your papa and brother are both ſo out-'rageous.'

'I am got above minding my brother, 'couſin Dolly: he is but my brother. 'But to my father I owe duty and obe-'dience, if I could comply.'

We are apt to be fond of any-body that will ſide with us, when oppreſſed or provoked. I always loved my couſin Dolly; but now ſhe endeared herſelf to me ten times times more, by her ſoothing concern for me. I aſked what ſhe would do, were ſhe in my caſe?

Without heſitation ſhe replied, Have Mr. Lovelace out-of-hand, and take up her own eſtate, if ſhe were me; and there would be an end of it—And Mr. Lovelace, ſhe ſaid, was a fine gentleman—Mr. Solmes was not worthy to buckle his ſhoes.

Miſs Hervey told me further, that her mother was deſired to come to me, to fetch me in; but ſhe excuſed herſelf. I ſhould have all my friends, ſhe ſaid, ſhe believed, ſit in judgment upon me.

I wiſh it had been ſo. But, as I have been told ſince, neither my father nor my mother would truſt themſelves with ſeeing me: the one it ſeems for paſſion-ſake; my mother for tender conſiderations.

By this time we entered the houſe. Miſs accompanied me into the parlour, and left me, as a perſon devoted, I then thought.

Nobody was there. I ſat down, and had leiſure to weep; reflecting upon what my couſin Dolly had told me.

They were all in my ſiſter's parlour adjoining: for I heard a confuſed mixture of voices, ſome louder than others, which drowned the more compaſſionating accents.

Female accents I could diſtinguiſh the drowned ones to be. O my dear! what a hard-hearted ſex is the other! Children of the ſame parents, how came they by their cruelty?—Do they get it by travel?—Do they get it by converſation with one another?—Or how do they get it?—Yet my ſiſter, too, is as hard-hearted as any of them. But this may be no exception neither: for ſhe has been thought to be maſculine in her air, and her ſpirit. She has then, perhaps, a ſoul of the other ſex in a body of ours.—And ſo, for the honour of our own, will I judge of every woman for the future, who, imitating the rougher manners of men, acts unbeſeeming the gentleneſs of her own ſex.

Forgive me, my dear friend, for breaking into my ſtory by theſe reflections. Were I rapidly to purſue my narration, without thinking, without reflecting, I believe I ſhould hardly be able to keep in my right mind; ſince vehemence and paſſion would then be always uppermoſt; but while I think as I write, I cool, and my hurry of ſpirits is allayed.

I believe I was above a quarter of an hour enjoying my own comfortleſs contemplations, before any-body came in to me; for they ſeemed to be in full debate. My aunt looked in firſt, 'O 'my dear!' ſaid ſhe, 'are you there?' and withdrew haſtily to apprize them of it.

And then (as agreed upon I ſuppoſe) in came my uncle Antony, crediting Mr. Solmes with the words, 'Let me 'lead you in, my dear friend,' having hold of his hand; while the new-made beau awkwardly followed, but more edgingly, as I may ſay, ſetting his feet mincingly, to avoid treading upon his leader's heels. Excuſe me, my dear, this ſeeming levity; but thoſe we do not love, appear in every-thing ungraceful to us.

I ſtood up. My uncle looked very ſurly.—'Sit down!—ſit down, girl,' ſaid he—And drawing a chair near me, he placed his dear friend in it, whether he would or not, I having taken my ſeat. And my uncle ſat on the other ſide of me.

'Well, niece,' taking my hand, 'we 'ſhall have very little more to ſay to you 'than we have already ſaid, as to the 'ſubject that is ſo diſtaſteful to you—'Unleſs, indeed, you have better con-'ſidered of the matter—And firſt, let 'me know if you have?'

'The matter wants no conſideration, 'Sir.'

'Very well, very well, Madam!' ſaid my uncle, withdrawing his hands from mine: 'could I ever have thought of 'this from you?'

'For God's ſake, deareſt Madam,' ſaid Mr. Solmes, folding his hands—And there he ſtopped.

'For God's ſake, what, Sir?—How 'came God's ſake, and your ſake, I pray 'you, to be the ſame?'

This ſilenced him. My uncle could only be angry; and that he was before.

'Well, well, well, Mr. Solmes,' ſaid my uncle, 'no more of ſupplication. 'You have not confidence enough to ex-'pect a woman's favour.'

He then was pleaſed to hint what great things he had deſigned to do for me; and that it was more for my ſake, after he returned from the Indies, than for the ſake of any other of the family, that he had reſolved to live a ſingle life.—'But now,' concluded he, 'that the per-'verſe girl deſpiſes all the great things 'it was once as much in my will, as it is 'in my power, to do for her, I will 'change my meaſures.'

I told him, that I moſt ſincerely thanked him for all his kind intentions to me; but that I was willing to reſign all claim to any other of his favours than kind looks and kind words.

He looked about him this way and that.

Mr. Solmes looked pitifully down.

But both being ſilent, I was ſorry, I added, that I had too much reaſon to ſay a very harſh thing, as it might be thought; which was, That if he would but be pleaſed to convince my brother and ſiſter, that he was abſolutely determined to alter his generous purpoſes towards me, it might poſſibly procure me better treatment from both, than I was otherwiſe likely to have.

My uncle was very much diſpleaſed. But he had not the opportunity to expreſs his diſpleaſure, as he ſeemed preparing to do; for in came my brother in exceeding great wrath, and called me ſeveral vile names. His ſucceſs hitherto, in his devices againſt me, had ſet him above keeping even decent meaſures.

Was this my ſpiteful conſtruction? he aſked—Was this the interpretation I put upon his brotherly care of me, and concern for me, in order to prevent my ruining myſelf?

'It is, indeed it is,' ſaid I: 'I know 'no other way to account for your late 'behaviour to me: and before your face, 'I repeat my requeſt to my uncle, and 'I will make it to my other uncle when-'ever I am permitted to ſee him, that 'they will confer all their favours upon 'you, and upon my ſiſter; and only 'make me happy (it is all I wiſh for!) 'in their kind looks, and kind words.'

How they all gazed upon one another!—But could I be leſs peremptory before the man?

'And, as to your care and concern for 'me, Sir,' turning to my brother, 'once 'more I deſire it not. You are but my 'brother. My father and mother, I 'bleſs God, are both living; and, were 'they not, you have given me abundant 'reaſon to ſay, that you are the very 'laſt perſon I would wiſh to have any 'concern for me.'

'How, niece! And is a brother, an 'only brother, of ſo little conſideration 'with you, as this comes to? And ought 'he to have no concern for his ſiſter's 'honour, and the family's honour?'

'My honour, Sir!—I deſire none of 'his concern for that! It never was en-'dangered till it had his undeſired 'concern!—Forgive me, Sir—But 'when my brother knows how to act 'like a brother, or behave like a gen-'tleman, he may deſerve more conſider-'ation from me than it is poſſible for me 'now to think he does.'

I thought my brother would have beat me upon this: but my uncle ſtood between us.

'Violent girl,' however he called me—'Who,' ſaid he, 'would have thought 'it of her?'

Then was Mr. Solmes told, that I was unworthy of his purſuit.

But Mr. Solmes warmly took my part: he could not bear, he ſaid, that I ſhould be treated ſo roughly.

And ſo very much did he exert himſelf on this occaſion, and ſo patiently was his warmth received by my brother, that I began to ſuſpect, that it was a contrivance to make me think myſelf obliged to him: and that this might perhaps be one end of the preſſed for interview.

The very ſuſpicion of this low artifice, violent as I was thought to be before, put me ſtill more out of patience; and my uncle and my brother again praiſing his wonderful generoſity, and his noble return of good for evil, 'You are a hap-'py man, Mr. Solmes,' ſaid I, 'that you 'can ſo eaſily confer obligations upon a 'whole family, except upon one un-'grateful perſon of it, whom you ſeem 'to intend moſt to oblige; but who be-'ing made unhappy by your favour, de-'ſires not to owe to you any protection 'from the violence of a brother.'

Then was I a rude, an ungrateful, an unworthy creature.

'I own it all—All, all you can call 'me, or think me, brother, do I own. 'I own my unworthineſs with regard to 'this gentleman. I take your word for 'his abundant merit, which I have nei-'ther leiſure nor inclination to examine 'into—It may, perhaps, be as great as 'your own—But yet I cannot thank him 'for his mediation: for who ſees not,' looking at my uncle, 'that this is giv-'ing himſelf a merit with every-body at 'my expence?'

Then turning to my brother, who ſeemed ſurprized into ſilence by my warmth, 'I muſt alſo acknowledge, Sir, 'the favour of your ſuperabundant care 'for me. But I diſcharge you of it; 'at leaſt while I have the happineſs of 'nearer and dearer relations. You have 'given me no reaſon to think better of 'your prudence, than of my own. I am 'independent of you, Sir; though I ne-'ver deſire to be ſo of my father; and 'although I wiſh for the good opinion 'of my uncles, it is all I with for from them:

'them: and this, Sir, I repeat, to make 'you and my ſiſter eaſy.'

Inſtantly almoſt came in Betty, in a great hurry, looking at me as ſpitefully, as if ſhe were my ſiſter: 'Sir,' ſaid ſhe to my brother, 'my maſter deſires to 'ſpeak with you this moment at the 'door.'

He went to that which led into my ſiſter's parlour; and this ſentence I heard thundered from the mouth of one who had a right to all my reverence: 'Son 'James, let the rebel be this moment 'carried away to my brother's—This 'very moment—She ſhall not ſtay one 'hour more under my roof!'

I trembled; I was ready to ſink. Yet, not knowing what I did, or ſaid, I flew to the door, and would have opened it: but my brother pulled it to, and held it cloſe by the key—'O my papa!—my 'dear papa!' ſaid I, falling upon my knees, at the door—'admit your child 'to your preſence!—Let me but plead 'my cauſe at your feet!—O reprobate 'not thus your diſtreſſed daughter!'

My uncle put his handkerchief to his eyes: Mr. Solmes made a ſtill more grievous face than he had before. But my brother's marble heart was untouched.

'I will not ſtir from my knees,' continued I, 'without admiſſion.—At this 'door I beg it!—O let it be the door of 'mercy! and open it to me, honoured 'Sir, I beſeech you!—But this once, 'this once! although you were afterwards to ſhut it againſt me for ever!'

The door was endeavoured to be opened on the inſide, which made my brother let go the key on a ſudden; and I preſſing againſt it, (all the time remaining on my knees) fell flat on my face into the other parlour; however without hurting myſelf. But every-body was gone, except Betty, who I ſuppoſe was the perſon that endeavoured to open the door. She helped to raiſe me up; and when I was on my feet, I looked round that apartment, and ſeeing nobody there, re-entered the other, leaning upon her; and then threw myſelf into the chair which I had ſat in before; and my eyes overflowed to my great relief: while my uncle Antony, my brother, and Mr. Solmes, left me, and went to my other relations.

What paſſed among them, I know not: but my brother came in by the time I had tolerably recovered himſelf, with a ſettled and haughty gloom upon his brow—'Your father and mother com-'mand you inſtantly to prepare for your 'uncle Antony's. You need not be ſo-'licitous about what you ſhall take with 'you. You may give Betty your keys. '—Take them, Betty, if the perverſe 'one has them about her, and carry 'them to her mother. She will take 'care to ſend every-thing after you that 'you ſhall want—But another night you 'will not be permitted to ſtay in this 'houſe.'

'I don't chuſe to give my keys to any-'body, except to my mother, and into 'her own hands. You ſee how much 'I am diſordered. It may coſt me my 'life, to be hurried away ſo ſuddenly. 'I beg to be indulged till next Monday 'at leaſt.'

'That will not be granted you. So 'prepare for this very night. And give 'up your keys. Give them to me, Miſs. 'I'll carry them to your mother.'

'Excuſe me, brother. Indeed I 'won't.

'Indeed you muſt. Have you any-'thing you are afraid ſhould be ſeen by 'your mother?'

'Not if I be permitted to attend her.'

'I'll make a report accordingly.'

He went out.

In came Miſs Dolly Hervey. 'I am 'ſorry, Madam, to be the meſſenger—'But your mamma inſiſts upon your ſend-'ing up all the keys of your cabinet, li-'brary, and drawers.'

'Tell my mother, that I yield them 'up to her commands: tell her, I make 'no conditions with my mother; but if 'ſhe find nothing ſhe ſhall diſapprove of, 'I beg that ſhe will permit me to tarry 'here a few days longer.—Try, my Dol-'ly; [the dear girl ſobbing with grief] 'try, if your gentleneſs cannot prevail 'for me.'

She wept ſtill more, and ſaid, 'It is 'ſad, very ſad, to ſee matters thus car-'ried!'

She took the keys, and wrapped her arms about me; and begged me to excuſe her for her meſſage; and would have ſaid more; but Betty's preſence awed her; as I ſaw.

'Don't pity me, my dear,' ſaid I. 'It will be imputed to you as a fault. 'You ſee who is by.'

The inſolent wench ſcornfully ſmiled: 'One young lady pitying another in 'things of this nature looks promiſing 'in the youngeſt I muſt needs ſay.'

I bid her be gone from my preſence.

She would moſt gladly go, ſhe ſaid, were ſhe not to ſtay about me by my mother's order.

It ſoon appeared for what ſhe ſtaid: for for I offering to go up ſtairs to my apartment when my couſin went from me with the keys, ſhe told me ſhe was commanded (to her very great regret, ſhe muſt own) to deſire me not to go up at preſent.

Such a bold face as ſhe, I told her, ſhould not hinder me.

She inſtantly rang the bell, and in came my brother, meeting me at the door.

'Return, return, Miſs—No going up 'yet.'

I went in again, and throwing myſelf upon the window-ſeat, wept bitterly.

Shall I give you the particulars of a ridiculouſly ſpiteful converſation that paſſed between my brother and me, in the time that he (with Betty) was in office to keep me in the parlour while my cloſet was ſearching?—But I think I will not. It can anſwer no good end.

I deſired ſeveral times, while he ſtaid, to have leave to retire to my apartment; but was denied. The ſearch, I ſuppoſe, was not over.

Bella was one of thoſe employed in it. They could not have a more diligent ſearcher. How happy it was they were diſappointed!

But when my ſiſter could not find the cunning creature's papers, I was to ſtand another viſit from Mr. Solmes—preceded now by my aunt Hervey, ſorely againſt her will, I could ſee that; accompanied by my uncle Antony, in order to keep her ſteady, I ſuppoſe.

But being a little heavy (for it is now paſt two in the morning) I will lie down in my cloaths, to indulge the kind ſummons, if it will be indulged.

THREE O'CLOCK, WED. MORN.

I COULD not ſleep—Only dozed away one half-hour.

My aunt Hervey accoſted me thus—'O my dear child, what troubles do you 'give to your parents, and to every-'body!—I wonder at you!'

'I am ſorry for it, Madam.'

'Sorry for it, child!—Why then ſo 'very obſtinate?—Come, ſit down, my 'dear. I will ſit next you;' taking my hand.

My uncle placed Mr. Solmes on the other ſide of me: himſelf over-againſt me, almoſt cloſe to me. Was I not finely beſet, my dear?

'Your brother, child,' ſaid my aunt, 'is too paſſionate—His zeal for your wel-'fare puſhes him on a little too vehe-'mently.

'Very true,' ſaid my uncle: 'but no 'more of this. We would now be glad 'to ſee if milder means will do with you '—Though, indeed, they were tried be-'fore.'

I aſked my aunt, if it were neceſſary, that that gentleman ſhould be preſent?

'There is a reaſon that he ſhould,' ſaid my aunt, 'as you will hear by-and-'by.—But I muſt tell you, firſt, that, 'thinking you was a little too angrily 'treated by your brother, your mother 'deſired me to try what gentler means 'would do upon a ſpirit ſo generous as 'we uſed to think yours.'

'Nothing can be done, Madam, I muſt 'preſume to ſay, if this gentleman's ad-'dreſs be the end.'

She looked upon my uncle who bit his lip; and looked upon Mr. Solmes, who rubbed his cheek; and ſhaking her head, 'Good, dear creature,' ſaid ſhe, 'be 'calm. Let me aſk you, if ſomething 'would not have been done, had you 'been more gently uſed, than you ſeem 'to think you have been?'

'No, Madam, I cannot ſay it would, 'in this gentleman's favour. You know, 'Madam—you know, Sir, to my uncle, 'I ever valued myſelf upon my ſincerи-'ty: and once indeed had the happineſs 'to be valued for it.'

My uncle took Mr. Solmes aſide. I heard him ſay, whiſperingly, 'She muſt, 'ſhe ſhall, ſtill be yours.—We'll ſee 'who'll conquer, parents or child, un-'cles or niece. I doubt not to be wit-'neſs to all this being got over, and ma-'ny a good-humoured jeſt made of this 'high phrenzy!'

I was heartily vexed.

'Though we cannot find out,' continued he, 'yet we gueſs, who puts her 'upon this obſtinate behaviour. It is 'not natural to her, man. Nor would 'I concern myſelf ſo much about her, 'but that I know what I ſay to be true, 'and intend to do great things for her.'

'I will hourly pray for that happy 'time,' whiſpered as audibly Mr. Solmes. 'I never will revive the remembrance of 'what is now ſo painful to me.

'Well, but, niece, I am to tell you,' ſaid my aunt, 'that the ſending up your 'keys, without making any conditions, 'has wrought for you what nothing elſe 'could have done. That, and the not 'finding any thing that could give them 'umbrage, together with Mr. Solmes's 'interpoſition—'

'O Madam, let me not owe an obli-'gation to Mr. Solmes. I cannot repay 'it, except by my thanks; and thoſe only 'on condition that he will decline his 'ſuit.

'suit.—To my thanks, Sir,' [turning to him] 'if you have a heart capable of 'humanity, if you have any esteem for 'me for my own sake, I beseech you to 'entitle yourself!—I beseech you do!'

'O Madam,' cried he, 'believe, be-'lieve, believe me, it is impossible. 'While you are single, I will hope. 'While that hope is encouraged by so 'many worthy friends, I must persevere. 'I must not slight them, Madam, because 'you slight me.'

I answered him only with a look; but it was of high disdain; and turning from him—'But what favour, dear 'Madam,' [to my aunt] 'has the in-'stance of duty you mention procured 'me?'

'Your mother and Mr. Solmes,' replied my aunt, 'have prevailed, that 'your request to stay here till Monday 'next shall be granted, if you will pro-'mise to go cheerfully then.

'Let me but chuse my own visitors, 'and I will go to my uncle's house with 'pleasure.'

'Well, niece,' said my aunt, 'we 'must wave this subject, I find. We 'will now proceed to another, which 'will require your utmost attention. It 'will give you the reason why Mr. 'Solmes's presence is requisite.

'Aye,' said my uncle, 'and shew you 'what sort of a man somebody is.—Mr. 'Solmes, pray favour us, in the first 'place, with the letter you received from 'your anonymous friend.'

'I will, Sir.' And out he pulled a letter-case, and, taking out a letter, 'It 'is written in answer to one sent to the 'person. It is superscribed, "To Roger "Solmes, Esq." It begins thus: "Honour- "ed Sir!"

'I beg your pardon, Sir,' said I: 'but 'what, pray, is the intent of reading this 'letter to me?'

'To let you know what a vile man 'you are thought to set your heart up-'on,' said my uncle, in an audible whis-per.

'If, Sir, it be suspected, that I have 'set my heart upon any other, why is 'Mr. Solmes to give himself any farther 'trouble about me?'

'Only hear, niece,' said my aunt; 'only hear what Mr. Solmes has to read 'and to say to you on this head.'

'If, Madam, Mr. Solmes will be 'pleased to declare, that he has no view 'to serve, no end to promote, for him-'self, I will hear any-thing he shall read. 'But if the contrary, you must allow 'me to say, That it will abate with me 'a great deal of the weight of whatso-'ever he shall produce.'

'Hear it but read, niece,' said my aunt.

'Hear it read,' said my uncle. 'You 'are so ready to take part with—'

'With any-body, Sir, that is accused 'anonymously, and from interested mo-'tives.'

He began to read; and there seemed to be a heavy load of charges in this letter against the poor criminal: but I stop-ped the reading of it, and said, 'It will 'not be my fault, if this vilified man be 'not as indifferent to me, as one whom 'I never saw. If he be otherwise at 'present, which I neither own, nor de-'ny, it proceeds from the strange me-'thods taken to prevent it. Do not let 'one cause unite him and me, and we 'shall not be united. If my offer to live 'single be accepted, he shall be no more 'to me than this gentleman.'

Still—'Proceed, Mr. Solmes—Hear 'it out, niece,' was my uncle's cry.

'But to what purpose, Sir!' said I—'Has not Mr. Solmes a view in this? 'And, besides, can any thing worse be 'said of Mr. Lovelace than I have heard 'said for several months past?'

'But this,' said my uncle, 'and, what 'Mr. Solmes can tell you, besides, 'amounts to the fullest proof—'

'Was the unhappy man, then, so free-'ly treated in his character before, with-'out full proof? I beseech you, Sir, give 'me not too good an opinion of Mr. Love-'lace; as I may have, if such pains be 'taken to make him guilty, by one who 'means not his reformation by it; nor 'to do good, if I may presume to say 'so in this case, to any-body but him-'self.

'I see very plainly, girl,' said my un-cle, 'your prepossession, your fond pre-'possession for the person of a man with-'out morals.'

'Indeed, my dear,' said my aunt, 'you too much justify all our apprehen-'sions. Surprising! that a young crea-'ture of virtue and honour should thus 'esteem a man of a quite opposite cha-'racter!'

'Dear Madam, do not conclude against 'me too hastily. I believe Mr. Love-'lace is far from being so good as he 'ought to be: but if every man's private 'life were searched into by prejudiced 'people, set on for that purpose, I know 'not whose reputation would be safe. I 'love a virtuous character, as much in 'man, as in woman. I think it is requi-'site, and as meritorious, in the one as 'in

'in the other. And, if left to myself, 'I would prefer a perſon of ſuch a cha-'racter to royalty without it.'

'Why then,' ſaid my uncle—

'Give me leave, Sir—But I may ven-'ture to ſay, that many of thoſe who 'have eſcaped cenſure have not merited applauſe.

'Permit me to obſerve further, that 'Mr. Solmes himſelf may not be abſo-'lutely faultleſs. I never heard of his 'virtues. Some vices I have heard of—'Excuſe me, Mr. Solmes, I ſpeak to your 'face—The text about caſting the firſt 'ſtone affords an excellent leſſon.'

He looked down; but was ſilent.

'Mr. Lovelace may have vices you 'have not. You may have others, which 'he has not.—I ſpeak not this to defend 'him, or to accuſe you. No man is bad, 'no one is good, in every-thing. Mr. 'Lovelace, for example, is ſaid to be 'implacable, and to hate my friends; 'that does not make me value him the 'more: but give me leave to ſay, that 'they hate him as much. Mr. Solmes 'has his antipathies, likewiſe; very 'ſtrong ones, and thoſe to his own relati-'ons; which I don't find to be the other's 'fault; for he lives well with his—Yet 'he may have as bad:—worſe, pardon 'me, he cannot have, in my poor opi-'nion. For what muſt be the man, who 'hates his own fleſh?

'You know not, Madam;
'You know not, niece;
'You know not, Clary; } All in one breath.

'I may not, nor do I deſire to know 'Mr. Solmes's reaſons. It concerns not 'me to know them: but the world, even 'the impartial part of it, accuſes him. 'If the world is unjuſt or raſh, in one 'man's caſe, why may it not be ſo in 'another's? That's all I mean by it. Nor 'can there be a greater ſign of want of 'merit than where a man ſeeks to pull 'down another's character, in order to 'build up his own.'

The poor man's face was all this time overſpread with confuſion, twiſted, as it were, and all awry, neither mouth nor noſe ſtanding in the middle of it. He looked as if he were ready to cry: and had he been capable of pitying me, I had certainly tried to pity him.

They all three gazed upon one another in ſilence.

My aunt, I ſaw, (at leaſt I thought ſo) looked as if ſhe would have been glad ſhe might have appeared to approve of what I ſaid. She but feebly blamed me, when ſhe ſpoke, for not hearing what Mr. Solmes had to ſay. He himſelf ſeemed not now very earneſt to be heard. My uncle ſaid, There was no talking to me. And I ſhould have abſolutely ſilenced both gentlemen, had not my brother come in again to their aſſiſtance.

This was the ſtrange ſpeech he made at his entrance, his eyes flaming with anger; 'This prating girl has ſtruck 'you all dumb, I perceive.—Perſevere, 'Mr. Solmes. I have heard every word 'ſhe has ſaid: and I know no other me-'thod of being even with her, than after 'ſhe is yours, to make her as ſenſible 'of your power, as ſhe now makes you 'of her inſolence.'

'Fie, couſin Harlowe!' ſaid my aunt—'Could I have thought a brother would 'have ſaid this to a gentleman, of a 'ſiſter?'

'I muſt tell you, Madam,' ſaid he, 'that you give the rebel courage. You 'yourſelf ſeem to favour too much the 'arrogance of her ſex in her; otherwiſe 'ſhe durſt not have thus ſtopped her un-'cle's mouth by reflections upon him; 'as well as denied to hear a gentleman 'tell her the danger ſhe is in from a li-'bertine, whoſe protection, as ſhe has 'plainly hinted, ſhe intends to claim 'againſt her family.'

'Stopped my uncle's mouth, by reflections 'upon him, Sir!' ſaid I, 'How can that 'be! How dare you to make ſuch an 'application as this!'

My aunt wept at his reflection upon her—'Couſin,' ſaid ſhe to him, 'if this 'be the thanks I have for my trouble, I 'have done: your father would not treat 'me thus—And I will ſay, that the hint 'you gave was an unbrotherly one.'

'Not more unbrotherly than all the 'reſt of his conduct to me, of late, Ma-'dam,' ſaid I. 'I ſee by this ſpecimen 'of his violence, how every-body has 'been brought into his meaſures. Had 'I any the leaſt apprehenſion of ever be-'ing in Mr. Solmes's power, this might 'have affected me.—But you ſee, Sir,' to Mr. Solmes, 'what a conduct is 'thought neceſſary to enable you to ar-'rive at your ungenerous end. You ſee 'how my brother courts for you!'

'I diſclaim Mr. Harlowe's violence, 'Madam, with all my ſoul. I will ne-'ver remind you—'

'Silence, worthy Sir!' ſaid I; 'I will 'take care you never ſhall have the op-'portunity.'

'Leſs violence, Clary,' ſaid my uncle.—'Couſin James, you are as much 'to blame as your ſiſter.'

In then came my ſiſter. 'Brother,' ſaid ſhe, 'you kept not your promiſe.

'You

'You are thought to be to blame with-
'in, as well as here. Were not Mr.
'Solmes's generoſity and affection to 'the girl well known, what you have
'ſaid would be inexcuſable. My father
'deſires to ſpeak with you—and with
'you, aunt—and with you, uncle—and
'with you, Mr. Solmes, if you pleaſe.'

They all four withdrew into the next apartment.

I ſtood ſilent, as not knowing preſently how to take this intervention of my ſiſter's. But ſhe left me not long at a loſs—'O thou perverſe thing,' ſaid ſhe, (poking out her angry face at me, when they were all gone, but ſpeaking ſpitefully low]—'What trouble do you 'give to us all!'

'You and my brother, Bella,' ſaid I,
'give trouble to yourſelves; yet neither
'you nor he have any buſineſs to con'cern yourſelves about me.'

She threw out ſome ſpiteful expreſſions, ſtill in a low voice, as if ſhe choſe not to be heard without; and I thought it beſt to oblige her to raiſe her tone a little, if I could. If I could, did I ſay? It is eaſy to make a paſſionate ſpirit anſwer all one's views upon it.

She accordingly flamed out in a raiſed tone: and this brought my couſin Dolly in to us. 'Miſs Harlowe, your com'pany is deſired.'

'I will come preſently, couſin Dolly.'

But again provoking a ſeverity from me which ſhe could not bear, and calling me names; in once more came Dolly, with another meſſage, that her company was deſired.

'Not mine, I doubt, Miſs Dolly,' ſaid I.

The ſweet-tempered girl burſt out into tears, and ſhook her head.

'Go in before me, child,' ſaid Bella, [vexed to ſee her concern for me] 'with 'thy ſharp face like a new moon: what 'doſt thou cry for? Is it to make thy
'keen face look ſtill keener?'

I believe Bella was blamed too, when ſhe went in; for I heard her ſay, The creature was ſo provoking, there was no keeping a reſolution.

Mr. Solmes, after a little while, came in again by himſelf, to take leave of me: full of ſcrapes and compliments; but too well tutored and encouraged, to give me hope of his declining his ſuit. He begged me not to impute to him any of the ſevere things to which he had been a ſorrowful witneſs. He beſought my compaſſion, as he called it.

He ſaid, the reſult was, that he had ſtill hopes given him; and although diſcouraged by me, he was reſolved to perſevere, while I remained ſingle.—And ſuch long and ſuch painful ſervices he talked of, as never before were heard of.

I told him in the ſtrongeſt manner, what he had to truſt to.

Yet ſtill he determined to perſiſt.—While I was no man's elſe, he muſt hope.

'What!' ſaid I, 'will you ſtill per-
'ſiſt, when I declare, as I now do, that
'my affections are engaged?—And let
'my brother make the moſt of it.'

He knew my principles, and adored me for them. He doubted not, that it was in his power to make me happy: and he was ſure I would not want the will to be ſo.

I aſſured him, that were I to be carried to my uncle's, it ſhould anſwer no end: for I would never ſee him; nor receive a line from him; nor hear a word in his favour, whoever were the perſon who ſhould mention him to me.

He was ſorry for it. He muſt be miſerable, were I to hold in that mind. But he doubted not, that I might be induced by my father and uncles to change it.

Never, never, he might depend upon it.

It was richly worth his patience, and the trial.

'At my expence?—At the price of all
'my happineſs, Sir?'

He hoped I ſhould be induced to think otherwiſe.

And then would he have run into his fortune, his ſettlements, his affection—Vowing, that never man loved a woman with ſo ſincere a paſſion, as he loved me.

I ſtopped him, as to the firſt part of his ſpeech: and to the ſecond, of the ſincerity of his paſſion. 'What then,
'Sir,' ſaid I, 'is your love to one, who
'muſt aſſure you, that never young
'creature looked upon man with a more
'ſincere diſapprobation, than I look
'upon you? And tell me, what argu'ment can you urge, that this true de'claration anſwers not beforehand?'

'Deareſt Madam, what can I ſay?—
'On my knees I beg—'

And down the ungraceful wretch dropped on his knees.

'Let me not kneel in vain, Madam:
'let me not be thus deſpiſed.'—And he looked moſt odiouſly ſorrowful.

'I have kneeled too, Mr. Solmes.
'Often have I kneeled: and I will kneel
'again—Even to you, Sir, will I kneel,
'if there be ſo much merit in kneeling;
'provided you will not be the imple'ment

'ment of my cruel brother's undeserved 'perfecution.'

'If all the services, even to worship 'you, during my whole life—You, 'Madam, invoke and expect mercy; 'yet shew none.'

'Am I to be cruel to myself, to shew 'mercy to you! Take my estate, Sir, 'with all my heart, since you are such 'a favourite in this house!—Only leave 'me myself—The mercy you ask for, do 'you shew to others.'

'If you mean to my relations, Ma-'dam—unworthy as they are, all shall 'be done that you shall prescribe.'

'Who, I, Sir, to find you bowels 'you naturally have not? I to purchase 'their happiness by the forfeiture of my 'own? What I ask you for, is mercy to 'myself: that, since you seem to have 'some power over my relations, you 'will use it in my behalf. Tell them, 'that you see I cannot conquer my aver-'sion to you: tell them, if you are a 'wise man, that you too much value 'your own happiness, to risque it against 'such a determined antipathy: tell 'them, that I am unworthy of your 'offers; and that, in mercy to yourself, 'as well as to me, you will not prose-'cute a suit so impossible to be granted.'

'I will risque all consequences,' said the fell wretch, rising, with a counte-nance whitened over, as if with malice, his hollow eyes flashing fire, and biting his under-lip, to shew he could be manly. 'Your hatred, Madam, shall be no 'objection with me: and I doubt not in 'a few days to have it in my power to 'shew you—'

'You have it in your power, Sir—'

He came well off—'To shew you more 'generosity, than, noble as you are said 'to be to others, you shew to me.'

The man's face became his anger: it seems formed to express the passion.

At that instant, again came in my brother—'Sister, sister, sister,' said he, with his teeth set, 'act on the termа-'gant part you have so newly assumed '—Most wonderfully well does it be-'come you. It is but a short one, how-'ever. Tyranness in your turn, accuse 'others of your own guilt—But leave 'her, leave her, Mr. Solmes: her time 'is short. You'll find her humble and 'mortified enough very quickly. Then, 'how like a little tame fool will she 'look, with her conscience upbraiding 'her, and begging of you [with a whi-ning voice, the barbarous brother spoke] 'to forgive and forget!'

More he said, as he flew out, with a glowing face, upon Shorey's coming in to recal him on his violence.

I removed from chair to chair, ex-ceedingly frighted and disturbed at this brutal treatment.

The man attempted to excuse himself, as being sorry for my brother's passion.

'Leave me, leave me, Sir,' fanning '—or I shall faint.' And indeed I thought I should.

He recommended himself to my fa-vour with an air of assurance; augment-ed, as I thought, by a distress so visible in me; for he even snatched my trem-bling, my struggling hand; and ravished it to his odious mouth.

I flung from him with high disdain: and he withdrew, bowing and cringing; self-gratified, and enjoying, as I thought, the confusion he saw me in.

The wretch is now, methinks, before me; and now I see him awkwardly strid-ing backward, as he retired, till the edge of the opened door, which he ran against, remembered him to turn his welcome back upon me.

Upon his withdrawing, Betty brought me word, that I was permitted to go up to my own chamber: and was bid to consider of every-thing: for my time was short. Nevertheless, she believed I might be permitted to stay till Satur-day.

She tells me, that although my bro-ther and sister were blamed for being so hasty with me, yet when they made their report, and my uncle Antony his, of my provocations, they were all more deter-mined than ever in Mr. Solmes's favour.

The wretch himself, she tells me, pretends to be more in love with me than before; and to be rather delighted than discouraged with the conversation that passed between us. He ran on, she says, in raptures, about the grace where-with I should dignify his board; and the like sort of stuff, either of his saying, or of her making.

She closed all with a 'Now is your time, Miss, to submit with a grace, and 'to make your own terms with him:— 'else, I can tell you, were I Mr. Solmes, 'it should be worse for you: and who, 'Miss, of our sex,' proceeded the saucy creature, 'would admire a rakish gen-'tleman, when she might be admired 'by a sober one to the end of the chap-'ter?'

She made this further speech to me on quitting my chamber—'You have 'had amazing good luck, Miss, I must 'tell you, to keep your writings con-'cealed so cunningly. You must needs 'think

'think I know that you are always at 'your pen: and as you endeavour to 'hide that knowledge from me, I do 'not think myſelf obliged to keep your 'ſecret. But I love not to aggravate. 'I had rather reconcile by much. 'Peace-making is my talent, and ever 'was. And had I been as much your 'foe, as you imagine, you had not per-'haps been here now. But this, how-'ever, I do not ſay to make a merit with 'you, Miſs: for, truly, it will be the 'better for you the ſooner every-thing 'is over with you. And better for me, 'and for every-one elſe; that's certain. 'Yet one hint I muſt conclude with; 'that your pen and ink (ſoon as you are 'to go away) will not be long in your 'power, I do aſſure you, Miſs. And 'then, having loſt that amuſement, it 'will be ſeen, how a mind ſo active as 'yours will be able to employ itſelf.'

This hint alarms me ſo much, that I ſhall inſtantly begin to conceal, in dif-ferent places, pens, ink, and paper; and to depoſit ſome in the ivy ſummer-houſe, if I can find a ſafe place there; and, at the worſt, I have got a pencil of black, and another of red-lead, which I uſe in my drawings; and my patterns ſhall ſerve for paper, if I have no other.

How lucky it was, that I had got away my papers! They made a ſtrict ſearch for them; that I can ſee, by the diſorderly manner they have left all my things in: for you know that I am ſuch an obſerver of method, that I can go to a bit of ribband, or lace, or edging, blindfold. The ſame in my books; which they have ſtrangely diſordered and miſmatched; to look behind them, and in ſome of them, I ſuppoſe. My cloaths too are rumpled not a little. No place has eſcaped them. To your hint, I thank you, are they indebted for their diſappointment.

The pen, through heavineſs and fa-tigue, dropped out of my fingers, at the word indebted. I reſumed it, to finiſh the ſentence; and to tell you, that I am, your for-ever obliged and affectionate

CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XXXIV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

WEDNESDAY, 11 O'CLOCK, APRIL 5.

I Muſt write as I have opportunity; making uſe of my concealed ſtores: for my pens and ink (all of each that they could find) are taken from me; as I ſhall tell you more particularly by-and-by.

About an hour ago, I depoſited my long letter to you; as alſo, in the uſual place, a billet to Mr. Lovelace, leſt his impatience ſhould put him upon ſome raſhneſs; ſignifying, in four lines, that the interview was over; and that I hoped my ſteady refuſal of Mr. Solmes would diſcourage any further applications to me in his favour.

Although I was unable (through the fatigue I had undergone, and by reaſon of ſitting up all night, to write to you; which made me lie longer than ordinary this morning) to depoſit my letter to you ſooner; yet I hope you will have it in ſuch good time, as that you will be able to ſend me an anſwer to it this night, or in the morning early; which, if ever ſo ſhort, will inform me whether I may depend upon your mother's in-dulgence or not. This it behoves me to know as ſoon as poſſible; for they are reſolved to hurry me away on Saturday next at fartheſt; perhaps to-morrow.

I will now inform you of all that hap-pened previous to their taking away my pen and ink, as well as of the manner in which that act of violence was com-mitted; and this as briefly as I can.

My aunt, who (as well as Mr. Solmes, and my two uncles) lives here, I think, came up to me, and ſaid, She would fain have me hear what Mr. Solmes had to ſay of Mr. Lovelace—Only that I might be apprized of ſome things, that would convince me what a vile man he is, and what a wretched huſband he muſt make. I might give them what degree of credit I pleaſed; and take them with abatement for Mr. Solmes's intereſted-neſs, if I thought fit. But it might be of uſe to me, were it but to queſtion Mr. Lovelace indirectly upon ſome of them, that related to myſelf.

I was indifferent, I ſaid, about what he could ſay of me; as I was ſure it could not be to my diſadvantage; and as he had no reaſon to impute to me the forwardneſs which my unkind friends had ſo cauſeleſsly taxed me with.

She ſaid, That he gave himſelf high airs on account of his family; and ſpoke as deſpicably of ours as if an alliance with us were beneath him.

I replied, That he was a very unwor-thy man, if it were true, to ſpeak ſlight-ingly of a family, which was as good as his own, 'bating that it was not allied to the peerage: that the dignity itſelf, I thought, conveyed more ſhame than ho-nour to deſcendants, who had not merit to adorn, as well as to be adorned by it: that my brother's abſurd pride, indeed, which made him every-where declare, he would never marry but to quality, gave a diſgraceful preference againſt ours: but that were I to be aſſured, that Mr. Lovelace was capable of ſo mean a pride as to inſult us, or value himſelf on ſuch an accidental advantage, I ſhould think as deſpicably of his ſenſe, as every-body elſe did of his morals.

She inſiſted upon it, that he had taken ſuch liberties; and offered to give ſome inſtances, which, ſhe ſaid, would ſurprize me.

I anſwered, That were it ever ſo certain that Mr. Lovelace had taken ſuch liberties, it would be but common juſtice (ſo much hated as he was by all our family, and ſo much inveighed againſt in all companies by them) to enquire into the provocation he had to ſay what was imputed to him, and whether the value ſome of my friends put upon the riches they poſſeſs, (throwing perhaps contempt upon every other advantage, and even diſcrediting their own pretenſions to family, in order to depreciate his) might not provoke him to like contempts. 'Upon the whole, Madam,' ſaid I, 'can 'you ſay, that the inveteracy lies not as 'much on our ſide, as on his? Can he ſay 'any-thing of us more diſreſpectful than 'we ſay of him?—And as to the ſuggeſ-'tion, ſo often repeated, that he will 'make a bad huſband, is it poſſible for 'him to uſe a wife worſe than I am 'uſed; particularly by my brother and 'ſiſter?'

'Ah, niece! ah, my dear! how 'firmly has this wicked man attached 'you!'

'Perhaps not, Madam. But really 'great care ſhould be taken by fathers 'and mothers, when they would have 'their daughter of their minds in theſe 'particulars, not to ſay things that ſhall 'neceſſitate the child, in honour and 'generoſity, to take part with the man 'her friends are averſe to. But, waving 'all this, as I have offered to renounce 'him for ever, I ſee not why he ſhould 'be mentioned to me, nor why I ſhould 'be wiſhed to hear any-thing about him.'

'Well, but ſtill, my dear, there can 'be no harm to let Mr. Solmes tell you 'what Mr. Lovelace has ſaid of you. Se-'verely as you have treated Mr. Solmes, 'he is fond of attending you once more: 'he begs to be heard on this head.'

'If it be proper for me to hear it, 'Madam—'

'It is,' eagerly interrupted ſhe, 'very 'proper.'

'Has what he has ſaid of me, Madam, 'convinced you of Mr. Lovelace's baſe-'neſs?'

'It has, my dear: and that you ought 'to abhor him for it.'

'Then, dear Madam, be pleaſed to 'let me hear it from your mouth: there 'is no need that I ſhould ſee Mr. Solmes, 'when it will have double the weight 'from you. What, Madam, has the 'man dared to ſay of me?'

My aunt was quite at a loſs.

At laſt, 'Well,' ſaid ſhe, 'I ſee how 'you are attached. I am ſorry for it, 'Miſs. For I do aſſure you, it will ſig-'nify nothing. You muſt be Mrs. 'Solmes; and that in a very few days.'

'If conſent of heart, and aſſent of 'voice, be neceſſary to a marriage, I 'am ſure I never can, nor ever will, be 'married to Mr. Solmes. And what 'will any of my relations be anſwerable 'for, if they force my hand into his, 'and hold it there till the ſervice be 'read; I perhaps inſenſible, and in fits, 'all the time!'

'What a romantic picture of a forced 'marriage have you drawn, niece! Some 'people would ſay, you have given a 'fine deſcription of your own obſtinacy, 'child.'

'My brother and ſiſter would: but 'you, Madam, diſtinguiſh, I am ſure, 'between obſtinacy and averſion.'

'Suppoſed averſion may owe it's riſe 'to real obſtinacy, my dear.'

'I know my own heart, Madam. I 'wiſh you did.'

'Well, but ſee Mr. Solmes once 'more, niece. It will oblige, and make 'for you, more than you imagine.'

'What ſhould I ſee him for, Madam? '—Is the man fond of hearing me de-'clare my averſion to him?—Is he de-'ſirous of having me more and more 'incenſe my friends againſt myſelf!—'O my cunning, my ambitious brother!'

'Ah, my dear!'—with a look of pity, as if ſhe underſtood the meaning of my exclamation—'But muſt that neceſſarily 'be the caſe?'

'It muſt, Madam, if they will take 'offence at me for declaring my ſtedfaſt 'deteſtation of Mr. Solmes, as a huſ-'band.'

'Mr. Solmes is to be pitied,' ſaid ſhe. 'He adores you. He longs to ſee you 'once more. He loves you the better 'for your cruel uſage of him yeſterday. 'He is in raptures about you.'

'Ugly creature,' thought I, 'he in 'raptures!'

'What a cruel wretch muſt he be,' ſaid I, 'who can enjoy the diſtreſs to 'which he ſo largely contributes!—But 'I ſee, I ſee, Madam, that I am con-'ſidered as an animal to be baited, to 'make,

'make ſport for my brother and ſiſter, 'and Mr. Solmes. They are all, all 'of them, wanton in their cruelty.—I, 'Madam, ſee the man!—the man ſo 'incapable of pity!—Indeed I will not 'ſee him, if I can help it.—Indeed I 'will not.'

'What a conſtruction does your live-'ly wit put upon the admiration Mr. 'Solmes expreſſes of you!—Paſſionate 'as you were yeſterday, and contemp-'tuouſly as you treated him, he doats 'upon you for the very ſeverity by 'which he ſuffers. He is not ſo unge-'nerous a man as you think him: nor 'has he an unfeeling heart.—Let me 'prevail upon you, my dear, (as your 'father and mother expect it of you) to 'ſee him once more, and hear what he 'has to ſay to you.'

'How can I conſent to ſee him again, 'when yeſterday's interview was inter-'preted by you, Madam, as well as by 'every other, as an encouragement to 'him? When I myſelf declared, that 'if I ſaw him a ſecond time by my own 'conſent, it might be ſo taken? And 'when I am determined never to en-'courage him?'

'You might ſpare your reflections up-'on me, Miſs. I have no thanks either 'from one ſide or the other.'

And away ſhe flung.

'Deareſt Madam!' ſaid I, following her to the door—

But ſhe would not hear me further, and her ſudden breaking from me occaſioned a hurry to ſome mean liſtener; as the ſlipping of a foot from the landing-place on the ſtairs diſcovered to me.

I had ſcarcely recovered myſelf from this attack, when up came Betty—'Miſs,' ſaid ſhe, 'your company is deſired 'below-ſtairs in your own parlour.'

'By whom, Betty?'

'How can I tell, Miſs?—Perhaps by 'your ſiſter, perhaps by your brother—'I know they won't come up-ſtairs to 'your apartment again.'

'Is Mr. Solmes gone, Betty?'

'I believe he is, Miſs—Would you 'have him ſent for back?' ſaid the bold creature.

Down I went: and to whom ſhould I be ſent for, but to my brother and Mr. Solmes? The latter ſtanding ſneaking behind the door, ſo that I ſaw him not, till I was mockingly led by the hand into the room by my brother. And then I ſtarted as if I had beheld a ghoſt.

'You are to ſit down, Clary.'

'And what then, brother?'

'Why then, you are to put off that 'ſcornful look, and hear what Mr. 'Solmes has to ſay to you.'

'Sent for down to be baited again?' thought I.

'Madam,' ſaid Mr. Solmes, as if in haſte to ſpeak, leſt he ſhould not have an opportunity given him, [and indeed he judged right] 'Mr. Lovelace is a 'declared marriage-hater, and has a de-'ſign upon your honour, if ever—'

'Baſe accuſer!' ſaid I in a paſſion, ſnatching my hand from my brother, who was inſolently motioning to give it to Mr. Solmes; 'he has not!—he dares 'not!—But you have, if endeavouring 'to force a free mind be to diſhonour 'it!'

'O thou violent creature!' ſaid my brother.—'But not gone yet!'—for I was ruſhing away.

'What mean you, Sir,' [ſtruggling vehemently to get away] 'to detain me 'thus againſt my will?'

'You ſhall not go, Violence;' claſping his unbrotherly arms about me.

'Then let not Mr. Solmes ſtay.—'Why hold you me thus? He ſhall not 'for your own ſake, if I can help it, ſee 'how barbarouſly a brother can treat a 'ſiſter who deverves not evil treatment.'

And I ſtruggled ſo vehemently to get from him, that he was forced to quit my hands; which he did with theſe words —'Be gone then, Fury!—How ſtrong 'is will!—There is no holding her.'

And up I flew to my chamber, and locked myſelf in, trembling, and out of breath.

In leſs than a quarter of an hour, up came Betty. I let her in upon her tapping, and aſking (half out of breath too) for admittance.

'The Lord have mercy upon us!' ſaid ſhe.—'What a confuſion of a houſe is 'this!'[hurrying up and down, fanning herſelf with her handkerchief] 'Such 'angry maſters and miſtreſſes!—Such 'an obſtinate young lady!—Such an 'humble lover!—Such enraged uncles! '—Such—O dear!—dear! What a top-'ſy-turvy houſe is this?—And all for 'what, trow?—Only becauſe a young 'lady may be happy, and will not?—'Only becauſe a young lady will have a 'huſband, and will not have a huſband? 'What hurly-burlies are here, where 'all uſed to be peace and quietneſs!'

Thus ſhe ran on to herſelf; while I ſat as patiently as I could (being aſſured that her errand was not deſigned to be a welcome one to me) to obſerve when her ſoliloquy would end.

At laſt, turning to me—'I muſt do as 'I am bid. I can't help it—Don't be 'angry with me, Miſs. But I muſt carry 'down your pen and ink: and that, this 'moment.'

'By whoſe order?'

'By your papa's and mamma's.'

'How ſhall I know that?'

She offered to go to my cloſet: I ſtepped in before her: 'Touch it if you 'dare.'

Up came my couſin Dolly—'Madam! '—Madam!' ſaid the poor weeping good-natured creature, in broken ſentences—'You muſt—indeed you muſt—'deliver to Betty—or to me—your pen 'and ink.'

'Muſt I, my ſweet couſin? Then I 'will to you; but not to this bold body.' And ſo I gave my ſtandiſh to her.

'I am ſorry, very ſorry,' ſaid Miſs, 'to be the meſſenger: but your papa 'will not have you in the ſame houſe 'with him: he is reſolved you ſhall be 'carried away to-morrow or Saturday 'at fartheſt. And therefore your pen 'and ink are taken away that you may 'give nobody notice of it.'

And away went the dear girl, very ſorrowful, carrying down with her my ſtandiſh, and all it's furniture, and a little parcel of pens beſide, which having been ſeen when the great ſearch was made, ſhe was bid to aſk for. As it happened, I had not diminiſhed it, having hid half a dozen crow quills in as many different places. It was lucky; for I doubt not they had numbered how many were in the parcel.

Betty ran on, telling me, That my mother was now as much incenſed againſt me, as any-body—That my doom was fixed—That my violent behaviour had not left one to plead for me—That Mr. Solmes bit his lip, and muttered, and ſeemed to have more in his head, than could come out at his mouth; that was her phraſe.

And yet ſhe alſo hinted to me, that the cruel wretch took pleaſure in ſeeing me; although ſo much to my diſguſt—And ſo wanted to ſee me again. Muſt he not be a ſavage, my dear?

The wench went on—That my uncle Harlowe ſaid, That now he gave me up—That he pitied Mr. Solmes—Yet hoped he would not think of this to my detriment hereafter: That my uncle Antony was of opinion, that I ought to ſmart for it: And, for her part—And then, as one of the family, ſhe gave her opinion of the ſame ſide.

As I have no other way of hearing any-thing that is ſaid or intended below, I bear ſometimes more patiently than I otherwiſe ſhould do with her impertinence. And indeed ſhe ſeems to be in all my brother's and ſiſter's counſels.

Miſs Hervey came up again, and demanded an half-pint ink-bottle which they had ſeen in my cloſet.

I gave it her without heſitation.

If they have no ſuſpicion of my being able to write, they will perhaps let me ſtay longer than otherwiſe they would.

This, my dear, is now my ſituation.

All my dependence, all my hopes, are in your mother's favour. But for that, I know not what I might do: for who can tell what will come next?

LETTER XXXV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

WEDNESDAY, FOUR O'CLOCK IN THE AFTERNOON.

I Am juſt returned from depoſiting the letter I ſo lately finiſhed, and ſuch of Mr. Lovelace's letters as I have not ſent you. My long letter I found remaining there—So you will have both together.

I am concerned, methinks, it is not with you.—But your ſervant cannot always be at leiſure. However, I will depoſit as faſt as I write. I muſt keep nothing by me now; and when I write, lock myſelf in, that I may not be ſurprized now they think I have no pen and ink.

I found in the uſual place another letter from this diligent man: and by it's contents, a confirmation that nothing paſſes in this houſe but he knows it; and that almoſt as ſoon as it paſſes. For this letter muſt have been written before he could have received my billet; and depoſited, I ſuppoſe, when that was taken away; yet he compliments me in it upon aſſerting myſelf (as he calls it) on that occaſion to my uncle and to Mr. Solmes.

He aſſures me, however, that they are more and more determined to ſubdue me.

He ſends me the compliments of his family; and acquaints me with their earneſt deſire to ſee me amongſt them. Moſt vehemently does he preſs for my quitting this houſe, while it is in my power to get away: and again craves leave to order his uncle's chariot-and-ſix to attend my commands at the ſtile leading to the coppice adjoining to the paddock.

Settlements to my own will he again offers.

offers. Lord M. and Lady Sarah and Lady Betty to be guarantees of his honour and juſtice. But, if I chuſe not to go to either of thoſe ladies, nor yet to make him the happieſt of men ſo ſoon as it is nevertheleſs his hope that I will, he urges me to withdraw to my own houſe, and to accept of my Lord M. for my guardian and protector till my couſin Morden arrives. He can contrive, he ſays, to give me eaſy poſſeſſion of it, and will fill it with his female relations on the firſt invitation from me; and Mrs. Norton, or Miſs Howe, may be undoubtedly prevailed upon to be with me for a time. There can be no pretence for litigation, he ſays, when I am once in it. Nor, if I chuſe to have it ſo, will he appear to viſit me; nor preſume to mention marriage to me till all is quiet and eaſy; till every method I ſhall preſcribe for a reconciliation with my friends is tried; till my couſin comes; till ſuch ſettlements are drawn as he ſhall approve of for me; and that I have unexceptionable proofs of his own good behaviour.

As to the diſgrace a perſon of my character may be apprehenſive of upon quitting my father's houſe, he obſerves, (too truly I doubt) that the treatment I meet with is in every-one's mouth: yet, he ſays, that the public voice is in my favour: my friends themſelves, he ſays, expect that I will do myſelf what he calls, this juſtice: why elſe do they confine me? He urges, that, thus treated, the independence I have a right to will be my ſufficient excuſe, going but from their houſe to my own, if I chuſe that meaſure; or in order to take poſſeſſion of my own, if I do not: that all the diſgrace I can receive, they have already given me: that his concern and his family's concern in my honour, will be equal to my own, if he may be ſo happy ever to call me his: and he preſumes, he ſays, to aver, that no family can better ſupply the loſs of my own friends to me than his, in whatever way I ſhall do them the honour to accept of his and their protection.

But he repeats, that, in all events, he will oppoſe my being carried to my uncle's; being well aſſured, that I ſhall be loſt to him for ever, if once I enter into that houſe. He tells me, that my brother and ſiſter, and Mr. Solmes, deſign to be there to receive me: that my father and mother will not come near me till the ceremony is actually over: and that then they will appear, in order to try to reconcile me to my odious huſband, by urging upon me the obligations I ſhall be ſuppoſed to be under from a double duty.

How, my dear, am I driven on one ſide, and invited on the other!—This laſt intimation is but a too probable one. All the ſteps they take ſeem to tend to this! And, indeed, they have declared almoſt as much.

He owns, that he has already taken his meaſures upon this intelligence—But that he is ſo deſirous for my ſake (I muſt ſuppoſe, he ſays, that he owes them no forbearance for their own) to avoid coming to extremities, that he has ſuffered a perſon, whom they do not ſuſpect, to acquaint them with his reſolutions, as if come at by accident, if they perſiſt in their deſign to carry me by violence to my uncle's; in hopes, that they may be induced from the fear of miſchief which may enſue, to change their meaſures: and yet he is aware, that he has expoſed himſelf to the greateſt riſques by having cauſed this intimation to be given them; ſince, if he cannot benefit himſelf by their fears, there is no doubt but they will doubly guard themſelves againſt him upon it.

What a dangerous enterprizer, however, is this man!

He begs a few lines from me by way of anſwer to this letter, either this evening, or to-morrow morning. If he be not ſo favoured, he ſhall conclude, from what he knows of the fixed determination of my relations, that I ſhall be under a cloſer reſtraint than before: and he ſhall be obliged to take his meaſures according to that preſumption.

You will ſee by this abſtract, as well as by his letter preceding this, (for both run in the ſame ſtrain) how ſtrangely forward the difficulty of my ſituation has brought him in his declarations and propoſals; and in his threatenings too: which, but for that, I would not take from him.

Something, however, I muſt ſpeedily reſolve upon, or it will be out of my power to help myſelf.

Now I think of it, I will incloſe his letter, (ſo might have ſpared the abſtract of it) that you may the better judge of all his propoſals, and intelligence; and leſt it ſhould fall into other hands. I cannot forget the contents, although I am at a loſs what anſwer to return.

I cannot bear the thoughts of throwing myſelf upon the protection of his friends—But I will not examine his propoſals cloſely till I hear from you. Indeed, I have no eligible hope, but in your mother's goodneſs. Here is a protection I could more reputably fly to, than to that of any other perſon: and from hers ſhould be ready to return to my father's, (for the breach then would not be irreparable, as it would be, if I fled to his family;) to return, I repeat, on ſuch terms as ſhall ſecure but my negative; not my independence; I do not aim at that, (ſo ſhall lay your mother under the leſs difficulty;) although I have a right to be put into poſſeſſion of my grandfather's eſtate, if I were to inſiſt upon it—Such a right, I mean, as my brother exerts in the eſtate left him; and which nobody diſputes.—God forbid, that I ſhould ever think myſelf freed from my father's reaſonable controul, whatever right my grandfather's will has given me! He, good gentleman, left me that eſtate, as a reward of my duty, and not to ſet me above it, as has been unjuſtly hinted to me: and this reflection makes me more fearful of not anſwering the intention of ſo valuable a bequeſt.—O that my friends knew but my heart!—Would but think of it as they uſed to do!—For once more, I ſay, if it deceive me not, it is not altered, although theirs are!

your

Would but your mother permit you to ſend her chariot, or chaiſe, to the bye-place where Mr. Lovelace propoſes Lord M.'s ſhall come, (provoked, intimidated, and apprehenſive, as I am) I would not heſitate a moment what to do. Place me any-where, as I have ſaid before—In a cot, in a garret; any-where—Diſguiſed as a ſervant—or let me paſs as a ſervant's ſiſter—So that I may but eſcape Mr. Solmes on one hand, and the diſgrace of refuging with the family of a man at enmity with my own, on the other; and I ſhall be in ſome meaſure happy!—Should your good mother refuſe me, what refuge, or whoſe, can I fly to?—Deareſt creature, adviſe your diſtreſſed friend.

I BROKE off here—I was ſo exceſſively uneaſy, that I durſt not truſt myſelf with my own reflections: I therefore went down to the garden, to try to calm my mind, by ſhifting the ſcene. I took but one turn upon the filberd-walk, when Betty came to me. 'Here, Miſs, 'is your papa—Here is your uncle Antony!—Here is my young maſter—and 'my young miſtreſs, coming to take a 'walk in the garden; and your papa 'ſends me to ſee where you are, for 'fear he ſhould meet you.'

I ſtruck into an oblique path, and got behind the yew-hedge, ſeeing my ſiſter appear; and there concealed myſelf till they were gone paſt me.

My mother, it ſeems, is not well. My poor mother keeps her chamber—Should ſhe be worſe, I ſhould have an additional unhappineſs, in apprehenſion that my reputed undutifulneſs has touched her heart.

You cannot imagine what my emotions were behind the yew-hedge, on ſeeing my father ſo near me. I was glad to look at him through the hedge as he paſſed by: but I trembled in every joint, when I heard him utter theſe words: 'Son James, to you—and to Bella—and 'to you, brother—do I wholly commit 'this matter.' That I was meant, I cannot doubt. And yet, why was I ſo affected; ſince I may be ſaid to have been given up to the cruelty of my brother and ſiſter for many days paſt?

WHILE my father remained in the garden, I ſent my dutiful compliments to my mother, with enquiry after her health, by Shorey, whom I met accidentally upon the ſtairs; for none of the ſervants, except my gaolereſs, dare to throw themſelves in my way. I had the mortification of ſuch a return, as made me repent my meſſage, though not my concern for her health. 'Let her not 'enquire after the diſorders ſhe occa-'ſions,' was the harſh anſwer. 'I will 'not receive any compliments from her.'

Very, very hard, my dear! Indeed it it very hard.

I HAVE the pleaſure to hear that my mother is already better. A colicky diſorder, to which ſhe is too ſubject. It is hoped it is gone off—God ſend it may!—Every evil that happens in this houſe is owing to me!

This good news was told me, with a circumſtance very unacceptable; for Betty ſaid, ſhe had orders to let me know, that my garden-walks and poultry-viſits were ſuſpected; and that both will be prohibited, if I ſtay here till Saturday or Monday.

Poſſibly this is ſaid by order, to make me go with leſs reluctance to my uncle's.

My mother bid her ſay, if I expoſtulated about theſe orders, and about my pen and ink, that reading was more to the purpoſe, at preſent, than writing: that by the one, I might be taught my duty; that the other, conſidering whom I was believed to write to, only ſtiffened my will: that my needle-works had better be purſued, than my airings; which were were obſerved to be taken in all weathers.

So, my dear, if I do not reſolve upon ſomething ſoon, I ſhall neither be able to avoid the intended evil, nor have it in my power to correſpond with you.

WEDNESDAY NIGHT.

ALL is in a hurry below-ſtairs. Betty is in and out like a ſpy. Something is working, I know not what. I am really a good deal diſordered in body as well as mind. Indeed I am quite heart-ſick.

I will go down, though it is almoſt dark, on pretence of getting a little air and compoſure. Robert has my two former, I hope, before now: and I will depoſit this, with Lovelace's incloſed, if I can, for fear of another ſearch.

I know not what I ſhall do!—All is ſo ſtrangely buſy!—Doors clapped to—Going out of one apartment, hurryingly, as I may ſay, into another. Betty in her alarming way, ſtaring, as if of frighted importance; twice with me in half an hour; called down in haſte by Shorey the laſt time; leaving me with ſtill more meaning in her looks and geſtures—Yet poſſibly nothing in all this worthy of my apprehenſions.

Here again comes the creature, with her deep-drawn affected ſighs, and her O dear's! O dear's!

MORE dark hints thrown out by this ſaucy creature. But ſhe will not explain herſelf. Suppoſe this pretty buſineſs ends in murder? ſhe ſays; I may rue my oppoſition, as long as I live, for aught ſhe knows. Parents will not be baffled out of their children by impudent gentlemen; nor is it fit they ſhould. It may come home to me when I leaſt expect it.

Theſe are the gloomy and perplexing hints this impertinent throws out. Probably they ariſe from the information Mr. Lovelace ſays he has ſecretly permitted them to have (from this vile double-faced agent, I ſuppoſe!) of his reſolution to prevent my being carried to my uncle's.

How juſtly, if ſo, may this exaſperate them!—How am I driven to and fro, like a feather in the wind, at the pleaſure of the raſh, the ſelfiſh, and the head-ſtrong! and when I am as averſe to the proceedings of the one, as I am to thoſe of the other! For although I was induced to carry on this unhappy correſpondence, as I think I ought to call it, in hopes to prevent miſchief; yet indiſcreet meaſures are fallen upon by the man, before I, who am ſo much concerned in the event of the preſent contentions, can be conſulted: and between his violence on one hand, and that of my relations on the other, I find myſelf in danger from both.

O my dear! what is worldly wiſdom but the height of folly?—I, the meaneſt, at leaſt the youngeſt, of my father's family, to thruſt myſelf in the gap between ſuch uncontroulable ſpirits!—To the intercepting perhaps of the deſigns of Providence, which may intend to make theſe hoſtile ſpirits their own puniſhers.—If ſo, what preſumption!—Indeed, my friend, I am afraid I have thought myſelf of too much conſequence. But, however this be, it is good, when calamities befal us, that we ſhould look into ourſelves, and fear.

If I am prevented depoſiting this and the incloſed, (as I intend to try to do, late as it is) I will add to it as occaſion ſhall offer. Mean time, believe me to be your ever-affectionate and grateful

CL. HARLOWE.

Under the ſuperſcription, written with a pencil, after ſhe went down.

My two former are not yet taken away.—I am ſurprized—I hope you are well—I hope all is right betwixt your mother and you.

LETTER XXXVI.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

THURSDAY MORNING, (APRIL 9.)

I Have your three letters. Never was there a creature more impatient on the moſt intereſting uncertainty than I was, to know the event of the interview between you and Solmes.

It behoves me to account to my dear friend, in her preſent unhappy ſituation, for every-thing that may have the leaſt appearance of negligence or remiſſneſs on my part. I ſent Robin in the morning early, in hopes of a depoſit. He loitered about the place till near ten to no purpoſe; and then came away; my mother having given him a letter to carry to Mr. Hunt's, which he was to deliver before three, when only, in the day-time, that gentleman is at home; and to bring her back an anſwer to it. Mr. Hunt's houſe, you know, lies wide from Harlowe Place. Robin but juſt ſaved his time; and returned not till it was too late to ſend him again. I could only direct him to ſet out before day this morning; and, if he got any letter, to ride as for his life to bring it to me.

I lay by myſelf: a moſt uneaſy night I had through impatience; and being diſcompoſed with it, lay longer than uſual. Juſt as I was riſen, in came Kitty, from Robin, with your three letters. I was not a quarter dreſſed; and only ſlipped on my morning-facque; proceeding no further till I had read them all through, long as they are: and yet I often ſtopped to rave aloud (though by myſelf, at the deviliſh people you have to deal with.

How my heart riſes at them all! How poorly did they deſign to trick you into an encouragement of Solmes, from the extorted interview!—I am very, very angry at your aunt Hervey—To give up her own judgment ſo tamely!—And, not content to do ſo, to become ſuch an active inſtrument in their hands!—But it is ſo like the world!—So like my mother too!—Next to her own child, there is not any-body living ſhe values ſo much as ſhe does you—Yet it is—'Why ſhould 'we embroil ourſelves, Nancy, with the 'affairs of other people?'

'Other people!'—How I hate the poor words, where friendſhip is concerned, and where the protection to be given may be of ſo much conſequence to a friend, and of ſo little detriment to one's ſelf!

I am delighted with your ſpirit, however. I expected it not from you. Nor did they, I am ſure. Nor would you, perhaps, have exerted it, if Lovelace's intelligence of Solmes's nurſery-offices had not ſet you up. I wonder not that the wretch is ſaid to love you the better for it. What an honour would it be to him to have ſuch a wife? And he can be even with you when you are ſo. He muſt indeed be a ſavage, as you ſay.—Yet he is leſs to blame for his perſeverance, than thoſe of your own family, whom moſt you reverence, for theirs.

It is well, as I have often ſaid, that I have not ſuch provocations and trials; I ſhould perhaps long ago have taken your couſin Dolly's advice—Yet dare I not to touch that key.—I ſhall always love the good girl for her tenderneſs to you.

I know not what to ſay to Lovelace; nor what to think of his promiſes, nor of his propoſals to you. It is certain that you are highly eſteemed by all his family. The ladies are perſons of unblemiſhed honour. My Lord M. is alſo (as men and peers go) a man of honour. I could tell what to adviſe any other perſon in the world to do but you. So much expected from you!—Such a ſhining light!—Your quitting your father's houſe, and throwing yourſelf into the protection of a family, however honourable, that has a man in it, whoſe perſon, parts, declarations, and pretenſions, will be thought to have engaged your warmeſt eſteem—Methinks I am rather for adviſing that you ſhould get privately to London; and not to let either him, or any-body elſe but me, know where you are, till your couſin Morden comes.

As to going to your uncle's, that you muſt not do, if you can help it. Nor muſt you have Solmes, that's certain: not only becauſe of his unworthineſs in every reſpect, but becauſe of the averſion you have ſo openly avowed to him; which every body knows and talks of; as they do of your approbation of the other. For your reputation-ſake therefore, as well as to prevent miſchief, you muſt either live ſingle, or have Lovelace.

If you think of going to London, let me know; and I hope you will have time to allow me a further concert as to the manner of your getting away, and thither, and how to procure proper lodgings for you.

To obtain this time, you muſt palliate a little, and come into ſome ſeeming compromiſe, if you cannot do otherwiſe. Driven as you are driven, it will be ſtrange if you are not obliged to part with a few of your admirable punctilios.

You will obſerve from what I have written, that I have not ſucceeded with my mother.

I am extremely mortified and diſappointed. We have had very ſtrong debates upon it. But, beſides the narrow argument of embroiling ourſelves with other people's affairs, as above-mentioned, ſhe will have it, that it is your duty to comply. She ſays, ſhe was always of opinion that daughters ſhould implicitly ſubmit to the will of their parents in the great article of marriage: and that ſhe governed herſelf accordingly in marrying my father; who at firſt was more the choice of her parents than her own.

This is what ſhe argues in behalf of her favourite Hickman, as well as for Solmes in your caſe.

I muſt not doubt, but my mother always governed herſelf by this principle—becauſe ſhe ſays ſhe did. I have likewiſe another reaſon to believe it; which you ſhall have, though it may not become me to give it—That they did not live ſo very happily together, as one would hope people might do who married preferring each other at the time, to the reſt of the world.

Some-

Somebody ſhall fare never the better for this double-meant policy of my mother, I do aſſure you. Such a retroſpection in her arguments to him, and to his addreſs, it is but fit that he ſhould ſuffer for my mortification in failing to carry a point upon which I had ſet my whole heart.

Think, my dear, if in any way I can ſerve you. If you allow of it, I proteſt I will go off privately with you, and we will live and die together. Think of it. Improve upon my hint, and command me.

A little interruption.—What is breakfaſt to the ſubject I am upon?

LONDON, I am told, is the beſt hiding-place in the world. I have written nothing but what I will ſtand to at the word of command. Women love to engage in knight-errantry, now-and-then, as well as to encourage it in the men. But in your caſe, what I propoſe, will not ſeem to have any thing of that nature in it. It will enable me to perform what is no more than a duty in ſerving and comforting a dear and worthy friend, who labours under undeſerved oppreſſion: and you will ennoble, as I may ſay, your Anna Howe, if you allow her to be your companion in affliction.

I will engage, my dear, we ſhall not be in town together one month, before we ſurmount all difficulties; and this without being beholden to any men-fellows for their protection.

I muſt repeat what I have often ſaid, That the authors of your perſecutions would not have preſumed to ſet on foot their ſelfiſh ſchemes againſt you, had they not depended upon the gentleneſs of your ſpirit: though now, having gone ſo far, and having engaged Old AUTHORITY in it, [Chide me if you will!] neither he nor they know how to recede.

When they find you out of their reach, and know that I am with you, you'll ſee how they'll pull in their odious horns.

I think, however, that you ſhould have written to your couſin Morden the moment they had begun to treat you diſgracefully.

I ſhall be impatient to hear whether they will attempt to carry you to your uncle's. I remember, that Lord M.'s diſmiſſed bailiff reported of Lovelace, that he had ſix or ſeven companions as bad as himſelf; and that the country was always glad when they left it. He actually has, as I hear, ſuch a knot of them about him now. And, depend upon it, he will not ſuffer them to carry you to your uncle's: and whoſe muſt you be, if he ſucceeds in taking you from them?

I tremble for you but upon ſuppoſing what may be the conſequences of a conflict upon this occaſion. Lovelace owes ſome of them vengeance. This gives me a double concern, that my mother ſhould refuſe her conſent to the protection I had ſet my heart upon procuring for you.

My mother will not breakfaſt without me. A quarrel has it's conveniences ſometimes. Yet too much love, I think, is as bad as too little.

WE have juſt now had another pull. Upon my word, ſhe is exceſſively—What ſhall I ſay?—unperſuadable—I muſt let her off with that ſoft word.

Who was the old Greek, that ſaid, He governed Athens; his wife, him; and his ſon, her?

It was not my mother's fault [I am writing to you, you know] that ſhe did not govern my father. But I am but a daughter!—Yet I thought I was not quite ſo powerleſs when I was ſet upon carrying a point, as I find myſelf to be.

Adieu, my dear!—Happier times muſt come—And that quickly too.—The ſtrings cannot long continue thus overſtrained. They muſt break or be relaxed. In either way, the certainty muſt be preferable to the ſuſpence.

One word more!

I think in my conſcience you muſt take one of theſe two alternatives; either to conſent to let us go to London together privately; [In which caſe, I will procure a vehicle, and meet you at your appointment at the ſtile to which Lovelace propoſes to bring his uncle's chariot] or, to put yourſelf into the protection of Lord M. and the ladies of his family.

You have another, indeed; and that is, if you are abſolutely reſolved againſt Solmes, to meet and marry Lovelace directly.

Which ſoever of theſe you make choice of, you will have this plea, both to yourſelf, and to the world, that you are concluded by the ſame uniform principle that has governed your whole conduct, ever ſince the contention between Lovelace and your brother has been on foot: that is to ſay, that you have choſen a leſſer evil, in hope to prevent a greater.

Adieu! and Heaven direct for the beſt my beloved creature, prays her

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XXXVII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

THURSDAY, APRIL 6.

I Thank you, my deareſt friend, for the pains you have taken in accounting ſo affectionately for my papers not being taken away yeſterday; and for the kind protection you would have procured for me, if you could.

This kind protection was what I wiſhed for: but my wiſhes, raiſed at firſt by your love, were rather governed by my deſpair of other refuge [having before caſt about, and not being able to determine, what I ought to do, and what I could do, in a ſituation ſo unhappy] than by a reaſonable hope. For why indeed ſhould any-body embroil themſelves for others, when they can avoid it?

All my conſolation is, as I have frequently ſaid, that I have not, by my own inadvertence or folly, brought myſelf into this ſad ſituation. If I had, I ſhould not have dared to look up to any-body with the expectation of protection or aſſiſtance, nor to you for excuſe of the trouble I give you. But nevertheleſs we ſhould not be angry at a perſon's not doing that for ourſelves, or for our friend, which ſhe thinks ſhe ought not to do; and which ſhe has it in her option either to do, or to let it alone. Much leſs have you a right to be diſpleaſed with ſo prudent a mother, for not engaging herſelf ſo warmly in my favour, as you wiſhed ſhe would. If my own aunt can give me up, and that againſt her judgment, as I may preſume to ſay; and if my father and mother, and uncles, who once loved me ſo well, can join ſo ſtrenuouſly againſt me; can I expect, or ought you, the protection of your mother, in oppoſition to them?

Indeed, my dear love, [Permit me to be very ſerious] I am afraid I am ſingled out (either for my own faults, or for the faults of my family, or perhaps for the faults of both) to be a very unhappy creature!—ſignally unhappy! For ſee you not how irreſiſtibly the waves of affliction come tumbling down upon me?

We have been till within theſe few weeks, every one of us, too happy. No croſſes, no vexations, but what we gave ourſelves from the pamperedneſs, as I may call it, of our own wills. Surrounded by our heaps and ſtores, hoarded up as faſt as acquired, we have ſeemed to think ourſelves out of the reach of the bolts of adverſe fate. I was the pride of all my friends, proud myſelf of their pride, and glorying in my ſtanding. Who knows what the juſtice of Heaven may inflict, in order to convince us, that we are not out of the reach of misfortune; and to reduce us to a better reliance, than what we have hitherto preſumptuouſly made?

I ſhould have been very little the better for the converſation-viſits which the good Dr. Lewen uſed to honour me with, and for the principles wrought (as I may ſay) into my earlieſt mind by my pious Mrs. Norton, founded on her reverend father's experience, as well as on her own, if I could not thus retroſpect and argue, in ſuch a ſtrange ſituation as we are in. Strange, I may well call it; for don't you ſee, my dear, that we ſeem all to be impelled, as it were, by a perverſe fate, which none of us are able to reſiſt?—And yet all ariſing (with a ſtrong appearance of ſelf-puniſhment) from ourſelves? Do not my parents ſee the hopeful children, from whom they expected a perpetuity of worldly happineſs to their branching family, now grown up to anſwer the till now diſtant hope, ſetting their angry faces againſt each other, pulling up by the roots, as I may ſay, that hope which was ready to be carried into a probable certainty?

Your partial love will be ready to acquit me of capital and intentional faults:—but oh, my dear! my calamities have humbled me enough to make me turn my gaudy eye inward; to make me look into myſelf.—And what have I diſcovered there?—Why, my dear friend, more ſecret pride and vanity than I could have thought had lain in my unexamined heart.

If I am to be ſingled out to be the puniſher of myſelf and family, who ſo lately was the pride of it, pray for me, my dear, that I may not be left wholly to myſelf; and that I may be enabled to ſupport my character, ſo as to be juſtly acquitted of wilful and premeditated faults. The will of Providence be reſigned to in the reſt: as that leads, let me patiently and unrepiningly, follow!—I ſhall not live always!—May but my cloſing ſcene be happy!

But I will not oppreſs you, my deareſt friend, with further reflections of this ſort. I will take them all into myſelf. Surely I have a mind that has room for them. My afflictions are too ſharp to laſt long. The criſis is at hand. Happier times you bid me hope for. I will hope.

BUT yet, I cannot but be impatient

at times, to find myself thus driven, and my character so depreciated and sunk, that were all the future to be happy, I should be ashamed to shew my face in public, or to look up. And all by the instigation of a selfish brother, and envious sister.

But let me stop: let me reflect!—Are not these suggestions the suggestions of the secret pride I have been censuring? Then, already so impatient! But this moment so resigned, so much better disposed for reflection! Yet it is hard, it is very hard, to subdue an embittered spirit!—In the instant of it's trial too!—O my cruel brother!—But now it rises again.—I will lay down a pen I am so little able to govern.—And I will try to subdue an impatience, which (if my afflictions are sent me for corrective ends) may otherwise lead me into still more punishable errors.

I WILL return to a subject, which I cannot fly from for ten minutes together—called upon especially as I am, by your three alternatives stated in the conclusion of your last.

As to the first; to wit, Your advice for me to escape to London—Let me tell you, that the other hint or proposal which accompanies it, perfectly frightens me—Surely, my dear, (happy as you are, and indulgently treated as your mother treats you) you cannot mean what you propose! What a wretch must I be, if, for one moment only, I could lend an ear to such a proposal as this!—I, to be the occasion of making such a mother's (perhaps shortened) life unhappy to the last hour of it!—Ennoble you, my dear creature! How must such an enterprize (the rashness public, the motives, were they excusable, private) debase you!—But I will not dwell upon the subject—For your own sake I will not.

As to your second alternative, To put myself into the protection of Lord M. and of the ladies of that family, I own to you, (as I believe I have owned before) that although to do this would be the same thing in the eye of the world as putting myself into Mr. Lovelace's protection, yet I think I would do it rather than be Mr. Solmes's wife, if there were evidently no other way to avoid being so.

Mr. Lovelace, you have seen, proposes to contrive a way to put me into possession of my own house; and he tells me, that he will soon fill it with the ladies of his family, as my visitors;—upon my invitation, however, to them. A very inconsiderate proposal I think it to be, and upon which I cannot explain myself to him. What an exertion of independence does it chalk out for me! How, were I to attend to him, (and not to the natural consequences to which the following of his advice would lead me) might I be drawn by gentle words into the perpetration of the most violent acts!—For how could I gain possession, but either by legal litigation, which, were I inclined to have recourse to it, (as I never can be) must take up time; or by forcibly turning out the persons whom my father has placed there, to look after the gardens, the house, and the furniture—persons entirely attached to himself, and who, as I know, have been lately instructed by my brother?

Your third alternative, To meet and marry Mr. Lovelace directly; a man with whose morals I am far from being satisfied—A step, that could not be taken with the least hope of obtaining pardon from or reconciliation with any of my friends; and against which a thousand objections rise in my mind—That is not to be thought of.

What appears to me, upon the fullest deliberation, the most eligible, if I must be thus driven, is the escaping to London. But I would forfeit all my hopes of happiness in this life, rather than you should go away with me, as you rashly, though with the kindest intention, propose. If I could get safely thither, and be private, methinks I might remain absolutely independent of Mr. Lovelace, and at liberty either to make proposals to my friends, or, should they renounce me, (and I had no other or better way) to make terms with him; supposing my cousin Morden, on his arrival, were to join with my other relations. But they would then perhaps indulge me in my choice of a single life, on giving him up; the renewing to them this offer, when at my own liberty, will at least convince them, that I was in earnest when I made it first. And, upon my word, I would stand to it, dear as you seem to think, when you are disposed to rally me, it would cost me, to stand it.

If, my dear, you can procure a vehicle for us both, you can perhaps procure one for me singly: but can it be done without embroiling yourself with your mother, or her with our family?—Be it coach, chariot, chaise, waggon, or horse, I matter not, provided you appear not to have a hand in my withdrawing. Only, in case it be one of the two latter, I believe I must desire you to get me an ordinary gown and coat, or habit, of ſome ſervant; having no concert with any of our own: the more ordinary the better. They muſt be thruſt into the Wood Houſe; where I can put them on: and then ſlide down from the bank, that ſeparates the Wood Yard from the Green Lane.

But, alas! my dear, this, even this alternative, is not without difficulties, which, to a ſpirit ſo little enterprizing as mine, ſeem in a manner inſuperable. Theſe are my reflections upon it.

I am afraid, in the firſt place, that I ſhall not have time for the requiſite preparations for an eſcape.

Should I be either detected in thoſe preparations, or purſued and overtaken in my flight, and ſo brought back, then would they think themſelves doubly warranted to compel me to have their Solmes: and, conſcious of an intended fault, perhaps, I ſhould be the leſs able to contend with them.

But were I even to get ſafely to London, I know nobody there but by name; and thoſe the tradeſmen to our family; who no doubt would be the firſt written to and engaged to find me out. And ſhould Mr. Lovelace diſcover where I was, and he and my brother meet, what miſchiefs might enſue between them, whether I were willing or not to return to Harlowe Place!

But ſuppoſing I could remain there concealed, to what might not my youth, my ſex, and unacquaintedneſs of the ways of that great, wicked town, expoſe me!—I ſhould hardly dare to go to church for fear of being diſcovered. People would wonder how I lived. Who knows but I might paſs for a kept-miſtreſs; and that, although nobody came to me, yet, that every-time I went out, it might be imagined to be in purſuance of ſome aſſignation?

You, my dear, who alone would know where to direct to me, would be watched in all your ſteps, and in all your meſſages; and your mother, at preſent not highly pleaſed with our correſpondence, would then have reaſon to be more diſpleaſed; and might not differences follow between her and you, that would make me very unhappy, were I to know them? And this the more likely, as you take it ſo unaccountably (and, give me leave to ſay, ſo ungenerouſly) into your head, to revenge yourſelf upon the innocent Mr. Hickman, for all the diſpleaſure your mother gives you?

Were Lovelace to find out my place of abode, that would be the ſame thing in the eye of the world as if I had actually gone off with him: for would he, do you think, be prevailed upon to forbear viſiting me? And then his unhappy character (a fooliſh man!) would be no credit to any young creature deſirous of concealment. Indeed the world, let me eſcape whither, and to whomſoever I could, would conclude him to be the contriver of it.

Theſe are the difficulties which ariſe to me on revolving this ſcheme; which, nevertheleſs, might appear ſurmountable to a more enterprizing ſpirit in my circumſtances. If you, my dear, think them ſurmountable in any one of the caſes put, [and to be ſure I can take no courſe, but what muſt have ſome difficulty in it] be pleaſed to let me know your free and full thoughts upon it.

Had you, my dear friend, been married, then ſhould I have had no doubt but that you and Mr. Hickman would have afforded an aſylum to a poor creature more than half loſt in her own apprehenſion for want of one kind protecting friend!

You ſay I ſhould have written to my couſin Morden the moment I was treated diſgracefully: but could I have believed that my friends would not have ſoftened by degrees when they ſaw my antipathy to their Solmes?

I had thoughts indeed ſeveral times of writing to my couſin: but by the time an anſwer could have come, I imagined all would have been over, as if it had never been; ſo from day to day, from week to week, I hoped on; and, after all, I might as reaſonably fear (as I have heretofore ſaid) that my couſin would be brought to ſide againſt me, as that ſome of thoſe I have named would.

And then to appeal to a couſin [I muſt have written with warmth, to engage him] againſt a father; this was not a deſirable thing to ſet about. Then I had not, you know, one ſoul on my ſide; my mother herſelf againſt me. To be ſure my couſin would have ſuſpended his judgment till he could have arrived. He might not have been in haſte to come, hoping the malady would cure itſelf: but had he written, his letters probably would have run in the qualifying ſtile; to perſuade me to ſubmit, or them only to relax. Had his letters been more on my ſide than on *their*s, they would not have regarded them; nor perhaps himſelf, had he come and been an advocate for me; for you ſee how ſtrangely determined they are; how they have over-awed or got in every-body;

ſo that no one dare to open their lips in my behalf. And you have heard that my brother puſhes his meaſures with the more violence, that all may be over with me before my couſin's expected arrival.

But you tell me, that, in order to gain time, I muſt palliate; that I muſt ſeem to compromiſe with my friends: but how palliate? how ſeem to compromiſe? You would not have me endeavour to make them believe, that I will conſent to what I never intend to conſent to! You would not have me gain time with a view to deceive!

To do evil, that good may come of it, is forbidden: and ſhall I do evil, yet know not whether good may come of it or not?

Forbid it, Heaven! that Clariſſa Harlowe ſhould have it in her thought to ſerve, or even to ſave herſelf at the expence of her ſincerity, and by a ſtudied deceit!

And is there, after all, no way to eſcape one great evil, but by plunging myſelf into another?—What an ill-fated creature am I?—Pray for me, my deareſt Nancy!—My mind is at preſent ſo much diſturbed, that I can hardly pray for myſelf.

LETTER XXXVIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE alarming hurry I mentioned under my date of laſt night, and Betty's ſaucy dark hints, come out to be owing to what I gueſſed they were; that is to ſay, to the private intimation Mr. Lovelace contrived our family ſhould have of his inſolent reſolution [inſolent I muſt call it] to prevent my being carried to my uncle's.

I ſaw at that time that it was as wrong with reſpect to anſwering his own view, as it was inſolent: for could he think, as Betty (I ſuppoſe from her betters) juſtly obſerved, that parents would be inſulted out of their right to diſpoſe of their own child, by a violent man, whom they hate; and who could have no pretenſion to diſpute that right with them, unleſs what he had from her who had none over herſelf? And how muſt this inſolence of his, aggravavated as my brother is able to aggravate it, exaſperate them againſt me?

The raſh man has indeed ſo far gained his point, as to intimidate them from attempting to carry me away: but he has put them upon a ſurer and a more deſperate meaſure; and this has driven me alſo into one as deſperate; the conſequence of which, although he could not foreſee it, may perhaps too well anſwer his great end, little as he deſerves to have it anſwered.

In ſhort, I have done, as far as I know, the moſt raſh thing that ever I did in my life.

But let me give you the motive, and then the action will follow of courſe.

About ſix o'clock this evening, my aunt (who ſtays here all night; on my account, no doubt) came up, and tapped at my door; for I was writing; and had locked myſelf in. I opened it; and ſhe entering, thus delivered herſelf—

'I come once more to viſit you, my 'dear; but ſorely againſt my will; be-'cauſe it is to impart to you matters of 'the utmoſt concern to you, and to the 'whole family.'

'What, Madam, is now to be done 'with me?' ſaid I, wholly attentive.

'You will not be hurried away to 'your uncle's, child; let that comfort 'you.—They ſee your averſion to go. '—You will not be obliged to go to 'your uncle Antony's.'

'How you revive me, Madam! 'This is a cordial to my heart!'

I little thought, my dear, what was to follow this ſuppoſed condeſcenſion.

And then I ran over with bleſſings for this good news; (and ſhe permitted me ſo to do, by her ſilence) congratulating myſelf, that I thought my father could not reſolve to carry things to the laſt extremity.

'Hold, niece,' ſaid ſhe, at laſt—You 'muſt not give yourſelf too much joy 'upon the occaſion, neither.—Don't be 'ſurprized, my dear.—Why look you 'upon me, child, with ſo affecting an 'earneſtneſs?—But you muſt be Mrs. 'Solmes, for all that.'

I was dumb.

She then told me, that they had had undoubted information, that a certain deſperate ruffian (I muſt excuſe her that word, ſhe ſaid) had prepared armed men to way-lay my brother and uncles, and ſeize me, and carry me off.—Surely, ſhe ſaid, I was not conſenting to a violence that might be followed by murder on one ſide or the other; perhaps on both.

I was ſtill ſilent.

That therefore my father (ſtill more exaſperated than before) had changed his reſolution as to my going to my uncle's; and was determined next Tueſday to ſet out thither himſelf with my mother;

mother; and that (for it was to no purpoſe to conceal a reſolution ſo ſoon to be put in execution)—I muſt not diſpute it any longer—on Wedneſday I muſt give my hand—as they would have me.

She proceeded, That orders were already given for a licence: that the ceremony was to be performed in my own chamber, in preſence of all my friends, except of my father and mother; who would not return, nor ſee me, till all was over, and till they had a good account of my behaviour.

The very intelligence, my dear!—the very intelligence this, which Lovelace gave me!

I was ſtill dumb—Only ſighing, as if my heart would break.

She went on, comforting me, as ſhe thought. She laid before me the merit of obedience; and told me, that if it were my deſire that my Norton ſhould be preſent at the ceremony, it would be complied with: that the pleaſure I ſhould receive from reconciling all my friends to me, and in their congratulations upon it, muſt needs overbalance with ſuch a one as me, the difference of perſons, however preferable I might think the one man to the other; that love was a fleeting thing, little better than a name, where morality and virtue did not diſtinguiſh the object of it: that a choice made by it's dictates was ſeldom happy; at leaſt not durably ſo; nor was it to be wondered at, when it naturally exalted the objects above it's merits, and made the lover blind to faults, that were viſible to every-body elſe; ſo that when a nearer intimacy ſtript it of its imaginary perfections, it left frequently both parties ſurprized, that they could be ſo groſsly cheated; and that then the indifference became ſtronger than the love ever was. That a woman gave a man great advantages, and inſpired him with great vanity, when ſhe avowed her love for him, and preference of him; and was generally requited with inſolence and contempt: whereas the confeſſedly-obliged man, it was probable, would be all reverence and gratitude—and I cannot tell what.

'You, my dear,' ſaid ſhe, 'believe 'you ſhall be unhappy, if you have 'Mr. Solmes: your parents think the 'contrary; and that you will be un-'doubtedly ſo, were you to have Mr. 'Lovelace, whoſe morals are unqueſ-'tionably bad: ſuppoſe it were your 'ſad lot to be unhappy with either, let 'me beſeech you to conſider, what 'great conſolation you will have on one 'hand, if you purſue your parents ad-'vice, that you did ſo; what mortifica-'tion on the other, that, by following 'your own, you have nobody to blame 'but yourſelf.'

This, you remember, my dear, was an argument enforced upon me by Mrs. Norton.

Theſe and other obſervations which ſhe made, were worthy of my aunt Hervey's good ſenſe and experience, and, applied to almoſt any young creature who ſtood in oppoſition to her parents will, but one who had offered to make the ſacrifices I have offered to make, ought to have had their due weight. But although it was eaſy to anſwer ſome of them in my own particular caſe; yet, having over and over, to my mother, before my confinement, and to my brother and ſiſter, and even to my aunt Hervey, ſince, ſaid what I muſt now have repeated, I was ſo much mortified and afflicted at the cruel tidings ſhe brought me, that however attentive I was to what ſhe ſaid, I had neither power nor will to anſwer one word; and, had ſhe not ſtopped of herſelf, ſhe might have gone on an hour longer, without interruption from me.

Obſerving this, and that I only ſat weeping, my handkerchief covering my face, and my boſom heaving ready to burſt; 'What! no anſwer, my dear? '—Why ſo much ſilent grief? You know 'I always loved you. You know, that 'I have no intereſt in the affair. You 'would not permit Mr. Solmes to ac-'quaint you with ſome things which 'would have ſet your heart againſt Mr. 'Lovelace. Shall I tell you ſome of the 'matters charged againſt him?—Shall 'I, my dear?'

Still I anſwered only by my tears and ſighs.

'Well, child, you ſhall be told theſe 'things afterwards, when you will be 'in a better ſtate of mind to hear them; 'and then you will rejoice in the eſcape 'you will have had. It will be ſome 'excuſe, then, for you to plead for your 'behaviour to Mr. Solmes, that you 'could not have believed Mr. Lovelace 'had been ſo very vile a man.'

My heart fluttered with impatience and anger at being ſo plainly talked to as the wife of this man; but yet I then choſe to be ſilent. If I had ſpoken, it would have been with vehemence.

'Strange, my dear, ſuch ſilence!—'Your concern is infinitely more on this 'ſide the day, than it will be on the 'other.—But let me aſk you, and do 'not

'not be displeased. Will you chuse to 'see what generous stipulations for you 'there are in the settlements?—You 'have knowledge beyond your years—'Give the writings a perusal: do, my 'dear; they are engrossed, and ready 'for signing, and have been for some 'time.—Excuse me, my love—I mean 'not to disorder you:—your father 'would oblige me to bring them up, and 'to leave them with you. He commands 'you to read them. But to read them, 'niece—since they are engrossed, and 'were before you made them absolutely 'hopeless.'

And then, to my great terror, out she drew some parchments from her handkerchief, which she had kept (unobserved by me) under her apron; and, rising, put them in the opposite window. Had she produced a serpent, I could not have been more frighted.

'Oh! my dearest aunt,' turning away my face, and holding out my hands: 'hide from my eyes those horrid parch-'ments!—Let me conjure you to tell me '—By all the tenderness of near relation-'ship, and upon your honour, and 'by your love for me, say, Are they 'absolutely resolved, that come what 'will, I must be that man's?'

'My dear, you must have Mr. Solmes: 'indeed you must.'

'Indeed, I never will! This, as I 'have said, over and over, is not ori-'ginally my father's will.—Indeed I 'never will—And that is all I will say!'

'It is your father's will now,' replied my aunt: 'and, considering how all 'the family is threatened by Mr. Love-'lace, and the resolution he has cer-'tainly taken to force you out of their 'hands, I cannot but say they are in the 'right, not to be bullied out of their 'child.'

'Well, Madam, then nothing remains 'for me to say. I am made desperate. 'I care not what becomes of me.'

'Your piety, and your prudence, my 'dear, and Mr. Lovelace's immoral 'character, together with his daring in-'sults, and threatenings, which ought 'to incense you, as much as any-body, 'are every one's dependence. We are 'sure the time will come, when you'll 'think very differently of the steps your 'friends take to disappoint a man who 'has made himself so justly obnoxious 'to them all.'

She withdrew; leaving me full of grief and indignation:—and as much out of humour with Mr. Lovelace as with any-body; who, by his conceited contrivances, has made things worse for me than before; depriving me of the hopes I had of gaining time to receive your advice, and private assistance to get to town; and leaving me no other advice in all appearance, than either to throw myself upon his family, or be made miserable for ever with Mr. Solmes. But I was still resolved to avoid both these evils, if possible.

I found Betty in the first place, (whom my aunt sent up, not thinking it proper, as Betty told me, that I should be left by myself, and who, I found, knew their designs) whether it were not probable that they would forbear, at my earnest entreaty, to push matters to the threatened extremity.

But she confirmed all my aunt said; rejoicing (as she said they all did) that Mr. Lovelace had given them so good a pretence to save me from him now, and for ever.

She ran on about equipages bespoken; talked of my brother's and sister's exultations that now the whole family would soon be reconciled to each other; of the servants joy upon it; of the expected licence; of a visit to be paid me by Dr. Lewen, or another clergyman, whom they named not to her; which was to crown the work; and of other preparations, so particular as made me dread that they designed to surprize me into a still nearer day than next Wednesday.

These things made me excessively uneasy. I knew not what to resolve upon.

At one time, 'What have I to do,' thought I, 'but to throw myself at 'once into the protection of Lady Betty 'Lawrance?'—But then, in resentment of his fine contrivances, which had so abominably disconcerted me, I soon resolved to the contrary; and at last concluded to ask the favour of another half-hour's conversation with my aunt.

I sent Betty to her with my request.

She came.

I put it to her in the most earnest manner, to tell me, whether I might not obtain the favour of a fortnight's respite?

She assured me, it would not be granted.

Would a week? Surely a week would?

She believed a week might, if I would promise two things: the first, upon my honour, not to write a line out of the house, in that week; for it was still suspected, she said, that I found means to write to somebody. And, secondly, to marry Mr. Solmes at the expiration of it.

'Impoſſible! Impoſſible!' I ſaid, with paſſion.—What! might not I be obliged with one week, without ſuch a horrid condition as the laſt?

She would go down, ſhe ſaid, that ſhe might not ſeem of her own head to put upon me what I thought a hardſhip ſo great.

She went down: and came up again.

Did I want, was the anſwer, to give the vileſt of men an opportunity to put his murderous ſchemes into execution?—It was time for them to put an end to my obſtinacy (they were tired out with me) and to his hopes at once. And an end ſhould be put on Tueſday or Wedneſday next, at fartheſt; unleſs I would give my honour to comply with the condition upon which my aunt had been ſo good as to allow me a longer time.

I even ſtamped with impatience!—I called upon her to witneſs, that I was guiltleſs of the conſequence of this compulſion; this barbarous compulſion, I called it; let that conſequence be what it would.

My aunt chid me in a higher ſtrain than ever ſhe did before.

While I, in a half phrenzy, inſiſted upon ſeeing my father: ſuch uſage, I ſaid, ſet me above fear. I would rejoice to owe my death to him, as I did my life.

I did go down half-way of the ſtairs, reſolved to throw myſelf at his feet wherever he was.—My aunt was frighted. She owned, that ſhe feared for my head.—Indeed I was in a perfect phrenzy for a few minutes—But hearing my brother's voice, as talking to ſomebody in my ſiſter's apartment juſt by, I ſtopt; and heard the barbarous deſigner ſay, ſpeaking to my ſiſter, 'This works 'charmingly, my dear Arabella!'

'It does! It does!' ſaid ſhe, in an exulting accent.

'Let us keep it up,' ſaid my brother.—'The villain is caught in his own trap! '—Now muſt ſhe be what we would have 'her be.'

'Do you keep my father to it; I'll 'take care of my mother,' ſaid Bella.

'Never fear!' ſaid he.—And a laugh of congratulation to each other, and deriſion of me, (as I made it out) quite turned my frantick humour into a vindictive one.

My aunt then juſt coming down to me, and taking my hand, led me up; and tried to ſoothe me.

My raving was turned into ſullenneſs.

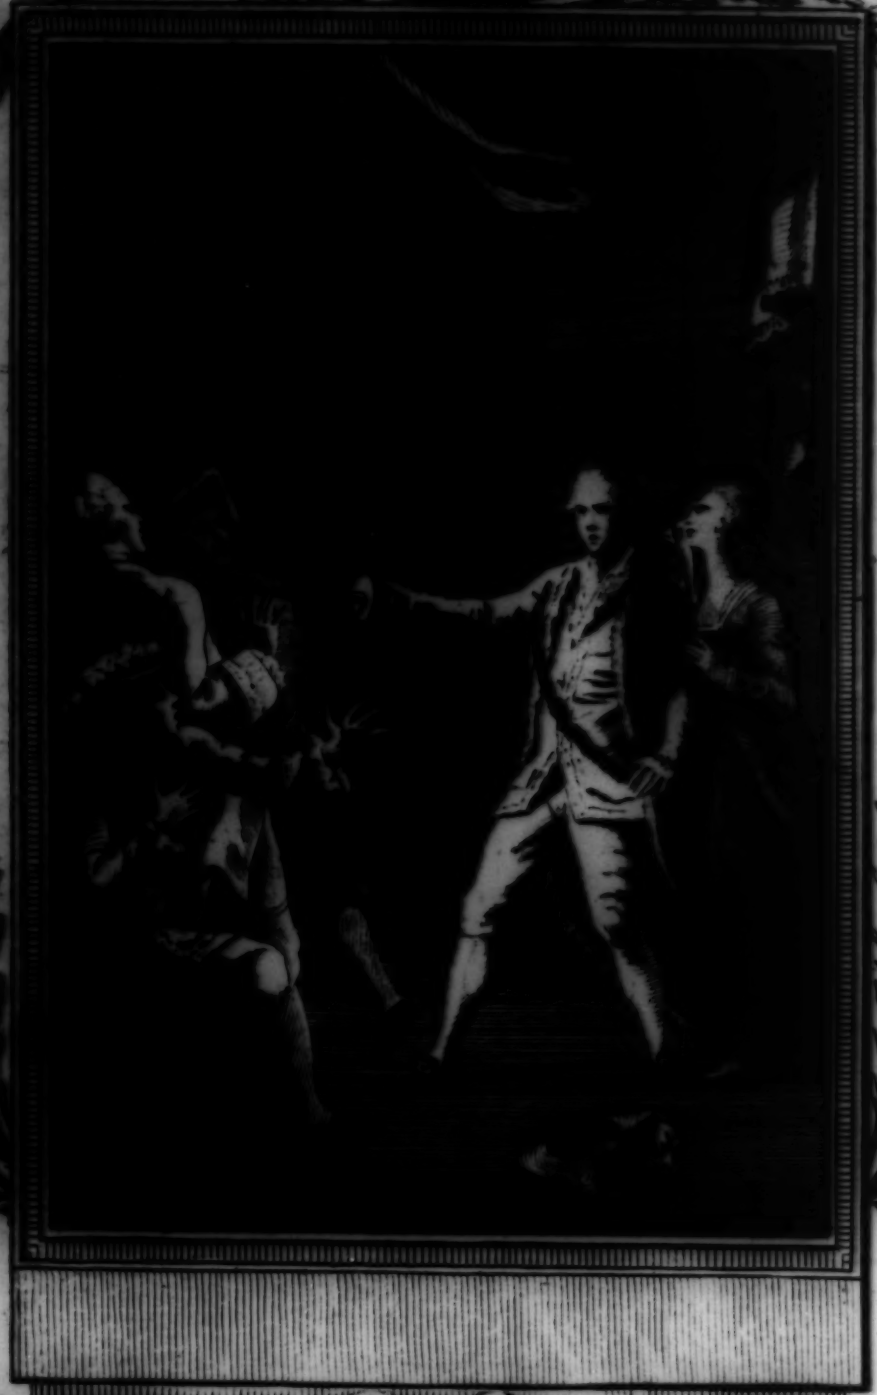
She preached patience and obedience to me.

I was ſilent.

At laſt ſhe deſired me to aſſure her, that I would offer no violence to myſelf.

God, I ſaid, had given me more grace, I hoped, than to permit me to be guilty of ſo horrid a raſhneſs. I was his creature, and not my own.

She then took leave of me; and I inſiſted upon her taken down with her the odious parchments.



Seeing me in ſo ill an humour, and very earneſt that ſhe ſhould take them with her, ſhe took them; but ſaid, that my father ſhould not know that ſhe did; and hoped I would better conſider of the matter, and be calmer next time they were offered to my peruſal.

I revolved after ſhe was gone all that my brother and ſiſter had ſaid. I dwelt upon their triumphings over me; and found riſe in my mind a rancour that was new to me; and which I could not withſtand.—And putting every-thing together, dreading the near day, what could I do?—Am I in any manner excuſable for what I did do?—If I ſhall be condemned by the world, who know not my provocations, may I be acquitted by you?—If not, I am unhappy indeed!—For this I did.

Having ſhaken off the impertinent Betty, I wrote to Mr. Lovelace, to let him know, That all that was threatened at my uncle Antony's was intended to be executed here. That I had come to a reſolution to throw myſelf upon the protection of either of his two aunts, who would afford it me—In ſhort, that by endeavouring to obtain leave on Monday to dine in the Ivy Summer Houſe, I would, if poſſible, meet him without the garden-door, at two, three, four, or five o'clock on Monday afternoon, as I ſhould be able. That in the mean time he ſhould acquaint me, whether I might hope for either of thoſe ladies protection: and if I might, I abſolutely inſiſted that he ſhould leave me with either, and go to London himſelf, or remain at Lord M.'s; nor offer to viſit me, till I were ſatisfied that nothing could be done with my friends in an amicable way; and that I could not obtain poſſeſſion of my own eſtate, and leave to live upon it; and particularly, that he ſhould not hint marriage to me, till I conſented to hear him upon that ſubject.—I added, that if he could prevail upon one of the Miſſes Montague to favour me with her company on the road, it would make me abundantly more eaſy in the thoughts of carrying into effect a reſolution which I had not come to, although ſo driven, but with the utmoſt reluctance and concern; cern; and which would throw such a slur upon my reputation in the eye of the world, as perhaps I should never be able to wipe off.

This was the purport of what I wrote; and down into the garden I slid with it in the dark, which at another time I should not have had the courage to do; and deposited it, and came up again unknown to any-body.

My mind so dreadfully misgave me when I returned, that to divert in some measure my encreasing uneasiness, I had recourse to my private pen; and in a very short time ran this length.

And now, that I am come to this part, my uneasy reflections begin again to pour in upon me. Yet what can I do? —I believe I shall take it back again the first thing I do in the morning—Yet what can I do?

And who knows but they may have a still earlier day in their intention, than that which will too soon come?

I hope to deposit this early in the morning for you, as I shall return from resuming my letter, if I do resume it as my inwardest mind bids me.

Although it is now near two o'clock, I have a good mind to slide down once more, in order to take back my letter. Our doors are always locked and barred up at eleven; but the seats of the lesser hall-windows being almost even with the ground without, and the shutters not difficult to open, I could easily get out.

Yet why should I be thus uneasy, since, should the letter go, I can but hear what Mr. Lovelace says to it? His aunts live at too great a distance for him to have an immediate answer from them; so I can scruple going to them till I have invitation. I can insist upon one of his cousins meeting me, as I have hinted, and accompanying me in the chariot; and he may not be able to obtain that favour from either of them. Twenty things may happen to afford me a suspension at least: why should I be so very uneasy?—When likewise I can take back my letter early, before it is probable he will have the thought of finding it there. Yet he owns he spends three parts of his days, and has done for this fortnight past, in loitering about sometimes in one disguise, sometimes in another, besides the attendance given by his trusty servant when he himself is not in waiting, as he calls it.

But these strange forebodings!—Yet I can, if you advise, cause the chariot he shall bring with him to carry me directly for town, whither in my Lovelace scheme, if you were to approve it, I had proposed to go: and this will save you the trouble of procuring for me a vehicle; as well as prevent any suspicion from your mother of your contributing to my escape.

But, solicitous of your advice, and approbation too, if I can have it, I will put an end to this letter.

Adieu, my dearest friend, adieu!

LETTER XXXIX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

FRIDAY MORNING, SEVEN O'CLOCK, (APRIL 7.)

MY aunt Hervey, who is a very early riser, was walking in the garden, (Betty attending her, as I saw from my window this morning) when I arose; for after such a train of fatigue and restless nights, I had unhappily overslept myself: so all I durst venture upon, was, to step down to my poultry-yard, and deposit mine of yesterday, and last night. And I am just come up; for she is still in the garden. This prevents me from going to resume my letter, as I think still to do; and hope it will not be too late.

I said, I had unhappily overslept myself: I went to bed at about half an hour after two. I told the quarters till five; after which I dropped asleep, and awaked not till past six, and then in great terror, from a dream, which has made such an impression upon me, that, slightly as I think of dreams, I cannot help taking this opportunity to relate it to you.

Methought my brother, my uncle Antony, and Mr. Solmes, had formed a plot to destroy Mr. Lovelace; who discovering it, and believing I had a hand in it, turned all his rage against me. I thought he made them all fly into foreign parts upon it; and afterwards seizing upon me, carried me into a church-yard; and there, notwithstanding all my prayers and tears, and protestations of innocence, stabbed me to the heart, and then tumbled me into a deep grave ready dug, among two or three half-dissolved carcases; throwing in the dirt and earth upon me with his hands, and trampling it down with his feet.

I awoke in a cold sweat, trembling, and in agonies; and still the frightful images raised by it, remain upon my memory.

But why ſhould I, who have ſuch real evils to contend with, regard imaginary ones? This, no doubt, was owing to my diſturbed imagination; huddling together wildly all the frightful ideas which my aunt's communications and diſcourſe, my letter to Mr. Lovelace, my own uneaſineſs upon it, and the apprehenſions of the dreaded Wedneſday, furniſhed me with.

EIGHT O'CLOCK.

THE man, my dear, has got the letter! —What a ſtrange diligence! I wiſh he mean me well, that he takes ſo much pains!—Yet, to be ingenuous, I muſt own, that I ſhould be diſpleaſed if he took leſs—I wiſh, however, he had been an hundred miles off!—What an advantage have I given him over me!

Now the letter is out of my power, I have more uneaſineſs and regret than I had before. For, till now, I had a doubt, whether it ſhould or ſhould not go: and now I think it ought not to have gone. And yet is there any other way than to do as I have done, if I would avoid Solmes? But what a giddy creature ſhall I be thought, if I purſue the courſe to which this letter muſt lead me?

My deareſt friend, tell me, Have I done wrong?—Yet do not ſay I have, if you think it; for ſhould all the world beſides condemn me, I ſhall have ſome comfort, if you do not. The firſt time I ever beſought you to flatter me. That, of itſelf, is an indication that I have done wrong, and am afraid of hearing the truth—O tell me (but yet do not tell me) if I have done wrong!

FRIDAY, ELEVEN O'CLOCK.

My aunt has made me another viſit. She began what ſhe had to ſay with letting me know, that my friends are all perſuaded that I ſtill correſpond with Mr. Lovelace; as is plain, ſhe ſaid, by hints and menaces he throws out, which ſhew that he is apprized of ſeveral things that have paſſed between my relations and me, ſometimes within a very little while after they have happened.

Although I approve not of the method he ſtoops to take to come at his intelligence, yet it is not prudent in me to clear myſelf by the ruin of the corrupted ſervant, (although his vileneſs has neither my connivance, nor approbation) ſince my doing ſo might occaſion the detection of my own correſpondence; and ſo fruſtrate all the hopes I have to avoid this Solmes. Yet it is not at all unlikely, that this very agent of Mr. Lovelace acts a double part between my brother and him: how elſe can our family know (ſo ſoon too) his menaces upon the paſſages they hint at?

I aſſured my aunt, that I was too much aſhamed of the treatment I met with, (and that for every-one's ſake as well as for my own) to acquaint Mr. Lovelace with the particulars of that treatment, even were the means of correſponding with him afforded me: that I had reaſon to think, that if he were to know of it from me, we muſt be upon ſuch terms, that he would not ſcruple making ſome viſits, which would give me great apprehenſions. They all knew, I ſaid, that I had no communication with any of my father's ſervants, except my ſiſter's Betty Barnes: for although I had a good opinion of them all, and believed, if left to their own inclinations that they would be glad to ſerve me; yet, finding by their ſhy behaviour, that they were under particular direction, I had forborne, ever ſince my Hannah had been ſo diſgracefully diſmiſſed, ſo much as to ſpeak to any of them, for fear I ſhould be the occaſion of their loſing their places too. They muſt, therefore, account among themſelves for the intelligence Mr. Lovelace met with, ſince neither my brother nor ſiſter, (as Betty had frequently, in praiſe of their open hearts, informed me) nor perhaps their favourite Mr. Solmes, were at all careful before whom they ſpoke, when they had any-thing to throw out againſt him, or even againſt me, whom they took great pride to join with him on this occaſion.

It was but too natural, my aunt ſaid, for my friends to ſuppoſe, that he had his intelligence (part of it at leaſt) from me; who, thinking myſelf hardly treated, might complain of it, if not to him, to Miſs Howe; which, perhaps, might be the ſame thing; for they knew Miſs Howe ſpoke as freely of them, as they could do of Mr. Lovelace; and muſt have the particulars ſhe ſpoke of, from ſomebody who knew what was done here. That this determined my father to bring the whole matter to a ſpeedy iſſue, leſt fatal conſequences ſhould enſue.

'I perceive you are going to ſpeak 'with warmth,' proceeded ſhe, [and ſo I was.] 'For my own part, I am ſure, you 'would not write any-thing, if you do 'write, to enflame ſo violent a ſpirit. '—But this is not the end of my pre'ſent viſit.

'You cannot, my dear, but be con'vinced, that your father will be obeyed.

'The

'The more you contend againſt his will, 'the more he thinks himſelf obliged to 'aſſert his authority. Your mother de- 'ſires me to tell you, that if you will 'give her the leaſt hopes of a dutiful 'compliance, ſhe will be willing to ſee 'you in her cloſet juſt now, while your 'father is gone to take a walk in the 'garden.'

'Aſtoniſhing perſeverance!' ſaid I— 'I am tired with making declarations 'and with pleadings on this ſubject; 'and had hoped, that my reſolution be- 'ing ſo well known, I ſhould not have 'been further urged upon it.'

'You miſtake the purport of my pre- 'ſent viſit, Miſs,' [looking gravely]— 'Heretofore you have been deſired and 'prayed to obey and oblige your friends. 'Entreaty is at an end: they give it up. 'Now it is reſolved upon, that your fa- 'ther's will is to be obeyed; as it is fit it 'ſhould. Some things are laid at your 'door, as if you concurred with Love- 'lace's threatened violence to carry you 'off, which your mother will not be- 'lieve She will tell you her own good 'opinion of you. She will tell you how 'much ſhe ſtill loves you; and what ſhe 'expects of you on the approaching 'occaſion. But yet, that ſhe may not be 'expoſed to an oppoſition, which would 'the more provoke her, ſhe deſires that 'you will firſt aſſure her that you go 'down with a reſolution to do that with 'a grace which muſt be done with or 'without a grace. And beſides, ſhe 'wants to give you ſome advice how 'to proceed in order to reconcile your- 'ſelf to your father, and to every-body 'elſe. Will you go down, Miſs Clary, 'or will you not?'

I ſaid, I ſhould think myſelf happy, could I be admitted to my mother's preſence, after ſo long a baniſhment from it; but that I could not wiſh it upon thoſe terms.

'And this is your anſwer, niece?'

'It muſt be my anſwer, Madam. 'Come what may, I never will have 'Mr. Solmes. It is cruel to preſs this 'matter ſo often upon me.—I never 'will have that man.'

Down ſhe went with diſpleaſure. I could not help it. I was quite tired with ſo many attempts, all to the ſame purpoſe. I am amazed that they are not!—So little variation! And no conceſſion on either ſide!

I will go down and depoſit this; for Betty has ſeen I have been writing. The ſaucy creature took a napkin, and dipped it in water, and with a fleering air, 'Here, Miſs;' holding the wet corner to me.

'What's that for?' ſaid I.

'Only, Miſs, one of the fingers of 'your right-hand, if you pleaſe to look 'at it.'

It was inky.

I gave her a look: but ſaid nothing.

But leſt I ſhould have another ſearch, I will cloſe here. CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XL.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

FRIDAY, ONE O'CLOCK.

I Have a letter from Mr. Lovelace, full of tranſports, vows, and promiſes. I will ſend it to you incloſed. You'll ſee how he engages in it for Lady Betty's protection, and for Miſs Charlotte Montague's accompanying me. I have nothing to do, but to perſevere, he ſays, and prepare to receive the perſonal congratulations of his whole family.

But you'll ſee how he preſumes upon my being his, as the conſequence of throwing myſelf into that lady's protection.

The chariot-and-ſix is to be ready at the place he mentions. You'll ſee as to the ſtur upon my reputation about which I am ſo apprehenſive, how boldly he argues. Generouſly enough, indeed, were I to be his; and had given him to believe that I would.—But that I have not done.

How one ſtep brings on another with this encroaching ſex! How ſoon may a young creature, who gives a man the leaſt encouragement, be carried beyond her intentions, and out of her own power! You would imagine, by what he writes, that I have given him reaſon to think that my averſion to Mr. Solmes is all owing to my favour for him.

The dreadful thing is that, comparing what he writes from his intelligencer of what is deſigned againſt me, though he ſeems not to know the threatened day) with what my aunt and Betty aſſure me of, there can be no hope for me, but that I muſt be Solmes's wife, if I ſtay here.

I had better have gone to my uncle Antony's at this rate. I ſhould have gained time, at leaſt, by it. This is the fruit of his fine contrivances!

What we are to do, and how good he is to be: how I am to direct all his future ſteps. All this ſhews, as I ſaid before, that he is ſure of me.

However, I have replied to the following effect: that although I had given him room to expect, that I would put put myself into the protection of one of the ladies of his family; yet as I have three days to come, between this and Monday, and as I still hope that my friends will relent, or that Mr. Solmes will give up a point they will find it impossible to carry; I shall not look upon myself as absolutely bound by the appointment: and expect, therefore, if I recede, that I shall not again be called to account for it by him. That I think it necessary to acquaint him, that if by throwing myself upon Lady Betty Lawrance's protection, as he proposed, he understands, that I mean directly to put myself into his power, he is very much mistaken: for that there are many points in which I must be satisfied; several matters to be adjusted, even after I have left this house, (if I do leave it) before I can think of giving him any particular encouragement: that in the first place he must expect that I will do my utmost to procure my father's reconciliation and approbation of my future steps: and that I will govern myself entirely by his commands, in every reasonable point, as much as if I had not left his house: that if he imagines, I shall not reserve to myself this liberty, but that my withdrawing is to give him any advantages which he would not otherwise have had; I am determined to stay where I am, and abide the event, in hopes that my friends will accept of my reiterated promise, Never to marry him, or any-body else, without their consent.

This I will deposit as soon as I can. And as he thinks things are near their crisis, I dare say it will not be long before I have an answer to it.

FRIDAY, FOUR O'CLOCK.

I AM really ill. I was used to make the best of any little accidents that befel me, for fear of making my then affectionate friends uneasy: but now I shall make the worst of my indisposition, in hopes to obtain a suspension of the threatened evil of Wednesday next. And if I do obtain it, will postpone my appointment with Mr. Lovelace.

Betty has told them that I am very much indisposed. But I have no pity from any-body.

I believe, I am become the object of every-one's aversion; and that they would all be glad I were dead. Indeed, I believe it. 'What ails the perverse 'creature?' cries one.—'Is she love-'sick?' another.

I was in the Ivy Summer House, and came out shivering with cold, as if anguishly affected. Betty observed this, and reported it.—'O, no matter!—Let 'her shiver on!—Cold cannot hurt her. 'Obstinacy will defend her from harm. 'Perverseness is a bracer to a love-sick 'girl, and more effectual than the cold-'bath to make hardy, although the con-'stitution be ever so tender.'

This said by a cruel brother, and heard said by the dearer friends of one, for whom, but a few months ago, every-body was apprehensive at the least blast of wind to which she exposed herself!

Betty, it must be owned, has an admirable memory on these occasions. Nothing of this nature is lost by her repetition: even the very air with which she repeats what she hears said, renders it unnecessary to ask, Who spoke this or that severe thing?

FRIDAY, SIX O'CLOCK.

MY aunt, who again stays all night, has just left me. She came to tell me the result of my friends deliberations about me. It is this:

Next Wednesday morning they are all to be assembled: to wit, my father, mother, my uncles, herself, and my uncle Hervey; my brother and sister of course; my good Mrs. Norton is likewise to be admitted; and Dr. Lewen is to be at hand, to exhort me, it seems, if there be occasion; but my aunt is not certain whether he is to be among them, or to tarry till called in.

When this awful court is assembled, the poor prisoner is to be brought in, supported by Mrs. Norton; who is to be first tutored to instruct me in the duty of a child; which it seems I have forgotten.

Nor is the success at all doubted, my aunt says: since it is not believed that I can be hardened enough to withstand the expostulations of so venerable a judicature, although I have withstood those of several of them separately. And still the less, as she hints at extraordinary condescensions from my father. But what condescentions, from even my father, can induce me to make such a sacrifice as is expected from me?

Yet my spirits will never bear up, I doubt, at such a tribunal!—My father presiding in it.

Indeed I expected, that my trials would not be at an end till he had admitted me into his awful presence.

What is hoped from me, she says, is, that I will cheerfully, on Tuesday night, if not before, sign the articles; and so turn the succeeding day's solemn convention into a day of festivity. I am to have the licence sent me up, however, and once more the ſettlements, that I may ſee how much in earneſt they are.

She further hinted, that my father himſelf would bring up the ſettlements for me to ſign.

O my dear! what a trial will this be! —How ſhall I be able to refuſe to my father the writing of my name?—To my father, from whoſe preſence I have been ſo long baniſhed!—He commanding and entreating, perhaps, in a breath!—How ſhall I be able to refuſe this to my father!

They are ſure, ſhe ſays, ſomething is working on Mr. Lovelace's part, and perhaps on mine: and my father would ſooner follow me to the grave, than ſee me his wife.

I ſaid, I was not well: that the very apprehenſions of theſe trials were already inſupportable to me; and would encreaſe upon me, as the time approached; and I was afraid I ſhould be extremely ill.

They had prepared themſelves for ſuch an artifice as that, was my aunt's unkind word; and ſhe could aſſure me, it would ſtand me in no ſtead.

'Artifice!' repeated I: 'and this from 'my aunt Hervey?'

'Why, my dear,' ſaid ſhe, 'do you 'think people are fools?—Can they not 'ſee, how diſmally you endeavour to 'ſigh yourſelf down within doors?— 'How you hang down your ſweet face' [thoſe were the words ſhe was pleaſed to uſe] 'upon your boſom—How you tot- 'ter, as it were, and hold by this chair, 'and by that door-poſt, when you know 'that any-body ſees you.' [This, my dear Miſs Howe, is an aſperſion to faſten hypocriſy and contempt upon me: my brother's or ſiſter's aſperſion!—I am not capable of arts ſo low.] 'But the mo- 'ment you are down with your poultry, 'or advancing upon your garden-walk, 'and, as you imagine, out of every- 'body's ſight, it is ſeen how nimbly you 'trip along; and what an alertneſs go- 'verns all your motions.'

'I ſhould hate myſelf,' ſaid I, 'were 'I capable of ſuch poor artifices as theſe. 'I muſt be a fool to uſe them, as well as 'a mean creature; for have I not had 'experience enough, that my friends 'are incapable of being moved in much 'more affecting inſtances!—But you'll ſee 'how I ſhall be by Tueſday.'

'My dear, you will not offer any vio- 'lence to your health?—I hope God has 'given you more grace than to do that.'

'I hope he has, Madam. But there 'is violence enough offered, and threa- 'tened, to affect my health; and ſo it 'will be found, without my needing to 'have recourſe to any other, or to arti- 'fice either.'

'I'll only tell you one thing, my dear: 'and that is; Ill or well, the ceremony 'will probably be performed before 'Wedneſday night—But this, alſo, I 'will tell you, although beyond my pre- 'ſent commiſſion, that Mr Solmes will 'be under an engagement, (if you ſhould 'require it of him as a favour) after the 'ceremony is paſſed, and Lovelace's 'hopes thereby utterly extinguiſhed, to 'leave you at your father's, and return 'to his own houſe every evening, until 'you are brought to a full ſenſe of your 'duty, and conſent to acknowledge your 'change of name.'

There was no opening of my lips to ſuch a ſpeech as this. I was dumb.

And theſe, my dear Miſs Howe, are they, who, ſome of them at leaſt, have called me a romantick girl!—This is my chimerical brother, and wiſe ſiſter; both joining their heads together, I dare ſay. And yet, my aunt told me, that the laſt part was what took in my mother; who had, till that expedient was found out, inſiſted, that her child ſhould not be married, if, through grief or oppoſition, ſhe ſhould be ill, or fall into fits.

This intended violence my aunt often excuſed, by the certain information they pretended to have, of ſome plots or machinations, that were ready to break out, from Mr. Lovelace*: the effects of which were thus cunningly to be fruſtrated.

FRIDAY, NINE O'CLOCK.

AND now, my dear, what ſhall I conclude upon? You ſee how determined —But how can I expect your advice will come time enough to ſtand me in any ſtead? For here I have been down, and already have another letter from Mr. Lovelace, [the man lives upon the ſpot, I think:] and I muſt write to him, either that I will or will not ſtand to my firſt reſolution of eſcaping hence on Monday next. If I let him know, that I will not, (appearances ſo ſtrong againſt him, and for Solmes, even ſtronger than when I made the appointment) will it not be juſtly deemed my own fault, if I am compelled to marry their odious man? And if any miſchief enſue from Mr. Lovelace's rage and diſappointment, will it not lie at my door?—Yet, he offers ſo fair!—Yet, on the other hand, to incur the cenſure of the world, as a giddy creature—But that, as he hints, I have already incurred—What can I do?—O that my couſin Morden—But what ſignifies wiſhing?

* It may not be amiſs to obſerve in this place, that Mr. Lovelace artfully contrived to drive the family on, by permitting his and their agent Leman to report machinations, which he had neither intention nor power to execute.

made

I will here give you the ſubſtance of Mr. Lovelace's letter. The letter itſelf I will ſend, when I have anſwered it; but that I will defer doing as long as I can, in hopes of finding reaſon to retract an appointment on which ſo much depends. And yet it is neceſſary you ſhould have all before you as I go along, that you may be the better able to adviſe me in this dreadful criſis.

He begs my pardon for writing with ſo much aſſurance; attributing it to his unbounded tranſport; and entirely acquieſces in my will. He is full of alternatives and propoſals. He offers to attend me directly to Lady Betty's; or, if I had rather, to my own eſtate; and that my Lord M. ſhall protect me there; [he knows not, my dear, my reaſons for rejecting this inconſiderate advice.] In either caſe, as ſoon as he ſees me ſafe, he will go up to London, or whither I pleaſe; and not come near me, but by my own permiſſion; and till I am ſatisfied in every-thing I am doubtful of, as well with regard to his reformation, as to ſettlements, &c.

To conduct me to you, my dear, is another of his propoſals, not doubting, he ſays, but your mother will receive me: or, if that be not agreeable to you, or to your mother, or to me, he will put me into Mr. Hickman's protection; whom, no doubt, he ſays, you can influence; and that it may be given out, that I am gone to Bath, or Briſtol, or abroad; wherever I pleaſe.

Again, if it be more agreeable, he propoſes to attend me privately to London, where he will procure handſome lodgings for me; and both his couſins Montague to receive me in them, and to accompany me till all ſhall be adjuſted to my mind; and till a reconciliation ſhall be effected; which he aſſures me nothing ſhall be wanting in him to facilitate; greatly as he has been inſulted by all my family.

Theſe ſeveral meaſures he propoſes to my choice; as it was unlikely, he ſays, that he could procure, in the time, a letter from Lady Betty, under her own hand, to invite me in form to her houſe, unleſs he had been himſelf to go to that lady for it; which, at this critical conjuncture, while he is attending my commands, is impoſſible.

He conjures me, in the moſt ſolemn manner, if I would not throw him into utter deſpair, to keep to my appointment.

However, inſtead of threatening my relations, or Solmes, if I recede, he reſpectfully ſays, that he doubts not, but that, if I do, it will be upon ſuch reaſons, as he ought to be ſatisfied with; upon no ſlighter, he hopes, than their leaving me at full liberty to purſue my own inclinations: in which (whatever they ſhall be) he will entirely acquieſce; only endeavouring to make his future good behaviour the ſole ground for his expectation of my favour.

In ſhort, he ſolemnly vows, that his whole view at preſent, is to free me from my impriſonment; and to reſtore me to my own free-will, in a point ſo abſolutely neceſſary to my future happineſs. He declares, that neither the hopes he has of my future favour, nor the conſideration of his own and family's honour, will permit him to propoſe any-thing that ſhall be inconſiſtent with my own moſt ſcrupulous notions: and, for my mind's ſake, ſhould chuſe to have the propoſed end obtained by my friends declining to compel me. But that nevertheleſs, as to the world's opinion, it is impoſſible to imagine, that the behaviour of my relations to me has not already brought upon my family thoſe free cenſures which they deſerve, and cauſed the ſtep which I am ſo ſcrupulous about taking, to be no other than the natural and expected conſequence of their treatment of me.

Indeed, I am afraid all this is true: and it is owing to ſome little degree of politeneſs, that Mr. Lovelace does not ſay all he might ſay on this ſubject: for I have no doubt that I am the talk, and perhaps the bye-word of half the county. If ſo, I am afraid I can now do nothing that will give me more diſgrace than I have already ſo cauſeleſsly received by their indiſcreet perſecutions: and let me be whoſe I will, and do what I will, I ſhall never wipe off the ſtain which my confinement, and the rigorous uſage I have received, have fixed upon me; at leaſt in my own opinion.

I wiſh, if ever I am to be conſidered as one of the eminent family this man is allied to, ſome of them do not think the worſe of me, for the diſgrace I have received. In that caſe, perhaps, I ſhall be obliged to him, if he do not. You ſee how much this harſh, this cruel treatment from my own family has humbled me! But perhaps I was too much exalted before.

Mr. Lovelace concludes, with repeatedly begging an interview with me; and that, this night, if poſſible: an honour, he ſays, he is the more encouraged to ſolicit for, as I had twice before made him hope for it. But whether he obtain it or not, he beſeeches me to chuſe one of the alternatives he offers to my acceptance; and not to depart from my reſolution of eſcaping on Monday, unleſs the reaſon ceaſes on which I had taken it up; and that I have a proſpect of being reſtored to the favour of my friends; at leaſt to my own liberty, and freedom of choice.

He renews all his vows and promiſes on this head in ſo earneſt and ſo ſolemn a manner, that (his own intereſt, and his family's honour, and their favour for me, co-operating) I can have no room to doubt of his ſincerity.

LETTER XLI.

MISS CLARISSA HALLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SAT. MORN. 8 O'CLOCK (APRIL 8.)

WHETHER you will blame me or not, I cannot tell, but I have depoſited a letter confirming my reſolution to leave this houſe on Monday next, within the hour mentioned in my former, if poſſible. I have not kept a copy of it. But this is the ſubſtance.

I tell him, That I have no way to avoid the determined reſolution of my friends in behalf of Mr. Solmes, but by abandoning this houſe by his aſſiſtance.

I have not pretended to make a merit with him on this ſcore; for I plainly tell him, That could I, without an unpardonable ſin, die when I would, I would ſooner make death my choice, than take a ſtep, which all the world, if not my own heart, would condemn me for taking.

I tell him, That I ſhall not try to bring any other cloaths with me, than thoſe I ſhall have on; and thoſe but my common wearing-apparel; leſt I ſhould be ſuſpected. That I muſt expect to be denied the poſſeſſion of my eſtate: but that I am determined never to conſent to a litigation with my father, were I to be reduced to ever ſo low a ſtate. So that the protection I am to be obliged for to any one, muſt be alone for the diſtreſs ſake. That, therefore, he will have nothing to hope for from this ſtep, that he had not before: and that, in every light I reſerve to myſelf to accept or refuſe his addreſs, as his behaviour and circumſpection ſhall appear to me to deſerve.

I tell him, That I think it beſt to go into a private lodging, in the neighbourhood of Lady Betty Lawrance; and not to her ladyſhip's houſe; that it may not appear to the world, that I have refuged myſelf in his family; and that a reconciliation with my friends may not, on that account, be made impracticable: that I will ſend for thither my faithful Hannah; and apprize only Miſs Howe where I am. That he ſhall inſtantly leave me, and go to London, or to one of Lord M.'s ſeats; and (as he had promiſed) not come near me, but by my leave; contenting himſelf with a correſpondence by letter only.

That if I find myſelf in danger of being diſcovered, and carried back by violence, I will then throw myſelf directly into the protection either of Lady Betty or Lady Sarah: but this only in caſe of abſolute neceſſity; for that it will be more to my reputation, for me, by the beſt means I can, (taking advantage of my privacy) to enter by a ſecond or third hand into a treaty of reconciliation with my friends.

That I muſt, however, plainly tell him, that if in this treaty, my friends inſiſt upon my reſolving againſt marrying him, I will engage to comply with them; provided they will allow me to promiſe him, that I will never be the wife of any other man while he remains ſingle, or is living; that this is a compliment I am willing to pay him, in return for the trouble and pains he has taken, and the uſage he has met with, on my account. Although I intimate, that he may, in a great meaſure thank himſelf (by reaſon of the little regard he has paid to his reputation) for the ſlights he has met with.

I tell him, That I may, in this privacy, write to my couſin Morden, and, if poſſible, intereſt him in my cauſe.

I take ſome brief notice then of his alternatives.

You muſt think, my dear, that this unhappy force upon me, and this projected flight, make it neceſſary for me to account to him much ſooner than I ſhould otherwiſe chuſe to do, for every part of my conduct.

It is not to be expected, I tell him, that your mother will embroil herſelf, or ſuffer you or Mr. Hickman to be embroiled, on my account: and as to his propoſal of my going to London, I am such an absolute stranger to everybody there, and have such a bad opinion of the place, that I cannot by any means think of going thither; except I should be induced, some time hence, by the ladies of his family to attend them.

As to the meeting he is desirous of, I think it by no means proper; especially as it is so likely that I may soon see him. But that if any-thing occurs to induce me to change my mind, as to withdrawing, I will then take the first opportunity to see him, and give him my reasons for that change.

This, my dear, I the less scrupled to write, as it might qualify him to bear such a disappointment, should I give it him; he having, besides, behaved so very unexceptionably when he surprized me some time ago in the lonely Wood House.

Finally, I commend myself, as a person in distress, and merely as such, to his honour, and to the protection of the ladies of his family. I repeat [most cordially, I am sure!] my deep concern for being forced to take a step so disagreeable, and so derogatory to my honour. And having told him, that I will endeavour to obtain leave to dine in the Ivy Summer House, and to send Betty of some errand, when there, I leave the rest to him; but imagine, that about four o'clock will be a proper time for him to contrive some signal to let me know he is at hand, and for me to unbolt the garden-door.

I added, by way of postscript, That their suspicions seeming to encrease, I advise him to contrive to send or come to the usual place, as frequently as possible, in the interval of time till Monday morning ten or eleven o'clock; as something may possibly happen to make me alter my mind.

O my dear Miss Howe!—what a sad, sad thing is the necessity, forced upon me, for all this preparation and contrivance!—But it is now too late!—But how!—Too late, did I say?—What a word is that!—what a dreadful thing, were I to repent, to find it to be too late to remedy the apprehended evil!

SATURDAY, TEN O'CLOCK.

MR. SOLMES is here. He is to dine with his new relations, as Betty tells me he already calls them.

He would have thrown himself in my way once more: but I hurried up to my prison, in my return from my garden walk, to avoid him.

I had, when in the garden, the curiosity to see if my letter were gone: I cannot say with an intention to take it back again if it were not, because I see not how I could do otherwise than I have done; yet, what a caprice! when I found it gone, I began (as yesterday morning) to wish it had not. For no other reason, I believe, than because it was out of my power.

A strange diligence in this man!—He says, he almost lives upon the place; and I think so too.

He mentions, as you will see in his letter, four several disguises, which he puts on in one day. It is a wonder, nevertheless, that he has not been seen by some of our tenants: for it is impossible that any disguise can hide the gracefulness of his figure. But this is to be said, that the adjoining grounds being all in our own hands, and no common foot-paths near that part of the garden, and through the park and coppice, nothing can be more bye and unfrequented.

Then they are less watchful, I believe, over my garden-walks, and my poultry-visits, depending, as my aunt hinted, upon the bad character they have taken so much pains to fasten upon Mr. Lovelace. This, they think, (and justly think) must fill me with doubts. And then the regard I have hitherto had for my reputation, is another of their securities. Were it not for these two, they would not surely have used me as they have done; and at the same time left me the opportunities which I have several times had, to get away, had I been disposed to do so: and indeed their dependence on both these motives would have been well founded, had they kept but tolerable measures with me.

Then, perhaps, they have no notion of the back-door; as it is seldom opened, and leads to a place so pathless and lonesome. If not, there can be no other way to escape (if one would) unless by the plashy lane, so full of springs, by which your servant reaches the solitary Wood House; to which lane one must descend from a high bank, that bounds the poultry-yard. For, as to the front-way, you know, one must pass through the house to that, and in sight of the parlours, and the servants hall; and then have the open court-yard to go through, and, by means of the iron-gate, be full in view, as one passes over the lawn, for a quarter of a mile together; the young plantations of elms and limes affording yet but little shade or covert.

The Ivy Summer House is the most convenient for this heart-affecting purpose, poſe, of any ſpot in the garden, as it is not far from the back-door, and yet in another alley, as you may remember. Then it is ſeldom reſorted to by anybody elſe, except in the ſummer-months, becauſe it is cool. When they loved me, they would often, for this reaſon, object to my long continuance in it:—but now, it is no matter what becomes of me. Beſides, cold is a bracer, as my brother ſaid yeſterday.

Here I will depoſit what I have written. Let me have your prayers, my dear; and your approbation, or your cenſure, of the ſteps I have taken: for yet it may not be quite too late to revoke the appointment. I am your moſt affectionate and faithful

CL. HARLOWE.

Why will you ſend your ſervant empty-handed?

LETTER XLII.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

SAT. AFTERNOON.

BY your laſt date of ten o'clock in your letter of this day, you could not long have depoſited it before Robin took it. He rode hard, and brought it to me juſt as I had riſen from table.

You may juſtly blame me for ſending my meſſenger empty-handed, your ſituation conſidered; and yet that very ſituation (ſo critical!) is partly the reaſon for it: for indeed I know not what to write, fit to ſend you.

I have been enquiring privately, how to procure you a conveyance from Harlowe Place, and yet not appear in it; knowing, that to oblige in the fact, and to diſoblige in the manner, is but obliging by halves: my mother being moreover very ſuſpicious, and very uneaſy; made more ſo by daily viſits from your uncle Antony; who tells her, that everything is now upon the point of being determined; and hopes, that her daughter will not ſo interfere, as to diſcourage your compliance with their wills. This I came at by a way that I cannot take notice of, or both ſhould hear of it in a manner neither would like: and, without that, my mother and I have had almoſt hourly bickerings.

I found more difficulty than I expected (as the time was confined, and ſecreſy required, and as you ſo earneſtly forbid me to accompany you in your enterprize) in procuring you a vehicle. Had you not obliged me to keep meaſures with my mother, I could have managed it with eaſe. I could even have taken our own chariot, on one preſence or other, and put two horſes extraordinary to it, if I had thought fit; and I could, when we had got to London, have ſent it back, and nobody the wiſer as to the lodgings we might have taken.

I wiſh to the Lord, you had permitted this. Indeed I think you are too punctilious a great deal for your ſituation. Would you expect to enjoy yourſelf with your uſual placidneſs, and not be ruffled, in an hurricane which every moment threatens to blow your houſe down?

Had your diſtreſs ſprung from yourſelf, that would have been another thing. But when all the world knows where to lay the fault, this alters the caſe.

How can you ſay I am happy, when my mother, to her power, is as much an abettor of their wickedneſs to my deareſt friend, as your aunt, or anybody elſe?—And this through the inſtigation of that odd-headed and fooliſh uncle of yours, who [ſorry creature that he is!] keeps her up to reſolutions which are unworthy of her, for an example to me, if it pleaſe you. Is not this cauſe enough for me to ground a reſentment upon, ſufficient to juſtify me for accompanying you; the friendſhip between us ſo well known?

Indeed, my dear, the importance of the caſe conſidered, I muſt repeat, that you are too nice. Don't they already think, that your non-compliance with their odious meaſures is owing a good deal to my advice? Have they not prohibited our correſpondence upon that very ſurmiſe? And have I, but on your account, reaſon to value what they think?

Beſides, what diſcredit have I to fear by ſuch a ſtep? What detriment? Would Hickman, do you believe, refuſe me upon it?—If he did, ſhould I be ſorry for that?—Who is it, that has a ſoul, who would not be affected by ſuch an inſtance of female friendſhip?

But I ſhould vex and diſorder my mother!—Well, that is ſomething: but not more than ſhe vexes and diſorders me, on her being made an implement by ſuch a ſorry creature, who ambles hither every day in ſpite to my deareſt friend—Woe be to both, if it be for a double end!—Chide me, if you will: I don't care.

I ſay, and I inſiſt upon it, ſuch a ſtep would ennoble your friend: and if ſtill you will permit it, I will take the office out of Lovelace's hands; and, to-morrow evening, or on Monday before his time of appointment takes place, will come in a chariot, or chaise. And then, my dear, if we get off as I wish, will we make terms (and what terms we please) with them all. My mother will be glad to receive her daughter again I warrant: and Hickman will cry for joy on my return; or he shall for sorrow.

But you are so very earnestly angry with me for proposing such a step, and have always so much to say for your side of any question, that I am afraid to urge it farther.—Only be so good (let me add) as to encourage me to resume it, if upon farther consideration, and upon weighing matters well, (and in this light, whether best to go off with me or with Lovelace) you can get over your punctilious regard for my reputation. A woman going away with a woman is not so discreditable a thing, surely! and with no view, but to avoid the fellows!—I say, only be so good as to consider this point; and if you can get over your scruples on my account, do. And so I will have done with this argument for the present; and apply myself to some of the passages in yours.

A time, I hope, will come, that I shall be able to read your affecting narratives without that impatient bitterness, which now boils over in my heart, and would flow to my pen, were I to enter into the particulars of what you write. And indeed I am afraid of giving you my advice at all, or of telling you what I should do in your case; (supposing you will still refuse my offer; finding too, what you have been brought or rather driven to, without it) lest any evil should follow it: in which case, I should never forgive myself. And this consideration has added to my difficulties in writing to you now you are upon such a crisis, and yet refuse the only method—But I said, I would not for the present touch any more that string. Yet, one word more, chide me if you please: if any harm betide you, I shall for ever blame my mother--Indeed I shall--And perhaps yourself, if you do not accept of my offer.

But one thing, in your present situation and prospects, let me advise: it is this; that if you do go off with Mr. Lovelace, you take the first opportunity to marry. Why should you not, when every-body will know by whose assistance, and in whose company, you leave your father's house, go whithersoever you will?—You may indeed keep him at a distance, until settlements are drawn, and such like matters are adjusted to your mind: but even these are matters of less consideration in your particular case, than they would be in that of most others: and first, Because, be his other faults what they will, nobody thinks him an ungenerous man: next, Because, the possession of your estate must be given up to you as soon as your cousin Morden comes; who, as your trustee, will see it done; and done upon proper terms: 3dly, Because there is no want of fortune on his side: 4thly, Because all his family value you, and are extremely desirous that you should be their relation: 5thly, Because he makes no scruple of accepting you without conditions. You see how he has always defied your relations; [I, for my own part, can forgive him for the fault: nor know I, if it be not a noble one] and I dare say, he had rather call you his, without a shilling, than be under obligation to those whom he has full as little reason to love, as they have to love him. You have heard, that his own relations cannot make his proud spirit submit to owe any favour to them.

For all these reasons, I think, you may the less stand upon previous settlements. It is therefore my absolute opinion, that if you do withdraw with him, (and in that case you must let him be judge, when he can leave you with safety, you'll observe that) you should not postpone the ceremony.

Give this matter your most serious consideration. Punctilio is out of doors the moment you are out of your father's house. I know how justly severe you have been upon those inexcusable creatures whose giddiness, and even want of decency, have made them, in the same hour as I may say, leap from a parent's window to a husband's bed—But considering Lovelace's character, I repeat my opinion, that your reputation in the eye of the world requires that no delay be made in this point when once you are in his power.

I need not, I am sure, make a stronger plea to you.

You say, in excuse for my mother, (what my fervent love for my friend very ill brooks) That we ought not to blame any one for not doing what she has an option to do, or to let alone. This, in cases of friendship, would admit of very strict discussion. If the thing requested be of greater consequence, or even of equal, to the person sought to, and it were, as the old phrase has it, to take a thorn out of one's friend's foot, to put it into one's own, something might be said.—Nay, it would be, be, I will venture to ſay, a ſelfiſh thing in us to aſk a favour of a friend which would ſubject that friend to the ſame or equal inconvenience as that from which we wanted to be relieved. The requeſter would, in this caſe, teach his friend, by his own ſelfiſh example, with much better reaſon, to deny him, and deſpiſe a friendſhip ſo merely nominal. But if by a leſs inconvenience to ourſelves, we could relieve our friend from a greater, the refuſal of ſuch a favour makes the refuſer unworthy of the name of friend: nor would I admit ſuch a one, not even into the outermoſt fold of my heart.

I am well aware that this is your opinion of friendſhip, as well as mine: for I owe the diſtinction to you, upon a certain occaſion; and it ſaved me from a very great inconvenience, as you muſt needs remember. But you were always for making excuſes for other people, in caſes wherein you would not have allowed of one for yourſelf.

I muſt own, that were theſe excuſes for a friend's indifference, or denial, made by any body but you, in a caſe of ſuch vaſt importance to herſelf, and of ſo comparative a ſmall one to thoſe for whoſe protection ſhe would be thought to wiſh; I, who am for ever, as you have often remarked, endeavouring to trace effects to their cauſes, ſhould be ready to ſuſpect, that there was a latent, unowned inclination, which balancing, or preponderating rather, made the iſſue of the alternative (however important) ſit more lightly upon the excuſer's mind than ſhe cared to own.

You will underſtand me, my dear. But if you do not, it may be as well for me; for I am afraid I ſhall have it from you, for but ſtarting ſuch a notion, or giving a hint, which perhaps, as you did once in another caſe, you will reprimandingly call, not being able to forego the oſtentation of ſagacity, though at the expence of that tenderneſs which is due to friendſhip and charity.

What ſignifies owning a fault without mending it, you'll ſay?—Very true, my dear. But you know I ever was a ſaucy creature—Ever ſtood in need of great allowances.—And I remember likewiſe that I ever had them from my dear Clariſſa. Nor do I doubt them now: for you know how much I love you—If it be poſſible, more than myſelf I love you! Believe me, my dear: and, in conſequence of that belief, you will be able to judge, how much I am affected by your preſent diſtreſsful and critical ſituation; which will not ſuffer me to paſs by without a cenſure even that philoſophy of temper in your own cauſe, which you have not in another's, and which all that know you ever admired you for.

From this critical and diſtreſsful ſituation, it ſhall be my hourly prayer, that you may be delivered without blemiſh to that fair fame, which has hitherto, like your heart, been unſpotted.

With this prayer, twenty times repeated, concludes your ever-affectionate

ANNA HOWE.

I hurried myſelf in writing this; and I hurry Robin away with it, that in a ſituation ſo very critical, you may have all the time poſſible to conſider what I have written, upon two points ſo very important. I will repeat them in a very few words:

Whether you chuſe not rather to go off with one of your own ſex; with your ANNA HOWE—than with one of the other; with Mr. LOVELACE?

And if not,

Whether you ſhould not marry him as ſoon as poſſible?

LETTER XLIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

[THE PRECEDING LETTER NOT RECEIVED.]

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

ALREADY have I an ecſtatick anſwer, as I may call it, to my letter.

He promiſes compliance with my will in every article: approves of all I propoſe; particularly of the private lodging: and thinks it a happy expedient to obviate the cenſures of the buſy and the unreflecting: and yet he hopes, that the putting myſelf into the protection of either of his aunts (treated as I am treated) would be far from being looked upon by any-body in a diſreputable light. But every thing I enjoin or reſolve upon muſt, he ſays, be right, not only with reſpect to my preſent but future reputation; with regard to which, he hopes ſo to behave himſelf, as to be allowed to be, next to myſelf, more properly ſolicitous than any-body. He will only aſſure me, that his whole family are extremely deſirous to take advantage of the perſecutions I labour under, to make their court and endear themſelves to me by their beſt and moſt cheerful ſervices: happy, if they can in any meaſure contribute to my preſent freedom and future happineſs.

He

He will this afternoon, he ſays, write to Lord M. and to Lady Betty and Lady Sarah, that he is now within view of being the happieſt man in the world, if it be not his own fault; ſince the only woman upon earth that can make him ſo, will be ſoon out of danger of being another man's; and cannot poſſibly preſcribe any terms to him that he ſhall not think it his duty to comply with.

He flatters himſelf now, (my laſt letter confirming my reſolution) that he can be in no apprehenſion of my changing my mind, unleſs my friends change their manner of acting by me; which he is too ſure they will not. And now will all his relations, who take ſuch a kind and generous ſhare in his intereſt, glory and pride themſelves in the proſpects he has before him.

Thus artfully does he hold me to it.

As to fortune, he begs of me not to be ſolicitous on that ſcore: that his own eſtate is ſufficient for us both; not a nominal, but a real, two thouſand pounds per annum, equivalent to ſome eſtates reputed a third more: that it never was encumbered: that he is clear of the world, both as to book and bond debts; thanks, perhaps, to his pride, more than to his virtue: that Lord M. moreover reſolves to ſettle upon him a thouſand pounds per annum on his nuptials. And to this, he will have it, his lordſhip is inſtigated more by motives of juſtice, than of generoſity; as he muſt conſider it was but an equivalent for an eſtate which he had got poſſeſſion of, to which his (Mr. Lovelace's) mother had better pretenſions. That his lordſhip alſo propoſed to give him up either his ſeat in Hertfordſhire, or that in Lancaſhire, at his own or at his wife's option, eſpecially if I am the perſon. All which it will be in my power to ſee done, and proper ſettlements drawn, before I enter into any farther engagements with him; if I will have it ſo.

He ſays, That I need not be under any ſolicitude as to apparel: all immediate occaſions of that ſort will be moſt cheerfully ſupplied by the ladies of his family: as my others ſhall, with the greateſt pride and pleaſure (if I will allow him that honour) by himſelf.

He aſſures me, That I ſhall govern him as I pleaſe, with regard to anything in his power towards effecting a reconciliation with my friends: a point he knows my heart is ſet upon.

He is afraid, that the time will hardly allow of his procuring Miſs Charlotte Montague's attendance upon me, at St. Alban's, as he had propoſed ſhe ſhould; becauſe, he underſtands, ſhe keeps her chamber with a violent cold and ſore throat. But both ſhe and her ſiſter, the firſt moment ſhe is able to go abroad, ſhall viſit me at my private lodgings; and introduce me to Lady Sarah and Lady Betty, or thoſe ladies to me, as I ſhall chuſe; and accompany me to town, if I pleaſe; and ſtay as long in it with me, as I ſhall think fit to ſtay there.

Lord M. will alſo, at my own time, and in my own manner, (that is to ſay, either publicly or privately) make me a viſit. And, for his own part, when he has ſeen me in ſafety, either in their protection, or in the privacy I prefer, he will leave me, and not attempt to viſit me but by my own permiſſion.

He had thoughts once, he ſays, on hearing of his couſin Charlotte's indiſpoſition, to have engaged his couſin Patty's attendance upon me, either in or about the neighbouring village, or at St. Alban's: but, he ſays, ſhe is a low-ſpirited, timorous girl, and would but the more have perplexed us.

So, my dear, the enterprize requires courage and nigh ſpirits, you ſee!—And indeed it does!—What am I about to do!

He himſelf, it is plain, thinks it neceſſary that I ſhould be accompanied with one of my own ſex.—He might, at leaſt, have propoſed the woman of one of the ladies of his family. Lord bleſs me!—What am I about to do!

AFTER all, far as I have gone, I know not but I may ſtill recede: and if I do, a mortal quarrel I ſuppoſe will enſue.—And what if it does?—Could there be any way to eſcape this Solmes, a breach with Lovelace might make way for the ſingle life to take place, which I ſo much prefer: and then I would defy the ſex. For I ſee nothing but trouble and vexation that they bring upon ours: and when once entered, one is obliged to go on with them, treading, with tender feet, upon thorns, and ſharper thorns, to the end of a painful journey.

What to do I know not. The more I think, the more I am embarraſſed!—And the ſtronger will be my doubts as the appointed time draws near.

But I will go down, and take a little turn in the garden; and depoſit this, and his letters all but the two laſt, which I will incloſe in my next, if I have opportunity to write another.

Mean time, my dear friend——But what can I deſire you to pray for?—Adieu then!—Let me only ſay—Adieu!

LETTER

LETTER XLIV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

[IN ANSWER TO LETTER XLII.]

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 9.

DO not think, my beloved friend, although you have given me in yours of yesterday a severer instance of what, nevertheless, I must call your impartial love, than ever yet I received from you, that I will be displeased with you for it. That would be to put myself into the inconvenient situation of royalty; that is to say, out of the way of ever being told of my faults; of ever mending them; and in the way of making the sincerest and warmest friendship useless to me.

And then how brightly, how nobly glows in your bosom the sacred flame of friendship; since it can make you ready to impute to the unhappy sufferer a less degree of warmth in her own cause, than you have for her, because she endeavours to divest herself of self so far as to leave others to the option which they have a right to make!—Ought I, my dear, to blame, ought I not rather to admire you for this ardour?

But nevertheless, lest you should think that there is any foundation for a surmise which (although it owes it's rise to your friendship) would, if there were, leave me utterly inexcusable; I must, in justice to myself, declare, that I know not my own heart, if I have any of that latent or un-owned inclination, which you would impute to any other but me. Nor does the important alternative sit lightly on my mind. And yet I must excuse your mother, were it but on this single consideration, that I could not presume to reckon upon her favour, as I could upon her daughter's, so as to make the claim of friendship upon her, to whom, as the mother of my dearest friend, a veneration is owing, which can hardly be compatible with that sweet familiarity which is one of the indispensable requisites of the sacred tie by which your heart and mine are bound in one.

What therefore I might expect from my Anna Howe, I ought not from her mother; for would it not be very strange, that a person of her experience should be reflected upon because she gave not up her own judgment, where the consequence of her doing so would be to embroil herself, as she apprehends, with a family she has lived well with, and in behalf of a child against her parents?—As she has moreover a daughter of her own:—a daughter too, give me leave to say, of whose vivacity and charming spirits she is more apprehensive than she need to be, because her truly maternal cares make her fear more from her youth, than she hopes from her prudence; which nevertheless she and all the world know to be beyond her years.

And here let me add, that whatever you may generously, and as the result of an ardent affection for your unhappy friend, urge on this head, in my behalf, or harshly against any one who may refuse me protection in the extraordinary circumstances I find myself in; I have some pleasure, in being able to curb undue expectations upon my indulgent friends, whatever were to befal myself from those circumstances; for I should be extremely mortified, were I by my selfish forwardness to give occasion for such a check, as to be told, that I had encouraged an unreasonable hope; or, according to the phrase you mention, wished to take a thorn out of my own foot, and to put it into that of my friend. Nor should I be better pleased with myself, if, having been taught by my good Mrs. Norton, that the best of schools is that of affliction, I should rather learn impatience than the contrary, by the lessons I am obliged to get by heart in it; and if I should judge of the merits of others, as they were kind to me; and that at the expence of their own convenience or peace of mind. For is not this to suppose myself ever in the right; and all who do not act as I would have them act, perpetually in the wrong? In short, to make my God's sake, in the sense of Mr. Solmes's pitiful plea to me?

How often, my dear, have you and I endeavoured to detect and censure this partial spirit in others?

But I know you do not always content yourself with saying what you think may justly be said; but, in order to shew the extent of a penetration which can go to the bottom of any subject, delight to say or to write all that can be said or written, or even thought, on the particular occasion; and this partly perhaps from being desirous [pardon me, my dear!] to be thought mistress of a sagacity that is aforehand with events. But who would wish to drain off or dry up a refreshing current, because it now-and-then puts us to some little inconvenience by it's overflowings? In other words, who would not allow for the liveliness of a spirit a ſpirit which for one painful ſenſibility gives an hundred pleaſurable ones? And the one in conſequence of the other?

But now I come to the two points in your letter, which moſt ſenſibly concern me: thus you put them—

> Whether I chuſe not rather to go off [ſhocking words!] with one of my own ſex; with my ANNA HOWE—than with one of the other; with Mr. LOVELACE?
> And if not,
> Whether I ſhould not marry him as ſoon as poſſible?

You know, my dear, my reaſons for rejecting your propoſal, and even for being earneſt that you ſhould not be known to be aſſiſting to me in an enterprize in which a cruel neceſſity induced me to think of engaging; and for which you have not the ſame plea. At this rate, well might your mother be uneaſy at our correſpondence, not knowing to what inconveniences it might ſubject her and you!—If I am hardly excuſable to think of withdrawing from my unkind friends, what could you have to ſay for yourſelf, were you to abandon a mother ſo indulgent? Does ſhe ſuſpect that your fervent friendſhip may lead you to a ſmall indiſcretion? And does this ſuſpicion offend you? And would you, in reſentment, ſhew her and the world, that you can voluntarily ruſh into the higheſt error that any of our ſex can be guilty of?

And is it worthy of your generoſity [I aſk you, my dear, is it?] to think of taking ſo undutiful a ſtep, becauſe you believe your mother would be glad to receive you again?

I do aſſure you, that were I to take this ſtep myſelf, I would run all riſques rather than you ſhould accompany me in it. Have I, do you think, a deſire to double and treble my own fault in the eye of the world? In the eye of that world, which, cruelly as I am uſed, (not knowing all) would not acquit me?

But, my deareſt, kindeſt friend, let me tell you, that we will neither of us take ſuch a ſtep. The manner of putting your queſtions abundantly convinces me, that I ought not, in your opinion, to attempt it. You no doubt intend that I ſhall ſo take it; and I thank you for the equally polite and forcible conviction.

It is ſome ſatisfaction to me, (taking the matter in this light) that I had begun to waver before I received your laſt. And now I tell you, that it has abſolutely determined me not to go off; at leaſt, not to-morrow.

If you, my dear, think the iſſue of the alternative (to uſe your own words) ſits ſo lightly upon my mind; in ſhort, that my inclination is faulty; the world would treat me much leſs ſcrupulouſly. When, therefore, you repreſent, that all punctilio muſt be at an end the moment I am out of my father's houſe; and hint, that I muſt ſubmit it to Mr. Lovelace to judge when he can leave me with ſafety; that is to ſay, give him the option whether he will leave me, or not; who can bear theſe reflections, who can reſolve to incur theſe inconveniences, that has the queſtion ſtill in her own power to decide upon?

While I thought only of an eſcape from this houſe as an eſcape from Mr. Solmes; that already my reputation ſuffered by my confinement; and that it would be ſtill in my own option, either to marry Mr. Lovelace, or wholly to renounce him; bold as the ſtep was, I thought, treated as I am treated, ſomething was to be ſaid in excuſe of it—If not to the world, to myſelf: and to be ſelf-acquitted, is a bleſſing to be preferred to the opinion of all the world. But, after I have cenſured moſt ſeverely, as I have ever done, thoſe giddy girls, who have in the ſame hour, as I may ſay, that they have fled from their chamber, preſented themſelves at the altar that is to witneſs to their undutiful raſhneſs; after I have ſtipulated with Mr. Lovelace for time, and for an ultimate option whether to accept or refuſe him; and for his leaving me, as ſoon as I am in a place of ſafety, (which as you obſerve, he muſt be the judge of;) and after he has ſignified to me his compliance with theſe terms; ſo that I cannot, if I would, recal them, and ſuddenly marry—You ſee, my dear, that I have nothing left me, but to reſolve not to go away with him.

But, how, on this revocation of my appointment, ſhall I be able to pacify him?

How!—Why aſſert the privilege of my ſex!—Surely, on this ſide of the ſolemnity he has no right to be diſpleaſed. Beſides, did I not reſerve a power of receding, as I ſaw fit? To what purpoſe, as I aſked in the caſe between your mother and you, has any-body an option, if the making uſe of it ſhall give the refuſed a right to be diſguſted?

Far, very far, would thoſe, who, according to the old law, have a right of abſolving or confirming a child's promiſe, be from ratifying mine, had it been ever ſo ſolemn a one*. But this was rather an appointment than a promiſe: and ſuppoſe it had been the latter; and that I had not reſerved to myſelf a liberty of revoking it; was it to preclude better or maturer conſideration?— ſ ſo, how unfit to be given!—How ungenerous to be inſiſted upon!—And how unfitter ſtill, to be kept!—Is there a man living who ought to be angry that a woman whom he hopes one day to call his, ſhall refuſe to keep a raſh promiſe, when, on the matureſt deliberation, ſhe is convinced that it was a raſh one?

I reſolve then, upon the whole, to ſtand this one trial of Wedneſday next—or, perhaps, I ſhould rather ſay, of Tueſday evening, if my father hold his purpoſe of endeavouring, in perſon, to make me read, or hear read, and then ſign, the ſettlements.—That, that muſt be the greateſt trial of all.

If I am compelled to ſign them overnight—Then (the Lord bleſs me!) muſt all I dread, follow, as of courſe, on Wedneſday. If I can prevail upon them by my prayers [Perhaps I ſhall fall into fits; for the very firſt appearance of my father, after having been ſo long baniſhed his preſence, will greatly affect me—If, I ſay, I can prevail upon them by my prayers] to lay aſide their views, or to ſuſpend the day, if but for one week; if not, but for two or three days; ſtill Wedneſday will be a lighter day of trial. They will ſurely give me time to conſider; to argue with myſelf. This will not be promiſing. As I have made no effort to get away, they have no reaſon to ſuſpect me; ſo I may have an opportunity, in the laſt reſort, to withdraw. Mrs. Norton is to be with me: ſhe, although ſhe ſhould be chidden for it, will, in my extremity, plead for me. My aunt Hervey may, in ſuch an extremity, join with her. Perhaps my mother may be brought over. I will kneel to each, one by one, to make a friend. Some of them have been afraid to ſee me, leſt they ſhould be moved in my favour: does not this give me a reaſonable hope, that I may move them? My brother's counſel, heretofore given, to turn me out of doors to my evil deſtiny, may again be repeated, and may prevail: then ſhall I be in no worſe caſe than now, as to the diſpleaſure of my friends; and thus far better, that it will not be my fault that I ſeek another protection: which even then ought to be my couſin Morden's, rather than Mr. Lovelace's, or any other perſon's.

My heart, in ſhort, miſgives me leſs, when I reſolve this way, than when I think of the other: and in ſo ſtrong and involuntary a bias, the heart is, as I may ſay, conſcience. And well cautions the wiſe man: 'Let the counſel of thine 'own heart ſtand; for there is no man 'more faithful to thee, than it: for a 'man's mind is ſometimes wont to tell 'him more than ſeven watchmen, that 'ſit above in a high tower.' [Eccluſ. xxxvii. 13, 14.

Forgive theſe indigeſted ſelf-reaſonings. I will cloſe here: and inſtantly ſet about a letter of revocation to Mr. Lovelace; take it as he will. It will only be another trial of temper to him. To me of infinite importance. And has he not promiſed temper and acquieſcence, on the ſuppoſition of a change in my mind?

LETTER XLV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SUNDAY MORNING, (APRIL 9.)

NOBODY, it ſeems, will go to church this day. No bleſſing to be expected perhaps upon views ſo worldly, and in ſome ſo cruel.

They have a miſtruſt that I have ſome device in my head. Betty has been looking among my cloaths. I found her, on coming up from depoſiting my letter to Lovelace, (for I have written!) peering among them; for I had left the key in the lock. She coloured, and was confounded to be caught. But I only ſaid, I ſhould be accuſtomed to any ſort of treatment in time. If ſhe had her orders—thoſe were enough for her.

She owned, in her confuſion, that a motion had been made to abridge me of my airings; and the report ſhe ſhould make, would be of no diſadvantage to me. One of my friends, ſhe told me, urged in my behalf, that there was no need of laying me under greater reſtraint, ſince Mr. Lovelace's threatening to reſcue me by violence, were I to have been carried to my uncle's, was a conviction that I had no design to go to him voluntarily; and that if I had, I should have made preparations of that kind before now; and, most probably, been detected in them.—Hence, it was also inferred, that there was no room to doubt, but I would at last comply. 'And,' added the bold creature, 'if you don't 'intend to do so, your conduct, Miss, 'seems strange to me.'—Only thus she reconciled it; that I had gone so far, I knew not how to come off genteelly: and she fancied I should, in full congregation, on Wednesday, give Mr. Solmes my hand. 'And then,' said the confident wench, 'as the learned Dr. Brand took 'his text last Sunday, There will be joy 'in Heaven.'

* See Numb. xxx. Where it is declared, whoſe vows ſhall be binding, and whoſe not. The vows of a man, or of a widow, are there pronounced to be indiſpenſable; becauſe they are ſole, and ſubject to no other domeſtick authority. But the vows of a ſingle woman, and of a wife, if the father of the one, or the huſband of the other, diſallow of them as ſoon as they know them, are to be of no force.

This is the substance of my letter to Mr. Lovelace:

That I have reasons of the greatest consequence to myself, (and which, when known, must satisfy him) to suspend, for the present, my intention of leaving my father's house: that I have hopes that matters may be brought to an happy conclusion, without taking a step, which nothing but the last necessity could justify: and that he may depend upon my promise, that I will die rather than consent to marry Mr. Solmes.

And so, I am preparing myself to stand the shock of his exclamatory reply. But be that what it will, it cannot affect me so much, as the apprehensions of what may happen to me next Tuesday or Wednesday; for now those apprehensions engage my whole attention, and make me sick at the very heart.

SUNDAY, FOUR IN THE AFTERNOON.

My letter is not yet taken away—If he should not send for it, or take it, and come hither on my not meeting him to-morrow, in doubt of what may have befallen me, what shall I do! Why had I any concerns with this sex!—I, that was so happy till I knew this man!

I dined in the Ivy Summer House. My request to do so was complied with at the first word. To shew I meant nothing, I went again into the house with Betty, as soon as I had dined. I thought it was not amiss to ask this liberty; the weather seemed to be set in fine. Who knows what Tuesday or Wednesday may produce?

SUNDAY EVENING, SEVEN O'CLOCK.

THERE remains my letter still!—He is busied, I suppose, in his preparations for to-morrow. But then he has servants. Does the man think he is so secure of me, that having appointed, he need not give himself any further concern about me, till the very moment? He knows how I am beset. He knows not what may happen. I might be ill, or still more closely watched or confined than before. The correspondence might be discovered. It might be necessary to vary the scheme. I might be forced into measures, which might entirely frustrate my purpose. I might have new doubts. I might suggest something more convenient, for any-thing he knew. What can the man mean, I wonder!—Yet it shall lie; for if he has it any time before the appointed hour, it will save me declaring to him personally my changed purpose, and the trouble of contending with him on that score. If he send for it at all, he will see by the date, that he might have had it in time; and if he be put to any inconvenience from shortness of notice, let him take it for his pains.

SUNDAY NIGHT, NINE O'CLOCK.

IT is determined, it seems, to send for Mrs. Norton to be here on Tuesday to dinner; and she is to stay with me for a whole week.

So she is first to endeavour to persuade me to comply; and, when the violence is done, she is to comfort me, and try to reconcile me to my fate. They expect fits and fetches, Betty insolently tells me, and expostulations, and exclamations, without number: but every-body will be prepared for them; and when it's over, it's over; and I shall be easy and pacified when I find I can't help it.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 10, SEVEN O'CLOCK.

O MY dear! There yet lies the letter, just as I left it!

Does he think he is so sure of me?—Perhaps he imagines that I dare not alter my purpose. I wish I had never known him! I begin now to see this rashness in the light every-one else would have seen it in, had I been guilty of it. But what can I do, if he come to-day at the appointed time! If he receive not the letter, I must see him, or he will think something has befallen me; and certainly will come to the house. As certainly he will be insulted. And what, in that case, may be the consequence! Then I as good as promised that I would take the first opportunity to see him, if I changed my mind, and to give him my reasons for it. I have no doubt but he will be out of humour upon it: but better, if we meet, that he go away dissatisfied with me, than that

that I ſhould go away diſſatisfied with myſelf.

Yet, ſhort as the time is, he may ſtill perhaps ſend, and get the letter. Something may have happened to prevent him, which, when known, will excuſe him.

After I have diſappointed him more than once before, on a requeſted interview only, it is impoſſible he ſhould not have curioſity at leaſt, to know if ſomething has not happened, and whether my mind hold or not in this more important caſe. And yet, as I raſhly confirmed my reſolution by a ſecond letter, I begin now to doubt it.

NINE O'CLOCK.

MY couſin Dolly Hervey ſlid the incloſed letter into my hand, as I paſſed by her, coming out of the garden.

'DEAREST MADAM,

'I HAVE got intelligence from one 'who pretends to know every-thing, 'that you muſt be married on Wedneſday morning to Mr. Solmes. Perhaps, 'however, ſhe ſays this only to vex me; 'for it is that fancy creature Betty 'Barnes. A licence is got, as ſhe ſays: 'and ſo far ſhe went as to tell me, (bidding me ſay nothing; but ſhe knew I 'would) that Mr. Brand is to marry 'you. For Dr. Lewen, I hear, refuſes, 'unleſs your conſent can be obtained; 'and they have heard that he does not 'approve of their proceedings againſt 'you. Mr. Brand, I am told, is to 'have his fortune made by uncle Harlowe, and among them.

'You will know better than I what 'to make of all theſe matters; for ſometimes I think Betty tells me things as 'if I ſhould not tell you, and yet expects that I will *. For there is great 'whiſpering between Miſs Harlowe and 'her; and I have obſerved that when 'their whiſpering is over, Betty comes 'and tells me ſomething by way of 'ſecret. She and all the world know 'how much I love you: and ſo I would 'have them. It is an honour to me to 'love a young lady who is and ever was 'an honour to all her family, let them 'ſay what they will.

'But from a more certain authority 'than Betty's, I can aſſure you, (but I 'muſt beg of you to burn this letter) 'that you are to be ſearched once more 'for letters, and for pen and ink; for 'they know you write. Something they 'pretend to have come at from one of 'Mr. Lovelace's ſervants, which they 'hope to make ſomething of. I know 'not for certain what it is. He muſt be 'a very vile and wicked man, who 'would boaſt of a lady's favour to him, 'and reveal ſecrets. But Mr. Lovelace, 'I dare ſay, is too much of a gentleman 'to be guilty of ſuch ingratitude.

'Then they have a notion, from that 'falſe Betty I believe, that you intend 'to take ſomething to make yourſelf 'ſick; and ſo they will ſearch for phials 'and powders, and ſuch-like.

'If nothing ſhould be found that will 'increaſe their ſuſpicions, you are to be 'uſed more kindly by your papa when 'you appear before them all, than he of 'late has uſed you.

'Yet, ſick or well, alas! my dear 'couſin! you muſt be married. But 'your huſband is to go home every night 'without you, till you are reconciled to 'him. And ſo illneſs can be no pretence to ſave you.

'They are ſure you will make a good 'wife. So would not I, unleſs I liked 'my huſband. And Mr. Solmes is always telling them how he will purchaſe 'your love by rich preſents.—A ſycophant man!—I wiſh he and Betty 'Barnes were to come together; and 'he would beat her every day.

'After what I have told you, I need 'not adviſe you to ſecure every thing 'you would not have ſeen.

'Once more let me beg that you will 'burn this letter: and, pray, deareſt 'Madam, do not take any-thing that 'may prejudice your health; for that 'will not do. I am your truly loving 'couſin, D. H.'

WHEN I firſt read my couſin's letter, I was half inclined to reſume my former intention; eſpecially as my countermanding letter was not taken away; and as my heart ached at the thoughts of the conflict I muſt expect to have with him on my refuſal. For ſee him for a few moments I doubt I muſt, leſt he ſhould take ſome raſh reſolutions; eſpecially as he has reaſon to expect I will ſee him. But here your words, That all punctilio is at an end, the moment I am out of my father's house, added to the ſtill more cogent conſiderations of duty and reputation, determined me once more againſt taking the raſh ſtep. And it will be very hard, (although no ſeaſonable fainting, or wiſhed-for fit, ſhould ſtand my friend) if I cannot gain one month, or fortnight, or week. And I have ſtill more hopes that I ſhall prevail for ſome delay, from my couſin's intimation that the good Dr. Lewen refuſes to give his aſſiſtance to their projects, if they have not my conſent, and thinks me cruelly uſed: ſince, without taking notice that I am apprized of this, I can plead a ſcruple of conſcience, and inſiſt upon having that worthy divine's opinion upon it; in which, enforced as I ſhall enforce it, my mother will ſurely ſecond me; my aunt Hervey, and Mrs. Norton, will ſupport her; the ſuſpenſion muſt follow; and I can but get away afterwards.

But, if they will compel me; if they will give me no time; if nobody will be moved; if it be reſolved that the ceremony ſhall be read over my conſtrained hand—Why then—Alas!—What then!—I can but—But what? O my dear! This Solmes ſhall never have my vows I am reſolved! And I will ſay nothing but 'No,' as long as I ſhall be able to ſpeak. And who will preſume to look upon ſuch an act of violence as a marriage?—It is impoſſible, ſurely, that a father and mother can ſee ſuch a dreadful compulſion offered to their child—But if mine ſhould withdraw, and leave the taſk to my brother and ſiſter, they will have no mercy.

I am grieved to be driven to have recourſe to the following artifices.

I have given them a clue, by the feather of a pen ſticking out, where they will find ſuch of my hidden ſtories, as I intend they ſhall find.

Two or three little eſſays I have left eaſy to be ſeen, of my own writing.

About a dozen lines alſo of a letter begun to you, in which I expreſs my hopes (although I ſay, that appearances are againſt me) that my friends will relent. They know from your mother, by my uncle Antony, that, ſome how or other, I now-and-then get a letter to you. In this piece of a letter, I declare renewedly my firm reſolution to give up the man ſo obnoxious to my family, on their releaſing me from the addreſs of the other.

Near the eſſays, I have left the copy of my letter to Lady Drayton; which affording arguments ſuitable to my caſe, may chance (thus accidentally to be fallen upon) to incline them to favour me.

I have reſerves of pen and ink, you may believe; and one or two in the Ivy Summer Houſe; with which I ſhall amuſe myſelf, in order to lighten, if poſſible, thoſe apprehenſions which more and more affect me, as Wedneſday, the day of trial, approaches.

LETTER XLVI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

IVY SUMMER HOUSE, ELEVEN O'CLOCK.

HE has not yet got my letter: and while I was contriving here how to ſend my officious gaolereſs from me, that I might have time for the intended interview, and had hit upon an expedient, which I believe would have done, came my aunt, and furniſhed me with a much better. She ſaw my little table covered, preparative to my ſolitary dinner; and hoped, ſhe told me, that this would be the laſt day that my friends would be deprived of my company at table.

You may believe me, my dear, that the thoughts of meeting Mr. Lovelace, for fear of being diſcovered, together with the contents of my couſin Dolly's letter, gave me great and viſible emotions. She took notice of them—'Why 'theſe ſighs, why theſe heavings here?' ſaid ſhe, patting my neck—'O my dear 'niece, who would have thought ſo 'much natural ſweetneſs could be ſo 'very unperſuadable?'

I could not anſwer her, and ſhe proceeded—'I am come, I doubt, upon a 'very unwelcome errand. Some things 'that have been told us yeſterday, which 'came from the mouth of one of the moſt 'deſperate and inſolent men in the world, 'convince your father, and all of us, that 'you ſtill find means to write out of the 'houſe. Mr. Lovelace knows every-'thing that is done here; and that as 'ſoon as done; and great miſchief is ap-'prehended from him, which you are 'as much concerned as any body to pre-'vent. Your mother has alſo ſome ap-'prehenſions concerning yourſelf, which 'yet ſhe hopes are groundleſs; but, how-'ever, cannot be eaſy, nor will be per-'mitted to be eaſy, if ſhe would, unleſs '(while you remain here in the garden, 'or in this ſummer-houſe) you give her 'the opportunity once more of looking 'into your cloſet, your cabinet, and 'drawers. It will be the better taken,

'if you give me cheerfully your keys. 'I hope, my dear, you won't diſpute it. 'Your deſire of dining in this place was 'the more readily complied with for the 'ſake of ſuch an opportunity.'

I thought myſelf very lucky to be ſo well prepared by my couſin Dolly's means for this ſearch: but yet I artfully made ſome ſcruples, and not a few complaints of this treatment; after which, I not only gave her the keys of all, but even officiouſly emptied my pockets before her, and invited her to put her fingers in my ſtays, that ſhe might be ſure I had no papers there.

This highly obliged her; and ſhe ſaid, ſhe would repreſent my cheerful compliance as it deſerved, let my brother and ſiſter ſay what they would. My mother in particular, ſhe was ſure, would rejoice at the opportunity given her to obviate, as ſhe doubted not would be the caſe, ſome ſuſpicions that were raiſed againſt me.

She then hinted, That there were methods taken to come at all Mr. Lovelace's ſecrets, and even, from his careleſs communicativeneſs, at ſome of mine; it being, ſhe ſaid, his cuſtom, boaſtingly to prate to his very ſervants of his intentions, in particular caſes. She added, that deep as he was thought to be, my brother was as deep as he, and fairly too hard for him at his own weapons—as one day it would be found.

I knew not, I ſaid, the meaning of theſe dark hints. I thought the cunning ſhe hinted at, on both ſides, called rather for contempt than applauſe. I myſelf might have been put upon artifices which my heart diſdained to practiſe, had I given way to the reſentment, which I was bold to ſay, was much more juſtifiable than the actions that occaſioned it: that it was evident to me from what ſhe had ſaid, that their preſent ſuſpicions of me were partly owing to this ſuppoſed ſuperior cunning of my brother, and partly to the conſciouſneſs, that the uſage I met with might naturally produce a reaſon for ſuch ſuſpicions; that it was very unhappy for me, to be made the butt of my brother's wit; that it would have been more to his praiſe, to have aimed at ſhewing a kind heart, than a cunning head; that nevertheleſs, I wiſhed he knew himſelf as well as I imagined I knew him; and he would then have leſs conceit of his abilities. Which abilities would, in my opinion, be leſs thought of, if his power to do ill offices were not much greater than they.

I was vexed. I could not help making this reflection. The dupe the other, too probably, makes of him, through his own ſpy, deſerved it. But I ſo little approve of this low art in either, that were I but tolerably uſed, the vileneſs of that man, that Joſeph Leman, ſhould be enquired into.

She was ſorry, ſhe ſaid, to find, that I thought ſo diſparagingly of my brother. He was a young man both of learning and parts.

Learning enough I ſaid, to make him vain of it among us women: but not of parts ſufficient to make his learning valuable either to himſelf, or to any-body elſe.

She wiſhed, indeed, that he had more good-nature: but ſhe feared, that I had too great an opinion of ſomebody elſe, to think ſo well of my brother, as a ſiſter ought. Since, between the two, there was a ſort of rivalry as to abilities, that made them hate one another.

'Rivalry, Madam,' ſaid I—'If that 'be the caſe, or whether it be or not, 'I wiſh they both underſtood better than 'either of them ſeems to do, what it be-'comes gentlemen, and men of liberal 'education, to be, and to do.—Neither 'of them, then, would glory in what 'they ought to be aſhamed of.'

But waving this ſubject, it was not impoſſible, I ſaid, that they might find a little of my writing, and a pen or two, and a little ink, [Hated art!—or rather, hateful the neceſſity for it!] as I was not permitted to go up to put them out of the way: but if they did, I muſt be contented. And I aſſured her, that, take what time they pleaſed, I would not go in to diſturb them, but would be either in or near the garden, in this ſummer-houſe, or in the cedar one, or about my poultry-yard, or near the great caſcade, till I was ordered to return to my priſon. With like cunning I ſaid, that I ſuppoſed the unkind ſearch would not be made, till the ſervants had dined; becauſe I doubted not, that the pert Betty Barnes, who knew all the corners of my apartment and cloſet, would be employed in it.

She hoped, ſhe ſaid, that nothing could be found that would give a handle againſt me: for, ſhe would aſſure me, the motives to the ſearch, on my mother's part eſpecially, were, that ſhe hoped to find reaſon rather to acquit than to blame me; and that my father might be induced to ſee me to-morrow night, or Wedneſday morning, with temper. 'With tenderneſs, I ſhould rather 'ſay,' ſaid ſhe; 'for he is reſolved ſo 'to do, if no new offence be given.'

'Ah! Madam,' ſaid I.

'Why

'Why that, "Ah! Madam," and 'shaking your head so significantly!'

'I wish, Madam, that I may not have 'more reason to dread my father's con-'tinued displeasure, than to hope for 'his returning tenderness.'

'You don't know, my dear!—Things 'may take a turn—Things may not be 'so bad as you fear.'

'Dearest Madam, have you any con-'solation to give me?'

'Why, my dear, it is possible, that 'you may be more compliable than you 'have been.'

'Why raised you my hopes, Madam! '—Don't let me think my dear aunt 'Hervey cruel to a niece who truly ho-'nours her.'

'I may tell you more perhaps,' said she, '(but in confidence, in absolute 'confidence) if the enquiry within come 'out in your favour. Do you know of 'any-thing above that can be found to 'your disadvantage?'

'Some papers they will find, I doubt: 'but I must take consequences. My 'brother and sister will be at hand with 'their good-natured constructions. I 'am made desperate, and care not what 'is found.'

'I hope, I earnestly hope,' said she, 'that nothing can be found that will im-'peach your discretion; and then—But 'I may say too much.'

And away she went, having added to my perplexity.

But I now can think of nothing but this interview.—Would to Heaven it were over!—To meet to quarrel—But, let him take what measures he will, I will not stay a moment with him, if he be not quite calm and resigned.

Don't you see how crooked some of my lines are? Don't you see how some of the letters stagger more than others? —That is when this interview is more in my head than my subject.

But, after all, should I, ought I to meet him? How have I taken it for granted, that I should!—I wish there were time to take your advice. Yet you are so loth to speak quite out—But that I owe, as you own, to the difficulty of my situation.

I should have mentioned, that in the course of this conversation I besought my aunt to stand my friend, and to put in a word for me, on my approaching trial; and to endeavour to procure me time for consideration, if I could obtain nothing else.

She told me, that, after the ceremony was performed, [Odious confirmation of a hint in my cousin Dolly's letter!] I should have what time I pleased to reconcile myself to my lot, before cohabitation.

This put me out of all patience.

She requested of me in her turn, she said, that I would resolve to meet them all with cheerful duty, and with a spirit of absolute acquiescence. It was in my power to make them all happy. And how joyful would it be to her, she said, to see my father, my mother, my uncles, my brother, my sister, all embracing me with raptures, and folding me by turns to their fond hearts, and congratulating each other on their restored happiness! Her own joy, she said, would probably make her motionless and speechless, for a time: and for her Dolly—the poor girl, who had suffered in the esteem of some, for her grateful attachment to me, would have every-body love her again.

Will you doubt, my dear, that my next trial will be the most affecting that I have yet had?

My aunt set forth all this in so strong a light, and I was so particularly touched on my cousin Dolly's account, that, impatient as I was just before, I was greatly moved: yet could only shew by my sighs and my tears, how desirable such an event would be to me, could it be brought about upon conditions with which it was possible for me to comply.

Here comes Betty Barnes with my dinner.

THE wench is gone. The time of meeting is at hand. O that he may not come!—But should I, or should I not meet him?—How I question, without the possibility of a timely answer!

Betty, according to my leading hint to my aunt, boasted to me, that she was to be employed, as she called it, after she had ate her own dinner.

She should be sorry, she told me, to have me found out. Yet 'twould be all for my good. I should have it in my power to be forgiven for all at once, before Wednesday night. The confident creature then, to stifle a laugh, put a corner of her apron in her mouth, and went to the door: and on her return, to take away, as I angrily bid her, she begged my excuse—'But—But—' and then the saucy creature laughed again, she could not help it; to think how I had drawn myself in by my Summer-House dinnering; since it had given so fine an opportunity, by way of surprize, to look into all my private hoards. She thought something was in the wind, when my brother came in to my dining here so readily. Her young master was too hard for for every-body. Squire Lovelace himſelf was nothing at all at a quick thought, to her young maſter.

My aunt mentioned Mr. Lovelace's boaſting behaviour to his ſervants: perhaps he may be ſo mean. But as to my brother, he always took a pride in making himſelf appear to be a man of parts and learning to our ſervants. Pride and meanneſs, I have often thought, are as nearly allied, and as cloſe borderers upon each other, as the poet tells us wit and madneſs are.

But why do I trouble you (and myſelf, at ſuch a criſis) with theſe impertinencies?—Yet I would forget, if I could, the neareſt evil, the interview; becauſe, my apprehenſions encreaſing as the hour is at hand, I ſhould, were my attention to be engroſſed by them, be unfit to ſee him, if he does come: and then he will have too much advantage over me, as he will have ſeeming reaſon to reproach me with change of reſolution.

The upbraider, you know, my dear, is in ſome ſenſe a ſuperior; while the upbraided, if with reaſon upbraided, muſt make a figure as ſpiritleſs as conſcious.

I know that this wretch will, if he can, be his own judge, and mine too. But the latter he ſhall not be.

I dare ſay, we ſhall be all to-pieces. But I don't care for that. It would be hard, if I, who have held it out ſo ſturdily to my father and uncles, ſhould not —But he is at the garden-door!

I WAS miſtaken!—How many noiſes un-like, be made like to what one fears! —Why flutters the fool ſo!

I WILL haſten to depoſit this. Then I will, for the laſt time, go to the uſual place, in hopes to find that he has got my letter. If he has, I will not meet him. If he has not, I will take it back, and ſhew him what I have written. That will break the ice, as I may ſay, and ſave me much circumlocution and reaſoning: and a ſtedfaſt adherence to that my written mind is all that will be neceſſary.—The interview muſt be as ſhort as poſſible; for ſhould it be diſcovered, it would furniſh a new and ſtrong pretence for the intended evil of Wedneſday next.

Perhaps I ſhall not be able to write again one while. Perhaps not, till I am the miſerable property of that Solmes! —But that ſhall never, never be, while I have my ſenſes.

If your ſervant find nothing from me by Wedneſday morning, you may conclude that I can then neither write to you, nor receive your favours.

In that caſe, pity and pray for me, my beloved friend; and continue to me that place in your affection, which is the pride of my life, and the only comfort left to your

CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XLVII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

ST. ALBAN'S, TUESDAY MORN. PAST ONE.

O MY DEAREST FRIEND!

AFTER what I had reſolved upon, as by my former, what ſhall I write? What can I? With what conſciouſneſs, even by letter, do I approach you?—You will ſoon hear (if already you have not heard from the mouth of common fame) that your Clariſſa Harlowe is gone off with a man!

I am buſying myſelf to give you the particulars at large. The whole twenty-four hours of each day (to begin the moment I can fix) ſhall be employed in it till it is finiſhed: every-one of the hours, I mean, that will be ſpared me by this interrupting man, to whom I have made myſelf ſo fooliſhly accountable for too many of them. Reſt is departed from me. I have no call for that, and that has no balm for the wounds of my mind. So you'll have all thoſe hours without interruption till the account is ended.

But will you receive, ſhall you be permitted to receive my letters, after what I have done?

O my deareſt friend!—But I muſt make the beſt of it. I hope that will not be very bad! Yet am I convinced, that I did a raſh and inexcuſable thing, in meeting him; and all his tenderneſs, all his vows, cannot pacify my inward reproaches on that account.

The bearer comes to you, my dear, for the little parcel of linen which I ſent you with far better and more agreeable hopes.

Send not my letters. Send the linen only: except you will favour me with one line, to tell me, you love me ſtill; and that you will ſuſpend your cenſures till you have the whole before you. I am the readier to ſend thus early, becauſe if you have depoſited any-thing for me, you may cauſe it to be taken back, or withhold any-thing you had but intended to ſend.

Adieu, my deareſt friend!—I beſeech you to love me ſtill—But, alas! what will your mother ſay?—What will mine? —What my other relations?—and what my dear Mrs. Norton? And how will my brother and ſiſter triumph?

my

I cannot at preſent tell you how, or where, you can direct to me. For very early ſhall I leave this place; harraſſed and fatigued to death. But, when I can do nothing elſe, conſtant uſe has made me able to write. Long, very long, has that been all my amuſement and pleaſure: yet could not that have been ſuch to me, had I not had you, my beſt beloved friend, to write to. Once more adieu. Pity and pray for your

CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XLVIII.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

TUESDAY, NINE O'CLOCK.

I Write, becauſe you enjoin me to do ſo. Love you ſtill!—How can I help it, if I would? You may believe how I ſtand aghaſt, your letter communicating the firſt news—Good God of heaven and earth!—But what ſhall I ſay?—I am all impatience for particulars.

Lord have mercy upon me!—But can it be?

My mother will indeed be aſtoniſhed!—How can I tell it her!—It was but laſt night (upon ſome jealouſies put into her head by your fooliſh uncle) that I aſſured her, and this upon the ſtrength of your own aſſurances, that neither man nor devil would be able to induce you to take a ſtep that was in the leaſt derogatory to the moſt punctilious honour.

But, once more, can it be? What woman, at this rate!—But, God preſerve you!

Let nothing eſcape you in your letters. Direct them for me however to Mrs. Knollys's, till further notice.

OBSERVE, my dear, that I don't blame you by all this—Your relations only are in fault!—Yet how you came to change your mind is the ſurpriſing thing.

How to break it to my mother, I know not. Yet, if ſhe hear it firſt from any other, and find I knew it before, ſhe will believe it to be by my connivance—Yet, as I hope to live, I know not how to break it to her.

But this is teazing you.—I am ſure, without intention.

Let me now repeat my former advice—If you are not married by this time, be ſure delay not the ceremony. Since things are as they are, I wiſh it were thought that you were privately married before you went away. If theſe men plead AUTHORITY to our pain, when we are theirs—why ſhould we not, in ſuch a caſe as this, make ſome good out of the hated word, for our reputation, when we are induced to violate a more natural one?

Your brother and ſiſter [That vexes me almoſt as much as any-thing!] have now their ends. Now I ſuppoſe, will go forward alterations of wills and ſuch-like ſpiteful doings.

Miss Lloyd and Miſs Biddulph this moment ſend up their names. They are out of breath, Kitty ſays, to ſpeak to me—Eaſy to gueſs their errand!—I muſt ſee my mother before I ſee them. I have no way but to ſhew her your letter to clear myſelf. I ſhall not be able to ſay a word, till ſhe has run herſelf out of her firſt breath.—Forgive me, my dear—Surprize makes me write thus. If your meſſenger did not wait, and were not thoſe young ladies below, I would write it over again, for fear of afflicting you.

I ſend what you write for. If there be any-thing elſe you want that is in my power, command without reſerve your ever-affectionate

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XLIX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

TUESDAY NIGHT.

I Think myſelf obliged to thank you, my dear Miſs Howe, for your condeſcenſion, in taking notice of a creature who has occaſioned you ſo much ſcandal.

I am grieved on this account, as much, I verily think, as for the evil itſelf.

Tell me—But yet I am afraid to know—what your mother ſaid.

I long, and yet I dread, to be told, what the young ladies my companions, now never more perhaps to be ſo, ſay of me.

They cannot, however, ſay worſe of me than I will of myſelf. Self-accuſation ſhall flow in every line of my narrative where I think I am juſtly cenſurable. If any-thing can ariſe from the account I am going to give you, for extenuation of my fault, (for that is all a perſon can hope for, who cannot excuſe herſelf) I know I may expect it from your friendſhip, though not from the charity of any other: ſince by this time I doubt not every mouth is opened againſt me; and all that know Clariſſa Harlowe condemn the fugitive daughter.

AFTER I had depoſited my letter to you, you, written down to the laſt hour, as I may ſay, I returned to the Ivy Summer Houſe; firſt taking back my letter from the looſe bricks: and there I endeavoured, as coolly as my ſituation would permit, to recollect and lay together ſeveral incidents that had paſſed between my aunt and me; and, comparing them with ſome of the contents of my couſin Dolly's letter, I began to hope, that I needed not to be ſo very apprehenſive as I have been of next Wedneſday. And thus I argued with myſelf

'Wedneſday cannot poſſibly be the 'day they intend, although to intimidate me they may wiſh me to think 'it is; for the ſettlements are unſigned: 'nor have they been offered me to ſign. 'I can chuſe whether I will or will not 'put my hand to them; hard as it will 'be to refuſe if my father tender them 'to me—Beſides, did not my father and 'mother propoſe, if I made compulſion 'neceſſary, to go to my uncle's themſelves, in order to be out of the way 'of my appeals? Whereas they intend 'to be preſent on Wedneſday. And 'however affecting to me the thought 'of meeting them and all my friends in 'full aſſembly is, perhaps it is the very 'thing I ought to wiſh for: ſince my 'brother and ſiſter had ſuch an opinion 'of my intereſt in them, that they got 'me excluded from their preſence, as a 'meaſure which they thought previouſly neceſſary to carry on their deſigns.

'Nor have I reaſon to doubt, but that' (as I had before argued with myſelf) 'I ſhall be able to bring over ſome of 'my relations to my party; and, being 'brought face to face with my brother, 'that I ſhall expoſe his malevolence, 'and of conſequence weaken his power.

'Then, ſuppoſing the very worſt, 'challenging the miniſter as I ſhall 'challenge him, he will not preſume to 'proceed: nor ſurely will Mr. Solmes 'dare to accept my refuſing and ſtruggling hand. And finally, if nothing 'elſe will do, nor procure me delay, I 'can plead ſcruples of conſcience, and 'even pretend prior obligation;' for, my dear, I have given Mr. Lovelace room to hope (as you will ſee in one of my letters in your hands) that I will be no other man's while he is ſingle, and gives me not wilful and premeditated cauſe of offence againſt him; and this in order to rein-in his reſentments on the declared animoſity of my brother and uncles to him. 'And as I ſhall appeal, or refer my ſcruples on this head, 'to the good Dr. Lewen, it is impoſſible 'but that my mother and aunt (if nobody elſe) muſt be affected with this 'plea.'

Revolving curſorily theſe things, I congratulated myſelf, that I had reſolved againſt going away with Mr. Lovelace.

I told you, my dear, that I would not ſpare myſelf; and I enumerate theſe particulars as ſo many arguments to condemn the actions I have been ſo unhappily betrayed into. An argument that concludes againſt me with the greater force, as I muſt acknowledge, that I was apprehenſive, that what my couſin Dolly mentions as from Betty and from my ſiſter, who told her, that ſhe ſhould tell me, in order to make me deſperate, and perhaps to puſh me upon ſome ſuch ſtep as I have been driven to take, as the moſt effectual means to ruin me with my father and uncles.

God forgive me if I judge too hardly of their views!—But if I do not, it follows, that they laid a wicked ſnare for me; and that I have been caught in it.—And now may they triumph, if they can triumph, in the ruin of a ſiſter, who never wiſhed or intended hurt to them!

As the above kind of reaſoning had leſſened my apprehenſions as to the Wedneſday, it added to thoſe I had of meeting Mr. Lovelace—Now, as it ſeemed not only the neareſt, but the heavieſt evil; principally indeed becauſe neareſt; for little did I dream (fooliſh creature that I was, and every way beſet!) of the event proving what it has proved. I expected a contention with him, it is true, as he had not my letter: but I thought it would be very ſtrange, as I mentioned in one of my former, if I, who had ſo ſteadily held out againſt characters ſo venerable, againſt authorities ſo ſacred, as I may ſay, when I thought them unreaſonably exerted, ſhould not find myſelf more equal to ſuch a trial as this; eſpecially as I had ſo much reaſon to be diſpleaſed with him for not having taken away my letter.

On what a point of time may one's worldly happineſs depend! Had I had but two hours more to conſider of the matter, and to attend to and improve upon theſe new lights, as I may call them—But even then, perhaps, I might have given him a meeting:—Fool that I was! what had I to do to give him hope that I would perſonally acquaint him with the reaſon for my change of mind, if I did change it?

O my dear! an obliging temper is a very very dangerous temper!—By endeavouring to gratify others, it is evermore disobliging itself!

When the bell rang to call the servants to dinner, Betty came to me, and asked, if I had any commands before she went to hers; repeating her hint, that she should be employed; adding, that she believed it was expected, that I should not come up till she came down, or till I saw my aunt or Miss Hervey.

I asked her some questions about the cascade, which had been out of order, and lately mended; and expressed a curiosity to see how it played, in order to induce her [How cunning to cheat myself, as it proved!] to go thither, if she found me not where she left me; it being at a part of the garden most distant from the Ivy Summer House.

She could have hardly got into the house when I heard the first signal—O how my heart fluttered!—But no time was to be lost. I stept to the garden-door; and seeing a clear coast, unbolted the already unlocked door—And there was he, all impatience, waiting for me.

A panick next to fainting seized me when I saw him. My heart seemed convulsed; and I trembled so, that I should hardly have kept my feet, had he not supported me.

'Fear nothing, dearest creature,' said he—'Let us hasten away—The chariot 'is at hand—And, by this sweet con-'descension, you have obliged me be-'yond expression or return.'

Recovering my spirits a little, as he kept drawing me after him, 'O, Mr. 'Lovelace,' said I, 'I cannot go with 'you—Indeed I cannot—I wrote you 'word so—Let go my hand, and you 'shall see my letter. It has lain there 'from yesterday morning, till within 'this half-hour. I bid you watch to 'the last for a letter from me, lest I 'should be obliged to revoke the ap-'pointment; and had you followed the 'direction, you would have found it.'

'I have been watched, my dearest 'life,' said he, half out of breath—'I 'have been watched in every step I took: 'and my trusty servant has been watched 'too, ever since Saturday; and dared 'not to come near your wall.—And 'here we shall be discovered in a mo-'ment.—Speed away, my charmer—'This is the moment of your deliverance '—If you neglect this opportunity, you 'never can have such another.'

'What is it you mean, Sir?—Let go 'my hand: for I tell you' [struggling vehemently] 'that I will sooner die 'than go with you.'

'Good God!' said he, with a look of wildness and surprize, 'what is it I 'hear!—But' [still drawing me after him, as he retreated farther from the door] 'it is no time to argue—By all 'that's good you must go—Surely you 'cannot doubt my honour, nor give me 'cause to question your own.'

'As you value me, Mr. Lovelace, 'urge me no farther. I come fixed and 'resolved. Let me give you the letter 'I had written. My further reasons 'shall follow; and they will convince 'you, that I ought not to go.'

'Nothing, Madam, can convince me '—By all that's sacred, I will not leave 'you. To leave you now, would be to 'lose you for ever.'

'Am I to be thus compelled?' interrupted I, with equal indignation and vehemence—'Let go my hands.—I am 'resolved not to go with you—And I 'will convince you, that I ought not.'

'All my friends expect you, Madam '—All your own are determined against 'you—Wednesday next is the day, the 'important, perhaps the fatal day! 'Would you stay to be Solmes's wife? '—Can this be your determination at 'last?'

'No, never, never, will I be that 'man's—But I will not go with you! '[Draw me not thus—How dare you, 'Sir? I would not have seen you, but 'to tell you so.] I had not met you, but 'for fear you would have been guilty of 'some rashness—And, once more, I 'will not go—What mean you?'—Striving with all my force to get from him.

'What can have possessed my angel,' said he, [quitting my hands, and with a gentler voice] 'that after so much ill-'usage from your relations; vows so 'solemn on my part; an affection so 'ardent; you stab me with a refusal to 'stand by your own appointment?'

'We have no time to talk, Mr. Love-'lace. I will give you my reasons at 'a better opportunity. I cannot go 'with you now—And, once more, urge 'me no farther—Surely I am not to be 'compelled by every-body!'

'I see how it is,' said he, with a dejected, but a passionate air—'What a 'severe fate is mine—At length your 'spirit is subdued!—Your brother and 'sister have prevailed; and I must give 'up all my hopes to a wretch so truly 'despicable—'

'Once more I tell you,' interrupted I, 'I never will be his—All may end on 'Wednesday differently from what you 'expect.'

'And it may not!—And then, good heavens!'

'It is to be their laſt effort, as I have reaſon to believe.'

'And I have reaſon to believe ſo too —Since, if you ſtay, you will inevitably be Solmes's wife.'

'Not ſo,' interrupted I—'I have obliged them in one point. They will be in good-humour with me. I ſhall gain time at leaſt. I am ſure I ſhall. I have ſeveral ways to gain time.'

'And what, Madam, will gaining time do? It is plain you have not a hope beyond that—It is plain you have not, by putting all upon that precarious iſſue. O my deareſt, deareſt life, let me beſeech you not to run a riſque of this conſequence. I can convince you, that it will be more than a riſque if you go back, that you will on Wedneſday next be Solmes's wife.—Prevent therefore, now that it is in your power to prevent, the fatal miſchiefs that will follow ſuch a dreadful certainty.'

'While I have any room for hope, it concerns your honour, Mr. Lovelace, as well as mine; (if you have the value for me you pretend, and wiſh me to believe you) that my conduct in this great point ſhould juſtify my prudence.'

'Your prudence, Madam! When has that been queſtionable? Yet what ſtead has either your prudence or your duty ſtood you in, with people ſo ſtrangely determined?'

And then he pathetically enumerated the different inſtances of the harſh treatment I had met with; imputing all to the malice and caprice of a brother, who ſet every-body againſt him: and inſiſting, that I had no other way to bring about a reconciliation with my father and uncles, than by putting myſelf out of the power of my brother's inveterate malice.

'Your brother's whole reliance,' proceeded he, 'has been upon your eaſineſs to bear his inſults. Your whole family will ſeek to you, when you have freed yourſelf from this diſgraceful oppreſſion. When they know you are with thoſe who can and will right you, they will give up to you your own eſtate.'

'Why then,' putting his arm round me, and again drawing me with a gentle force after him, 'do you heſitate a moment?—Now is the time—Fly with me then, I beſeech you, my deareſt creature! Truſt your perſecuted adorer. Have we not ſuffered in the ſame cauſe? If any imputations are caſt upon you, give me the honour (as I ſhall be found to deſerve it) to call you mine; and, when you are ſo, ſhall I not be able to protect both your perſon and character?'

'Urge me no more, Mr. Lovelace, I conjure you. You yourſelf have given me a hint, which I will ſpeak plainer to, than prudence, perhaps, on any other occaſion, would allow. I am convinced, that Wedneſday next (if I had time I would give you my reaſons) is not intended to be the day we had both ſo much dreaded: and if after that day ſhall be over, I find my friends determined in Mr. Solmes's favour, I will then contrive ſome way to meet you with Miſs Howe, who is not your enemy; and when the ſolemnity has paſſed, I ſhall think that ſtep a duty, which till then will be criminal to take; ſince now my father's authority is unimpeached by any greater.'

'Deareſt Madam—'

'Nay, Mr. Lovelace, if you now diſpute—if, after this more favourable declaration, than I had the thought of making, you are not ſatisfied, I ſhall know what to think both of your gratitude and generoſity.'

'The caſe, Madam, admits not of this alternative. I am all gratitude upon it. I cannot expreſs how much I ſhould be delighted with the charming hope you have given me, were you not next Wedneſday, if you ſtay, to be another man's. Think, deareſt creature! what an heightening of my anguiſh the diſtant hope you bid me look up to, is, taken in this light!'

'Depend, depend upon it, I will die ſooner than be Mr. Solmes's. If you would have me rely upon your honour, why ſhould you doubt of mine?'

'I doubt not your honour, Madam; your power is all I doubt. You never, never, can have ſuch another opportunity.—Deareſt creature, permit me'—And he was again drawing me after him.

'Whither, Sir, do you draw me?—Leave me this moment—Do you ſeek to keep me till my return ſhall grow dangerous or impracticable? This moment let me go, if you would have me think tolerably of you.'

'My happineſs, Madam, both here and hereafter, and the ſafety of all your implacable family, depend upon this moment.'

'To Providence, Mr. Lovelace, and to the law, will I leave the ſafety of my friends. You ſhall not threaten me into a raſhneſs that my heart condemns!—Shall I, to promote your hap-

'happiness, as you call it, destroy all my 'future peace of mind?'

'You trifle with me, my dear life, just 'as our better prospects begin to open. 'The way is clear; just now it is clear; 'but you may be prevented in a mo'ment. What is it you doubt?—May 'I perish eternally, if your will shall not 'be a law to me in every thing! All 'my relations expect you. Your own 'appointment calls upon you. Next 'Wednesday!—Dearest creature! think 'of next Wednesday!—And to what is 'it I urge you, but to take a step that 'sooner than any other will reconcile 'you to all whom you have most reason 'to value in your family?'

'Let me judge for myself, Sir. Do 'not you, who blame my friends for en'deavouring to compel me, yourself seek 'to compel me: I won't bear it. Your 'earnestness gives me greater appre'hensions, and greater reluctance. Let 'me go back, then—Let me, before it 'is too late, go back, that it may not be 'worse for both—What mean you by 'this forcible treatment? Is it thus that 'I am to judge of the entire submission 'to my will which you have so often 'vowed?—Unhand me this moment, or 'I will cry out for help.'

'I will obey you, my dearest creature!' —And quitted my hand with a look full of tender despondency, that, knowing the violence of his temper, half-concerned me for him. Yet I was hastening from him, when, with a solemn air, looking upon his sword, but catching, as it were, his hand from it, he folded both his arms, as if a sudden thought had recovered him from an intended rashness.

'Stay one moment—But one moment 'stay, O best beloved of my soul!—'Your retreat is secure, if you will go: 'the key lies down at the door.—But, 'O Madam, next Wednesday, and you 'are Mr. Solmes's!—Fly me not so ea'gerly—Hear me but a few words.'

When near the garden door, I stopped; and was the more satisfied, as I saw the key there, by which I could let myself in again at pleasure, But, being uneasy lest I should be missed, told him, I could stay no longer. I had already staid too long. I would write to him all my reasons. 'And depend upon it, Mr. 'Lovelace,' said I, [just upon the point of stooping for the key, in order to return] 'I will die, rather than have that 'man. You know what I have pro'mised, if I find myself in danger.'

'One word, Madam, however; one 'word more,' [approaching me, his arms still folded, as if, as I thought, he would not be tempted to mischief.]' Remember 'only, that I come at your appointment, 'to redeem you, at the hazard of my 'life, from your gaolers and persecu'tors, with a resolution, God is my wit'ness, or may he for ever blast me!' [that was his shocking imprecation] 'to be a father, uncle, brother, and, as 'I humbly hoped, in your own good 'time, a husband to you, all in one. But 'since I find you are so ready to cry out 'for help against me, which must bring 'down upon me the vengeance of all 'your family, I am contented to run all 'risques. I will not ask you to retreat 'with me; I will attend you into the 'garden, and into the house, if I am not 'intercepted.

'Nay, be not surprized, Madam. 'The help you would have called for, 'I will attend you to; for I will face 'them all: but not as a revenger, if they 'provoke me not too much. You shall 'see what I can further bear for your 'sake—And let us both see, if expostu'lation, and the behaviour of a gentle'man to them, will not procure me the 'treatment due to a gentleman from 'them.'

Had he offered to draw his sword upon himself, I was prepared to have despised him for supposing me such a poor novice, as to be intimidated by an artifice so common. But this resolution, uttered with so serious an air, of accompanying me in to my friends, made me gasp with terror.

'What mean you, Mr. Lovelace?' said I: 'I beseech you leave me— 'Leave me, Sir, I beseech you.'

'Excuse me, Madam! I beg you to 'excuse me. I have long enough skulk'ed like a thief about these lonely walls '—Long, too long, have I borne the 'insults of your brother, and other of 'your relations. Absence but heightens 'malice. I am desperate. I have but 'this one chance for it; for is not the 'day after to-morrow Wednesday? I 'have encouraged virulence by my 'tameness.—Yet tame I will still be. 'You shall see, Madam, what I will 'bear for your sake. My sword shall 'be put sheathed into your hands.' [And he offered it to me in the scabbard]— 'My heart, if you please,' clapping one hand upon his breast, 'shall afford a 'sheath for your brother's sword. Life 'is nothing if I lose you—Be pleased, 'Madam, to shew me the way into the 'garden,' [moving towards the door.]

'I will

'I will attend you, though to my fate! —But too happy, be it what it will, if 'I receive it in your preſence. Lead 'on, dear creature!' [putting his ſword into his belt]—'You ſhall ſee what I 'can bear for you.' And he ſtooped and took up the key, and offered it to the lock; but dropped it again, without opening the door, upon my earneſt expoſtulations.

'What can you mean, Mr. Lovelace?' —ſaid I—'Would you thus expoſe 'yourſelf? Would you thus expoſe me? '—Is this your generoſity? Is every-'body to take advantage thus of the 'weakneſs of my temper?'

And I wept. I could not help it.

He threw himſelf upon his knees at my feet—'Who can bear,' ſaid he, [with an ardour that could not be feigned, his own eyes gliſtening] 'who can 'bear to behold ſuch ſweet emotion? '—O charmer of my heart,' [and, reſpectfully ſtill kneeling, he took my hand with both his, preſſing it to his lips] 'command me with you, command me 'from you; in every way I am all im-'plicit obedience—But I appeal to all 'you know of your relations cruelty to 'you, their determined malice againſt 'me, and as determined favour to the 'man you tell me you hate; (and, oh! 'Madam, if you did not hate him, I 'ſhould hardly think there would be a 'merit in your approbation, place it 'where you would)—I appeal to every-'thing you know, to all you have ſuffer-'ed, whether you have not reaſon to be 'apprehenſive of that Wedneſday, which 'is my terror!—Whether you can poſ-'ſibly have ſuch another opportunity '—The chariot ready: my friends with 'impatience expecting the reſult of your 'own appointment: a man whoſe will 'ſhall be entirely your will, imploring 'you, thus, on his knees imploring you '—to be your own miſtreſs; that is all: 'nor will I aſk for your favour, but as upon 'full proof I ſhall appear to deſerve it. 'Fortune, alliance, unobjectible!—O 'my beloved creature!' preſſing my hand once more to his lips, 'let not 'ſuch an opportunity ſlip. You never, 'never, will have ſuch another.'

I bid him riſe. He aroſe; and I told him, that were I not thus unaccountably hurried by his impatience, I doubted not to convince him, that both he and I had looked upon next Wedneſday with greater apprehenſions than was neceſſary. I was proceeding to give him my reaſons, but he broke in upon me.

'Had I, Madam, but the ſhadow of 'a probability to hope what you hope, I 'would be all obedience and reſigna-'tion. But the licence is actually got; 'the parſon is provided; the pedant 'Brand is the man. O my deareſt crea-'ture, do theſe preparations mean only 'a trial?'

'You know not, Sir, were the worſt 'to be intended, and weak as you think 'me, what a ſpirit I have: you know 'not what I can do, and how I can re-'ſiſt, when I think myſelf meanly or 'unreaſonably dealt with: nor do you 'know what I have already ſuffered, 'what I have already borne, knowing 'to whoſe unbrotherly inſtigations all 'is to be aſcribed—'

'I may expect all things, Madam,' interrupted he, 'from the nobleneſs of 'your mind. But your ſpirits may fail 'you—What may not be apprehended 'from the invincible temper of a father 'ſo poſitive, to a daughter ſo dutiful? '—Fainting will not ſave you: they 'will not, perhaps, be ſorry for ſuch an 'effect of their barbarity. What will 'ſignify expoſtulations againſt a cere-'mony performed? Muſt not all, the 'dreadful all, follow, that is torture to 'my heart but to think of? Nobody to 'appeal to, of what avail will your re-'ſiſtance be againſt the conſequences of a 'rite witneſſed to by the impoſers of it; 'and thoſe your neareſt relations?'

I was ſure, I ſaid, of procuring a delay at leaſt. Many ways I had to procure delay. Nothing could be ſo fatal to us both, as for me now to be found with him. My apprehenſions on this ſcore, I told him, grew too ſtrong for my heart. I ſhould think very hardly of him, if he ſought to detain me longer. But his acquieſcence ſhould engage my gratitude.

And then ſtooping to take up the key to let myſelf into the garden, he ſtarted, and looked as if he had heard ſomebody near the door, on the inſide; clapping his hand on his ſword.

This frighted me ſo, that I thought I ſhould have ſunk down at his feet. But he inſtantly re-aſſured me: he thought, he ſaid, he had heard a ruſtling againſt the door; but had it been ſo, the noiſe would have been ſtronger. It was only the effect of his apprehenſion for me!'

And then taking up the key, he preſented it to me—'If you will go, Ma-'dam—Yet I cannot, cannot leave you! '—I muſt enter the garden with you— 'Forgive me, but I muſt enter the gar-'den with you.'

'And will you, will you thus unge-

'neroufly,

'nerously, Mr. Lovelace, take advantage of my fears?—of my wishes to prevent mischief? I, vain fool, to be concerned for every-one; nobody for me!'

'Dearest creature!' interrupted he, holding my hand, as I tremblingly offered to put the key to the lock—'Let me, if you will go, open the door. But once more, consider, could you possibly obtain that delay which seems to be your only dependence, whether you may not be closer confined? I know they have already had that in consideration. Will you not, in this case, be prevented from corresponding either with Miss Howe, or with me?—Who then shall assist you in your escape?—From your chamber-window only permitted to view the garden you must not enter into, how will you wish for the opportunity you now have, if your hatred to Solmes continue!—But, alas! that cannot continue. If you go back, it must be from the impulses of a yielding (which you'll call a dutiful) heart, tired and teazed out of your own will.'

'I have no patience, Sir, to be thus constrained. Must I never be at liberty to follow my own judgment? Be the consequence what it may, I will not be thus constrained.'

And then, freeing my hand, I again offered the key to the door.

Down the ready kneeler dropt between me and that: 'And can you, can you, Madam, once more on my knees let me ask you, look with an indifferent eye upon the evils that may follow? Provoked as I have been, and triumphed over as I shall be, if your brother succeeds, my own heart shudders, at times, at the thoughts of what must happen; and can yours be unconcerned? Let me beseech you, dearest creature, to consider all these things; and lose not this only opportunity. My intelligence—'

'Never, Mr. Lovelace,' interrupted I, 'give so much credit to the words of a traitor. Your base intelligencer is but a servant. He may pretend to know more than he has grounds for, in order to earn the wages of corruption. You know not what contrivances I can find out.'

I was once more offering the key to the lock, when, starting from his knees, with a voice of affrightment, loudly whispering, and as if out of breath, 'They are at the door, my beloved creature!' And taking the key from me, he fluttered with it, as if he would double-lock it. And instantly a voice from within cried out, bursting against the door, as if to break it open, the person repeating his violent pushes, 'Are you there?—Come up this moment!—This moment!—Here they are—Here they are both together!—Your pistol this moment!—Your gun!'—Then another push, and another. He at the same moment drew his sword, and clapping it naked under his arm, took both my trembling hands in his; and, drawing me swiftly after him, 'Fly, fly, my charmer! this moment is all you have for it!' said he.—'Your brother!—Your uncles!—Or this Solmes!—They will instantly burst the door.—Fly, my dearest life! if you would not be more cruelly used than ever—If you would not see two or three murders committed at your feet, fly, fly, I beseech you!'

'O Lord!—Help, help!' cried the fool, all in amaze and confusion, frighted beyond the power of controuling.

Now behind me, now before me, now on this side, now on that, turned I my affrighted face, in the same moment; expecting a furious brother here, armed servants there, an enraged sister screaming, and a father armed with terror in his countenance more dreadful than even the drawn sword which I saw, or those I apprehended. I ran as fast as he; yet knew not that I ran; my fears adding wings to my feet, at the same time that they took all power of thinking from me—My fears, which probably would not have suffered me to know what course to take, had I not had him to urge and draw me after him: especially as I beheld a man, who must have come out of the door, keeping us in his eye, running now towards us; then back to the garden; beckoning and calling to others, whom I supposed he saw, although the turning of the wall hindered me from seeing them; and whom I imagined to be my brother, my father, and their servants.

Thus terrified, I was got out of sight of the door in a very few minutes: and then, although quite breathless between running and apprehension, he put my arm under his, his drawn sword in the other hand, and hurried me on still faster: my voice, however, contradicting my action; crying, 'No, no, no,' all the while; straining my neck to look back, as long as the walls of the garden and park were within sight, and till he brought me to the chariot; where, attending, were two armed servants of his own, and two of Lord M.'s on horseback.

LOVELACE artfully Carries off CLARISSA from her FATHERS HOUSE.

Published by Alexr Hogg. Sept 21. 1793.

Here I muſt ſuſpend my relation for a while: for now I am come to this ſad period of it, my indiſcretion ſtares me in the face; and my ſhame and my grief give me a compunction that is more poignant, methinks, than if I had a dagger in my heart. To have it to reflect, that I ſhould ſo inconſiderately give in to an interview, which, had I known either myſelf or him, or in the leaſt conſidered the circumſtances of the caſe, I might have ſuppoſed, would put me into the power of his reſolution, and out of that of my own reaſon.

For, might I not have believed, that he, who thought he had cauſe to apprehend that he was on the point of loſing a perſon who had coſt him ſo much pains and trouble, would not hinder her, if poſſible, from returning? That he, who knew I had promiſed to give him up for ever, if inſiſted on as a condition of reconciliation, would not endeavour to put it out of my power to do ſo? In ſhort, that he, who had artfully forborne to ſend for my letter, (for he could not be watched, my dear) leſt he ſhould find in it a countermand to my appointment, (as I myſelf could apprehend, although I profited not by the apprehenſion) would want a device to keep me with him till the danger of having our meeting diſcovered might throw me abſolutely into his power, to avoid my own worſe uſage, and the miſchiefs which might have enſued, (perhaps in my very ſight) had my friends and he met?

But if it ſhould come out, that the perſon within the garden was his corrupted implement, employed to frighten me away with him, do you think, my dear, that I ſhall not have reaſon to hate him and myſelf ſtill more? I hope his heart cannot be ſo deep and ſo vile a one: I hope it cannot! But how came it to paſs, that one man could get out at the garden-door, and no more? How, that that man kept aloof, as it were, and purſued us not; nor ran back to alarm the houſe? My fright, and my diſtance, would not let me be certain; but really this man, as I now recollect, had the air of that vile Joſeph Leman.

O why, why, my dear friends!—But wherefore blame I them, when I had argued myſelf into a hope, not improbable, that even the dreadful trial I was to undergo ſo ſoon, might turn out better than if I had been directly carried away from the preſence of my once indulgent parents, who might poſſibly intend that trial to be the laſt I ſhould have had?

Would to Heaven, that I had ſtood it, however! Then if I had afterwards done, what now I have been prevailed upon, or perhaps fooliſhly frightened to do, I ſhould not have been ſtung ſo much by inward reproach as now I am: and this would have been a great evil avoided.

You know, my dear, that your Clariſſa's mind was ever above juſtifying her own failings by thoſe of others. God forgive thoſe of my friends who have acted cruelly by me! But their faults are their own, and not excuſes for mine. And mine began early: for I ought not to have correſponded with him.

O the vile encroacher! how my indignation, at times, riſes at him! Thus to lead a young creature (too much indeed relying upon her own ſtrength) from evil to evil!—This laſt evil, although the remote, yet ſure conſequence of my firſt—my prohibited correſpondence! By a father early prohibited.

How much more properly had I acted, with regard to that correſpondence, had I, once for all, when he was forbidden to viſit me, and I to receive his viſits, pleaded the authority by which I ought to have been bound, and denied to write to him!—But I thought I could proceed or ſtop, as I pleaſed. I ſuppoſed it concerned me, more than any other, to be the arbitreſs of the quarrels of unruly ſpirits—And now I find my preſumption puniſhed—Puniſhed, as other ſins frequently are, by itſelf!

As to this laſt raſhneſs; now, that it is too late, I plainly ſee how I ought to have conducted myſelf. As he knew I had but one way of tranſmitting to him the knowledge of what befel me; as he knew, that my fate was upon a criſis with my friends; and that I had, in my letter to him, reſerved the liberty of revocation; I ſhould not have been ſolicitous whether he had got my letter or not: when he had come, and found I did not anſwer his ſignal, he would preſently have reſorted to the looſe bricks, and there been ſatisfied by the date of my letter, that it was his own fault, that he had it not before. But, governed by the ſame pragmatical motives which induced me to correſpond with him at firſt, I was again afraid, truly, with my fooliſh and buſy preſcience, that the diſappointment would have thrown him into the way of receiving freſh inſults from the ſame perſons; which might have made him guilty of ſome violence to them. And ſo, to ſave him an apprehended raſhneſs, I have ruſhed into a real one myſelf. And what vexes me more, is, that it is plain to me now, by all his behaviour, that he had as great a confidence in my weakneſs, as I had in my own ſtrength. And ſo, in a point entirely relative to my honour, he has triumphed; for he has not been miſtaken in me, whilſt I have in myſelf!

Tell me, my dear Miſs Howe, tell me truly, if your unbiaſſed heart does not deſpiſe me?—It muſt! for your mind and mine were ever one; and I deſpiſe myſelf!—And well I may: for could the goddeſt and moſt inconſiderate girl in England have done worſe than I ſhall appear to have done in the eye of the world? Since my crime will be known without the provocations, and without the artifices of the betrayer too; while it will be a high aggravation, that better things were expected from me, than from many others.

You charge me to marry the firſt opportunity—Ah! my dear! another of the bleſſed effects of my folly—That's as much in my power now as—as I am myſelf!—And can I beſides give a ſanction immediately to his deluding arts?—Can I avoid being angry with him for tricking me thus, as I may ſay, (and as I have called it to him) out of myſelf?—For compelling me to take a ſtep ſo contrary to all my reſolutions, and aſſurances given to you; a ſtep ſo dreadfully inconvenient to myſelf; ſo diſgraceful and ſo grievous (as it muſt be) to my dear mother, were I to be leſs regardful of any other of my family or friends—You don't know, nor can you imagine, my dear, how I am mortified!—How much I am ſunk in my own opinion!—I, that was propoſed for an example, truly, to others!—O that I were again in my father's houſe, ſtealing down with a letter to you; my heart beating with expectation of finding one from you!

THIS is the Wedneſday morning I dreaded ſo much, that I once thought of it as the day of my doom: but of the Monday, it is plain, I ought to have been moſt apprehenſive. Had I ſtaid, and had the worſt I dreaded happened, my friends would then have been anſwerable for the conſequences, if any bad ones had followed—But now, I have this only conſolation left me, (a very poor one, you'll ſay!) that I have cleared them of blame, and taken it all upon myſelf!

You will not wonder to ſee this narrative ſo diſmally ſcrawled. It is owing to different pens and ink, all bad, and written by ſnatches of time; my hand trembling too with fatigue and grief.

I will not add to the length of it, by the particulars of his behaviour to me, and of our converſation at St. Alban's, and ſince; becauſe thoſe will come in courſe in the continuation of my ſtory; which no doubt you will expect from me.

Only thus much I will ſay, that he is extremely reſpectful (even obſequiouſly ſo) at preſent, though I am ſo much diſſatisfied with him and myſelf, that he has hitherto had no great cauſe to praiſe my complaiſance to him. Indeed, I can hardly, at times, bear the ſeducer in my ſight.

The lodgings I am in are inconvenient. I ſhall not ſtay in them: ſo it ſignifies nothing to tell you how to direct to me hither. And where my next may be, as yet I know not.

He knows that I am writing to you; and has offered to ſend my letter, when finiſhed, by a ſervant of his. But I thought I could not be too cautious, as I am now ſituated, in having a letter of this importance conveyed to you. Who knows what ſuch a man may do? So very wicked a contriver! The contrivance, if a contrivance, to get me away, ſo inſolently mean!—But I hope it is not a contrivance neither!—Yet, be that as it will, I muſt ſay, that the beſt of him, and of my proſpects with him, are bad: and yet, having enrolled myſelf among the too-late repenters, who ſhall pity me?

Nevertheleſs, I will dare to hope for a continued intereſt in your affections, [I ſhall be miſerable indeed if I may not!] and to be remembered in your daily prayers. For neither time nor accident ſhall ever make me ceaſe to be your faithful and affectionate

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER L.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOSEPH LEMAN.

SAT. APRIL 8.

HONEST JOSEPH,

AT length your beloved young lady has conſented to free herſelf from the cruel treatment ſhe has ſo long borne. She is to meet me without the garden-door at about four o'clock on Monday afternoon. I told you ſhe had promiſed to do ſo. She has confirmed her promiſe. Thank Heaven, ſhe has confirmed her promiſe.

I ſhall have a chariot-and-ſix ready in the by-road fronting the private path to

Harlowe

Harlowe Paddock; and ſeveral of my friends and ſervants not far off, armed to protect her, if there be occaſion: but every-one charged to avoid miſchief. That, you know, has always been my principal care.

All my fear is, that when ſhe comes to the point, the over-niceneſs of her principles will make her waver, and want to go back: although her honour is my honour, you know, and mine is hers. If ſhe ſhould, and ſhould I be unable to prevail upon her, all your paſt ſervices will avail nothing, and ſhe will be loſt to me for ever: the prey then of that curſed Solmes, whoſe vile ſtiagineſs will never permit him to do good to any of the ſervants of the family.

Be very mindful, therefore, of the following directions: take them into your heart.

Contrive to be in the garden, in diſguiſe, if poſſible, and unſeen by your young lady. If you find the garden-door unbolted, you will know that ſhe and I are together, although you ſhould not ſee her go out at it. It will be locked, but my key ſhall be on the ground juſt without the door, that you may open it with yours, as it may be needful.

If you hear our voices parleying, keep at the door till I cry 'Hem, hem,' twice: but be watchful for this ſignal; for I muſt not hem very loud, leſt ſhe ſhould take it for a ſignal. Perhaps, in ſtruggling to prevail upon the dear creature, I may have an opportunity to ſtrike the door hard with my elbow, or heel, to confirm you—Then you are to make a violent burſt againſt the door, as if you would break it open, drawing backward and forward the bolt in a hurry: then, with another puſh, but with more noiſe than ſtrength, leſt the lock give way, cry out, (as if you ſaw ſome of the family) 'Come up, come up, inſtantly!—Here 'they are! Here they are!—Haſten!—'This inſtant! haſten!' And mention ſwords, piſtols, guns, with as terrible a voice as you can cry out with. Then ſhall I prevail upon her, no doubt, if loth before, to fly. If I cannot, I will enter the garden with her, and the houſe too, be the conſequence what it will. But ſo affrighted, there is no queſtion but ſhe will fly.

When you think us at ſufficient diſtance, [and I ſhall raiſe my voice urging her ſwifter flight, that you may gueſs at that] then open the door with your key: but you muſt be ſure to open it very cautiouſly, leſt we ſhould not be far enough off. I would not have her know you have a hand in this matter, out of my great regard to you.

When you have opened the door, take your key out of the lock, and put it in your pocket: then ſtooping for mine, put it in the lock on the inſide, that it may appear as if the door was opened by herſelf, with a key, which they will ſuppoſe of my procuring, (it being new) and left open by us.

They ſhould conclude ſhe is gone off by her own conſent, that they may not purſue us: that they may ſee no hopes of tempting her back again. In either caſe, miſchief might happen, you know.

But you muſt take notice, that you are only to open the door with your key, in caſe none of the family came up to interrupt us, and before we are quite gone: for, if they do, you'll find by what follows, that you muſt not open the door at all. Let them, on breaking it open, or by getting over the wall, find my key on the ground, if they will.

If they do not come to interrupt us, and if you, by help of your key, come out, follow us at a diſtance; and, with uplifed hands, and wild and impatient geſtures, (running backward and forward, for fear you ſhould come too near us; and as if you ſaw ſomebody coming to your aſſiſtance) cry out for help, help, and to haſten. Then ſhall we be ſoon at the chariot.

Tell the family, that you ſaw me enter a chariot with her: a dozen, or more, men on horſeback, attending us; all armed: ſome with blunderbuſſes, as you believe; and that we took the quite contrary way to that we ſhall take.

You ſee, honeſt Joſeph, how careful I am, as well as you, to avoid miſchief.

Obſerve to keep at ſuch a diſtance that ſhe may not diſcover who you are. Take long ſtrides, to alter your gaite; and hold up your head, honeſt Joſeph; and ſhe'll not know it to be you. Mens airs and gaites are as various and as peculiar as their faces. Pluck a ſtake out of one of the hedges; and tug at it, though it may come eaſy: this, if ſhe turn back, will look terrible, and account for your not following us faſter. Then, returning with it, ſhouldered, brag to the family what you would have done, could you have overtaken us, rather than your young lady ſhould have been carried off by ſuch a—And you may call me names, and curſe me. And theſe airs will make you look valiant, and in earneſt. You ſee, honeſt Joſeph, I am always contriving to give you reputation. No man ſuffers by ſerving me.

But, if our parley ſhould laſt longer than I with; and if any of their friends miſs her before I cry, 'Hem, hem,' twice; then, in order to ſave yourſelf, (which is a very great point with me, I aſſure you) make the ſame noiſe as above: but, as I directed before, open not the door with your key. On the contrary, wiſh for a key with all your heart; but for fear any of them ſhould by accident have a key about them, keep in readineſs half a dozen little gravel-ſtones, no bigger than peas, and thruſt two or three ſlily into the key-hole; which will hinder their key from turning round. It is good, you know, Joſeph to provide againſt every accident in ſuch an important caſe as this. And let this be your cry, inſtead of the other, if any of my enemies come in your ſight, as you ſeem to be trying to burſt the door open, 'Sir! Sir!' or, 'Madam! Madam! O 'Lord, haſten! O Lord, haſten! Mr. 'Lovelace!—Mr. Lovelace!'—And very loud—And that ſhall quicken me more than it ſhall thoſe you call to.—If it be Betty, and only Betty, I ſhall think worſe of your art of making love, than of your fidelity, if you can't find a way to amuſe her, and put her upon a falſe ſcent.

You muſt tell them, that your young lady ſeemed to run as faſt off with me, as I with her. This will alſo confirm to them that all purſuit is in vain. An end will hereby be put to Solmes's hopes: and her friends, after a while, will be more ſtudious to be reconciled to her, than to get her back. So you will be an happy inſtrument of great good to all round. And this will one day be acknowledged by both families. You will then be every-one's favourite; and every good ſervant, for the future, will be proud to be likened to honeſt Joſeph Leman.

If ſhe ſhould gueſs at you, or find you out, I have it already in my head to write a letter for you to copy; which occaſionally produced, will ſet you right.

This one time be diligent, be careful; this will be the crown of all: and depend for a recompence upon the honour of your aſſured friend, R. LOVELACE.

LETTER LI.

TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQUIRE.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 9.

HONNERED SIR,

I Muſt confeſſe I am infinnitely obliged to your honner's bounty. But this laſt command!—It ſeems ſo intricket! Lord be merciful to me, how have I been led from little ſtepps to grate ſtepps! —And if I ſhould be found out!—But your honner ſays, you will take me into your honner's ſarviſe, and proteckt me, if as I ſhould at any time be found out; and raiſe my wages beſides; or ſet me upp in a good inne; which is my ambition. And you will be honnerable and kind to my deareſt young lady. God love her.—But who can be unkind to ſhe?

I will do the beſt I am able, ſince your honner will be apt to loſe her, as your honner ſays if I do not; and a man ſo ſingle will be apt to gain her. But mayhap my deareſte young lady will not make all this trubble needful. If ſhe has promiſſed, ſhe will ſtand to it, I dare to ſay.

I love your honner for contriveing to ſave miſchiff ſo weſl. I thought till I know'd your honner, that you was verry miſchevous, and pleſe your honner: but find it to be clene contrary. Your honner, it is plane, means mighty well by every-body, as far as I ſee. As I am ſure I do myſelf; for I am, althoff a very plane man, and all that, a very honneſt one; I thank my God. And have good principels, and have kept my young lady's preſſents always in mind: for ſhe goes nowhere, but ſaves a ſoul or two, more or leſs.

So, commending myſelf to your honner's further favour, not forgetting the inne, when your honner ſhall ſo pleaſe, and a good one offers; for plaſes are no inherritanſes now-a-days. And, I hope, your honner will not think me a diſhoneſt man for ſarvinge your honner againſt my duty, as it may lock; but only as my conſhence clears me.

Be pleaſed, howſomever, if it like your honner not to call me, honneſt Joſeph, and honneſt Joſeph, ſo often. For, althoff I think myſelf very honneſt, and all that; yet I am touched a little, for fear I ſhould not do the quite right thing: and too beſides, your honner has ſuch a feſſethious way with you, as that I hardly know whether you are in jeſt or earneſt, when your honner calls me honeſt ſo often.

I am a very plane man, and ſeldom have writ to ſuch honourable gentlemen; ſo you will be good enuff to paſs by every-thing, as I have often ſaid, and need not now ſay over again.

I reſte, your honner's dewtiful ſarvant to command, JOSEPH LEMAN.

VOLUME THE THIRD.

LETTER I.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

ST. ALBAN'S, MONDAY NIGHT.

I Snatch a few moments while my beloved is retired [as I hope, to reſt] to perform my promiſe. No purſuit—Nor have I apprehenſions of any; though I muſt make my charmer dread that there will be one.

And now, let me tell thee, that never was joy ſo complete as mine!—But let me enquire—Is not the angel flown away?

O NO! She is in the next apartment!—Securely mine!—Mine for ever!

O extaſy!—My heart will burſt my breaſt,
To leap into her boſom!

I knew that the whole ſtupid family were in a combination to do my buſineſs for me. I told thee that they were all working for me, like ſo many underground moles; and ſtill more blind than the moles are ſaid to be, unknowing that they did ſo. I myſelf, the director of their principal motions; which falling in with the malice of their little hearts, they took to be all their own.

But did I ſay my joy was perfect?—O no!—It receives ſome abatement from my diſguiſed bride. For how can I endure to think, that I owe more to her relations perſecutions, than to her favour for me?—Or even, as far as I know, to her preference of me to another man?

But let me not indulge this thought. Were I to do ſo, it might coſt my charmer dear. Let me rejoice, that ſhe has paſſed the Rubicon; that ſhe cannot return; that, as I have ordered it, the flight will appear to the implacables to be altogether with her own conſent; and that if I doubt her love, I can put her to trials as mortifying to her niceneſs, as glorious to my pride.—For, let me tell thee, dearly as I love her, if I thought there was but the ſhadow of a doubt in her mind, whether ſhe preferred me to any man living, I would ſhew her no mercy.

TUESDAY, DAY-DAWN.

BUT, on the wings of love, I fly to my charmer, who perhaps by this time is riſing to encourage the tardy dawn. I have not ſlept a wink of the hour and half I lay down to invite ſleep. It ſeems to me, that I am not ſo much body, as to require ſuch vulgar renovation.

But why, as in the chariot, as in the inn, at alighting, all heart-burſting grief, my deareſt creature? So perſecuted as thou wert perſecuted!—So much in danger of the moſt abhorred compulſion!—Yet grief ſo unſuſpectedly ſincere for an eſcape ſo critical!—Take care—O beloved of my ſoul! for jealous is the heart in which love has erected a temple to thee.

Yet, it muſt be allowed, that ſuch a ſudden tranſition muſt affect her; muſt ice her over. When a little more uſed to her new ſituation; when her hurries are at an end; when ſhe ſees how religiouſly I ſhall obſerve all her INJUNCTIONS; ſhe will undoubtedly have the gratitude to diſtinguiſh between the confinement ſhe has eſcaped from, and the liberty ſhe has reaſon to rejoice in.

She comes! ſhe comes!—And the ſun is juſt riſing to attend her!—Adieu! —Be half as happy as I am, (for all diffidences, like night-fogs before the ſun, diſperſe at her approach) and, next myſelf, thou wilt be the happieſt man in the world.

LETTER II.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 12.

I Will purſue my melancholy ſtory. Being thus hurried to the chariot, it would have been to no purpoſe to have refuſed entering into it, had he not in my fright lifted me in, as he did: and it inſtantly drove away a full gallop, and ſtopped not till it brought us to St. Alban's; which was juſt as the day ſhut in.

I thought I ſhould have fainted ſeveral times by the way. With uplifted hands and eyes, 'God protect me!' ſaid I often to myſelf—'Can it be I, that am here!'—My eyes running over, and my heart ready to burſt with ſighs as involuntary as my flight.

How different, how inexpreſſibly different, the gay wretch; viſibly triumphing (as I could not but conſtrue his almoſt rapturous joy) in the ſucceſs of his arts! But overflowing with complimental flouriſhes, yet reſpectfully diſtant his addreſs, all the way we flew; for that rather than galloping, was the motion of the horſes; which took, as I believe, a round-about way, to prevent being traced.

I have reaſon to think, there were other horſemen at his devotion; three or four different perſons, above the rank of ſervants, galloping by us now-and-then on each ſide of the chariot: but he took no notice of them; and I had too much grief, mingled with indignation, notwithſtanding all his blandiſhments, to aſk any queſtions about them, or anything elſe.

Think, my dear, what were my thoughts on alighting from the chariot; having no attendant of my own ſex; no cloaths but what I had on, and thoſe little ſuited for ſuch a journey as I had already taken, and was ſtill to take: neither hood nor hat, nor any-thing but a handkerchief about my neck and ſhoulders. Fatigued to death: my mind ſtill more fatigued than my body; and in ſuch a foam the horſes, that every-one in the inn we put up at gueſſed [They could not do otherwiſe] that I was a young giddy creature, who had run away from her friends. This it was eaſy to ſee, by their whiſpering and gaping; more of the people of the houſe alſo coming in by turns, than were neceſſary for the attendance.

The miſtreſs of the houſe, whom he ſent in to me, ſhewed me another apartment, and, ſeeing me ready to faint, brought me hartſhorn and water; and then, upon my deſiring to be left alone for half an hour, retired: for I found my heart ready to burſt, on revolving every-thing in my thoughts. And the moment ſhe was gone, faſtening the door, I threw myſelf into an old great chair, and gave way to a violent flood of tears; which a little relieved me.

Mr. Lovelace, ſooner than I wiſhed, ſent up the gentlewoman, who preſſed me, in his name, to admit my brother, or to come down to him: for he had told her I was his ſiſter; and that he had brought me, againſt my will, and without warning, from a friend's houſe, where I had been all the winter, in order to prevent my marrying againſt the conſent of my friends; to whom he was now conducting me; and that, having given me no time for a travelling-dreſs, I was greatly offended at him.

So, my dear, your frank, your open-hearted friend, was forced to countenance this tale; which indeed ſuited me the better, becauſe I was unable for ſome time to talk, ſpeak, or look up; and ſo my dejection, and grief, and ſilence, might very well paſs before the gentlewoman and her niece who attended me, as a fit of ſullenneſs.

The room I was in being a bed-chamber, I choſe to go down, at his repeated meſſage, attended by the miſtreſs of the houſe, to that in which he was. He approached me with great reſpect, yet not exceeding a brotherly politeneſs, where a brother is polite; and, calling me his deareſt ſiſter, aſked after the ſtate of my mind; and hoped I would forgive him; for never brother half ſo well loved a ſiſter, as he me.

A wretch! How naturally did he fall into the character, although I was ſo much out of mine!

Unthinking creatures have ſome comfort in the ſhortneſs of their views; in their unapprehenſiveneſs; and that they penetrate not beyond the preſent moment: in ſhort that they are unthinking! —But, for a perſon of my thoughtful diſpoſition, who has been accuſtomed to look forward, as well to the poſſible, as to the probable, what comfort can I have in my reflections?

But let me give you the particulars of our converſation a little before and after our ſupper-time, joining both in one.

When we were alone, he beſought me (I cannot ſay but with all the tokens of a paſſionate and reſpectful tenderneſs) to be better reconciled to myſelf and to him: he repeated all the vows of honour and inviolable affection that he ever made me: he promiſed to be wholly governed by me in every future ſtep. He aſked me to give him leave to propoſe, whether I choſe to ſet out next day to either of his aunts?

I was ſilent. I knew not what to ſay, nor what to do.

Whether I choſe to have private lodgings procured for me, in either of thoſe ladies neighbourhood, as were once my thoughts?

I was ſtill ſilent.

Whether I choſe to go to either of Lord M.'s ſeats; that of Berks, or that in the county we were in?

In lodgings, I ſaid, any-where, where he was not to be.

He had promiſed this, he owned; and he would religiouſly keep to his word, as ſoon as he found all danger of purſuit over; and that I was ſettled to my mind. But, if the place were indifferent to me, London was the ſafeſt, and the moſt private: and his relations ſhould all viſit me there, the moment I thought fit to admit them. His couſin Charlotte particularly, ſhould attend me, as my companion, if I would accept of her, as ſoon as ſhe was able to go abroad. Mean time, would I go to Lady Betty Lawrance's, (Lady Sarah was a melancholy woman!) I ſhould be the moſt welcome gueſt ſhe ever received.

I told him, I wiſhed not to go (immediately, however, and in the frame I was in, and likely not to be out of) to any of his relations: that my reputation was concerned, to have him abſent from me; that, if I were in ſome private lodging, the meaner the leſs to be ſuſpected, (as it would be known, that I went away by his means; and he would be ſuppoſed to have provided me handſome accommodations) it would be moſt ſuitable both to my mind and to my ſituation. That this might be beſt, I ſhould think, in the country for me; in town for him. And no matter how ſoon he was known to be there.

If he might deliver his opinion, he ſaid, it was, that ſince I declined going to any of his relations, London was the only place in the world to be private in. Every new comer in a country-town or village excited a curioſity: a perſon of my figure [And many compliments he made me] would excite more. Even meſſages and letters, where none uſed to be brought, would occaſion enquiry. He had not provided a lodging anywhere, ſuppoſing I would chuſe to go either to London, where accommodations of that ſort might be fixed upon in an hour's time, or to Lady Betty's; or to Lord M.'s Hertfordſhire ſeat, where was the houſekeeper, an excellent woman, Mrs. Greme, ſuch another as my Norton.

To be ſure, I ſaid, if I were purſued, it would be in their firſt paſſion; and ſome one of his relations houſes would be the place they would expect to find me at—I knew not what to do.

My pleaſure ſhould determine him, he ſaid, be it what it would. Only that I were ſafe, was all he was ſolicitous about. He had lodgings in town; but, he did not offer to propoſe them. He knew, I would have more objections to go to them, than I could have to go to Lord M.'s, or to Lady Betty's.

'No doubt of it,' I replied with ſuch an indignation in my manner, as made him run over with profeſſions, that he was far from propoſing them, or wiſhing for my acceptance of them. And again he repeated, That my honour and ſafety were all he was ſolicitous about; aſſuring me, that my will ſhould be a law to him in every particular.

I was too peeviſh, and too much afflicted, and indeed too much incenſed againſt him, to take well any-thing he ſaid.

I thought myſelf, I ſaid, extremely unhappy. I knew not what to determine upon: my reputation now, no doubt, utterly ruined. Deſtitute of cloaths; unfit to be ſeen by any-body: my very indigence, as I might call it, proclaiming my folly to every-one who ſaw me; who would ſuppoſe that I had been taken at advantage, or had given an undue one; and had no power over either my will or my actions. That I could not but think I had been dealt artfully with;—that he had ſeemed to have taken, what he might ſuppoſe, the juſt meaſure of my weakneſs, founded on my youth and inexperience: that I could not forgive myſelf for meeting him; that my heart bled for the diſtreſſes of my father and mother, on this occaſion; that I would give the world, and all my hopes in it, to have been ſtill in my father's houſe, whatever had been my uſage; that, let him proteſt and vow what he would, I ſaw ſome-thing low and selfish in his love, that he could study to put a young creature upon making such a sacrifice of her duty and conscience; when a person, actuated by a generous love, must seek to oblige the object of it, in every-thing essential to her honour, and to her peace of mind.

He was very attentive to all I said; never offering to interrupt me once. His answer to every article, almost methodically, shewed his memory.

What I had said, he told me, had made him very grave; and he would answer accordingly.

He was grieved at his heart, to find that he had so little share in my favour or confidence.

As to my reputation; (he must be very sincere with me) that could not suffer half so much by the step I so greatly regretted to have taken, as by the confinement, and equally foolish and unjust treatment, I had met with from my relations: that every mouth was full of blame of them, of my brother and sister particularly; and of wonder at my patience; that he must repeat what he had written to me he believed more than once, that my friends themselves expected, that I should take a proper opportunity to free myself from their persecutions; why else did they confine me? That my exalted character, as he called it, would still bear me out, with those who knew me; who knew my brother's and sister's motives; and who knew the wretch they were for compelling me to have.

With regard to cloaths; who, as matters were circumstanced, could expect that I should be able to bring away any others than those I had on at the time? For present use to wear, all the ladies of his family would take a pride to supply me: for future, the product of the best looms, not only in England, but throughout the world, were at my command.

If I wanted money, as no doubt I must, he should be proud to supply me: would to Heaven, he might presume to hope, there were but one interest between us!

And then he would fain have had me to accept of a Bank note of an hundred pounds; which, unawares to me, he put into my hand: but which, you may be sure, I refused with warmth.

He was inexpressibly grieved and surprized, he said, to hear me say he had acted artfully by me. He came provided, according to my confirmed appointment, [A wretch to upbraid me thus!] to redeem me from my persecutors; and little expected a change of sentiment, and that he should have so much difficulty to prevail upon me, as he had met with: that perhaps I might think his offer to go into the garden with me, and to face my assembled relations, was a piece of art only; but that if I did, I wronged him: since to this hour, seeing my excessive uneasiness, he wished with all his soul he had been permitted to accompany me in. It was always his maxim to brave a threatened danger. Threateners, where they have an opportunity to put in force their threats, were seldom to be feared. But had he been assured of a private stab, or of as many death's wounds as there were persons in my family, (made desperate as he should have been by my return) he would have attended me into the house.

So, my dear, what I have to do, is to hold myself inexcusable for meeting such a determined and audacious spirit; that's all! I have hardly any question now, but that he would have contrived some wicked stratagem or other to have got me away, had I met him at a midnight hour, as once or twice I had thoughts to do; and that would have been more terrible still.

He concluded this part of his talk, with saying, That he doubted not, but that had he attended me in, he should have come off in every-one's opinion so well, that he should have had general leave to renew his visits.

He went on—He must be so bold as to tell me, that he should have paid a visit of this kind (but indeed accompanied by several of his trusty friends) had I not met him; and that very afternoon too; for he could not tamely let the dreadful Wednesday come, without making some effort to change their determinations.

What, my dear, was to be done with such a man!

That therefore for my sake, as well as for his own, he had reason to wish that a disease so desperate had been attempted to be overcome by as desperate a remedy. 'We all know,' said he, 'that great ends are sometimes brought 'about by the very means by which they 'are endeavoured to be frustrated.'

'My present situation, I am sure,' thought I, 'affords a sad evidence of 'this truth!'

I was silent all this time. My blame was indeed turned inward. Sometimes, too, I was half-frighted at his audaciousness: at others, had the less inclination tion to interrupt him, being exceſſively fatigued, and my ſpirits ſunk to nothing, with the view even of the beſt proſpects with ſuch a man.

This gave him opportunity to proceed: and that he did; aſſuming a ſtill more ſerious air.

As to what further remained for him to ſay, in anſwer to what I had ſaid, he hoped I would pardon him; but, upon his ſoul, he was concerned, infinitely concerned, he repeated, (his colour and his voice riſing) that it was neceſſary for him to obſerve, how much I choſe rather to have run the riſque of being Solmes's wife, than to have it in my power to reward a man who, I muſt forgive him, had been as much inſulted on my account, as I had been on his—who had watched my commands, 'And '(pardon me, Madam) every changeable 'motion of your pen, all hours, in all 'weathers, and with a cheerfulneſs and 'ardour, that nothing but the moſt 'faithful and obſequious paſſion could 'inſpire.'

I now, my dear, began to revive into a little more warmth of attention.

'And all, Madam, for what?'—How I ſtared! for he ſtopt then a moment or two—'Only,' went he on, 'to prevail 'upon you to free yourſelf from unge'nerous and baſe oppreſſion—'

'Sir, Sir!' indignantly ſaid I.

'Hear me but out, deareſt Madam! '—My heart is full—I muſt ſpeak what 'I have to ſay—To be told (for your 'words are yet in my ears, and at my 'heart!) that you would give the world, 'and all your hopes in it, to have been ſtill 'in your cruel and gloomy father's 'houſe—'

'Not a word, Sir, againſt my father! '—I will not bear that.'

'Whatever had been your uſage:—and 'you have a credulity, Madam, againſt 'all probability, if you believe you 'ſhould have avoided being Solmes's 'wife. That I have put you upon ſacri'ficing your duty and conſcience—Yet, 'deareſt creature! ſee you not the con'tradiction that your warmth of temper 'has ſurprized you into, when the re'luctance you ſhewed to the laſt to leave 'your perſecutors, has cleared your 'conſcience from the leaſt reproach of 'this ſort?'

'O Sir! Sir! are you ſo critical then? 'Are you ſo light in your anger, as to 'dwell upon words?'

Indeed, my dear, I have ſince thought, that his anger was not owing to that ſudden impetus, which cannot be eaſily bridled; but rather was a ſort of manageable anger, let looſe to intimidate me.

'Forgive me, Madam—I have juſt 'done—Have I not, in your own opini'on, hazarded my life to redeem you 'from oppreſſion?—Yet is not my re'ward, after all, precarious?—For, Ma'dam, have you not conditioned with me, '(and, hard as the condition is, moſt ſa'credly will I obſerve it) that all my hope 'muſt be remote? That you are determin'ed to have it in your power to favour or 'reject me totally, as you pleaſe?'

See, my dear! in every reſpect my condition changed for the worſe! Is it in my power to take your advice, if I ſhould think it ever ſo right to take it*?

'And have you not furthermore de'clared,' proceeded he, 'that you will 'engage to renounce me for ever, if your 'friends inſiſt upon that cruel renunciation, 'as the terms of being reconciled to you?'

'But nevertheleſs, Madam, all the 'merit of having ſaved you from an 'odious compulſion, ſhall be mine. I 'glory in it, though I were to loſe you 'for ever.—As I ſee I am but too likely to 'do, from your preſent diſpleaſure; and 'eſpecially, if your friends inſiſt upon the 'terms you are ready to comply with.

'That you are your own miſtreſs, through 'my means, is, I repeat, my boaſt. As 'ſuch, I humbly implore your favour—'And that only upon the conditions I have 'yielded to hope for it.—As I do now thus 'humbly' [the proud wretch falling on one knee] 'your forgiveneſs, for ſo long 'detaining your ear, and for all the 'plain-dealing that my undeſigning heart 'would not be denied to utter by my 'lips.'

* Clariſſa has been cenſured as behaving to Mr. Lovelace, in their firſt converſation at St. Alban's, and afterwards, with too much reſerve, and even with haughtineſs. Surely thoſe, who have thought her to blame on this account, have not paid a due attention to the ſtory. How early, as above, and in what immediately follows, does he remind her of the terms of diſtance which ſhe preſcribed to him, before ſhe was in his power, in hopes to have the door open for a reconciliation with her friends, which her heart was ſet upon? And how artfully does he (unrequired) promiſe to obſerve the conditions which ſhe in her preſent circumſtances and ſituation (in purſuance of Miſs Howe's advice) would gladly have diſpenſed with?—To ſay nothing of the reſentment which ſhe was under a neceſſity to ſhew, at the manner of his getting her away, in order to juſtify to him the fierceity of her refuſal to go off with him. See, in her ſubſequent Letter to Miſs Howe, No. V. her own ſenſe upon this ſubject.

'O Sir,

'O Sir, pray rise!—Let the obliged 'kneel, if one of us must kneel!—But 'nevertheless, proceed not in this strain, 'I beseech you. You have had a great 'deal of trouble about me: but had you 'let me know in time, that you expected 'to be rewarded for it at the price of 'my duty, I should have spared you 'much of it.

'Far be it from me, Sir, to depreciate 'merit so extraordinary. But let me say, 'that had it not been for the forbidden 'correspondence I was teazed by you 'into; and which I had not continued '(every letter, for many letters, intend-'ed to be the last) but because I thought 'you a sufferer from my friends; I had 'not been either confined or ill-treated: 'nor would my brother's low-meant 'violence have had a foundation to work 'upon.

'I am far from thinking my case would 'have been so very desperate as you ima-'gine, had I staid. My father loved me, 'in his heart: he would not see me be-'fore; and I wanted only to see him, and 'to be heard; and a delay of his sentence 'was the least thing I expected from the 'trial I was to stand.

'You are boasting of your merits, Sir: 'let merit be your boast; nothing else 'can attract me. If personal considera-'tions had principal weight with me, ei-'ther in Solmes's disfavour, or in your 'favour, I should despise myself: if you 'value yourself upon them, in prefer-'ence to the person of the poor Solmes, 'I shall despise you!

'You may glory in your fancied merits 'in getting me away: but the cause of 'your glory, I tell you plainly, is my 'shame.

'Make to yourself a title to my re-'gard, which I can better approve of; 'or else you will not have so much me-'rit with me, as you have with yourself.

'But here, Sir, like the first pair, (I, 'at least, driven out of my paradise) 'are we recriminating. No more shall 'you need to tell me of your sufferings, 'and your merits!—your all hours, and 'all weathers! for I will bear them in me-'mory as long as I live; and if it be im-'possible for me to reward them, be ever 'ready to own the obligation. All that 'I desire of you now, is, to leave it to 'myself to seek for some private abode: 'to take the chariot with you to London, 'or elsewhere. And, if I have any fur-'ther occasion for your assistance and 'protection, I will signify it to you, and 'be still further obliged to you.'

'You are warm, my dearest life!—'But indeed there is no occasion for it. 'Had I any views unworthy of my faith-'ful love for you, I should not have been 'so honest in my declarations.'

Then he began again to vow the sincerity of his intentions.

But I took him up short; 'I am will-'ing to believe you, Sir. It would be in-'supportable but to suppose there were 'a necessity for such solemn declarations.' [At this he seemed to collect himself, as I may say, into a little more circumspection.] 'If I thought there were, I would 'not sit with you here, in a publick inn, 'I assure you, although cheated hither, 'as far as I know, by methods (You 'must excuse me, Sir) which but to sus-'pect, will hardly let me have patience 'either with you or with myself.—But 'no more of this, just now: let me, I 'beseech you, good Sir,' bowing, [I was very angry!] 'let me only know whe-'ther you intend to leave me; or whe-'ther I have only escaped from one con-'finement to another?'

'Cheated hither, as far as I know, Ma-'dam! Let you know (and with that air 'too, charming, though grievous to my 'heart!) if you have only escaped from one 'confinement to another—Amazing! per-'fectly amazing! and can there be a ne-'cessity for me to answer this? You are 'absolutely your own mistress.—It were 'very strange, if you were not. The 'moment you are in a place of safety, I will 'leave you. To one condition only, 'give me leave to beg your consent: it 'is this; that you will be pleased, now 'you are so entirely in your own power, 'to renew a promise voluntarily made 'before; voluntarily, or I would not 'now presume to request it; for although 'I would not be thought capable of 'growing upon concession, yet I cannot 'bear to think of losing the ground your 'goodness had given me room to hope 'I had gained; that, make up how you 'please with your relations, you will ne-'ver marry any other man, while I am 'living and single, unless I should be so 'wicked as to give new cause for high 'displeasure.'

'I hesitate not to confirm this promise, 'Sir, upon your own condition. In 'what manner do you expect me to con-'firm it?'

'Only, Madam, by your word.'

'Then I never will.'

He had the assurance (I was now in his power) to salute me as a sealing of my promise, as he called it. His motion was so sudden, that I was not aware of it. It would have looked affected to be very very angry; yet I could not be pleaſed, conſidering this as a leading freedom, from a ſpirit ſo audacious and encroaching: and he might ſee, that I was not.

He paſſed all that by with an air peculiar to himſelf—'Enough, enough, deareſt Madam! And now let me beg of you but to conquer this dreadful uneaſineſs, which gives me to apprehend too much for my jealous love to bear; and it ſhall be my whole endeavour to deſerve your favour, and to make you the happieſt woman in the world; as I ſhall be the happieſt of men.'

I broke from him to write to you my preceding letter; but refuſed to ſend it by his ſervant, as I told you. The miſtreſs of the houſe helped me to a meſſenger, who was to carry what you ſhould give him to Lord M.'s ſeat in Hertfordſhire, directed for Mrs. Greme, the houſekeeper there. And early in the morning, for fear of purſuit, we were to ſet out that way: and there he propoſed to exchange the chariot-and-ſix for a chaiſe-and-pair of his own, which he had at that ſeat, as it would be a leſs-noticed conveyance.

I looked over my little ſtock of money; and found it to be no more than ſeven guineas and ſome ſilver: the reſt of my ſtock was but fifty guineas, and that five more than I thought it was, when my ſiſter challenged me as to the ſum I had by me; and thoſe I left in my eſcritoire, little intending to go away with him.

Indeed my caſe abounds with a ſhocking number of indelicate circumſtances. Among the reſt, I was forced to account to him, who knew I could have no cloaths but what I had on, how I came to have linen with you, (for he could not but know I ſent for it;) leſt he ſhould imagine I had an early deſign to go away with him, and made that a part of the preparation.

He moſt heartily wiſhed, he ſaid, for my mind's ſake, that your mother would have afforded me her protection; and delivered himſelf upon this ſubject with equal freedom and concern.

There are, my dear Miſs Howe, a multitude of punctilios and decorums, which a young creature muſt diſpenſe with, who, in a ſituation like mine, makes a man the intimate attendant of her perſon. I could now, I think, give twenty reaſons ſtronger than any I have heretofore mentioned, why women of the leaſt delicacy ſhould never think of incurring the danger and diſgrace of taking the ſtep I have been drawn in to take, but with horror and averſion; and why they ſhould look upon the man who ſhall tempt them to it, as the vileſt and moſt ſelfiſh of ſeducers.

BEFORE five o'clock (Tueſday morning) the maid came up to tell me my brother was ready, and that breakfaſt alſo waited for me in the parlour. I went down with a heart as heavy as my eyes, and received great acknowledgments and compliments from him on being ſo ſoon dreſſed, and ready (as he interpreted it) to continue our journey.

He had the thought which I had not (for what had I to do with thinking, who had it not when I ſtood moſt in need of it?) to purchaſe for me a velvet hood, and a ſhort cloak, trimmed with ſilver, without ſaying any-thing to me. He muſt reward himſelf, the artful encroacher ſaid, before the landlady and her maids and niece, for his forethought; and would ſalute his pretty ſullen ſiſter! —He took his reward; and, as he ſaid, a tear with it. While he aſſured me, ſtill before them, [a vile wretch!] that I had nothing to fear from meeting with parents who ſo dearly loved me.

How could I be complaiſant, my dear, to ſuch a man as this?

When we had got into the chariot, and it began to move, he aſked me, Whether I had any objection to go to Lord M.'s Hertfordſhire ſeat? His lordſhip, he ſaid, was at his Berkſhire one.

I told him, I choſe not to go, as yet, to any of his relations; for that would indicate a plain defiance to my own. My choice was, to go to a private lodging, and for him to be at a diſtance from me: at leaſt till I heard how things were taken by my friends—For that although I had but little hopes of a reconciliation as it was; yet if they knew I was in his protection, or in that of any of his friends, (which would be looked upon as the ſame thing) there would not be room for any hopes at all.

I ſhould govern him as I pleaſed, he ſolemnly aſſured me, in every thing. But he ſtill thought London was the beſt place for me; and if I were once ſafe there, and in a lodging to my liking, he would go to M. Hall. But, as I approved not of London, he would urge it no further.

He propoſed, and I conſented, to put up at an inn in the neighbourhood of the Lawn (as he called Lord M.'s ſeat in this county) ſince I choſe not to go thither. And here I got two hours to myſelf; which I told him I ſhould paſs in writing another letter to you, (meaning my narrative, native, which, though greatly fatigued, I had begun at St. Alban's) and in one to my ſiſter, to apprize the family (whether they were ſolicitous about it or not) that I was well; and to beg that my cloaths, ſome particular books, and the fifty guineas I had left in my eſcritoire, might be ſent me.

He aſked, if I had conſidered whither to have them directed?

Indeed, not I, I told him: I was a ſtranger to—

So was he, he interrupted me; but it ſtruck him by chance.

Wicked ſtory-teller!

'But,' added he, 'I will tell you, 'Madam, how it ſhall be managed—If 'you don't chuſe to go to London, it is, 'nevertheleſs, beſt, that your relations 'ſhould think you there; for then they 'will abſolutely deſpair of finding you. 'If you write, be pleaſed to direct, to 'be left for you, at Mr. Oſgood's, near 'Soho Square. Mr. Oſgood is a man 'of reputation: and this will effectually 'amuſe them.'

Amuſe them, my dear!—Amuſe whom?—My father!—my uncles!—But it muſt be ſo!——All his expedients ready, you ſee!

I had no objection to this: and I have written accordingly. But what anſwer I ſhall have, or whether any, that is what gives me no ſmall anxiety.

This, however, is one conſolation, that if I have an anſwer, and although my brother ſhould be the writer, it cannot be more ſevere than the treatment I have of late received from him and my ſiſter.

Mr. Lovelace ſtaid out about an hour and half; and then came in; impatiently ſending up to me no leſs than four times, to deſire admittance. But I ſent him word as often, that I was buſy; and at laſt, that I ſhould be ſo till dinner were ready. He then haſtened that, as I heard him now-and-then, with a hearty curſe upon the cook and waiters.

This is another of his imperfections. I ventured afterwards to check him for his free words, as we ſat at dinner.

Having heard him ſwear at his ſervant, when below, whom, nevertheleſs, he owns to be a good one; 'It is a ſad life,' ſaid I, 'theſe innkeepers live, Mr. Love-'lace.'

'No; pretty well, I believe—But why, 'Madam, think you, that fellows, who 'eat and drink at other mens coſt, or 'they are ſorry innkeepers, ſhould be en-'titled to pity?'

'Becauſe of the ſoldiers they are oblig-'ed to quarter; who are generally, I 'believe, wretched profligates.—Bleſs 'me!' ſaid I, 'how I heard one of them 'ſwear and curſe, juſt now, at a modeſt 'meek man, as I judge by his low voice, 'and gentle anſwers!—Well do they 'make it a proverb—Like a trooper!'

He bit his lip; aroſe; turned upon his heel; ſtept to the glaſs; and looking confidently abaſhed, if I may ſo ſay, 'Aye, 'Madam,' ſaid he, 'theſe troopers are 'ſad ſwearing fellows. I think their of-'ficers ſhould chaſtiſe them for it.'

'I am ſure they deſerve chaſtiſement,' replied I: 'for ſwearing is a moſt un-'manly vice, and curſing as poor and low 'a one; ſince they proclaim the profli-'gate's want of power, and his wicked-'neſs at the ſame time; for could ſuch 'a one puniſh as he ſpeaks, he would be 'a fiend!'

'Charmingly obſerved, by my ſoul, 'Madam!—The next trooper I hear 'ſwear and curſe, I'll tell him what an 'unmanly, and what a poor wretch he is.'

Mrs. Greme came to pay her duty to me, as Mr. Lovelace called it; and was very urgent with me to go to her lord's houſe; letting me know what handſome things ſhe had heard her lord, and his two nieces, and all the family, ſay of me; and what wiſhes for ſeveral months paſt they had put up for the honour ſhe now hoped would ſoon be done them all.

This gave me ſome ſatisfaction, as it confirmed from the mouth of a very good ſort of woman all that Mr. Lovelace had told me.

Upon enquiry about a private lodging, ſhe recommended me to a ſiſter-in-law of hers, eight miles from thence—Where I now am. And what pleaſed me the better, was, that Mr. Lovelace (of whom I could ſee ſhe was infinitely obſervant) obliged her, of his own motion, to accompany me in the chaiſe; himſelf riding on horſeback, with his two ſervants, and one of Lord M.'s. And here we arrived about four o'clock.

But, as I told you, in my former, the lodgings are inconvenient. Mr. Lovelace indeed found great fault with them: and told Mrs. Greme (who had ſaid, that they were not worthy of us) that they came not up even to her account of them. As the houſe was a mile from a town, it was not proper for him, he ſaid, to be ſo far diſtant from me, leſt any-thing ſhould happen: and yet the apartments were not ſeparate and diſtinct enough for me to like them, he was ſure.

This muſt be agreeable enough from him, you will believe.

Mrs.

Mrs. Greme and I had a good deal of talk in the chaiſe about him: ſhe was very eaſy and free in her anſwers to all I aſked; and has, I find, a very ſerious turn.

I led her on to ſay to the following effect; ſome part of it not unlike what Lord M.'s diſmiſſed bailiff had ſaid before; by which I find that all the ſervants have a like opinion of him.

That Mr. Lovelace was a generous man; that it was hard to ſay, whether the ſervants of her lord's family loved or feared him moſt; that her lord had a very great affection for him; that his two noble aunts were not leſs fond of him; that his couſins Montague were as good-natured young ladies as ever lived; that Lord M. and Lady Sarah and Lady Betty had propoſed ſeveral ladies to him, before he made his addreſſes to me, and even ſince, deſpairing to move me and my friends in his favour—But that he had no thoughts of marrying at all, ſhe had heard him ſay, if it were not to me; that as well her lord as the two ladies his ſiſters were a good deal concerned at the ill-uſage he received from my family; but admired my character, and wiſhed to have him married to me (although I were not to have a ſhilling) in preference to any other perſon, from the opinion that they had of the influence I ſhould have over him. That, to be ſure, Mr. Lovelace was a wild gentleman; but wildneſs was a diſtemper which would cure itſelf. That her lord delighted in his company, whenever he could get it: but that they often fell out; and his lordſhip was always forced to ſubmit—Indeed, was half-afraid of him, ſhe believed; for Mr. Lovelace would do as he pleaſed. She mingled a thouſand pities often, that he acted not up to the talents lent him—Yet would have it, that he had fine qualities to found a reformation upon; and, when the happy day came, would make amends for all: and of this all his friends were ſo aſſured, that they wiſhed for nothing ſo earneſtly, as for his marriage.

This, indifferent as it is, is better than my brother ſays of him.

The people of the houſe here are very honeſt-looking induſtrious folks: Mrs. Sorlings is the gentlewoman's name. The farm ſeems well-ſtocked and thriving. She is a widow; has two ſons, men grown, who vie with each other which ſhall take the moſt pains in promoting the common good; and they are both of them, I already ſee, more reſpectful to two modeſt young women their ſiſters, than my brother was to his ſiſter.

I believe I muſt ſtay here longer than at firſt I thought I ſhould.

I ought to have mentioned, that, before I ſet out for this place, I received your kind letter. Every thing is kind from ſo dear a friend.

I own, that after I had told you of my abſolute determination not to go away with him, you might well be ſurprized at your firſt hearing that I was actually gone. The Lord bleſs me, my dear, I myſelf, at times, can hardly believe it is I, that have been led to take ſo ſtrange a ſtep.

I have not the better opinion of Mr. Lovelace for his extravagant volubility. He is too full of profeſſions. He ſays too many fine things of me, and to me. True reſpect, true value, I think, lies not in words: words cannot expreſs it: the ſilent awe, the humble, the doubting eye, and even the heſitating voice, better ſhew it by much, than, as our beloved Shakeſpeare ſays—

——'The rattling tongue
'Of ſaucy and audacious eloquence.'

The man indeed at times is all upon the extatick; one of his phraſes. But, to my ſhame and confuſion, I muſt ſay, that I know too well to what to attribute his tranſports. In one word, it is to his triumph, my dear. And, to impute it to that perhaps equally expoſes my vanity, and condemns my folly.

We have been alarmed with notions of a purſuit, founded upon a letter from his intelligencer.

How do different circumſtances either ſanctify or condemn the ſame action!—What care ought we to take not to confound the diſtinctions of right or wrong, when ſelf comes in the queſtion!—I condemned in Mr. Lovelace the corrupting of a ſervant of my father's; and now I am glad to give a kind of indirect approbation of that fault, by enquiring of him what he hears, by that or any other way, of the manner in which my relations took my flight. A preconcerted, forward, and artful flight, it muſt undoubtedly appear to them. How grievous is that to think of! Yet how, as I am ſituated, can I put them right?

Moſt heavily, he ſays, they take it; but ſhew not ſo much grief as rage. And he can hardly have patience to hear of the virulence and menaces of my brother againſt himſelf. Then a merit is made to me of his forbearance.

What a ſatisfaction am I robbed of, my dearest friend, when I reflect upon my inconsiderateness! O that I had it still in my power to say I suffered wrong, rather than did wrong! That others were more wanting in their kindness to me than I in duty (where duty is owing) to them.

Fie upon me! for meeting the seducer! —Let all end as happily as it now may, I have laid up for myself remorse for my whole life.

What still more concerns me is, that every time I see this man, I am still at a greater loss than before what to make of him. I watch every turn of his countenance: and I think I see very deep lines in it. He looks with more meaning, I verily think, than he used to look; yet not more serious; not less gay—I don't know how he looks—But with more confidence a great deal than formerly; and yet he never wanted that.

But here is the thing; I behold him with fear now, as conscious of the power my indiscretion has given him over me. And well may he look more elate, when he sees me deprived of all the self-supposed significance, which adorns and exalts a person who has been accustomed to respect; and who now, by a conscious inferiority, allows herself to be overcome, and in a state of obligation, as I may say, to a man who from a humble suitor to her for her favour, assumes the consequence and airs of a protector.

I shall send this, as my former, by a poor man, who travels every day with pedlary matters. He will leave it at Mrs. Knolly's, as you direct.

If you hear any-thing of my father and mother, and of their health, and how my friends were affected by my unhappy step, pray be so good as to write me a few lines by the messenger, if his waiting for them can be known to you.

I am afraid to ask you, whether, upon reading that part of my narrative already in your hands, you think any sort of extenuation lies for your unhappy

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER III.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

TUESDAY. WEDN. APRIL 11, 12.

YOU claim my promise, that I will be as particular as possible, in all that passes between me and my goddess. Indeed, I never had a more illustrious subject to exercise my pen upon. And, moreover, I have leisure; for by her good will, my access would be as difficult to her, as that of the humblest slave to an eastern monarch. Nothing, then, but inclination to write can be wanting: and since our friendship, and your obliging attendance upon me at the White Hart, will not excuse that, I will endeavour to keep my word.

I parted with thee and thy brethren, with a full resolution, thou knowest, to rejoin ye, if she once again disappointed me, in order to go together (attended by our servants, for shew-sake) to the gloomy father; and demand audience of the tyrant upon the freedoms taken with my character. In short, to have tried by fair means, if fair would do, to make him change his resolutions; and treat his charming daughter with less inhumanity, and me with more civility.

I told thee my reasons for not going in search of a letter of countermand. I was right; for if I had, I should have found such a one; and had I received it, she would not have met me. Did she think, that after I had been more than once disappointed, I would not keep her to her promise; that I would not hold her to it, when I had got her in so deeply?

The moment I heard the door unbolt, I was sure of her. That motion made my heart bound to my throat. But when that was followed with the presence of my charmer, flashing upon me all at once in a flood of brightness, sweetly dressed, though all unprepared for a journey, I trod air, and hardly thought myself a mortal.

Thou shalt judge of her dress, as, at the moment I first beheld her, she appeared to me, and as, upon a nearer observation, she really was. I am a critick, thou knowest, in womens dresses. Many a one I have taught to dress, and helped to undress. But there is such a native elegance in this lady, that she surpasses all that I could imagine surpassing. But then her person adorns what she wears, more than dress can adorn her; and that's her excellence.

Expect therefore a faint sketch of her admirable person with her dress.

Her wax-like flesh (for after all, flesh and blood I think she is) by it's delicacy and firmness, answers for the soundness of her health. Thou hast often heard me launch out in praise of her complexion. I never in my life beheld a skin so illustriously fair. The lily and the driven snow it is nonsense to talk of: her lawn and her laces one might indeed compare to those: but what a whited wall would a woman appear to be, who had a complexion plexion which would juſtify ſuch unnatural compariſons? But this lady is all glowing, all charming fleſh and blood: yet ſo clear, that every meandring vein is to be ſeen in all the lovely parts of her which cuſtom permits to be viſible.

Thou haſt heard me alſo deſcribe the wavy ringlets of her ſhining hair needing neither art nor powder; of itſelf an ornament, defying all other ornaments; wantoning in and about a neck that is beautiful beyond deſcription.

Her head-dreſs was a Bruſſels-lace mob, peculiarly adapted to the charming air and turn of her features. A ſky-blue ribband illuſtrated that. But although the weather was ſomewhat ſharp, ſhe had not on either hat or hood; for, beſides that ſhe loves to uſe herſelf hardily, (by which means and by a temperance truly exemplary, ſhe is allowed to have given high health and vigour to an originally tender conſtitution) ſhe ſeems to have intended to ſhew me, that ſhe was determined not to ſtand to her appointment. O Jack! that ſuch a ſweet girl ſhould be a rogue!

Her morning gown was a pale primroſe-coloured paduaſoy: the cuffs and robings curiouſly embroidered by the fingers of this ever-charming Arachne, in a running pattern of violets and their leaves; the light in the flowers ſilver; gold in the leaves. A pair of diamond ſnaps in her ears. A white handkerchief wrought by the ſame inimitable fingers concealed—O Belford! what ſtill more inimitable beauties did it not conceal!—And I ſaw, all the way we rode, the bounding heart (by it's throbbing motions I ſaw it!) dancing beneath the charming umbrage.

Her ruffles were the ſame as her mob. Her apron a flowered lawn. Her coat white ſattin, quilted: blue ſattin her ſhoes, braided with the ſame colour, without lace; for what need has the prettieſt foot in the world of ornament? neat buckles in them: and on her charming arms a pair of black velvet glove-like muffs of her own invention; for ſhe makes and gives faſhions as ſhe pleaſes.—Her hands velvet of themſelves, thus uncovered the freer to be graſped by thoſe of her adorer.

I have told thee what were my tranſports, when the undrawn bolt preſented to me my long-expected goddeſs.—Her emotions were more ſweetly feminine, after the firſt moments; for then the fire of her ſtarry eyes began to ſink into a leſs dazzling languor. She trembled: nor knew ſhe how to ſupport the agitations of a heart ſhe had never found ſo ungovernable. She was even fainting, when I claſped her in my ſupporting arms. What a precious moment that! How near, how ſweetly near, the throbbing partners!

By her dreſs, I ſaw, as I obſerved before, how unprepared ſhe was for a journey; and not doubting her intention once more to diſappoint me, I would have drawn her after me. Then began a contention the moſt vehement that ever I had with woman. It would pain thy friendly heart to be told the infinite trouble I had with her. I begged, I prayed, on my knees; yet in vain, I begged and prayed her to anſwer her own appointment: and had I not happily provided for ſuch a ſtruggle, knowing whom I had to deal with, I had certainly failed in my deſign; and as certainly would have accompanied her in, without thee and thy brethren: and who knows what might have been the conſequence?

But my honeſt agent anſwering my ſignal, though not quite ſo ſoon as I expected, in the manner thou knoweſt I had preſcribed, 'They are coming! They are 'coming!—Fly, fly, my beloved crea-'ture,' cried I, drawing my ſword with a flouriſh, as if I would have ſlain half an hundred of the ſuppoſed intruders; and, ſeizing her trembling hands, I drew her after me ſo ſwiftly, that my feet, winged by love, could hardly keep pace with her feet, agitated by fear.—And ſo I became her emperor.

I'll tell thee all, when I ſee thee: and thou ſhalt then judge of my difficulties, and of her perverſeneſs. And thou wilt rejoice with me at my conqueſt over ſuch a watchful and open-eyed charmer.

But feeſt thou not now (as I think I do) the wind-outſtripping fair-one flying from her love to her love?—Is there not ſuch a game?—Nay, flying from friends ſhe was reſolved not to abandon, to the man ſhe was determined not to go off with?—The ſex! The ſex! all over!—Charming contradiction!—Hah, hah, hah, hah!—I muſt here—I muſt here, lay down my pen, to hold my ſides; for I muſt have my laugh out now the fit is upon me.

I BELIEVE—I believe—Hah, hah, hah! I believe, Jack, my dogs conclude me mad: for here has one of them popt in, as if to ſee what ailed me; or whom I had with me. The whorſon caught the laugh, as he went out.—Hah, hah, hah!—An impudent dog!—O Jack, knoweſt thou my conceit, and were but thy laugh laugh joined to mine, I believe it would hold me for an hour longer.

But, O my beſt beloved fair one, repine not thou at the arts by which thou ſuſpecteſt thy fruitleſs vigilance has been over-watched.—Take care, that thou provokeſt not new ones that may be ſtill more worthy of thee. If once thy emperor decrees thy fall, thou ſhalt greatly fall. Thou ſhalt have cauſe, if that come to paſs, which may come to paſs, (for why wouldſt thou put off marriage to ſo long a day, as till thou hadſt reaſon to be convinced of my reformation, deareſt?) thou ſhalt have cauſe, never fear, to ſit down more diſſatisfied with the ſtars, than with thyſelf. And come the worſt to the worſt, glorious terms will I give thee. Thy garriſon, with General Prudence at the head, and Governor Watchfulneſs bringing up the rear, ſhall be allowed to march out with all the honours due to ſo brave a reſiſtance. And all thy ſex, and all mine, that hear of my ſtratagems, and of thy conduct, ſhall acknowledge the fortreſs as nobly won, as defended.

'Thou wilt not dare,' methinks I hear thee ſay, 'to attempt to reduce ſuch a 'goddeſs as this to a ſtandard unworthy 'of her excellences. It is impoſſible, 'Lovelace, that thou ſhouldſt intend to 'break through oaths and proteſtations 'ſo ſolemn.'

That I did not intend it, is certain. That I do intend it, I cannot (my heart, my reverence for her, will not let me) ſay. But knoweſt thou not my averſion to the ſtate of ſhackles?—And is ſhe not IN MY POWER?

'And wilt thou, Lovelace, abuſe that 'power which—'

Which what, Belford?—Which I obtained not by her own conſent, but againſt it.

'But which thou never hadſt obtain-'ed, had ſhe not eſteemed thee above 'all men.'

And which I had never taken ſo much pains to obtain, had I not loved her above all women. So far upon a par, Jack! and if thou pleadeſt honour, ought not honour to be mutual? If mutual, does it not imply mutual truſt, mutual confidence? And what have I had of that from her to boaſt of?—Thou knoweſt the whole progreſs of our warfare: for a warfare it has truly been; and far, very far, from an amorous warfare too. Doubts, miſtruſts, upbraidings, on her part: humiliations the moſt abject on mine. Obliged to aſſume ſuch airs of reformation, that every varlet of ye has been afraid I ſhould reclaim in good earneſt. And haſt thou not thyſelf frequently obſerved to me, how awkwardly I returned to my uſual gaiety, after I had been within a mile of her father's garden-wall, although I had not ſeen her?

Does ſhe not deſerve to pay for all this?—To make an honeſt fellow look like an hypocrite; what a vile thing is that!

Then thou knoweſt what a falſe little rogue ſhe has been. How little conſcience ſhe has made of diſappointing me. Haſt thou not been a witneſs of my ravings, on this ſcore?—Have I not, in the height of them, vowed revenge upon the faithleſs charmer?—And, if I muſt be forſworn, whether I anſwer her expectations, or follow my own inclinations; and if the option be in my own power; can I heſitate a moment which to chuſe?

Then, I fancy by her circumſpection, and her continual grief, that ſhe expects ſome miſchief from me. I don't care to diſappoint any-body I have a value for.

But O the noble, the exalted creature! Who can avoid heſitating when he thinks of an offence againſt her? Who can but pity—

Yet, on the other hand, ſo loth at laſt to venture, though threatened to be forced into the nuptial fetters with a man, whom to look upon as a rival, is to diſgrace myſelf!—So ſullen, now ſhe has ventured!—What title has ſhe to pity; and to a pity which her pride would make her diſclaim?

But I reſolve not any way. I will ſee how her will works; and how my will leads me on. I will give the combatants fair play, and yet, every time I attend her, I find that ſhe is leſs in my power; I more in her's.

Yet, a fooliſh little rogue! to forbid me to think of marriage till I am a reformed man! Till the implacables of her family change their natures, and become placable!

It is true, when ſhe was for making thoſe conditions, ſhe did not think, that without any, ſhe ſhould be cheated out of herſelf; for ſo the dear ſoul, as I may tell thee in it's place, phraſes it.

How it ſwells my pride, to have been able to outwit ſuch a vigilant charmer! I am taller by half a yard in my imagination than I was. I look down upon every-body now. Laſt night I was ſtill more extravagant. I took off my hat, as I walked, to ſee if the lace were not ſcorched,

ſcorched, ſuppoſing it had bruſhed down a ſtar; and, before I put it on again, in mere wantonneſs, and heart's eaſe, I was for buffeting the moon.

In ſhort, my whole ſoul is joy. When I go to bed I laugh myſelf aſleep: and I awake either laughing or ſinging—Yet nothing nearly in view, neither—For why?—I am not yet reformed enough.

I told thee at the time, if thou remembreſt, how capable this reſtriction was of being turned upon the over-ſcrupulous dear creature, could I once get her out of her father's houſe; and were I diſpoſed to puniſh her for her family's faults, and for the infinite trouble ſhe herſelf had given me. Little thinks ſhe, that I have kept an account of both: and that, when my heart is ſoft, and all her own, I can but turn to my memoranda, and harden myſelf at once.

O my charmer, look to it! Abate of thy haughty airs! Value not thyſelf upon thy ſincerity, if thou art indifferent to me! I will not bear it now. Art thou not in my POWER?—Nor, if thou loveſt me, think, that the female affectation of denying thy love, will avail thee now, with a heart ſo proud and ſo jealous as mine?—Remember, moreover, that all thy family-ſins are upon thy head!

But, ah! Jack, when I ſee my angel, when I am admitted to the preſence of this radiant beauty, what will become of all this vapouring?

But, be my end what it may, I am obliged, by thy penetration, fair-one, to proceed by the ſap. Fair and ſoftly. A wife at any time! Marriage will be always in my power.

When put to the univerſity, the ſame courſe of initial ſtudies will qualify the yonker for the one line or for the other. The genius ought to point out the future lawyer, divine, or phyſician!—So the ſame cautious conduct, with ſuch a vigilance, will do either for the wife, or for the no-wife. When I reform, I'll marry. 'Tis time enough for the one, the lady muſt ſay—For the other, ſay I!

But how I ramble!—This it is to be in ſuch a ſituation, that I know not what to reſolve upon.

I'll tell thee my inclinings, as I proceed. The pro's and the con's I'll tell thee: but being got too far from the track I ſet out in, I will cloſe here. I may however write every day ſomething, and ſend it as opportunity offers.

Regardleſs, nevertheleſs, I ſhall be in all I write, of connexion, accuracy, or of any thing but of my own imperial will and pleaſure.

LETTER IV.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

WEDNESDAY NIGHT, APRIL 12.

I Have your narrative, my dear. You are the ſame noble creature you ever were. Above diſguiſe, above art, above attempting to extenuate a failing.

The only family in the world, yours, ſurely, that could have driven ſuch a daughter upon ſuch extremities.

But you muſt not be ſo very much too good for them, and for the caſe.

You lay the blame ſo properly and ſo unſparingly upon your meeting him, that nothing can be added to that ſubject by your worſt enemies, were they to ſee what you have written.

I am not ſurprized, now I have read your narrative, that ſo bold and ſo contriving a man—I am forced to break off——

You ſtood it out much better and longer—Here again comes my buſtling, jealous mother!

Don't be ſo angry at yourſelf. Did you not do for the beſt at the time? As to your firſt fault, the anſwering his letters; it was always incumbent upon you to aſſume the guardianſhip of ſuch a family, when the bravo of it had run riot as he did, and brought himſelf into danger.

Except your mother, who has no will of her own, have any of them common ſenſe?

Forgive me, my dear—Here is that ſtupid uncle Antony of yours. A pragmatical, conceited, poſitive—He came yeſterday, in a fearful pucker, and puffed, and blowed, and ſtumped about our hall and parlour, while his meſſage was carried up.

My mother was dreſſing. Theſe widows are as ſtarched as the old batchelors. She would not ſee him in a diſhabille for the world—What can ſhe mean by it?

His errand was to ſet her againſt you, and to ſhew their determined rage on your going away. The iſſue proved too evidently that this was the principal end of his viſit.

The odd creature deſired to ſpeak with her alone. I am not uſed to ſuch exceptions whenever any viſits are made to my mother.

When ſhe was primmed out, down ſhe came came to him. They locked themſelves in. The two poſitive heads were put together—Cloſe together I ſuppoſe; for I liſtened, but could hear nothing diſtinctly, though they both ſeemed full of their ſubject.

I had a good mind, once or twice, to have made them open the door. Could I have been ſure of keeping but tolerably my temper, I would have demanded admittance. But I was afraid, if I had obtained it, that I ſhould have forgot it was my mother's houſe, and been for turning him out of it. To come to rave againſt and abuſe my deareſt, deareſt, faultleſs friend! and the ravings to be encouraged, and perhaps joined in, in order to juſtify themſelves; the one for contributing to drive that dear friend out of her father's houſe; the other for refuſing her a temporary aſylum, till the reconciliation could have been effected, which her dutiful heart was ſet upon; and which it would have become the love which my mother had ever pretended for you, to have mediated for—Could I have had patience!

The iſſue, as I ſaid, ſhewed what the errand was—It's firſt appearance, after the old fuſty fellow was marched off, [You muſt excuſe me, my dear] was in a kind of gloomy, Harlowe-like reſervedneſs in my mother; which, upon a few reſenting flirts of mine, was followed by a rigorous prohibition of correſpondence.

This put us, you may ſuppoſe, upon terms not the moſt agreeable. I deſired to know, if I were prohibited dreaming of you?—For, my dear, you have all my ſleeping as well as waking hours.

I can eaſily allow for your correſpondence with your wretch at firſt (and yet your motions were excellent) by the effect this prohibition has upon me; ſince, if poſſible, it has made me love you better than before; and I am more deſirous than ever of correſponding with you.

But I have nevertheleſs a much more laudable motive—I ſhould think myſelf the unworthieſt of creatures, could I be brought to ſlight a dear friend, and ſuch a meritorious one, in her diſtreſs.—I would die firſt—And ſo I told my mother. And I have deſired her not to watch me in my retired hours; nor to inſiſt upon my lying with her conſtantly, which ſhe now does more earneſtly than ever. 'Twere better, I told her, that the Harlowe-Betty were borrowed to be ſet over me.

Mr. Hickman, who greatly honours you, has, unknown to me, interpoſed ſo warmly in your favour with my mother, that it makes for him no ſmall merit with me.

I cannot, at preſent, write to every particular, unleſs I would be in ſet defiance.—Teaze, teaze, teaze, for ever! The ſame thing, though anſwered fifty times over, in every hour to be repeated—Lord bleſs me! what a life muſt my poor father—But let me remember to whom I am writing.

If this ever-active, ever-miſchievous monkey of a man, this Lovelace, contrived, as you ſuſpect—But here comes my mother again—'Aye, ſtay a little 'longer, my mamma, if you pleaſe—'I can but be ſuſpected! I can but be 'chidden for making you wait; and 'chidden I am ſure to be, whether I do 'or not, in the way you, my good 'mamma, are Antony'd into.'

Bleſs me!—how impatient ſhe is!—How ſhe thunders at the door!—'This 'moment, Madam!—How came I to 'double-lock myſelf in!—What have 'I done with the key!—Deuce take the 'key!—Dear Madam! You flutter one 'ſo!'

You may believe, my dear, that I took care of my papers before I opened the door. We have had a charming dialogue—She flung from me in a paſſion.

So—what's now to be done?—Sent for down in a very peremptory manner, I aſſure you. What an incoherent letter will you have, when I can get it to you! But now I know where to ſend it, Mr. Hickman ſhall find me a meſſenger. Yet, if he be detected, poor ſoul, he will be Harlowed-off, as well as his meek miſtreſs.

THURSDAY, APRIL 13.

I HAVE this moment your continuation-letter. And am favoured, at preſent, with the abſence of my Argus-eyed mother.

Dear creature!—I can account for all your difficulties. A young lady of your delicacy!—And with ſuch a man!—I muſt be brief.

The man's a fool, my dear, will all his pride, and with all his complaiſance, and affected regards to your injunctions. Yet his ready inventions—

Sometimes I think you ſhould go to Lady Betty's—I know not what to adviſe you to do.—I ſhould, if you were not ſo intent upon reconciling yourſelf to your relations. Yet they are implacable. You can have no hopes of them. Your uncle's errand to my mother may convince convince you of that; and if you have an anſwer to your letter to your ſiſter, that will confirm you, I dare ſay.

You need not to have been afraid of aſking me, whether, upon reading your narrative, I thought any extenuation could lie for what you have done! I have, as above, before I had your queſtion, told you my mind as to that.—And I repeat, that I think, your provocations and inducements conſidered, you are free from blame: at leaſt, the freeſt that ever young creature was who took ſuch a ſtep.

But you took it not—You were driven on one ſide, and, poſſibly, tricked on the other.—If any woman on earth ſhall be circumſtanced as you were, and ſhall hold out ſo long as you did, againſt her perſecutors on one hand, and her ſeducer on the other, I will forgive her for all the reſt of her conduct, be it what it will.

All your acquaintance, you may ſuppoſe, talk of nobody but you. Some indeed bring your admirable character for a plea againſt you: but nobody does, or can, acquit your father and uncles.

Every-body ſeems apprized of your brother's and ſiſter's motives. Your flight is, no doubt, the very thing they aimed to drive you to, by the various attacks they made upon you; unhoping (as they muſt do all the time) the ſucceſs of their ſchemes in Solmes's behalf. They knew, that if once you were reſtored to favour, the ſuſpended love of your father and uncles, like a river breaking down a temporary obſtruction, would return with double force; and that then you would expoſe, and triumph over all their arts.—And now, I hear they enjoy their ſucceſsful malice.

Your father is all rage and violence. He ought, I am ſure, to turn his rage inward. All your family accuſe you of acting with deep art; and are put upon ſuppoſing that you are actually every hour exulting over them, with your man, in the ſucceſs of it.

They all pretend now, that your trial of Wedneſday was to be the laſt.

Advantage would indeed, my mother owns, have been taken of your yielding, if you had yielded. But had you not been to be prevailed upon, they would have given up their ſcheme, and taken your promiſe for renouncing Lovelace—Believe them who will!

They own, however, that a miniſter was to be preſent—Mr. Solmes was to be at hand—And your father was previouſly to try his authority over you, in order to make you ſign the ſettlements—All of it a romantick contrivance of your wild-headed fooliſh brother, I make no doubt. Is it likely that he and Bell would have given way to your reſtoration to favour, ſuppoſing it in their power to hinder it, on any other terms than thoſe their hearts had been ſo long ſet upon?

How they took your flight, when they found it out, may be better ſuppoſed than deſcribed.

Your aunt Hervey it ſeems was the firſt that went down to the Ivy Summer Houſe, in order to acquaint you that their ſearch was over. Betty followed her; and they not finding you there, went towards the caſcade, according to a hint of yours.

Returning by the garden-door, they met a ſervant [They don't ſay, it was that Joſeph Leman; but it is very likely that it was he] running, as he ſaid, from purſuing Mr. Lovelace (a great hedge ſtake in his hand, and out of breath) to alarm the family.

If it were this fellow, and if he were employed in the double agency of cheating them, and cheating you, what ſhall we think of the wretch you are with?—Run away from him, my dear, if ſo—No matter to whom—or marry him, if you cannot.

Your aunt and all your family were accordingly alarmed by this fellow—evidently when too late for purſuit. They got together; and, when a poſſe, ran to the place of interview; and ſome of them as far as to the tracks of the chariot-wheels, without ſtopping. And having heard the man's tale upon the ſpot, a general lamentation, a mutual upbraiding, and rage, and grief, were echoed from the different perſons, according to their different tempers and conceptions. And they returned like fools as they went.

Your brother, at firſt, ordered horſes and armed men to be got ready for a purſuit. Solmes and your uncle Tony were to be of the party. But your mother and your aunt Hervey diſſuaded them from it, for fear of adding evil to evil; not doubting but Lovelace had taken meaſures to ſupport himſelf in what he had done; and eſpecially when the ſervant declared, that he ſaw you run with him as faſt as you could ſet foot to the ground; and that there were ſeveral armed men on horſeback at a ſmall diſtance off.

My mother's abſence was owing to her her ſuſpicion, that the Knollys's were to aſſiſt in our correſpondence. She made them a viſit upon it. She does every thing at once. And they have promiſed, that no more letters ſhall be left there, without her knowledge.

But Mr. Hickman has engaged one Filmer, a huſbandman in the lane we call Finch Lane, near us, to receive them. Thither you will be pleaſed to direct yours, under cover, to Mr. John Soberton; and Mr. Hickman himſelf will call for them there; and there ſhall leave mine. It goes againſt me too, to make him ſo uſeful to me.—He looks already ſo proud upon it!—I ſhall have him [Who knows?] give himſelf airs.—He had beſt conſider, that the favour he has been long aiming at, may put him into a very dangerous, a very tickliſh ſituation. He that can oblige, may diſoblige—Happy for ſome people not to have it in their power to offend!

I will have patience, if I can, for a while, to ſee if theſe buſtlings in my mother will ſubſide—But upon my word, I will not long bear this uſage.

Sometimes I am ready to think, that my mother carries it thus on purpoſe to tire me out, and to make me the ſooner marry. If I find it to be ſo, and that Hickman, in order to make a merit with me, is in the low plot, I will never bear him in my ſight.

Plotting wretch, as I doubt your man is, I wiſh to Heaven that you were married, that you might brave them all, and not be forced to hide yourſelf, and be hurried from one inconvenient place to another. I charge you, omit not to lay hold on any handſome opportunity that may offer for that purpoſe.

Here again comes my mother.

We look mighty glum upon each other, I can tell you. She had not beſt Harlowe me at this rate—I won't bear it.

I have a vaſt deal to write. I know not what to write firſt. Yet my mind is full, and ready to run over.

I am got into a private corner of the garden, to be out of her way.—Lord help theſe mothers!—Do they think they can prevent a daughter's writing, or doing any-thing ſhe has a mind to do, by ſuſpicion, watchfulneſs, and ſcolding?—They had better place a confidence in one by half—A generous mind ſcorns to abuſe a generous confidence.

You have a nice, a very nice part to act with this wretch—Who yet has, I think, but one plain path before him. I pity you—But you muſt make the beſt of the lot you have been forced to draw. Yet I ſee your difficulties.—But if he do not offer to abuſe your confidence, I would have you ſeem at leaſt to place ſome in him.

If you think not of marrying ſoon, I approve of your reſolution to fix ſomewhere out of his reach. And if he know not where to find you, ſo much the better. Yet I verily believe, they would force you back, could they but come at you, if they were not afraid of him.

I think, by all means, you ſhould demand of both your truſtees to be put in poſſeſſion of your own eſtate. Mean time I have ſixty guineas at your ſervice. I beg you will command them. Before they are gone, I'll take care you ſhall be further ſupplied. I don't think you'll have a ſhilling or a ſhilling's worth of your own from your relations, unleſs you extort it from them.

As they believe you went away by your own conſent, they are, it ſeems, equally ſurprized and glad that you have left your jewels and money behind you, and have contrived for cloaths ſo ill. Very little likelihood this ſhews of their anſwering your requeſts.

Indeed every-one who knows not what I now know, muſt be at a loſs to account for your flight, as they will call it. And how, my dear, can one report it with any tolerable advantage to you?—To ſay, you did not intend it when you met him, who will believe it?—to ſay, that a perſon of your known ſteadineſs and punctilio was over-perſuaded when you gave him the meeting, how will that ſound?—To ſay, you were tricked out of yourſelf, and people were to give credit to it, how diſreputable!—And while unmarried, and yet with him, the man a man of ſuch a character, what would it not lead a cenſuring world to think?

I want to ſee how you put it in your letter for your cloaths.

As you may depend upon all the little ſpiteful things they can offer, inſtead of ſending what you write for, pray accept the ſum I tender. What will ſeven guineas do?—And I will find a way to ſend you alſo any of my cloaths and linen for preſent ſupply. I beg, my dear Clariſſa, that you will not put your Anna Howe upon a foot with Lovelace, in refuſing to accept of my offer. If you do not oblige me, I ſhall be apt to think that you rather incline to be obliged to him, than to favour me. And if I find this, I ſhall not know how to reconcile it with your delicacy in other reſpects.

Pray

Pray inform me of every-thing that paſſes between you and him. My cares for you (however needleſs, from your own prudence) make me wiſh you to continue to be very minute. If any-thing occur that you would tell me of if I were preſent, fail not to put it down in writing, although, from your natural diffidence, it ſhould not appear to you altogether ſo worthy of your pen, or of my knowing. A ſtander-by may ſee more of the game than one that plays. Great conſequences, like great folks, generally owe their greatneſs to ſmall cauſes, and little incidents.

Upon the whole, I do not now think it is in your power to diſmiſs him when you pleaſe. I apprized you before-hand, that it would not. I repeat therefore, that were I you, I would at leaſt ſeem to place ſome confidence in him. So long as he is decent, you may. Very viſibly obſervable, to ſuch delicacy as yours, muſt be that behaviour in him, which will make him unworthy of ſome confidence.

Your relations, according to what old Antony ſays to my mother, and ſhe to me, (by way of threatening, that you will not gain your ſuppoſed ends upon them by your flight) ſeem to expect that you will throw yourſelf into Lady Betty's protection; and that ſhe will offer to mediate for you: and they vow, that they will never hearken to any terms of accommodation that ſhall come from that quarter. They might ſpeak out, and ſay, from any quarter; for I dare aver, that your brother and ſiſter will not let them cool—At leaſt, till their uncles have made ſuch diſpoſitions, and perhaps your father too, as they would have them make.

As this letter will apprize you of an alteration in the place to which you muſt direct your next, I ſend it by a friend of Mr. Hickman, who may be depended upon. He has buſineſs in the neighbourhood of Mrs. Sorlings; and he knows her. He will return to Mr. Hickman this night; and bring back any letter you ſhall have to ſend, or can get ready. It is moonlight. He'll not mind waiting for you. I chuſe not to ſend by any of Mr. Hickman's ſervants—at preſent, however. Every hour is now, or may be, important; and may make an alteration in your reſolutions neceſſary.

I hear at this inſtant, my mother calling about her, and putting every-body into motion. She will ſoon, I ſuppoſe, make me and my employment the ſubjects of her enquiry.

Adieu, my dear. May Heaven preſerve you, and reſtore you with honour as unſullied as your mind to your ever-affectionate

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER V.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 13.

I Am infinitely concerned, my ever-dear and ever kind friend, that I am the ſad occaſion of the diſpleaſure between your mother and you.—How many perſons have I made unhappy!

Had I not to conſole myſelf, that my error is not owing to wicked precipitation, I ſhould be the moſt miſerable of all creatures. As it is, I am enough puniſhed in the loſs of my character, more valuable to me than my life; and in the cruel doubts and perplexities which, conflicting with my hopes, and each getting the victory by turns, harrow up my ſoul between them.

I think, however, that you ſhould obey your mother, and decline a correſpondence with me; at leaſt for the preſent. Take care how you fall into my error; for that begun with carrying on a prohibited correſpondence; a correſpondence which I thought it in my power to diſcontinue at pleaſure. My talent is ſcribbling; and I the readier fell into this freedom, as I found delight in writing; having motives too, which I thought laudable; and, at one time, the permiſſion of all my friends; to write to him.

Yet as to this correſpondence, what hurt could ariſe from it, if your mother could be prevailed upon to permit it to be continued?—So much prudence and diſcretion as you have; and you, in writing to me, laying under no temptation of following ſo bad an example, as I have ſet—My letters too occaſionally filled with ſelf-accuſation.

I thank you, my dear, moſt cordially I thank you, for your kind offers. You may be aſſured, that I will ſooner be beholden to you, than to any-body living. To Mr. Lovelace the laſt. Do not therefore think, that by declining your favours, I have an intention to lay myſelf under obligation to him.

I am willing to hope (notwithſtanding what you write) that my friends will ſend me my little money, together with my cloaths. They are two conſiderate, ſome of them, at leaſt, to permit that I ſhould be put to ſuch low difficulties. Perhaps, they will not be in haſte to oblige me. But if not, I cannot yet want. I believe you think, I muſt not diſpute with Mr. Lovelace the expences of the road and lodgings, till I can get a fixed abode. But I hope ſoon to put an end even to thoſe ſort of obligations.

Small hopes indeed of a reconciliation from your account of my uncle's viſit to your mother, in order to ſet her againſt an almoſt-friendleſs creature whom once he loved! But is it not my duty to try for it? Ought I to widen my error by obſtinacy and reſentment, becauſe of their reſentment; which muſt appear reaſonable to them, as they ſuppoſe my flight premeditated; and as they are made to believe, that I am capable of triumphing in it, and over them, with the man they hate? When I have done all in my power to reſtore myſelf to their favour, I ſhall have the leſs to reproach myſelf with.

Theſe conſiderations make me waver about following your advice, in relation to marriage; and the rather, as he is ſo full of complaiſance with regard to my former conditions, which he calls my injunctions.– Nor can I now, that my friends, as you inform me, have ſo ſtrenuouſly declared againſt accepting of the mediation of the ladies of Mr. Lovelace's family, put myſelf into their protection, unleſs I am reſolved to give up all hopes of a reconciliation with my own.

Yet if any happy introduction could be thought of to effect this deſirable purpoſe, how ſhall terms be propoſed to my father, while this man is with me, or near me? On the other hand, ſhould they in his abſence get me back by force, (and this, you are of opinion, they would attempt to do, but in fear of him) how will their ſevereſt acts of compulſion be juſtified by my flight from them!— Meanwhile, to what cenſures, as you remind me, do I expoſe myſelf, while he and I are together, and unmarried!— Yet [Can I with patience aſk the queſtion?] is it in my power?—O, my dear Miſs Howe! And am I ſo reduced, as that, to ſave the poor remains of my reputation in the world's eye, I muſt watch the gracious motion from this man's lips?

Were my couſin Morden in England, all might ſtill perhaps be determined happily.

If no other mediation than his can be procured to ſet on foot the wiſhed-for reconciliation, and if my ſituation with Mr. Lovelace alter not in the interim, I muſt endeavour to keep myſelf in a ſtate of independence till he arrive, that I be at liberty to govern myſelf by his advice and direction.

I will acquaint you, as you deſire, with all that paſſes between Mr. Lovelace and me. Hitherto I have not diſcovered anything in his behaviour that is very exceptionable. Yet I cannot ſay, that I think the reſpect he ſhews me, an eaſy, unreſtrained, and natural reſpect, although I can hardly tell where the fault is.

But he has doubtleſs an arrogant and encroaching ſpirit. Nor is he ſo polite as his education, and other advantages, might have made one expect him to be. He ſeems, in ſhort, to be one, who has always had too much of his own will to ſtudy to accomodate himſelf to that of others.

As to the placing of ſome confidence in him, I ſhall be as ready to take your advice in this particular, as in all others, and as he will be to deſerve it. But tricked away as I was by him, not only againſt my judgment, but my inclination, can he, or any-body, expect, that I ſhould immediately treat him with complaiſance, as if I acknowledged obligation to him for carrying me away?—If I did, muſt he not either think me a vile diſſembler before he gained that point, or afterwards?

Indeed, indeed, my dear, I could tear my hair, on conſidering what you write, (as to the probability that the dreaded Wedneſday was more dreaded than it needed to be) to think, that I ſhould be thus tricked by this man; and that, in all likelihood, through his vile agent Joſeph Leman. So premeditated and elaborate a wickedneſs as it muſt be!— Muſt I not, with ſuch a man, be wanting to myſelf, if I were not jealous and vigilant?—Yet what a life to live for a ſpirit ſo open, and naturally ſo unſuſpicious, as mine?

I am obliged to Mr. Hickman for the aſſiſtance he is ſo kindly ready to give to our correſpondence. He is ſo little likely to make to himſelf an additional merit with the daughter upon it, that I ſhall be very ſorry, if he riſque anything with the mother by it.

I am now in a ſtate of obligation: ſo muſt reſt ſatisfied with whatever I cannot help. Whom have I the power, once ſo precious to me, of obliging?— What I mean, my dear, is, that I ought, perhaps, to expect, that my influences over you are weakened by my indiſcretion. Nevertheleſs, I will not, if I can help it, deſert myſelf, nor give up the privilege you uſed to allow me, of telling you what I think of ſuch parts of your conduct as I may not approve.

You muſt permit me therefore, ſevere as your mother is againſt an undeſigning offender, to ſay, that I think your livelineſs to her inexcuſable—To paſs over, for this time, what nevertheleſs concerns me not a little, the free treatment you almoſt indiſcriminately give to my relations.

If you will not, for your duty's ſake, forbear your tauntings and impatience, let me beſeech you, that you will for mine.—Since otherwiſe, your mother may apprehend, that my example, like a leaven, is working itſelf into the mind of her beloved daughter. And may not ſuch an apprehenſion give her an irreconcileable diſpleaſure againſt me?

I incloſe the copy of my letter to my ſiſter, which you are deſirous to ſee. You will obſerve, that although I have not demanded my eſtate in form, and of my truſtees, yet that I have hinted at leave to retire to it. How joyfully would I keep my word, if they would accept of the offer I renew!—It was not proper, I believe you will think, on many accounts, to own that I was carried off againſt my inclination. I am, my deareſt friend, your ever-obliged and affectionate

CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER VI.

TO MISS ARABELLA HARLOWE.

[INCLOSED TO MISS HOWE IN THE PRECEDING.]

ST. ALBAN'S, APR. 11.

MY DEAR SISTER,

I Have, I confeſs, been guilty of an action which carries with it a raſh and undutiful appearance. And I ſhould have thought it an inexcuſable one, had I been uſed with leſs ſeverity than I have been of late; and had I not too great reaſon to apprehend, that I was to be made a ſacrifice to a man I could not bear to think of. But what is done, is done—Perhaps I could wiſh it had not; and that I had truſted to the relenting of my dear and honoured parents.—Yet this from no other motives, but thoſe of duty to them.—To whom I am ready to return (if I may not be permitted to retire to The Grove) on conditions which I before offered to comply with.

Nor ſhall I be in any ſort of dependence upon the perſon by whoſe means I have taken this truly reluctant ſtep, inconſiſtent with any reaſonable engagement I ſhall enter into, if I am not farther precipitated. Let me not have it to ſay, now at this important criſis! that I have a ſiſter, but not a friend in that ſiſter. My reputation, dearer to me than life, (whatever you may imagine from the ſtep I have taken) is ſuffering. A little lenity will, even yet, in a great meaſure, reſtore it, and make that paſs for a temporary miſunderſtanding only, which otherwiſe will be a ſtain as durable as life, upon a creature who has already been treated with great unkindneſs, to uſe no harſher a word.

For your own ſake therefore, for my brother's ſake, by whom (I muſt ſay) I have been thus precipitated, and for all the family's ſake, aggravate not my fault, if, on recollecting every thing, you think it one; nor by widening the unhappy difference, expoſe a ſiſter for ever—Prays your affectionate

CL. HARLOWE.

I ſhall take it for a very great favour, to have my cloaths directly ſent me, together with fifty guineas, which you will find in my eſcritoire; (of which I incloſe the key) as alſo the divinity and miſcellany claſſes of my little library; and, if it be thought fit, my jewels—Directed for me, 'To be left, 'till called for, at Mr. Oſgood's, near 'Soho Square.'

LETTER VII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

MR. Lovelace, in continuation of his laſt letter, (No III.) gives an account to his friend (pretty much to the ſame effect with the lady's) of all that paſſed between them at the inns, in the journey, and till their fixing at Mrs. Sorlings's. To avoid repetition, thoſe paſſages in his narrative are only extracted, which will ſerve to embelliſh hers; to open his views; or to diſplay the humorous talent he was noted for.

At their alighting at the inn at St. Alban's on Monday night, thus he writes.

THE people who came about us, as we alighted, ſeemed, by their jaw-fallen faces, and goggling eyes, to wonder at beholding a charming young lady, majeſty in her air and aſpect, ſo compoſedly dreſſed, yet with features ſo diſcompoſed, come off a journey which had made the cattle ſmoke, and the ſervants ſweat. I read their curioſity in their faces, and my beloved's uneaſineſs in hers.

hers. She caſt a conſcious glance, as ſhe alighted, upon her habit, which was no habit; and repulſively, as I may ſay, quitting my aſſiſting hand, hurried into the houſe.

Ovid was not a greater maſter of metamorphoſes than thy friend. To the miſtreſs of the houſe I inſtantly changed her into a ſiſter, brought off by ſurprize from a near relation's (where ſhe had wintered) to prevent her marrying a confounded rake [I love always to go as near the truth as I can] whom her father and mother, her eldeſt ſiſter, and all her loving uncles, aunts, and couſins, abhorred. This accounted for my charmer's expected ſullens; for her diſpleaſure when ſhe was to join me again, were it to hold; for her unſuitable dreſs upon the road; and, at the ſame time, gave her a proper and ſeaſonable aſſurance of my honourable views.

Upon the debate between the lady and him, and particularly upon that part where ſhe upbraids him with putting a young creature upon making a ſacrifice of her duty and conſcience, he writes—

ALL theſe, and ſtill more mortifying things, ſhe ſaid.

I heard her in ſilence. But when it came to my turn, I pleaded, I argued, I anſwered her, as well as I could.—And when humility would not do, I raiſed my voice, and ſuffered my eye to ſparkle with anger; hoping to take advantage of that ſweet cowardice which is ſo amiable in the ſex, and to which my victory over this proud beauty is principally owing.

She was not intimidated, however; and was going to riſe upon me in her temper; and would have broken in upon my defence. But when a man talks to a woman upon ſuch ſubjects, let her be ever ſo much in alt, 'tis ſtrange, if he cannot throw out a tub to the whale; —that is to ſay, if he cannot divert her from reſenting one bold thing, by uttering two or three full as bold; but for which more favourable interpretations will lie.

To that part, where ſhe tells him of the difficulty ſhe made to correſpond with him at firſt, thus he writes.

VERY true, my precious!—And innumerable have been the difficulties thou haſt made me ſtruggle with. But one day thou mayeſt wiſh, that thou hadſt ſpared this boaſt; as well as thoſe other pretty haughtineſſes, That thou didſt not reject Solmes for my ſake: that my glory, if I valued myſelf upon carrying thee off, was thy ſhame; that I have more merit with myſelf than with thee, or anybody elſe; [What a coxcomb ſhe makes me, Jack!] that thou wiſheſt thyſelf in thy father's houſe again, whatever were to be the conſequence.—If I forgive thee, charmer, for theſe hints, for theſe reflections, for theſe wiſhes, for theſe contempts, I am not the Lovelace I have been reputed to be; and that thy treatment of me ſhews that thou thinkeſt I am.

In ſhort, her whole air throughout this debate, expreſſed a majeſtick kind of indignation, which implied a believed ſuperiority of talents over the perſon to whom ſhe ſpoke.

Thou haſt heard me often expatiate upon the pitiful figure a man muſt make, whoſe wife has, or believes ſhe has, more ſenſe than himſelf. A thouſand reaſons could I give why I ought not to think of marrying Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe: at leaſt till I can be ſure, that ſhe loves me with the preference I muſt expect from a wife.

I begin to ſtagger in my reſolutions. Ever averſe as I was to Hymeneal ſhackles, how eaſily will old prejudices recur! Heaven give me the heart to be honeſt to my Clariſſa!—There's a prayer, Jack! If I ſhould not be heard, what a ſad thing would that be, for the moſt admirable of women!—Yet, as I do not often trouble Heaven with my prayers, who knows but this may be granted?

But there lie before me ſuch charming difficulties, ſuch ſcenery for intrigue, for ſtratagem, for enterprize—What a horrible thing, that my talents point all that way!—When I know what is honourable and juſt; and would almoſt wiſh to be honeſt?—Almoſt I ſay; for ſuch a varlet am I, that I cannot altogether wiſh it, for the ſoul of me!—Such a triumph over the whole ſex, if I can ſubdue this lady! My maiden vow, as I may call it!—For did not the ſex begin with me?—And does this lady ſpare me?—Thinkeſt thou, Jack, that I ſhould have ſpared my roſebud, had I been ſet at defiance thus?—Her grandmother beſought me, at firſt, to ſpare her roſebud; and when a girl is put, or puts herſelf, into a man's power, what can he wiſh for further? while I always conſidered oppoſition and reſiſtance as a challenge to do my worſt.

Why, why, will the dear creature take ſuch pains to appear all ice to me?—Why will ſhe, by her pride, awaken mine?—Haſt thou not ſeen, in the above, how how contemptibly she treats me?—What have I not suffered for her, and even from her?—Ought I to bear being told, that she will despise me, if I value myself above that odious Solmes?

Then she cuts me short in all my ardours. To vow fidelity, is by a cursed turn upon me, to shew, that there is a reason, in my own opinion, for doubt of it.—The very same reflection upon me once before. In my power, or out of my power, all one to this lady.—So, Belford, my poor vows are crammed down my throat, before they can well rise to my lips. And what can a lover say to his mistress, if she will neither let him lye nor swear?

One little piece of artifice I had recourse to: when she pushed so hard for me to leave her, I made a request to her, upon a condition she could not refuse; and pretended as much gratitude upon her granting it, as if it were a favour of the last consequence.

And what was this? but to promise what she had before promised, never to marry any other man, while I am living, and single, unless I should give her cause for high disgust against me. This, you know, was promising me nothing, because she could be offended at any time, and was to be the sole judge of the offence. But it shewed her, how reasonable and just my expectations were; and that I was no encroacher.

She consented; and asked what security I expected? Her word only.

She gave me her word: but I besought her excuse for sealing it. And in the same moment (since to have waited for consent would have been asking for a denial) saluted her. And, believe me, or not, but, as I hope to live, it was the first time I had the courage to touch her charming lips with mine. And this I tell thee, Belford, that that single pressure (as modestly put too, as if I were as much a virgin as herself, that she might not be afraid of me another time) delighted me more than ever I was delighted by the ultimatum with any other woman.—So precious do awe, reverence, and apprehended prohibition, make a favour!

And now, Belford, I am only afraid, that I shall be too cunning; for she does not at present talk enough for me. I hardly know what to make of the dear creature yet.

I topt the brother's part on Monday night before the landlady at St. Alban's; asking my sister's pardon for carrying her off so unprepared for a journey; prated of the joy my father and mother, and all our friends, would have on receiving her; and this with so many circumstances, that I perceived, by a look she gave me, that went through my very reins, that I had gone too far. I apologized for it indeed when alone; but could not penetrate for the soul of me, whether I made the matter better or worse by it.

But I am of too frank a nature: my success, and the joy I have because of the jewel I am half in possession of, has not only unlocked my bosom, but left the door quite open.

This is a confounded sly sex. Would she but speak out, as I do—But I must learn reserves of her.

She must needs be unprovided of money: but has too much pride to accept of any from me. I would have had her to go to town, [To town, if possible, must I get her to consent to go] in order to provide herself with the richest of silks which that can afford. But neither is this to be assented to. And yet, as my intelligencer acquaints me, her implacable relations are resolved to distress her all they can.

These wretches have been most gloriously raving, ever since her flight; and still, thank Heaven, continue to rave; and will, I hope, for a twelvemonth to come. Now, at last, it is my day!

Bitterly do they regret, that they permitted her poultry visits, and garden-walks, which gave her the opportunity to effect an escape which they suppose preconcerted. For, as to her dining in the Ivy Bower, they had a cunning design to answer upon her in that permission, as Betty told Joseph her lover.

They lost, they say, an excellent pretence for confining her more closely on my threatening to rescue her, if they offered to carry her against her will to old Antony's moated house. For this, as I told thee at the Hart, and as I once hinted to the dear creature herself, they had it in deliberation to do; apprehending, that I might attempt to carry her off, either with or without her consent, on some one of those connived-at excursions.

But here my honest Joseph, who gave me the information, was of admirable service to me. I had taught him to make the Harlowes believe, that I was as communicative to my servants, as their stupid James was to Joseph: Joseph as they supposed, by tampering with Will, got all my secrets, and was acquainted acquainted with all my motions. And having alſo undertaken to watch all thoſe of his young lady, the wiſe family were ſecure; and ſo was my beloved; and ſo was I.

I once had it in my head, (and I hinted it to thee in a former) in caſe ſuch a ſtep ſhould be neceſſary, to attempt to carry her off by ſurprize from the Wood Houſe; as it is remote from the dwelling-houſe. This had I attempted, I ſhould certainly have effected, by the help of the confraternity; and it would have been an action worthy of us all. But Joſeph's conſcience, as he called it, ſtood in my way; for he thought, it muſt have been known to be done by his connivance. I could, I dare ſay, have overcome this ſcruple, as eaſily as I did many of his others, had I not depended at one time upon her meeting me at a midnight or late hour; [And, if ſhe had, ſhe never would have gone back] at other times upon the cunning family's doing my work for me, equally againſt their knowledge or their wills.

For well I knew, that James and Arabella were determined never to leave off their fooliſh trials and provocations, till, by tiring her out, they had either made her Solmes's wife, or guilty of ſome ſuch raſhneſs as ſhould throw her for ever out of the favour of both her uncles; though they had too much malice in their heads to intend ſervice to me by their perſecutions of her.

LETTER VIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

IN CONTINUATION.

I Obliged the dear creature highly, I could perceive, by bringing Mrs. Greme to attend her, and to ſuffer that good woman's recommendation of lodgings to take place, on her refuſal to go to The Lawn.

She muſt believe all my views to be honourable, when I had provided for her no particular lodgings, leaving it to her choice, whether ſhe would go to M. Hall, to The Lawn, to London, or to either of the dowagers of my family.

She was viſibly pleaſed with my motion of putting Mrs. Greme into the chaiſe with her, and riding on horſeback myſelf.

Some people would have been apprehenſive of what might paſs between her and Mrs. Greme. But as all my relations either know or believe the juſtice of my intentions by her, I was in no pain on that account; and the leſs, as I have been always above hypocriſy, or wiſhing to be thought better than I am. And indeed, what occaſion has a man to be an hypocrite, who has hitherto found his views upon the ſex better anſwered, for his being known to be a rake? Why, even my beloved here denied not to correſpond with me, though her friends had taught her to think me a libertine—Who then would be trying a new and worſe character?

And then Mrs. Greme is a pious matron, and would not have been biaſſed againſt the truth on any conſideration. She uſed formerly, while there were any hopes of my reformation, to pray for me. She hardly continues the good cuſtom, I doubt; for her worthy lord makes no ſcruple, occaſionally to rave againſt me to man, woman, and child, as they come in his way. He is very undutiful, as thou knoweſt. Surely, I may ſay ſo; ſince all duties are reciprocal. But for Mrs. Greme, poor woman! when my lord has the gout, and is at The Lawn, and the chaplain not to be found, ſhe prays by him, or reads a chapter to him in the Bible, or ſome other good book.

Was it not therefore right to introduce ſuch a good ſort of woman to the dear creature; and to leave them, without reſerve, to their own talk!—And very buſy in talk I ſaw they were, as they rode; and felt it too; for moſt charmingly glowed my cheeks.

I hope I ſhall be honeſt, I once more ſay: but as we frail mortals are not our own maſters at all times, I muſt endeavour to keep the dear creature un-apprehenſive, until I can get her to our acquaintance's in London, or to ſome other ſafe place there. Should I, in the interim, give her the leaſt room for ſuſpicion; or offer to reſtrain her; ſhe can make her appeals to ſtrangers, and call the country in upon me; and, perhaps, throw herſelf upon her relations on their own terms. And were I now to loſe her, how unworthy ſhould I be to be the prince and leader of ſuch a confraternity as ours!—How unable to look up among men! or to ſhew my face among women!

As things at preſent ſtand, ſhe dare not own, that ſhe went off againſt her own conſent; and I have taken care to make all the implacables believe, that ſhe eſcaped with it.

She has received an anſwer from Miſs Howe, to the letter written to her from St. Alban's.

Whatever are the contents, I know not; but she was drowned in tears on the perusal of it. And I am the sufferer.

Miss Howe is a charming creature too; but confoundedly smart and spiritful. I am a good deal afraid of her. Her mother can hardly keep her in. I must continue to play off old Antony, by my honest Joseph, upon that mother, in order to manage that daughter, and oblige my beloved to an absolute dependence upon myself.

Mrs. Howe is impatient of contradiction. So is Miss. A young lady who is sensible that she has all the maternal requisites herself, to be under maternal controul;—fine ground for a man of intrigue to build upon! — A mother over-notable; a daughter over-sensible; and their Hickman, who is—over-neither: but merely a passive—

Only that I have an object still more desirable!

Yet how unhappy, that these two young ladies lived so near each other, and are so well acquainted! Else how charmingly might I have managed them both!

But one man cannot have every woman worth having—Pity though—when the man is such a VERY clever fellow!

LETTER IX.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

IN CONTINUATION.

NEVER was there such a pair of scribbling lovers as we; yet perhaps whom it so much concerns to keep from each other what each writes. She won't have any-thing else to do. I would, if she'd let me. I am not reformed enough for a husband. —Patience is a virtue, Lord M. says. Slow and sure, is another of his sentences. If I had not a great deal of that virtue, I should not have waited the Harlowes own time of ripening into execution my plots upon themselves and upon their goddess-daughter.

My beloved has been writing to her fancy friend, I believe, all that has befallen her, and what has passed between us hitherto. She will possibly have fine subjects for her pen, if she be as minute as I am.

I would not be so barbarous as to permit old Antony to set Mrs. Howe against her, did I not dread the consequences of the correspondence between the two young ladies. So lively the one, so vigilant, so prudent both, who would not wish to outwit such girls, and to be able to twirl them round his finger?

My charmer has written to her sister for her cloaths, for some gold, and for some of her books. What books can tell her more than she knows? But I can. So she had better study me.

She may write. She must be obliged to me at last with all her pride. Miss Howe indeed will be ready enough to supply her; but I question, whether she can do it without her mother, who is as covetous as the grave. And my agent's agent, old Antony, has already given the mother a hint which will make her jealous of pecuniaries.

Besides, if Miss Howe has money by her, I can put her mother upon borrowing it of her: nor blame me, Jack, for contrivances that have their foundation in generosity. Thou knowest my spirit; and that I should be proud to lay an obligation upon my charmer to the amount of half, nay, to the whole of my estate. Lord M. has more for me than I can ever wish for. My predominant passion is girl, not gold; nor value I this, but as it helps me to that, and gives me independence.

I was forced to put it into the sweet novice's head, as well for my sake as for hers (lest we should be traceable by her direction) whither to direct the sending of her cloaths, if they incline to do her that small piece of justice.

If they do, I shall begin to dread a reconciliation; and must be forced to muse for a contrivance or two, to prevent it; and to avoid mischief. For that (as I have told honest Joseph Leman) is a great point with me.

Thou wilt think me a sad fellow, I doubt. But are not all rakes sad fellows?—And art not thou, to thy little power, as bad as any? If thou dost all that's in thy head and in thy heart to do, thou art worse than I; for I do not, I assure you.

I proposed, and she consented, that her cloaths, or whatever else her relations should think fit to send her, should be directed to thy cousin Osgood's. Let a special messenger, at my charge, bring me any letter, or portable parcel, that shall come. If not portable, give me notice of it. But thou'lt have no trouble of this sort from her relations, I dare be sworn. And in this assurance, I will leave them, I think, to act upon their own heads. A man would have no more to answer for than needs must.

But one thing, while I think of it; which is of great importance to be attended to—You muſt hereafter write to me in character, as I ſhall do to you. It would be a confounded thing to be blown up by a train of my own laying. And who knows what opportunities a man in love may have againſt himſelf? In changing a coat or waiſtcoat, ſomething might be forgotten. I once ſuffered that way. Then for the ſex's curioſity, it is but remembering, in order to guard againſt it, that the name of their common mother was Eve.

Another thing remember; I have changed my name: changed it without an act of parliament. Robert Huntingford it is now. Continue Eſquire. It is a reſpectable addition, although every ſorry fellow aſſumes it, almoſt to the baniſhment of the uſual travelling one of captain. To be left till called for, at the poſthouſe at Hertford.

Upon naming thee, ſhe aſked thy character. I gave thee a better than thou deſervedſt, in order to do credit to myſelf. Yet I told her, that thou wert an aukward fellow; and this to do credit to thee, that ſhe may not, if ever ſhe be to ſee thee, expect a cleverer man than ſhe'll find. Yet thy apparent aukwardneſs befriends thee not a little: for wert thou a ſightly mortal, people would diſcover nothing extraordinary in thee, when they converſed with thee: whereas, ſeeing a bear, they are ſurprized to find in thee any-thing that is like a man. Felicitate thyſelf then upon thy defects; which are evidently thy principal perfections; and which occaſion thee a diſtinction which otherwiſe thou wouldſt never have.

The lodgings we are in at preſent are not convenient. I was ſo delicate as to find fault with them, as communicating with each other, becauſe I knew ſhe would; and told her, That were I ſure ſhe was ſafe from purſuit, I would leave her in them, (ſince ſuch was her earneſt deſire and expectation) and go to London.

She muſt be an infidel againſt all reaſon and appearances, if I do not baniſh even the ſhadow of miſtruſt from her heart.

Here are two young likely girls, daughters of the widow Sorlings; that's the name of our landlady.

I have only, at preſent, admired them in their dairy-works. How greedily do the ſex ſwallow praiſe!—Did I not once in the ſtreets of London ſee a well-dreſſed handſome girl laugh, bridle, and viſibly enjoy the praiſes of a ſooty dog, a chimney-ſweeper; who with his empty ſack croſs his ſhoulder, after giving her the way, ſtopt, and held up his bruſh and ſhovel in admiration of her?—'Egad, girl,' thought I, 'I deſpiſe thee 'as Lovelace: but were I the chimney-'ſweeper, and could only contrive to 'get into thy preſence, my life to thy 'virtue, I would have thee.'

So pleaſed was I with the younger Sorlings, for the elegance of her works, that I kiſſed her, and ſhe made me a curtſey for my condeſcenſion; and bluſhed, and ſeemed ſenſible all over: encouraging, yet innocently, ſhe adjuſted her handkerchief, and looked towards the door, as much as to ſay, ſhe would not tell, were I to kiſs her again.

Her eldeſt ſiſter popt upon her. The conſcious girl bluſhed again, and looked ſo confounded, that I made an excuſe for her, which gratified both. 'Mrs. 'Betty,' ſaid I, 'I have been ſo much 'pleaſed with the neatneſs of your dairy-'works, that I could not help ſaluting 'your ſiſter: you have your ſhare of 'merit in them, I am ſure—Give me 'leave——'

Good ſouls!—I like them both—She curtſeyed too—How I love a grateful temper! O that my Clariſſa were but half ſo acknowledging!

I think I muſt get one of them to attend my charmer when ſhe removes.—The mother ſeems to be a notable woman. She had not beſt, however, be too notable: ſince, were ſhe by ſuſpicion to give a face of difficulty to the matter, it would prepare me for a trial with one or both the daughters.

Allow me a little rodomontade, Jack—But really and truly my heart is fixed. I can think of no creature breathing of the ſex, but my Gloriana.

LETTER X.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

IN CONTINUATION.

THIS is Wedneſday; the day that I was to have loſt my charmer for ever to the hideous Solmes! With what high ſatisfaction and heart's-eaſe can I now ſit down, and triumph over my men in ſtraw at Harlowe Place! Yet 'tis perhaps beſt for them, that ſhe got off as ſhe did. Who knows what conſequences might have followed upon my attending her in; or (if ſhe had not met me) upon my projected viſit, followed by my myrmidons?

But had I even gone in with her unaccompanied, accompanied, I think I had but little reaſon for apprehenſion: for well thou knoweſt, that the tame ſpirits which value themſelves upon reputation, and are held within the ſkirts of the law by political conſiderations only, may be compared to an infectious ſpider; which will run into his hole the moment one of his threads is touched by a finger that can cruſh him, leaving all his toils defenceleſs, and to be bruſhed down at the will of the potent invader. While a ſilly fly that has neither courage nor ſtrength to reſiſt, no ſooner gives notice, by it's buz and it's ſtruggles, of it's being entangled, but out ſteps the ſelf-circumſcribed tyrant, winds round and round the poor inſect, till he covers it with his bowel-ſpun toils; and when ſo fully ſecured, that it can neither move leg nor wing, ſuſpends it, as if for a ſpectacle to be exulted over: then ſtalking to the door of his cell, turns about, glotes over it at a diſtance; and, ſometimes advancing, ſometimes retiring, preys at leiſure upon it's vitals.

But now I think of it, will not this compariſon do as well for the entangled girls, as for the tame ſpirits?—Better o' my conſcience!—'Tis but comparing the ſpider to us brave fellows; and it quadrates.

Whatever our hearts are in, our heads will follow. Begin whith ſpiders, with flies, with what we will, girl is the center of gravity, and we all naturally tend to it.

Nevertheleſs, to recur; I cannot but obſerve, that theſe tame ſpirits ſtand a poor chance in a fairly offenſive war with ſuch of us mad fellows, as are above all law, and ſcorn to ſculk behind the hypocritical ſcreen of reputation.

Thou knoweſt, that I never ſcruple to throw myſelf amongſt numbers of adverſaries; the more the fater: one or two, no fear, will take the part of a ſingle adventurer, if not intentionally, in fact; holding him in, while others hold in the principal antagoniſt, to the augmentation of their mutual proweſs, till both are prevailed upon to compromiſe, or one to abſent: ſo that upon the whole, the law-breakers have the advantage of the law-keepers, all the world over; at leaſt for a time, and till they have run to the end of their race. Add to this, in the queſtion between me and the Harlowes, that the whole family of them muſt know that they have injured me—muſt therefore be afraid of me. Did they not, at their own church, cluſter together like bees, when they ſaw me enter it? Nor knew they which ſhould venture out firſt, when the ſervice was over.

James, indeed, was not there. If he had, he would perhaps have endeavoured to look valiant. But there is a ſort of valour in the face, which ſhews fear in the heart: juſt ſuch a face would James Harlowe's have been, had I made them a viſit.

When I have had ſuch a face and ſuch a heart as I have deſcribed to deal with, I have been all calm and ſerene, and left it to the friends of the bluſterer (as I have done to the Harlowes) to do my work for me.

I am about muſtering up in my memory, all that I have ever done, that has been thought praiſe-worthy, or but barely tolerable. I am afraid thou canſt not help me to many remembrances of this ſort: becauſe I never was ſo bad as ſince I have known thee.

Have I not had it in my heart to do ſome good that thou canſt remind me of? Study for me, Jack. I have recollected ſome inſtances which I think will tell in—But ſee if thou canſt help me to ſome which I may have forgot.

This I may venture to ſay, That the principal blot in my eſcutcheon is owing to theſe girls, theſe confounded girls. But for them, I could go to church with a good conſcience: but when I do, there they are. Every-where does Satan ſpread his ſnares for me! But, now I think of it, what if our governor ſhould appoint churches for the women only, and others for the men?—Full as proper, I think, for the promoting of true piety in both, [much better than the ſynagogue-lattices] as ſeparate boarding-ſchools for their education.

There are already male and female dedications of churches.

St. Swithin's, St. Stephen's, St. Thomas's, St. George's, and ſo forth, might be appropriated to the men; and Santa Catharina's, Santa Anna's, Santa Maria's, Santa Margaretta's, for the women.

Yet, were it ſo, and life to be the forfeiture of being found at the female churches, I believe that I, like a ſecond Clodius, ſhould change my dreſs, to come at my Portia or Pompeia, though one the daughter of a Cato, the other the wife of a Cæſar.

But how I excurſe!—Yet thou uſedſt to ſay, thou likedſt my excurſions. If thou doſt, thou'lt have enow of them: for I never had a ſubject I ſo much adored; and with which I ſhall probably be compelled to have ſo much patience before I ſtrike the blow; if the blow I do ſtrike.

But let me call myſelf back to my recordation-ſubject—Thou needeſt not remind me of my roſebud. I have her in my head; and moreover have contrived to give my fair-one an hint of that affair, by the agency of honeſt Joſeph Leman; although I have not reaped the hoped-for credit of her acknowledgment.

That's the devil; and it was always my hard fate—Every-thing I do that is good, is but as I ought!—Every-thing of a contrary nature is brought into the moſt glaring light againſt me—Is this fair? Ought not a balance to be ſtruck; and the credit carried to my account?—Yet I muſt own too, that I half-grudge Johnny this blooming maiden; for, in truth, I think a fine woman too rich a jewel to hang about a poor man's neck.

Surely, Jack, if I am guilty of a fault in my univerſal adorations of the ſex, the women in general ought to love me the better for it.

And ſo they do, I thank them heartily; except here and there a covetous little rogue comes croſs me, who under the pretence of loving virtue for it's own ſake, wants to have me all to herſelf.

I have rambled enough.

Adieu, for the preſent.

LETTER XI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

THURSDAY NIGHT, APRIL 13.

I Always loved writing, and my unhappy ſituation gives me now enough of it; and you, I fear, too much. I have had another very warm debate with Mr. Lovelace. It brought on the ſubject which you adviſed me not to decline, when it handſomely offered. And I want to have either your acquittal or blame for having ſuffered it to go off without effect.

The impatient wretch ſent up to me ſeveral times, while I was writing my laſt to you, to deſire my company: yet his buſineſs nothing particular; only to hear him talk. The man ſeems pleaſed with his own volubility; and, whenever he has collected together abundance of ſmooth things, he wants me to find an ear for them! Yet he need not; for I don't often gratify him either with giving him the praiſe for his verboſeneſs, or ſhewing the pleaſure in it, that he would be fond of.

When I had finiſhed the letter, and given it to Mr. Hickman's friend, I was going up again, and had got up half a dozen ſtairs; when he beſought me to ſtop, and hear what he had to ſay.

Nothing, as I ſaid, to any new purpoſe had he to offer; but complainings; and thoſe in a manner, and with an air, as I thought, that bordered upon inſolence. He could not live, he told me, unleſs he had more of my company, and of my indulgence too, than I had yet given him.

Hereupon I ſtept down, and into the parlour, not a little out of humour with him; and the more, as he has very quietly taken up his quarters here, without talking of removing as he had promiſed.

We began inſtantly our angry conference. He provoked me; and I repeated ſeveral of the plaineſt things I had ſaid in our former converſations; and particularly told him, that I was every hour more and more diſſatisfied with myſelf, and with him: that he was not a man, who, in my opinion, improved upon acquaintance; and that I ſhould not be eaſy till he had left me to myſelf.

He might be ſurprized at my warmth, perhaps: but really the man looked ſo like a ſimpleton, heſitating, and having nothing to ſay for himſelf, or that ſhould excuſe the peremptorineſs of his demand upon me, (when he knew I had been writing a letter which a gentleman waited for) that I flung from him, declaring, that I would be miſtreſs of my own time, and of my own actions, and not be called to account for either.

He was very uneaſy till he could again be admitted into my company; and when I was obliged to ſee him, which was ſooner than I liked, never did man put on a more humble and reſpectful demeanour.

He told me, That he had, upon this occaſion, been entering into himſelf, and had found a great deal of reaſon to blame himſelf for an impatiency and inconſideration, which, although he meant nothing by it, muſt be very diſagreeable to one of my delicacy. That having always aimed at a manly ſincerity and openneſs of heart, he had not till now diſcovered, that both were very conſiſtent with that true politeneſs, which he feared he had too much diſregarded, while he ſought to avoid the contrary extreme; knowing, that in me he had to deal with a lady, who deſpiſed an hypocrite, and who was above all flattery. But from this time forth, I ſhould find ſuch an alteration in his whole behaviour, as might be expected from a man who knew himſelf to be honoured with the preſence and converſation of a perſon, who had the moſt delicate mind in the world—that was his flouriſh.

I ſaid, That he might perhaps expect congratulation upon the diſcovery he had juſt now made, to wit, That true politeneſs and ſincerity were reconcileable: but that I, who had, by a perverſe fate, been thrown into his company, had abundant reaſon to regret that he had no ſooner found this out.—Since, I believed, very few men of birth and education were ſtrangers to it.

He knew not, neither, he ſaid, that he had ſo very badly behaved himſelf, as to deſerve ſo very ſevere a rebuke.

Perhaps not, I replied: but he might, if ſo, make another diſcovery from what I had ſaid, which might be to my own diſadvantage. Since, if he had ſo much reaſon to be ſatisfied with himſelf, he would ſee what an ungenerous perſon he ſpoke to, who, when he ſeemed to give himſelf airs of humility, which, perhaps, he thought beneath him to aſſume, had not the civility to make him a compliment upon them; but was ready to take him at his word.

He had long, with infinite pleaſure, the pretended flattery-hater ſaid, admired my ſuperior talents, and a wiſdom in ſo young a lady, perfectly ſurprizing.

'Let me, Madam,' ſaid he, 'ſtand 'ever ſo low in your opinion, I ſhall be'lieve all you ſay to be juſt; and that I 'have nothing to do, but to govern my'ſelf for the future by your example, 'and by the ſtandard you ſhall be pleaſ'ed to give me.'

'I know better, Sir,' replied I, than 'to value myſelf upon your volu'bility of ſpeech. As you pretend to 'pay ſo preferable a regard to ſincerity, 'you ſhall confine yourſelf to the ſtrict 'rules of truth, when you ſpeak of me 'to myſelf: and then, although you 'ſhall be ſo kind as to imagine you have 'reaſon to make me a compliment, you 'will have much more to pride yourſelf 'in thoſe arts which have made ſo ex'traordinary a young creature ſo great a 'fool.'

Really, my dear, the man deſerves not politer treatment.—And then has he not made a fool, an egregious fool of me!—I am afraid he himſelf thinks he has.

'I am ſurprized! I am amazed, Ma'dam,' returned he, 'at ſo ſtrange a 'turn upon me!—I am very unhappy, 'that nothing I can do or ſay will give 'you a good opinion of me!—Would 'to Heaven that I knew what I can do 'to obtain the honour of your confi'dence!'

I told him, that I deſired his abſence, of all things. I ſaw not, I ſaid, that my friends thought it worth their while to give me diſturbance: therefore, if he would ſet out for London, or Berkſhire, or whither he pleaſed, it would be moſt agreeable to me, and moſt reputable too.

He would do ſo, he ſaid, he intended to do ſo, the moment I was in a place to my liking—in a place convenient for me.

'This, Sir, will be ſo,' ſaid I, 'when 'you are not here to break in upon me, 'and make the apartments inconve'nient.'

He did not think this place ſafe, he replied; and as I intended not to ſtay here, he had not been ſo ſolicitous, as otherwiſe he ſhould have been, to enjoin privacy to his ſervants, nor to Mrs. Greme at her leaving me; that there were two or three gentlemen in the neighbourhood, he ſaid, with whoſe ſervants his goſſiping fellows had ſcraped acquaintance: ſo that he could not think of leaving me here unguarded and unattended.—But fix upon any place in England where I could be out of danger, and he would go to the furthermoſt part of the king's dominions, if by doing ſo he could make me eaſy.

I told him plainly that I ſhould never be in humour with myſelf for meeting him; nor with him, for ſeducing me away: that my regrets increaſed, inſtead of diminiſhed; that my reputation was wounded; that nothing I could do would now retrieve it; and that he muſt not wonder, if I every hour grew more and more uneaſy both with myſelf and him; that upon the whole, I was willing to take care of myſelf; and when he had left me, I ſhould beſt know what to reſolve upon, and whither to go.

He wiſhed, he ſaid, he were at liberty, without giving me offence, or being thought to intend to infringe the articles I had ſtipulated and inſiſted upon, to make one humble propoſal to me. But the ſacred regard he was determined to pay to all my injunctions, (reluctantly as I had on Monday laſt put it into his power to ſerve me) would not permit him to make it, unleſs I would promiſe to excuſe him, if I did not approve of it.

I aſked, in ſome confuſion, what he would ſay?

He prefaced and paraded on; and then out came, with great diffidence, and many apologies, and a bashfulness which sat very awkwardly upon him, a proposal of speedy solemnization: which, he said, would put all right; and make my first three or four months (which otherwise must be passed in obscurity and apprehension) a round of visits and visitings to and from all his relations; to Miss Howe; to whom I pleased. And would pave the way to the reconciliation I had so much at heart.

Your advice had great weight with me just then, as well as his reasons, and the consideration of my unhappy situation: but what could I say? I wanted somebody to speak for me.

The man saw I was not angry at his motion. I only blushed; and that I am sure I did up to the ears; and looked silly, and like a fool.

He wants not courage. Would he have had me catch at his first, at his very first word?—I was silent too—And do not the bold sex take silence for a mark of a favour?—Then, so lately in my father's house! Having also declared to him in my letters, before I had your advice, that I would not think of marriage till he had passed through a state of probation, as I may call it—How was it possible I could encourage, with ready signs of approbation, such an early proposal; especially so soon after the free treatment he had provoked from me? If I were to die, I could not.

He looked at me with great confidence; as if (notwithstanding his contradictory bashfulness) he would look me through; while my eye but now-and-then could glance at him. He begged my pardon with great humility: he was afraid I would think he deserved no other answer, but that of a contemptuous silence. True love was fearful of offending. ['Take care, Mr. Lovelace,' thought I, 'how yours is tried by that 'rule.'] Indeed for sacred a regard [foolish man!] would he have to all my declarations made before I honoured him—

I would hear him no further; but withdrew in a confusion too visible, and left him to make his nonsensical flourishes to himself.

I will only add, that, if he really wishes for a speedy solemnization, he never could have had a luckier time to press for my consent to it. But he let it go off; and indignation has taken place of it. And now shall it be a point with me, to get him at a distance from me.

I am, my dearest friend, your ever-faithful and obliged CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

TUESDAY, APRIL 13.

WHY, Jack, thou needest not make such a wonderment, as the girls say, if I should have taken large strides already towards reformation: for dost thou not see, that while I have been so assiduously, night and day, pursuing this single charmer, I have infinitely less to answer for, than otherwise I should have had? Let me see, how many days and nights?—Forty, I believe, after open trenches, spent in the sap only, and never a mine sprung yet!

By a moderate computation, a dozen kites might have fallen, while I have been only trying to ensnare this single lark. Nor yet do I see when I shall be able to bring her to my lure: more innocent days yet, therefore!—But reformation for my stalking-horse, I hope, will be a sure, though a slow method to effect all my purposes.

Then, Jack, thou wilt have a merit too in engaging my pen, since thy time would be otherwise worse employed: and, after all, who knows but by creating new habits, at the expence of the old, a real reformation may be brought about? I have promised it; and I believe there is a pleasure to be found in being good, reversing that of Nat. Lee's madman—

'—Which none but good men know.'

By all this, feest thou not, how greatly preferable it is, on twenty accounts, to pursue a difficult, rather than an easy chace? I have a desire to inculcate this pleasure upon thee, and to teach thee to fly at nobler game than daws, crows, and widgeons: I have a mind to shew thee from time to time, in the course of the correspondence thou hast so earnestly wished me to begin on this illustrious occasion, that these exalted ladies may be abased, and to obviate one of the objections that thou madest to me, when we were last together, that the pleasure which attends these nobler aims, remunerates not the pains they bring with them; since, like a paltry fellow as thou wert, thou assertedst that all women are alike.

Thou knowest nothing, Jack, of the delicacies of intrigue: nothing of the glory of outwitting the witty and the watchful; of the joys that fill the mind of the inventive or contriving genius, ruminating which to use of the different webs that offer to him for the entanglement ment of a haughty charmer, who in her day has given him unnumbered torments.—Thou, Jack, who, like a dog at his eaſe, contenteſt thyſelf to growl over a bone thrown out to thee, doſt not know the joys of a chace, and in purſuing a winding-game: theſe I will endeavour to rouze thee to, and then thou wilt have reaſon doubly and trebly to thank me, as well becauſe of thy preſent delight, as with regard to thy proſpects beyond the moon.

To this place I had written, purely to amuſe myſelf, before I was admitted to my charmer. But now I have to tell thee, that I was quite right in my conjecture, that ſhe would ſet up for herſelf, and diſmiſs me: for ſhe has declared in ſo many words, that ſuch was her reſolution. And why? Becauſe, to be plain with me, the more ſhe ſaw of me, and of my ways, the leſs ſhe liked of either.

This cut me to the heart!—I did not cry indeed!—Had I been a woman, I ſhould though; and that moſt plentifully: but I pulled out a white cambrick handkerchief. That I could command, but not my tears.

She finds fault with my proteſtations; with my profeſſions; with my vows: I cannot curſe a ſervant, the only privilege a maſter is known by, but I am ſuppoſed to be a trooper—I muſt not ſay, 'By my ſoul;' nor, 'As I hope to 'be ſaved.' Why, Jack, how particular this is! Would ſhe not have me think, I have a precious ſoul, as well as ſhe?—If ſhe thinks my ſalvation hopeleſs, what a devil [Another exceptionable word!] does ſhe propoſe to reform me for?—So I have not an ardent expreſſion left me.

WHAT can be done with a woman who is above flattery, and deſpiſes all praiſe but that which flows from the approbation of her own heart?

Well, Jack, thou ſeeſt it is high time to change my meaſures. I muſt run into the pious a little faſter than I had deſigned.

What a ſad thing would it be, were I, after all, to loſe her perſon, as well as her opinion! The only time that further acquaintance, and no blow ſtruck, nor ſuſpicion given, ever leſſened me in a lady's favour!—A curſed mortification!—'Tis certain I can have no pretence for holding her, if ſhe will go.—No ſuch thing as force to be uſed, or ſo much as hinted at: Lord ſend us ſafe at London!—That's all I have for it now: and yet it muſt be the leaſt part of my ſpeech.

But why will this admirable creature urge her deſtiny? Why will ſhe defy the power ſhe is abſolutely dependent upon? Why will ſhe ſtill wiſh to my face, that ſhe had never left her father's houſe? Why will ſhe deny me her company, till ſhe makes me loſe my patience, and lay myſelf open to her reſentment? And why, when ſhe is offended, does ſhe carry her indignation to the utmoſt length that a ſcornful beauty, in the very height of her power and pride, can go?

Is it prudent, thinkeſt thou, in her circumſtances, to tell me, repeatedly to tell me, That ſhe is every hour more and more diſſatisfied with herſelf and me? That I am not one, who improve upon her in my converſation and addreſs? [Couldſt thou, Jack, bear this from a captive?] That ſhe ſhall not be eaſy while ſhe is with me? That ſhe was thrown upon me by a perverſe fate? That ſhe knows better than to value herſelf upon my volubility? That if I think ſhe deſerves the compliments I make her, I may pride myſelf in thoſe arts, by which I have made a fool of ſo extraordinary a perſon? That ſhe ſhall never forgive herſelf for meeting me, nor me for ſeducing her away? [Her very words] That her regrets increaſe inſtead of diminiſh? That ſhe will take care of herſelf; and ſince her friends think it not worth while to purſue her, ſhe will be left to her own care? That I ſhall make Mrs. Sorlings's houſe more agreeable by my abſence?—And go to Berks, to town, or where-ever I will, [to the devil, I ſuppoſe] with all her heart?

The impolitick charmer!—To a temper ſo vindictive as ſhe thinks mine! To a free-liver, as ſhe believes me to be, who has her in his power! I was before, as thou knoweſt, balancing; now this ſcale, now that, the heavieſt. I only waited to ſee how her will would work, how mine would lead me on. Thou ſeeſt what bias hers takes—And wilt thou doubt that mine will be determined by it? Were not her faults, before this, numerous enough? Why will ſhe put me upon looking back?

I will ſit down to argue with myſelf by-and-by, and thou ſhalt be acquainted with the reſult.

If thou didſt but know, if thou hadſt but beheld, what an abject ſlave ſhe made me look like!—I had given myſelf high airs, as ſhe called them: but they were airs that ſhewed my love for her; that ſhewed I could not live out of her company. But she took me down with a vengeance! She made me look about me. So much advantage had she over me; such severe turns upon me; by my soul, Jack, I had hardly a word to say for myself. I am ashamed to tell thee, what a poor creature she made me look like! But I could have told her something that would have humbled her pretty pride at the instant, had she been in a proper place, and proper company about her.

To such a place then—and where she cannot fly me—And then to see how my will works, and what can be done by the amorous see-saw; now humble; now proud; now expecting, or demanding; now submitting, or acquiescing—till I have tried resistance.

But these hints are at present enough, I may further explain myself as I go along; and as I confirm or recede in my future motions. If she will revive past disobligations! If she will—But no more, no more, as I said, at present, of threatenings.

LETTER XIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

IN CONTINUATION.

AND do I not see that I shall need nothing but patience, in order to have all power with me? For what shall we say, if all these complaints of a character wounded; these declarations of increasing regrets for meeting me; of resentments never to be got over for my seducing her away; these angry commands to leave her:—what shall we say, if all were to mean nothing but MATRIMONY? And what if my forbearing to enter upon that subject come out to be the true cause of her petulance and uneasiness?

I had once before played about the skirts of the irrevocable obligation; but thought myself obliged to speak in clouds, and to run away from the subject, as soon as she took my meaning, lest she should imagine it to be ungenerously urged, now she was in some sort in my power, as she had forbid me beforehand, to touch upon it, till I were in a state of visible reformation, and till a reconciliation with her friends were probable. But now, out-argued, out-talented, and pushed so vehemently to leave one whom I had no good pretence to hold, if she would go; and who could so easily, if I had given her cause to doubt, have thrown herself into other protection, or have returned to Harlowe Place and Solmes; I spoke out upon the subject, and offered reasons, although with infinite doubt and hesitation, [lest she should be offended at me, Belford!] why she should assent to the legal tie, and make me the happiest of men. And O how the mantle cheek, the downcast eye, the silent, yet trembling lip, and the heaving bosom, a sweet collection of heightened beauties, gave evidence, that the tender was not mortally offensive!

'Charming creature!' thought I, '[But I charge thee, that thou let not any of thy sex know my exultation] Is it so soon come to this?—Am I already lord of the destiny of a Clarissa Harlowe?—Am I already the reformed man thou resolvedst I should be, before I had the least encouragement given me? Is it thus, that the more thou knowest me, the less thou seest reason to approve of me?—And can art and design enter into a breast so celestial? To banish me from thee, to insist so rigorously upon my absence, in order to bring me closer to thee, and make the blessing dear?—Well do thy arts justify mine; and encourage me to let loose my plotting genius upon thee.

'But let me tell thee, charming maid, if thy wishes are all to be answered, that thou hast yet to account to me for thy reluctance to go off with me, at a crisis when thy going off was necessary to avoid being forced into nuptial fetters with a wretch, that were he not thy aversion, thou wert no more honest to thy own merit than to me.

'I am accustomed to be preferred, let me tell thee, by thy equals in rank too, though thy inferiors in merit; but who is not so? And shall I marry a woman, who has given me reason to doubt the preference she has for me?

'No, my dearest love, I have too sacred a regard for thy injunctions, to let them be broken through, even by thyself. Nor will I take in thy full meaning by blushing silence only. Nor shalt thou give me room to doubt, whether it be necessity or love, that inspires this condescending impulse.'

Upon these principles, what had I to do, but to construe her silence into contemptuous displeasure? And I begged pardon for making a motion, which I had so much reason to fear would offend her: for the future I would pay a sacred regard to her previous injunctions, and prove to her by all my conduct the truth truth of that obſervation, that true love is always fearful of offending.

'And what could the lady ſay to 'this?' methinks thou aſkeſt.

Say!—Why ſhe looked vexed, diſconcerted, teazed; was at a loſs, as I thought, whether to be more angry with herſelf, or with me. She turned about, however, as if to hide a ſtarting tear; and drew a ſigh into two or three but juſt audible quavers, trying to ſuppreſs it, and withdrew—leaving me maſter of the field.

Tell me not of politeneſs; tell me not of generoſity; tell me not of compaſſion—Is ſhe not a match for me? More than a match? Does ſhe not out-do me at every fair weapon? Has ſhe not made me doubt her love? Has ſhe not taken officious pains to declare that ſhe was not averſe to Solmes for any reſpect ſhe had to me? and her ſorrow for putting herſelf out of his reach; that is to ſay, for meeting me?

Then what a triumph would it be to the Harlowe pride, were I now to marry this lady! A family beneath my own! No one in it worthy of an alliance with, but her! My own eſtate not contemptible! Living within the bounds of it, to avoid dependence upon their betters, and obliged to no man living! My expectations ſtill ſo much more conſiderable! My perſon, my talents—not to be deſpiſed, ſurely—Yet rejected by them with ſcorn. Obliged to carry on an underhand addreſs to their daughter, when two of the moſt conſiderable families in the kingdom have made overtures, which I have declined, partly for her ſake, and partly becauſe I never will marry; if ſhe be not the perſon. To be forced to ſteal her away; not only from them, but from herſelf! and muſt I be brought to implore forgiveneſs and reconciliation from the Harlowes?—Beg to be acknowledged as the ſon of a gloomy tyrant; whoſe only boaſt is his riches? As a brother to a wretch, who has conceived immortal hatred to me; and to a ſiſter who was beneath my attempts, or I would have had her in my own way, and that with a tenth part of the trouble and pains that her ſiſter has coſt me; and, finally, as a nephew to uncles, who value themſelves upon their acquired fortunes, would inſult me as creeping to them on that account?—Forbid it the blood of the Lovelaces, that your laſt, and, let me ſay, not the meaneſt of your ſtock, ſhould thus creep, thus fawn, thus lick the duſt, for a WIFE!

Proceed anon.

LETTER XIV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

IN CONTINUATION.

BUT is it not the divine CLARISSA [Harlowe let me not ſay; my ſoul ſpurns them all but her] whom I am thus by application threatening?—If virtue be the true nobility, how is ſhe ennobled, and how ſhould an alliance with her ennoble, were not contempt due to the family from which ſhe ſprung and prefers to me!

But again, let me ſtop.—Is there not ſomething wrong, has there not been ſomething wrong, in this divine creature? And will not the reflections upon that wrong (what though it may be conſtrued in my favour?) make me unhappy, when novelty has loſt it's charms, and when, mind and perſon, ſhe is all my own? Libertines are nicer, if at all nice, than other men. They ſeldom meet with the ſtand of virtue in the women whom they attempt. And by the frailty of thoſe they have triumphed over, they judge of all the reſt. Importunity and opportunity no woman is proof againſt, eſpecially from a perſevering lover, who knows how to ſuit temptations to inclinations: this, thou knoweſt, is a prime article of the rake's creed.

'And what!' (methinks thou aſkeſt with ſurprize) 'Doſt thou queſtion this 'moſt admirable of women?—The vir-'tue of a CLARISSA doſt thou queſtion?'

I do not, I dare not queſtion it. My reverence for her will not let me directly queſtion it. But let me, in my turn, aſk thee—Is not, may not her virtue be founded rather in pride than in principle? Whoſe daughter is ſhe?—And is ſhe not a daughter? If impeccable, how came ſhe by her impeccability? The pride of ſetting an example to her ſex has run away with her hitherto, and may have made her till now invincible. But is not that pride abated? What may not both men and women be brought to do, in a mortified ſtate? What mind is ſuperior to calamity? Pride is perhaps the principal bulwark of female virtue. Humble a woman, and may ſhe not be effectually humbled?

Then who ſays, Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe is the paragon of virtue?—Is virtue itſelf?

'All who know her, and have heard 'of her,' it will be anſwered.

Common bruit!—Is virtue to be eſtabliſhed by common bruit only?—Has her virtue ever been proved?—Who has dared to try her virtue?

I told thee, I would ſit down to argue with myſelf; and I have drawn myſelf into argumentation before I was aware.

Let me enter into a ſtrict diſcuſſion of this ſubject.

I know how ungenerous an appearance what I have ſaid, and what I have farther to ſay, on this topick, will have from me: but am I not bringing virtue to the touchſtone, with a view to exalt it, if it come out to be proof?—Avaunt then, for one moment, all conſideration that may ariſe from a weakneſs which ſome would miſcall gratitude; and is oftentimes the corrupter of a heart not ignoble!

To the teſt then—And I will bring this charming creature to the ſtricteſt teſt, that all the ſex, who may be ſhewn any paſſages in my letters, [And I know thou cheareſt the hearts of all thy acquaintance with ſuch detached parts of mine, as tend not to diſhonour characters, or reveal names: and this gives me an appetite to oblige thee by interlardment] that all the ſex, I ſay, may ſee what they ought to be; what is expected from them; and if they have to deal with a perſon of reflection and punctilio, [of pride, if thou wilt] how careful they ought to be, by a regular and uniform conduct, not to give him cauſe to think lightly of them for favours granted, which may be interpreted into natural weakneſs. For is not a wife the keeper of a man's honour? And do not her faults bring more diſgrace upon a huſband, than even upon herſelf?

It is not for nothing, Jack, that I have diſliked the life of ſhackles.

To the teſt then, as I ſaid, ſince now I have the queſtion brought home to me, whether I am to have a wife? And whether ſhe be to be a wife at the firſt or at the ſecond hand?

I will proceed fairly. I will do the dear creature not only ſtrict, but generous juſtice; for I will try her by her own judgment, as well as by our principles.

She blames herſelf for having correſponded with me, a man of free character; and one, indeed, whoſe firſt view it was, to draw her into this correſpondence; and who ſucceeded in it, by means unknown to herſelf.

Now, what were her inducements to this correſpondence? If not what her niceneſs makes her think blame-worthy, why does ſhe blame herſelf?

Has ſhe been capable of error? Of perſiſting in that error?

Whoever was the tempter, that is not the thing; nor what the temptation. The fact, the error, is now before us.

Did ſhe perſiſt in it againſt parental prohibition?

She owns ſhe did.

Was a daughter ever known who had higher notions of the filial duty, of the parental authority?

Never.

What muſt be thoſe inducements, how ſtrong, that were too ſtrong for duty, in a daughter ſo dutiful?—What muſt my thoughts have been of theſe inducements, what my hopes built upon them, at the time, taken in this light?

Well, but it will be ſaid, that her principal view was, to prevent miſchief between her brother and her other friends, and the man vilely inſulted by them all.

But why ſhould ſhe be more concerned for the ſafety of others, than they were for their own? And had not the rencounter then happened? Was a perſon of virtue to be prevailed upon to break through her apparent, her acknowledged duty, upon any conſideration? And if not, was ſhe to be ſo prevailed upon to prevent an apprehended evil only?

'Thou, Lovelace, the tempter,' (thou wilt again break out and ſay) 'to be the 'accuſer!'

But I am not the accuſer. I am the arguer only, and, in my heart, all the time acquit and worſhip the divine creature. But let me, nevertheleſs, examine, whether the acquittal be owing to her merit, or to my weakneſs—Weakneſs the true name for love!

But ſhall we ſuppoſe another motive?—And that is LOVE; a motive which all the world will excuſe her for. But let me tell the world that do, not becauſe they ought, but becauſe all the world is apt to be miſled by it.

Let LOVE then be the motive—Love of whom?

A Lovelace, is the anſwer.

Is there but one Lovelace in the world? May not more Lovelaces be attracted by ſo fine a figure? By ſuch exalted qualities? It was her character that drew me to her; and it was her beauty and good ſenſe, that rivetted my chains: and now all together make me think her a ſubject worthy of my attempts; worthy of my ambition.

But has ſhe had the candour, the openneſs, to acknowledge that love?

She has not.

Well, then, if love be at the bottom, is there not another fault lurking beneath the ſhadow of that love?—Has ſhe not affectation?—Or is it pride of heart?

And what reſults?—Is then the divine Clariſſa capable of loving a man whom

CLARISSA forced back by her BROTHER, to have another INTERVIEW with Mr. SOLMES and her UNCLE ANTHONY.

Published by Alex.r Hogg 1 April 1793.

whom she ought not to love? And is she capable of affectation? And is her virtue founded in pride?—And, if the answer to these questions be affirmative, must she not then be a woman?

And can she keep this love at bay? Can she make him, who has been accustomed to triumph over other women, tremble? Can she so conduct herself, as to make him, at times, question whether she loves him or any man; yet not have the requisite command over the passion itself in steps of the highest consequence to her honour, as she thinks, [I am trying her, Jack, by her own thoughts] but suffer herself to be provoked to promise to abandon her father's house, and go off with him, knowing his character; and even conditioning not to marry till improbable and remote contingencies were to come to pass? What though the provocations were such as would justify any other woman; yet was a CLARISSA to be susceptible to provocations which she thinks herself highly censureable for being so much moved by?

But let us see the dear creature resolved to revoke her promise; yet meeting her lover; a bold and intrepid man, who was more than once before disappointed by her; and who comes, as she knows, prepared to expect the fruits of her appointment, and resolved to carry her off. And let us see him actually carrying her off; and having her at his mercy—May there not be, I repeat, other Lovelaces; other like intrepid persevering enterprizers; although they may not go to work in the same way?

And has then a CLARISSA (herself her judge) failed?—In such great points failed?—And may she not further fail?—Fail in the greatest point, to which all the other points, in which she has failed, have but a natural tendency?

Nor say thou, that virtue, in the eye of Heaven, is as much a manly as a womanly grace. By virtue in this place I mean chastity, and to be superior to temptation; my Clarissa out of the question. Nor ask thou, Shall the man be guilty, yet expect the woman to be guiltless, and even unsuspectable? Urge thou not these arguments, I say, since the wife, by a failure, may do much more injury to the husband, than the husband can do to the wife; and not only to her husband, but to all his family, by obtruding another man's children into his possessions, perhaps to the exclusion of (at least to a participation with) his own; he believing them all the time to be his. In the eye of Heaven, therefore, the sin cannot be equal. Besides I have read in some places that the woman was made for the man, not the man for the woman. Virtue then is less to be dispensed with in the woman than in the man.

'Thou, Lovelace,' (methinks some better man than thyself will say) 'to 'expect such perfection in a woman!'

'Yes, I,' may I answer. Was not the great Cæsar a great rake as to women? Was he not called, by his very soldiers, on one of his triumphant entries into Rome, The bald-pated lecher? And warning given of him to the wives, as well as to the daughters, of his fellow-citizens? Yet did not Cæsar repudiate his wife for being only in company with Clodius, or rather because Clodius, though by surprize upon her, was found in hers? And what was the reason he gave for it?—It was this, (though a rake himself, as I have said) and only this—The wife of Cæsar must not be suspected!

Cæsar was not a prouder man than Lovelace.

Go to then, Jack; nor say, nor let any-body say, in thy hearing, that Lovelace, a man valuing himself upon his ancestry, is singular in his expectations of a wife's purity, though not pure himself.

As to my CLARISSA, I own, that I hardly think there ever was such an angel of a woman. But has she not, as above, already taken steps, which she herself condemns? Steps, which the world and her own family did not think her capable of taking? And for which her own family will not forgive her?

Nor think it strange, that I refuse to hear any-thing pleaded in behalf of a standard virtue, from high provocations. Are not provocations and temptations the tests of virtue? A standard virtue must not be allowed to be provoked to destroy or annihilate itself.

May not then the success of him, who could carry her thus far, be allowed to be an encouragement for him to try to carry her farther? It is but to try. Who will be afraid of a trial for this divine creature? Thou knowest, that I have more than once, twice, or thrice, put to the fiery trial young women of name and character; and never yet met with one who held out a month; nor indeed so long as could puzzle my invention. I have concluded against the whole sex upon it. And now, if I have not found a virtue that cannot be corrupted, I will swear that there is not one such in the whole sex. Is not then the whole ſex concerned that this trial ſhould be made? And who is it that knows this lady, that would not ſtake upon her head the honour of the whole?—Let her who would refuſe it, come forth, and deſire to ſtand in her place.

I muſt aſſure thee, that I have a prodigious high opinion of virtue; as I have of all thoſe graces and excellences, which I have not been able to attain myſelf. Every free-liver would not ſay this, nor think thus—Every argument he uſes, condemnatory of his own actions, as ſome would think. But ingenuouſneſs was ever a ſignal part of my character.

Satan, whom thou mayeſt, if thou wilt, in this caſe, call my inſtigator, put the good man of old upon the ſevereſt trials. To his behaviour under theſe trials that good man owed his honour and his future rewards. An innocent perſon, if doubted, muſt wiſh to be brought to a fair and candid trial.

Rinaldo, indeed, in Arioſto, put the Mantua Knight's cup of trial from him, which was to be the proof of his wife's chaſtity*.—This was his argument for forbearing the experiment: 'Why 'ſhould I ſeek a thing I ſhould be loth 'to find? My wife is a woman. The 'ſex is frail. I cannot believe better of 'her than I do. It will be to my own 'loſs, if I find reaſon to think worſe.' But Rinaldo would not have refuſed the trial of the lady, before ſhe became his wife, and when he might have found account in detecting her.

For my part, I would not have put the cup from me, though married, had it been but in hope of finding reaſon to confirm my good opinion of my wife's honour; and that I might know whether I had a ſnake or a dove in my boſom.

To my point—What muſt that virtue be, which will not ſtand a trial?—What that woman, who would wiſh to ſhun it?

Well, then, a trial ſeems neceſſary for the further eſtabliſhment of the honour of ſo excellent a creature.

And who ſhall put her to this trial? Who, but the man, who has, as ſhe thinks, already induced her in leſſer points, to ſwerve?—And this for her own ſake in a double ſenſe—Not only, as he has been able to make ſome impreſſion, but as ſhe regrets the impreſſion made; and ſo may be preſumed to be guarded againſt his further attempts.

The ſituation ſhe is at preſent in, it muſt be confeſſed, is a diſadvantageous one to her: but if ſhe overcome, that will redound to her honour.

Shun not, therefore, my dear ſoul, further trials, nor hate me for making them.—For what woman can be ſaid to be virtuous till ſhe has been tried?

Nor is one effort, one trial, to be ſufficient. Why? Becauſe a woman's heart may be at one time adamant, at another wax—As I have often experienced. And ſo, no doubt, haſt thou.

'A fine time of it,' methinks thou ſayeſt, 'would the women have, if they 'were all to be tried!'

But, Jack, I am not for that neither. Though I am a rake, I am not a rake's friend; except thine and company's.

And be this one of the morals of my tedious diſcuſſion—Let the little rogues who would not be put to the queſtion, as I may call it, chuſe accordingly. Let them prefer to their favour good honeſt ſober fellows, who have not been uſed to play dogs tricks: who will be willing to take them as they offer; and who being tolerable themſelves, are not ſuſpicious of others.

'But what,' methinks thou aſkeſt, 'is 'to become of the lady, if ſhe fail?'

'What!—Why will ſhe not, if once 'ſubdued, be always ſubdued?' Another of our libertine maxims. And what an immenſe pleaſure to a marriage-hater, what rapture to thought, to be able to prevail upon ſuch a woman as Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe to live with him, without real change of name!

But if ſhe reſiſt—If nobly ſhe ſtand her trial!—

Why then I will marry her; and bleſs my ſtars for ſuch an angel of a wife.

But will ſhe not hate thee?—will ſhe not refuſe—

No, no, Jack!—Circumſtanced and ſituated as we are, I am not afraid of that. And hate me! Why ſhould ſhe hate the man who loves her upon proof?

And then for a little hint at repriſal—Am I not juſtified in my reſolutions of trying her virtue; who is reſolved, as I may ſay, to try mine? Who has declared, that ſhe will not marry me, till ſhe has hopes of my reformation?

And now, to put an end to this ſober argumentation, wilt thou not thyſelf (whom I have ſuppoſed an advocate for the lady, becauſe I know that Lord M. has put thee upon uſing the intereſt he thinks thinks thou haſt in me, to perſuade me to enter the pale; wilt thou not thyſelf allow me to try, if I cannot awaken the woman in her?—To try, if ſhe, with all that glowing ſymmetry of parts, and that full bloom of vernal graces, by which ſhe attracts every eye, be really inflexible as to the grand article?

* The ſtory tells us, that whoever drank of this cup, if his wife were chaſte, could drink without ſpilling; if otherwiſe, the contrary.

Let me begin then, as opportunity preſents—I will; and watch her every ſtep to find one ſliding one; her every moment, to find the moment critical. And the rather, as ſhe ſpares not me, but takes every advantage that offers, to puzzle and plague me; nor expects nor thinks me to be a good man.

If ſhe be a woman, and love me, I ſhall ſurely catch her once tripping: for love was ever a traitor to it's harbourer; and love within, and I without, ſhe will be more than woman, as the poet ſays, or I leſs than man, if I ſucceed not.

Now, Belford, all is out. The lady is mine; ſhall be more mine. Marriage, I ſee, is in my power, now ſhe is ſo. Elſe perhaps it had not. If I can have her without marriage, who can blame me for trying? If not, great will be her glory, and my future confidence. And well will ſhe merit the ſacrifice I ſhall make her of my liberty; and from all her ſex honours next to divine, for giving a proof, that there was once a woman whoſe virtue no trials, no ſtratagems, no temptations, even from the men ſhe hated not, could overpower.

Now wilt thou ſee all my circulation: as in a glaſs wilt thou ſee it.—CABALA, however, is the word*; nor let the ſecret eſcape thee even in thy dreams.

Nobody doubts, that ſhe is to be my wife. Let her paſs for ſuch, when I give the word. Mean time, reformation ſhall be my ſtalking-horſe; ſome one of the women in London, if I can get her thither, my bird. And ſo much for this time.

LETTER XV.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

[IN ANSWER TO LETTERS V. VI.]

DO not be ſo much concerned, my deareſt friend, at the bickerings between my mother and me. We love one another dearly notwithſtanding. If my mother had not me to find fault with, ſhe muſt find fault with ſomebody elſe. And as to me, I am a very faulty girl; and were there not this occaſion, there would be ſome other, to ſhew it.

You have heard me ſay, that this was always the caſe between us. You could not otherwiſe have known it. For when you was with us, you harmonized us both; and indeed I was always more afraid of you than of my mother. But then that awe is accompanied with love. Your reproofs, as I have always found, are ſo charmingly mild and inſtructive; ſo evidently calculated to improve, and not to provoke; that a generous temper muſt be amended by them. But here now, mind my good mamma, when you are not with us—'You ſhall, I tell you, 'Nancy. I will have it ſo. Don't I know 'beſt; I won't be diſobeyed.' How can a daughter of ſpirit bear ſuch language; ſuch looks too with the language; and not have a longing mind to diſobey?

Don't adviſe me, my dear, to ſubſcribe to my mother's prohibition of correſpondence with you. She has no reaſon for it. Nor would ſhe of her own judgment have prohibited it. That odd old ambling ſoul your uncle, (whoſe viſits are frequenter than ever) inſtigated by your malicious and ſelfiſh brother and ſiſter, is the occaſion. And they only have borrowed my mother's lips, at the diſtance they are from you, for a ſort of ſpeaking-trumpet for them. The prohibition, once more I ſay, cannot come from her heart: but if it did, is ſo much danger to be apprehended from my continuing to write to one of my own ſex, as if I wrote to one of the other? Don't let dejection and diſappointment and the courſe of oppreſſion which you have run through, weaken your mind, my deareſt creature; and make you ſee inconveniences, where there poſſibly cannot be any. If your talent is ſcribbling, as you call it; ſo is mine—And I will ſcribble on, at all opportunities; and to you; let them ſay what they will. Nor let your letters be filled with the ſelf-accuſations you mention: there is no cauſe for them. I wiſh, that your Anna Howe, who continues in her mother's houſe, were but half ſo good as Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe, who has been driven out of her father's.

I will ſay nothing upon your letter to your ſiſter till I ſee the effect it will have. You hope, you tell me, that you ſhall have your money and cloaths ſent you,

* This word, whenever uſed by any of theſe gentlemen, was agreed to imply an inviolable ſecret.

notwithſtanding

notwithſtanding my opinion to the contrary—I am ſorry to have it to acquaint you, that I have juſt now heard, that they have ſat in council upon your letter; and that your mother was the only perſon who was for ſending you your things; and was over-ruled. I charge you, therefore, to accept of my offer, as by my laſt: and give me particular directions for what you want, that I can ſupply you with beſides.

Don't ſet your thought ſo much upon a reconciliation, as to prevent your laying hold of any handſome opportunity to give yourſelf a protector; ſuch a one as the man will be, who, I imagine, huſband-like, will let nobody inſult you but himſelf.

What could he mean, by letting ſlip ſuch a one as that you mention? I don't know how to blame you; for how could you go beyond ſilence and bluſhes, when the fooliſh fellow came with his obſervances of the reſtrictions which you laid him under when in another ſituation? But, as I told you above, you really ſtrike people into awe. And, upon my word, you did not ſpare him.

I repeat what I ſaid in my laſt, that you have a very nice part to act: and I will add, that you have a mind that is much too delicate for your part. But when the lover is exalted, the lady muſt be humbled. He is naturally proud and ſaucy. I doubt, you muſt engage his pride, which he calls his honour: and that you muſt throw off a little more of the veil. And I would have you reſtrain your wiſhes before him, that you had not met him, and the like. What ſignifies wiſhing, my dear? He will not bear it. You can hardly expect that he will.

Nevertheleſs, it vexes me to the very bottom of my pride, that any wretch of that ſex ſhould be able to triumph over Clariſſa.

I cannot, however, but ſay, that I am charmed with your ſpirit. So much ſweetneſs, where ſweetneſs is requiſite; ſo much ſpirit, where ſpirit is called for—What a true magnanimity!

But I doubt, in your preſent circumſtances, you muſt endeavour after a little more of the reſerve, in caſes where you are diſpleaſed with him, and palliate a little. That humility which he puts on when you riſe upon him, is not natural to him.

Methinks I ſee the man heſitating, and looking like the fool you paint him, under your corrective ſuperiority!—But he is not a fool. Don't put him upon mingling reſentment with his love.

You are very ſerious, my dear, in the firſt of the two letters before me, in relation to Mr. Hickman and me; and in relation to my mother and me. But as to the latter, you muſt not be too grave. If we are not well together at one time, we are not ill together at another. And while I am able to make her ſmile in the midſt of the moſt angry fit ſhe ever fell into on the preſent occaſion, (though ſometimes ſhe would not if ſhe could help it) it is a very good ſign; a ſign that diſpleaſure can never go deep, or be laſting. And then a kind word, or kind look, to her favourite Hickman, ſets the one into raptures, and the other in tolerable humour, at any time.

But your caſe pains me at heart; and with all my levity, both the good folks muſt ſometimes partake of that pain; nor will it be over, as long as you are in a ſtate of uncertainty; and eſpecially as I was not able to prevail for that protection for you which would have prevented the unhappy ſtep, the neceſſity for which we both, with ſo much reaſon, deplore.

I have only to add, (and yet it is needleſs to tell you) that I am, and will ever be, your affectionate friend and ſervant,

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XVI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

YOU tell me, my dear, that my cloaths and the little ſum of money I left behind me, will not be ſent me.—But I will ſtill hope. It is yet early days. When their paſſions ſubſide, they will better conſider of the matter; and eſpecially as I have my ever dear and excellent mother for my friend in this requeſt. O the ſweet indulgence! How has my heart bled, and how does it ſtill bleed for her!

You adviſe me not to depend upon a reconciliation. I do not, I cannot depend upon it. But, nevertheleſs, it is the wiſh next my heart. And as to this man, what can I do? You ſee, that marriage is not abſolutely in my own power, if I were inclined to prefer it to the trial which I think I ought to have principally in view to make for a reconciliation.

You ſay, he is proud and inſolent—Indeed he is. But can it be your opinion, that he intends to humble me down to the level of his mean pride?

And what mean you, my dear friend, when you ſay, that I muſt throw off a little more of the veil?—Indeed I never knew that I wore one. Let me aſſure

you,

you, that if I ſee any-thing in Mr. Lovelace that looks like a deſign to humble me, his inſolence ſhall never make me diſcover a weakneſs unworthy of a perſon diſtinguiſhed by your friendſhip; that is to ſay, unworthy either of my ſex, or of my former ſelf.

But I hope, as I am out of all other protection, that he is not capable of mean or low reſentments. If he has had any extraordinary trouble on my account, may he not thank himſelf for it? He may; and lay it, if he pleaſes, to his character; which, as I have told him, gave at leaſt a pretence to my brother againſt him. And then, did I ever make him any promiſes? Did I ever profeſs a love for him? Did I ever wiſh for the continuance of his addreſs? Had not my brother's violence precipitated matters, would not my indifference to him in all likelihood (as I deſigned it ſhould) have tired out his proud ſpirit, and made him ſet out for London, where he uſed chiefly to reſide? And if he had, would there not have been an end of all his pretenſions and hopes? For no encouragement had I given him: nor did I then correſpond with him. Nor, believe me, ſhould I have begun to do ſo—that fatal rencounter not having then happened; which drew me in afterwards for others ſakes, (fool that I was!) and not for my own. And can you think, or can he, that even this but temporarily-intended correſpondence (which, by the way, my mother connived at) would have ended thus, had I not been driven on one hand, and teazed on the other, to continue it; the occaſion which had at firſt induced it, continuing? What pretence then has he, were I to be abſolutely in his power, to avenge himſelf on me, for the faults of others; and through which I have ſuffered more than he? It cannot—cannot be, that I ſh uld have cauſe to apprehend him to be ſo ungenerous, ſo bad, a man.

You bid me not be concerned at the bickerings between your mother and you. Can I avoid concern, when thoſe bickerings are on my account? That they are raiſed (inſtigated ſhall I ſay?) by my uncle, and my other relations, ſurely muſt add to my concern.

But I muſt obſerve, perhaps too critically for the ſtate my mind is in at preſent, that the very ſentences you give from your mother, as ſo many imperatives, which you take amiſs, are very ſevere reflections upon yourſelf. For inſtance—'You ſhall, I tell you, Nancy,' implies that you had diſputed her will—And ſo of the reſt.

And further let me obſerve, with reſpect to what you ſay, that there cannot be the ſame reaſon for a prohibition of correſpondence with me, as there was of mine with Mr. Lovelace; that I thought as little of bad conſequences from my correſpondence with him at the time, as you can do from yours with me, now. But if obedience be a duty, the breach of it is the fault, however circumſtances may differ. Surely there is no merit in ſetting up our own judgment againſt the judgments of our parents. And if it be puniſhable ſo to do, I have been ſeverely puniſhed; and that is what I warned you of, from my own dear experience.

Yet, God forgive me! I adviſe thus againſt myſelf with very great reluctance: and, to ſay truth, have not ſtrength of mind, at preſent, to decline it myſelf. But, if my occaſion go not off, I will take it into further conſideration.

You give me very good advice in relation to this man; and I thank you for it. When you bid me be more upon the reſerve with him in expreſſing my diſpleaſure, perhaps I may try for it: but to palliate, as you call it, that, my deareſt Miſs Howe, cannot be done, by your own

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XVII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

YOU may believe, my dear Miſs Howe, that the circumſtance of the noiſe and outcry within the garden-door, on Monday laſt, gave me no ſmall uneaſineſs, to think that I was in the hands of a man, who could, by ſuch vile premeditation, lay a ſnare to trick me out of myſelf, as I have ſo frequently called it.

Whenever he came in my ſight, the thought of this gave me an indignation that made his preſence diſguſtful to me; and the more, as I fancied I beheld in his face a triumph which reproached my weakneſs on that account; although, perhaps, it was only the ſame vivacity and placidneſs that generally ſit upon his features.

I was reſolved to taſk him upon this ſubject, the firſt time I could have patience to enter upon it with him. For, beſides that it piqued me exceſſively from the nature of the artifice, I expected ſhuffling and evaſion, if he were guilty, that would have incenſed me: and, if not confeſſedly guilty, ſuch unſatisfactory declarations, as ſtill would have kept my mind doubtful and uneaſy; and would, upon every new offence that he might give me, sharpen my disgust to him.

I have had the opportunity I waited for; and will lay before you the result.

He was making his court to my good opinion in very polite terms, and with great seriousness lamenting that he had lost it; declaring, that he knew not how he had deserved to do so; attributing to me an indifference to him, that seemed, to his infinite concern, hourly to increase. And he besought me to let him know my whole mind, that he might have an opportunity either to confess his faults and amend them, or clear his conduct to my satisfaction, and thereby entitle himself to a greater share of my confidence.

I answered him with quickness—'Then, Mr. Lovelace, I will tell you 'one thing with a frankness, that is, 'perhaps, more suitable to my character, 'than to your's' [He hoped not, he said] 'which gives me a very bad opinion of 'you, as a designing artful man.'

'I am all attention, Madam.'

'I never can think tolerably of you, 'while the noise and voice I heard at the 'garden-door, which put me into the 'terror you took so much advantage of, 'remains unaccounted for. Tell me 'fairly, tell me candidly, the whole of 'that circumstance; and of your dealings with that wicked Joseph Leman; 'and according to your explicitness in 'this particular, I shall form a judgment 'of your future professions.'

'I will, without reserve, my dearest 'life,' said he, 'tell you the whole; and 'hope that my sincerity in the relation 'will atone for any thing you may think 'wrong in the fact.

'I knew nothing,' said he, 'of this 'man, this Leman, and should have 'scorned a resort to so low a method as 'bribing the servant of any family to let 'me into the secrets of that family, if I 'had not detected him in attempting to 'corrupt a servant of mine, to inform 'him of all my motions, of all my supposed intrigues, and, in short, of every 'action of my private life, as well as of 'my circumstances and engagements; 'and this for motives too obvious to be 'dwelt upon.

'My servant told me of his offers, 'and I ordered him, unknown to the 'fellow, to let me hear a conversation 'that was to pass between them.

'In the midst of it, and just as he had 'made an offer of money for a particular piece of intelligence, promising 'more when procured, I broke in upon 'them, and by bluster, calling for a 'knife to cut off his ears (one of which I 'took hold of) in order to make a present of it, as I said, to his employers, 'I obliged him to tell me who they 'were.

'Your brother, Madam, and your 'uncle Antony, he named.

'It was not difficult when I had given 'him my pardon on naming them (after 'I had set before him the enormity of 'the task he had undertaken, and the 'honourableness of my intentions to 'your dear self) to prevail upon him, by 'a larger reward, to serve me; since, 'at the same time, he might preserve 'the favour of your uncle and brother, 'as I desired to know nothing, but what 'related to myself and to you, in order 'to guard us both against the effects of 'an ill-will, which all his fellow-servants, 'as well as himself, as he acknowledged, 'thought undeserved.

'By this means, I own to you, Madam, I frequently turned his principals about upon a pivot of my own, unknown to themselves: and the fellow, 'who is always calling himself a plain 'man, and boasting of his conscience, was 'the easier, as I condescended frequently to assure him of my honourable 'views; and as he knew that the use I 'made of his intelligence, in all likelihood, prevented fatal mischiefs.

'I was the more pleased with his services, as (let me acknowledge to you, 'Madam) they procured to you, unknown to yourself, a safe and uninterrupted egress (which perhaps would 'not otherwise have been continued to 'you so long as it was) to the garden 'and wood-house: for he undertook to 'them, to watch all your motions; and 'the more cheerfully (for the fellow 'loves you) as it kept off the curiosity of 'others.'

So, my dear, it comes out, that I myself was obliged to this deep contriver.

I sat in silent astonishment; and thus he went on.

'As to the circumstance, for which 'you think so hardly of me, I do freely 'confess, that having a suspicion that 'you would revoke your intention of 'getting away, and in that case apprehending that we should not have the 'time together that was necessary for 'that purpose; I had ordered him to 'keep off every-body he could keep off, 'and to be himself within view of the 'garden-door; for I was determined,

'if

'if poſſible, to induce you to adhere to 'your reſolution.'

'But pray, Sir,' interrupting him, 'how came you to apprehend that I 'ſhould revoke my intention? I had in-'deed depoſited a letter to that purpoſe; 'but you had it not: and how, as I had 'reſerved to myſelf the privilege of a 'revocation, did you know, but I 'might have prevailed upon my friends, 'and ſo have revoked upon good 'grounds?'

'I will be very ingenuous, Madam— 'You had made me hope that if you 'changed your mind, you would give 'me a meeting to apprize me of the rea-'ſons for it. I went to the looſe bricks, 'and I ſaw the letter there: and as I 'knew your friends were immoveably 'fixed in their ſchemes, I doubted not 'but the letter was to revoke or ſuſ-'pend your reſolution; and probably to 'ſerve inſtead of a meeting too. I there-'fore let it lie, that if you did revoke, 'you might be under the neceſſity of 'meeting me for the ſake of the expecta-'tion you had given me: and as I came 'prepared, I was reſolved, pardon me, 'Madam, whatever were your intenti-'ons, that you ſhould not go back. Had 'I taken your letter, I muſt have been 'determined by the contents of it, for 'the preſent, at leaſt: but not having 'received it, and you having reaſon to 'think I wanted not reſolution, in a ſitu-'ation ſo deſperate, to make your 'friends a perſonal viſit, I depended 'upon the interview you had bid me 'hope for.'

'Wicked wretch!' ſaid I; 'It is my 'grief, that I gave you opportunity to 'take ſo exact a meaſure of my weak-'neſs!—But would you have preſumed 'to viſit the family, had I not met you?'

'Indeed I would. I had ſome friends 'in readineſs, who were to have accom-'panied me to them. And had your 'father refuſed to give me audience, I 'would have taken my friends with me 'to Solmes.'

'And what did you intend to do to 'Mr. Solmes?'

'Not the leaſt hurt, had the man been 'paſſive.'

'But had he not been paſſive, as you 'call it, what would you have done to 'Mr. Solmes?'

He was loth, he ſaid, to tell me—Yet not the leaſt hurt to his perſon.

I repeated my queſtion.

If he muſt tell me, he only propoſed to carry off the poor fellow, and to hide him for a month or two. And this he would have done, let what would have been the conſequence.

Was ever ſuch a wretch heard of!—I ſighed from the bottom of my heart; but bid him proceed from the part I had interrupted him at.

'I ordered the fellow, as I told you, 'Madam,' ſaid he, 'to keep within 'view of the garden-door: and if he 'found any parley between us, and 'any-body coming (before you could 'retreat undiſcovered) whoſe coming 'might be attended with violent effects, 'he ſhould cry out; and this not only 'in order to ſave himſelf from their 'ſuſpicions of him, but to give me 'warning to make off, and if poſſible, 'to induce you (I own it, Madam) 'to go off with me, according to your 'own appointment. And I hope, all 'circumſtances conſidered, and the dan-'ger I was in of loſing you for ever, 'that the acknowledgment of that con-'trivance, or if you had not met me, 'that upon Solmes, will not procure 'me your hatred: for, had they come 'as I expected as well as you, what 'a deſpicable wretch had I been, could 'I have left you to the inſults of a bro-'ther and others of your family, whoſe 'mercy was cruelty when they had 'not the pretence with which this de-'tected interview would have furniſhed 'them!'

'What a wretch!' ſaid I.—'But if, 'Sir, taking your own account of this 'ſtrange matter to be fact, any-body 'were coming, how happened it, that I 'ſaw only that man Leman (I thought it 'was he) out of the door, and at a diſ-'tance look after us?'

'Very lucky!' ſaid he, putting his hand firſt in one pocket, then in ano-ther—'I hope I have not thrown it 'away—It is, perhaps, in the coat I 'had on yeſterday—Little did I think 'it would be neceſſary to be produced— 'But I love to come to a demonſtration 'whenever I can—I may be giddy—I may 'be heedleſs. I am indeed—But no 'man, as to you, Madam, ever had a 'ſincerer heart.'

He then ſtepping to the parlour-door, called his ſervant to bring him the coat he had on yeſterday.

The ſervant did. And in the pocket, rumpled up as a paper he regarded not, he pulled out a letter, written by that Joſeph, dated Monday night; in which he begs pardon for crying out ſo ſoon—ſays, That his fears of being diſcovered to act on both ſides, had made him take the ruſhing of a little dog (that always follows follows him) through the phyllirea-hedge, for Betty's being at hand; or some of his masters: and when he found his mistake, he opened the door by his own key, (which the contriving wretch confessed he had furnished him with) and inconsiderately ran out in a hurry, to have apprized him that his crying out was owing to his fright only: and he added, that they were upon the hunt for me, by the time he returned *.

I shook my head—'Deep! deep! deep!' said I, 'at the best!—O Mr. 'Lovelace! God forgive and reform 'you!—But you are, I see plainly '(upon the whole of your own account) a very artful, a very designing man.'

'Love, my dearest life, is ingenious. Night and day have I racked my 'stupid brain.' ['O Sir,' thought I, 'not 'stupid! 'Twere well perhaps if it were.'] 'to contrive methods to prevent the 'sacrifice designed to be made of you, 'and the mischief that must have ensued 'upon it: so little hold in your affections: such undeserved antipathy from 'your friends: so much danger of losing you for ever from both causes. I 'have not had for the whole fortnight 'before last Monday, half an hour's 'rest at a time. And I own to you, 'Madam, that I should never have 'forgiven myself, had I omitted any 'contrivance or fore-thought that would 'have prevented your return without 'me.'

Again I blamed myself for meeting him: and justly; for there were many chances to one, that I had not met him. And if I had not, all his fortnight's contrivances, as to me, would have come to nothing; and perhaps I might nevertheless have escaped Solmes.

Yet, had he resolved to come to Harlowe Place with his friends, and been insulted, as he certainly would have been, what mischiefs might have followed!

But his resolutions to run away with and to hide the poor Solmes for a month or so, O my dear! what a wretch have I let run away with me, instead of Solmes!

I asked him, if he thought such enormities as these, such defiances of the laws of society, would have passed unpunished?

He had the assurance to say, with one of his usual gay airs, That he should by this means have disappointed his enemies, and saved me from a forced marriage. He had no pleasure in such desperate pushes. Solmes he would not have personally hurt. He must have fled his country, for a time at least: and, truly, if he had been obliged to do so, (as all his hopes of my favour must have been at an end) he would have had a fellow-traveller of his own sex out of our family, whom I little thought of.

Was ever such a wretch!—To be sure he meant my brother!

'And such, Sir,' said I, in high resentment, 'are the uses you make of 'your corrupt intelligencer—'

'My corrupt intelligencer, Madam!' interrupted he. 'He is to this hour 'your brother's as well as mine. By 'what I have ingenuously told you, 'you may see who began this corruption. Let me assure you, Madam, 'that there are many free things which 'I have been guilty of as reprizals, in 'which I would not have been the aggressor.'

'All that I shall further say on this 'head, Mr. Lovelace, is this: that as 'this vile double-faced wretch has probably been the cause of great mischief on both sides, and still continues, as you own, his wicked practices, I think it would be but just, to 'have my friends apprized what a creature he is whom some of them encourage.'

'What you please, Madam, as to 'that—My service, as well as your 'brother's, is now almost over for him. 'The fellow has made a good hand of 'it. He does not intend to stay long 'in his place. He is now actually in 'treaty for an inn, which will do his 'business for life. I can tell you further, that he makes love to your sister's 'Betty: and that by my advice. They 'will be married when he is established. An innkeeper's wife is every 'man's mistress; and I have a scheme 'in my head to set some engines at 'work to make her repent her saucy behaviour to you to the last day of her 'life.'

'What a wicked schemer are you, 'Sir!—Who shall avenge upon you 'the still greater evils which you have 'been guilty of? I forgive Betty with 'all my heart. She was not my ser'vant;

'vant; and but too probably, in what 'ſhe did, obeyed the commands of 'her to whom ſhe owed duty, better 'than I obeyed thoſe to whom I owed 'more.'

No matter for that, the wretch ſaid: [To be ſure, my dear, he muſt deſign to make me afraid of him] the decree was gone out—Betty muſt ſmart—Smart too by an act of her own choice. He loved, he ſaid, to make bad people their own puniſhers—'Nay, Madam, excuſe 'me; but if the fellow, if this Joſeph, 'in your opinion, deſerves puniſhment, 'mine is a complicated ſcheme; a man 'and his wife cannot well ſuffer ſepa-'rately, and it may come home to him 'too.'

I had no patience with him. I told him ſo. 'I ſee, Sir,' ſaid I, 'I ſee, what 'a man I am with. Your rattle warns 'me of the ſnake.'—And away I flung; leaving him ſeemingly vexed, and in confuſion.

LETTER XVIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

MY plain-dealing with Mr. Lovelace, on ſeeing him again, and the free diſlike I expreſſed to his ways, his manners, and his contrivances, as well as to his ſpeeches, have obliged him to recollect himſelf a little. He will have it, that the menaces which he threw out juſt now againſt my brother and Mr. Solmes, are only the effect of an unmeaning pleaſantry. He has too great a ſtake in his country, he ſays, to be guilty of ſuch enterprizes as ſhould lay him under a neceſſity of quitting it for ever. Twenty things, particularly, he ſays, he has ſuffered Joſeph Leman to tell of him, that were not, and could not be true, in order to make himſelf formidable in ſome people's eyes, and this purely with a view to prevent miſchief. He is unhappy, as far as he knows, in a quick invention; in hitting readily upon expedients; and many things are reported of him which he never ſaid, and many which he never did, and others which he has only talked of, (as juſt now) and which he has forgot as ſoon as the words have paſſed his lips.

This may be ſo, in part, my dear. No one man ſo young could be ſo wicked as he has been reported to be. But ſuch a man at the head of ſuch wretches as he is ſaid to have at his beck, all men of fortune and fearleſſneſs, and capable of ſuch enterprizes as I have unhappily found him capable of, what is not to be apprehended from him?

His careleſſneſs about his character is one of his excuſes: a very bad one. What hope can a woman have of a man who values not his reputation?—Theſe gay wretches may, in mixed converſation, divert for an hour or ſo: but the man of probity, the man of virtue, is the man that is to be the partner for life. What woman, who could help it, would ſubmit it to the courteſy of a wretch, who avows a diſregard to all moral ſanctions, whether he will perform his part of the matrimonial obligation, and treat her with tolerable politeneſs?

With theſe notions, and with theſe reflections, to be thrown upon ſuch a man as himſelf—Would to Heaven—But what avail wiſhes now?—To whom can I fly, if I would fly from him?

LETTER XIX.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

FRIDAY, APRIL 14.

NEVER did I hear of ſuch a parcel of fooliſh toads as theſe Harlowes;—Why, Belford, the lady muſt fall, if every hair of her head were a guardian angel, unleſs they were to make a viſible appearance for her, or, ſnatching her from me at unawares, would draw her after them into the ſtarry regions.

All I had to apprehend, was, that a daughter ſo reluctantly carried off, would offer terms to her father, and would be accepted upon a mutual concedence; they to give up Solmes; ſhe to give up me. And ſo I was contriving to do all I could to guard againſt the latter. But they ſeem reſolved to perfect the work they have begun.

What ſtupid creatures are there in the world! This fooliſh brother not to know, that he who would be bribed to undertake a baſe thing by one, would be over-bribed to retort the baſeneſs; eſpecially when he could be put into the way to ſerve himſelf by both!—Thou, Jack, wilt never know one half of my contrivances.

He here relates the converſation between him and the lady (upon the ſubject of the noiſe and exclamations his agent made at the garden door) to the ſame effect as in the lady's letter, No. XVII. and proceeds exulting:

What a capacity for glorious miſchief has thy friend!—Yet how near the truth all of it! The only deviation, my aſſerting that the fellow made the noiſes by miſtake, and through fright, and not by previous direction: had ſhe known the preciſe truth, her anger, to be ſo taken in, would never have let her forgive me.

Had I been a military hero, I ſhould have made gunpowder uſeleſs; for I ſhould have blown up all my adverſaries by dint of ſtratagem, turning their own devices upon them.

But theſe fathers and mothers—Lord help 'em!—Were not the powers of nature ſtronger than thoſe of diſcretion; and were not that buſy dea bona to afford her genial aids, till tardy prudence qualified parents to manage their future offſpring, how few people would have children!

James and Arabella may have their motives; but what can be ſaid for a father acting as this father has acted? What for a mother? What for an aunt? What for uncles?—Who can have patience with ſuch fellows and felloweſſes?

Soon will the fair-one hear how high their fooliſh reſentments run againſt her: and then will ſhe, it is to be hoped, have a little more confidence in me. Then will I be jealous that ſhe loves me not with the preference my heart builds upon. Then will I bring her to confeſſions of grateful love: and then will I kiſs her when I pleaſe; and not ſtand trembling, as now, like a hungry hound, who ſees a delicious morſel within his reach, (the froth hanging about his vermillion jaws) yet dares not leap at it for his life.

But I was originally a baſhful mortal. Indeed I am baſhful ſtill with regard to this lady—Baſhful, yet know the ſex ſo well!—But that indeed is the reaſon that I know it ſo well:—for, Jack, I have had abundant cauſe, when I have looked into myſelf, by way of compariſon with the other ſex, to conclude, that a baſhful man has a good deal of the ſoul of a woman; and ſo, like Tireſias, can tell what they think, and what they drive at, as well as themſelves.

The modeſt ones and I, particularly, are pretty much upon a par. The difference between us is only, what they think, I act. But the immodeſt ones outdo the worſt of us by a bar's length, both in thinking and acting.

One argument let me plead in proof of my aſſertion; that even we rakes love modeſty in a woman; while the modeſt women as they are accounted (that is to ſay, the ſlyeſt) love, and generally prefer, an impudent man. Whence can this be, but from a likeneſs in nature? And this made the poet ſay, That every woman is a rake in her heart. It concerns them by their actions, to prove the contrary, if they can.

Thus have I read in ſome of the philoſophers, That no wickedneſs is comparable to the wickedneſs of a woman. Canſt thou tell me, Jack, who ſays this! Was it Socrates? for he had the devil of a wife—Or who? Or is it Solomon?—King Solomon—Thou remembereſt to have read of ſuch a king, doſt thou not? SOL-O-MON, I learned, in my infant ſtate [My mother was a good woman] to anſwer, when aſked, 'Who was the wiſeſt 'man?'—But my indulgent queſtioner never aſked me, How he came by the uninſpired part of his wiſdom.

Come, come, Jack, you and I are not ſo very bad, could we but ſtop where we are.

He then gives the particulars of what paſſed between him and the lady on his menaces relating to her brother and Mr. Solmes, and of his deſign to puniſh Betty Barnes and Joſeph Leman.

LETTER XX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

FRIDAY, APRIL 14.

I Will now give you the particulars of a converſation that has juſt paſſed between Mr. Lovelace and me; which I muſt call agreeable.

It began with his telling me, that he had juſt received intelligence, that my friends were on a ſudden come to a reſolution, to lay aſide all thoughts of purſuing me, or of getting me back: and that therefore he attended me to know my pleaſure; and what I would do, or have him do?

I told him, that I would have him leave me directly; and that, when it was known to every body that I was abſolutely independent of him, it would paſs, that I had left my father's houſe becauſe of my brother's ill uſage of me: which was a plea that I might make with juſtice, and to the excuſe of my father, as well as of myſelf.

He mildly replied, that if we could be certain, that my relations would adhere to this their new reſolution, he could have no objection, ſince ſuch was my pleaſure:

pleaſure: but, as he was well aſſured, that they had taken it only from apprehenſions, that a more active one might involve my brother (who had breathed nothing but revenge) in ſome fatal misfortune, there was too much reaſon to believe, that they would reſume their former purpoſe the moment they ſhould think they ſafely might.

'This, Madam,' ſaid he, 'is a riſque 'I cannot run. You would think it 'ſtrange if I could. And yet, as ſoon 'as I knew they had ſo given out, I 'thought it proper to apprize you of it, 'and to take your commands upon it.'

'Let me hear,' ſaid I, willing to try if he had any particular view, 'what 'you think moſt adviſeable?'

''Tis very eaſy to ſay, That if I 'durſt—If I might not offend you—If it 'were not to break conditions that ſhall be 'inviolable with me.'

'Say then, Sir, what you would ſay. 'I can approve or diſapprove, as I 'think fit.'

Had not the man a fine opportunity here to ſpeak out? He had. And thus he uſed it.

'To wave, Madam, what I would ſay 'till I have more courage to ſpeak out,' [More courage—Mr. Lovelace more courage, my dear!]—'I will only propoſe what I 'think will be moſt agreeable to you— 'Suppoſe, if you chuſe not to go to Lady 'Betty's, that you take a turn croſs the 'country to Windſor?'

'Why to Windſor?'

'Becauſe it is a pleaſant place: be'cauſe it lies in the way either to Berk'ſhire, to Oxford, or to London. Berk'ſhire, where Lord M. is at preſent: 'Oxford, in the neighbourhood of which 'lives Lady Betty; London, whither you 'may retire at your pleaſure. Or, if 'you will have it ſo, whither I may go, 'you ſtaying at Windſor; and yet be 'within an eaſy diſtance of you, if any'thing ſhould happen, or if your friends 'ſhould change their new-taken reſolu'tion.'

This propoſal, however, diſpleaſed me not. But I ſaid, My only objection was, the diſtance of Windſor from Miſs Howe, of whom I ſhould be glad to be always within two or three hours reach by a meſſenger, if poſſible.

If I had thoughts of any other place than Windſor or nearer to Miſs Howe, he wanted but my commands, and would ſeek for proper accommodations: but, fix as I pleaſed, farther or nearer, he had ſervants, and they had nothing elſe to do but to obey me.

A grateful thing then he named to me—To ſend for my Hannah, as ſoon as I ſhall be fixed; unleſs I would chuſe one of the young gentlewomen here to attend me; both of whom, as I had acknowledged, were very obliging; and he knew I had generoſity enough to make it worth their while.

This of Hannah, he might ſee, I took very well. I ſaid, I had thoughts of ſending for her, as ſoon as I got to more convenient lodgings. As to theſe young gentlewomen, it were pity to break in upon that uſefulneſs which the whole family were of to each other: each having her proper part, and performing it with an agreeable alacrity: inſomuch that I liked them all ſo well, that I could even paſs my days among them were he to leave me; by which means the lodgings would be more convenient to me than now they were.

He need not repeat his objections to this place, he ſaid: but as to going to Windſor, or wherever elſe I thought fit, or as to his perſonal attendance, or leaving me, he would aſſure me, (he very agreeably ſaid) that I could propoſe nothing in which I thought my reputation, and even my punctilio, concerned, that he would not cheerfully come into. And ſince I was ſo much taken up with my pen, he would inſtantly order his horſe to be got ready, and would ſet out.

Not to be off my caution. 'Have 'you any acquaintance at Windſor?' ſaid I.—'Know you of any convenient 'lodgings there?'

'Except the Foreſt,' replied he, 'where I have often hunted, I know the 'leaſt of Windſor, of any place ſo noted 'and ſo pleaſant. Indeed, I have not a 'ſingle acquaintance there.'

Upon the whole, I told him, that I thought his propoſal of Windſor not amiſs; and that I would remove thither, if I could get a lodging only for myſelf, and an upper-chamber for Hannah; for that my ſtock of money was but ſmall; as was eaſy to be conceived; and I ſhould be very loth to be obliged to anybody. I added, that the ſooner I removed the better; for that then he could have no objection to go to London, or Berkſhire, as he pleaſed: and I ſhould let every-body know my independence.

He again propoſed himſelf, in very polite terms, for my banker. But I, as civilly, declined his offer.

This converſation was to be, all of it, in the main, agreeable. He aſked, whether whether I would chuſe to lodge in the town of Windſor, or out of it?

'As near the caſtle,' I ſaid, 'as poſſible, for the convenience of going 'conſtantly to the publick worſhip.' An opportunity I had been long deprived of.

He ſhould be very glad, he told me, if he could procure me accommodations in any of the canons houſes; which he imagined would be more agreeable to me than any other, on many accounts. And as he could depend upon my promiſe, never to have any other man but himſelf, on the condition to which he had ſo cheerfully ſubſcribed, he ſhould be eaſy; ſince it was now his part, in earneſt, to ſet about recommending himſelf to my favour, by the only way he knew it would be done. Adding, with a very ſerious air—'I am but a young 'man, Madam; but I have run a long 'courſe: let not your purity of mind 'incline you to deſpiſe me for the ac-'knowledgment. It is high time to be 'weary of it, and to reform; ſince, like 'Solomon, I can ſay, There is nothing 'new under the ſun: but that it is my 'belief, that a life of virtue can afford 'ſuch pleaſures, on reflection, as will 'be for ever blooming, for ever new!'

I was agreeably ſurprized. I looked at him, I believe, as if I doubted my ears and my eyes. His aſpect however became his words.

I expreſſed my ſatisfaction in terms ſo agreeable to him, that he ſaid, he found a delight in this early dawning of a better day to him, and in my approbation, which he had never received from the ſucceſs of the moſt favoured of his purſuits.

Surely, my dear, the man muſt be in earneſt. He could not have ſaid this; he could not have thought it, had he not. What followed made me ſtill readier to believe him.

'In the midſt of my wild vagaries,' ſaid he, 'I have ever preſerved a reve-'rence for religion, and for religious 'men. I always called another cauſe, 'when any of my libertine companions, 'in purſuance of Lord Shafteſbury's 'teſt, (which is a part of the rake's 'creed, and what I may call the whet-'ſtone of infidelity) endeavoured to turn 'the ſacred ſubject into ridicule. On 'this very account I have been called 'by good men of the clergy, who ne-'verthelefs would have it, that I was a 'practical rake, the decent rake: and in-'deed I had too much pride in my 'ſhame, to diſown the name of rake.

'This, Madam, I am the readier to 'confeſs, as it may give you hope, that 'the generous taſk of my reformation, 'which I flatter myſelf you will have 'the goodneſs to undertake, will not be 'ſo difficult a one as you may have ima-'gined; for it has afforded me ſome 'pleaſure in my retired hours, when a 'temporary remorſe has ſtruck me for 'any-thing I have done amiſs, that I 'ſhould one day take delight in another 'courſe of life: for, unleſs we can, I 'dare ſay, no durable good is to be ex-'pected from the endeavour. Your ex-'ample, Madam, muſt do all, muſt con-'firm all.'

'The Divine Grace, or Favour, Mr. 'Lovelace, muſt do all, and confirm 'all. You know not how much you 'pleaſe me, that I can talk to you in this 'dialect.'

And I then thought of his generoſity to his pretty ruſtick; and of his kindneſs to his tenants.

'Yet, Madam, be pleaſed to remem-'ber one thing: reformation cannot be 'a ſudden work. I have infinite vivaci-'ty: it is that which runs away with 'me. Judge, deareſt Madam, by what 'I am going to confeſs, that I have a 'prodigious way to journey on, before 'a good perſon will think me tolerable; 'ſince, though I have read in ſome of 'our perfectioniſts enough to make a bet-'ter man than myſelf either run into 'madneſs or deſpair about the grace 'you mention; yet I cannot enter into 'the meaning of the word, nor into the 'modus of it's operation. Let me not 'then be checked, when I mention your 'example for my viſible reliance; and 'inſtead of uſing ſuch words, till I can 'better underſtand them, ſuppoſe all 'the reſt included in the profeſſion of 'that reliance.'

I told him, that, although I was ſomewhat concerned at his expreſſion, and ſurprized at ſo much darkneſs, as (for want of another word) I would call it, in a man of his talents and learning; yet I was pleaſed with his ingenuouſneſs. I wiſhed him to encourage this way of thinking. I told him, that his obſervation, that no durable good was to be expected from any new courſe where there was not a delight taken in it, was juſt: but that the delight would follow by uſe.

And twenty things of this ſort I even preached to him; taking care, however, nor to be tedious, nor to let my expanded heart give him a contracted or impatient blow. And, indeed, he took viſible pleaſure in what I ſaid, and even hung upon the ſubject, when I, to try him, once or twice, ſeemed ready to drop it: and proceeded to give me a moſt agreeable inſtance, that he could at times think both deeply and ſeriouſly.—Thus it was.

He was once, he ſaid, dangerouſly wounded in a duel, in the left-arm, baring it, to ſhew me the ſcar: that this (notwithſtanding a great effuſion of blood, it being upon an artery) was followed by a violent fever, which at laſt fixed upon his ſpirits; and that ſo obſtinately, that neither did he deſire life, nor his friends expect it. That, for a month together, his heart, as he thought, was ſo totally changed, that he deſpiſed his former courſes, and particularly that raſhneſs, which had brought him to the ſtate he was in, and his antagoniſt (who, however, was the aggreſſor) into a much worſe: that in this ſpace he had thoughts which at times ſtill give him pleaſure to reflect upon. And altho' theſe promiſing proſpects changed, as he recovered health and ſpirits, yet he parted with them with ſo much reluctance, that he could not help ſhewing it in a copy of verſes, truly blank ones, he ſaid; ſome of which he repeated, and (advantaged by the grace which he gives to every-thing he repeats) I thought them very tolerable ones; the ſentiments, however, much graver than I expected from him.

He has promiſed me a copy of the lines; and then I ſhall judge better of their merit; and ſo ſhall you. The tendency of them was, that, ſince ſickneſs only gave him a proper train of thinking, and that his reſtored health brought with it a return of his evil habits, he was ready to renounce the gifts of nature for thoſe of contemplation.

He farther declared, that although theſe good motions went off (as he had owned) on his recovery, yet he had better hopes now, from the influence of my example, and from the reward before him, if he perſevered: and that he was the more hopeful that he ſhould, as his preſent reſolution was made in a full tide of health and ſpirits; and when he had nothing to wiſh for but perſeverance, to entitle himſelf to my favour.

'I will not throw cold water, Mr. 'Lovelace,' ſaid I, 'on a riſing flame: 'but look to it! For I ſhall endeavour 'to keep you up to this ſpirit. I ſhall 'meaſure your value of me by this teſt: 'and I would have you bear thoſe 'charming lines of Mr. Rowe for ever 'in your mind; you, who have, by your 'own confeſſion, ſo much to repent of; 'and as the ſcar, indeed, you ſhewed 'me, will, in one inſtance, remind you 'to your dying day.'

The lines, my dear, are from the poet's Ulyſſes; you have heard me often admire them; and I repeated them to him.

'Habitual evils change not on a ſudden;
'But many days muſt paſs, and many for-
'rows;
'Conſcious remorſe and anguiſh muſt be felt,
'To curb deſire, to break the ſtubborn will,
'And work a ſecond nature in the ſoul,
'Ere Virtue can reſume the place ſhe loſt:
'Tis elſe DISSIMULATION.'

He had often read theſe lines, he ſaid: but never taſted them before.—By his ſoul, (the unmortified creature ſwore) and as he hoped to be ſaved, he was now in earneſt in his good reſolutions. He had ſaid, before I repeated theſe lines from Rowe, that habitual evils could not be changed on a ſudden: but he hoped, he ſhould not be thought a diſſembler, if he were not enabled to hold his good purpoſes; ſince ingratitude and diſſimulation were vices that of all others he abhorred.

'May you ever abhor them!' ſaid I. 'They are the moſt odious of all vices.'

I hope, my dear Miſs Howe, I ſhall not have occaſion, in my future letters, to contradict theſe promiſing appearances. Should I have nothing on his ſide to combat with, I ſhall be very far from being happy, from the ſenſe of my fault, and the indignation of all my relations.—So ſhall not fail of condign puniſhment for it, from my inward remorſe on account of my forfeited character. But the leaſt ray of hope could not dart in upon me, without my being willing to lay hold of the very firſt opportunity to communicate it to you, who take ſo generous a ſhare in all my concerns.

Nevertheleſs you may depend upon it, my dear, that theſe agreeable aſſurances, and hopes of his begun reformation, ſhall not make me forget my caution. Not that I think, at worſt, any more than you, that he dare to harbour a thought injurious to my honour: but he is very various, and there is an apparent, and even an acknowledged unfixedneſs in his temper, which, at times, gives me uneaſineſs. I am reſolved, therefore, to keep him at a diſtance from my perſon and my thoughts, as much as I can: for whether all men are or are not encroachers,

encroachers, I am ſure Mr. Lovelace is one.

Hence it is, that I have always caſt about, and will continue to caſt about, what ends he may have in view from this propoſal, or from that report. In a word, though hopeful of the beſt, I will always be fearful of the worſt, in every-thing that admits of doubt. For it is better, in ſuch a ſituation as mine, to apprehend without cauſe, than to ſubject myſelf to ſurprize for want of forethought.

Mr. Lovelace is gone to Windſor, having left two ſervants to attend me. He purpoſes to be back to-morrow.

I have written to my aunt Hervey, to ſupplicate her intereſt in my behalf, for my cloaths, books, and money; ſignifying to her, That, if I may be reſtored to the favour of my family, and allowed a negative only, as to any man who may be propoſed to me, and be uſed like a daughter, a niece, and a ſiſter, I will ſtand by my offer to live ſingle, and ſubmit, as I ought, to a negative from my father. Intimating, nevertheleſs, That it were perhaps better, after the uſage I have received from my brother and ſiſter, that I may be allowed to be diſtant from them, as well for their ſakes as for my own, (meaning, as I ſuppoſe it will be taken, at my Dairy Houſe)—offering to take my father's directions, as to the manner I ſhall live in, the ſervants I ſhall have, and in every-thing that ſhall ſhew the dutiful ſubordination to which I am willing to conform.

My aunt will know by my letter to my ſiſter how to direct to me, if ſhe be permitted to favour me with a line.

I am equally earneſt with her in this letter, as I was with my ſiſter in that I wrote to her, to obtain for me a ſpeedy reconciliation, that I may not be further precipitated; intimating, That, by a timely lenity, all may paſs for a miſunderſtanding only, which, otherwiſe, will be thought equally diſgraceful to them, and to me; appealing to her for the neceſſity I was under to do what I did.

Had I owned, that I was over-reached, and forced away againſt my intention, might they not, as a proof of the truth of my aſſertion, have inſiſted upon my immediate return to them? And if I did not return, would they not have reaſon to ſuppoſe, that I had now altered my mind, (if ſuch were my mind) or had not the power to return?—Then were I to have gone back, muſt it not have been upon their own terms? No conditioning with a father! is a maxim with my father, and with my uncles. If I would have gone, Mr. Lovelace would have oppoſed it. So I muſt have been under his controul, or have run away from him, as it is ſuppoſed I did to him from Harlowe Place. In what a giddy light would this have made me appear!—Had he conſtrained me, could I have appealed to my friends for their protection, without riſquing the very conſequences, to prevent which (ſetting up myſelf preſumptuouſly, as a middle perſon between flaming ſpirits) I have run into ſuch terrible inconveniences.

But, after all, muſt it not give me great anguiſh of mind, to be forced to ſanctify, as I may ſay, by my ſeeming after-approbation, a meaſure I was ſo artfully tricked into, and which I was ſo much reſolved not to take?

How one evil brings on another, is ſorrowfully witneſſed to, by your ever-obliged and affectionate CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XXI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

FRIDAY, APR. 14.

THOU haſt often reproached me, Jack, with my vanity, without diſtinguiſhing the humorous turn that accompanies it; and for which, at the ſame time that thou robbeſt me of the merit of it, thou admireſt me highly. Envy gives thee the indiſtinction: Nature inſpires the admiration; unknown to thyſelf it inſpires it. But thou art too clumſy and too ſhort-ſighted a mortal, to know how to account even for the impulſes by which thou thyſelf art moved.

'Well, but this acquits thee not of 'my charge of vanity, Lovelace,' methinks thou ſayeſt.

And true thou ſayeſt: for I have indeed a confounded parcel of it. But, if men of parts may not be allowed to be vain, who ſhould! And yet, upon ſecond thoughts, men of parts have the leaſt occaſion of any to be vain; ſince the world (ſo few of them are there in it) are ready to find them out, and extol them. If a fool can be made ſenſible, that there is a man who has more underſtanding than himſelf, he is ready enough to conclude, that ſuch a man muſt be a very extraordinary creature.

And what, at this rate, is the general concluſion to be drawn from the premiſes?—Is it not, that no man ought to be vain? But what if a man can't help help it!—This, perhaps, may be my caſe. But there is nothing upon which I value myſelf ſo much as upon my inventions. And for the ſoul of me, I cannot help letting it be ſeen, that I do. Yet this vanity may be a means, perhaps, to overthrow me with this ſagacious lady.

She is very apprehenſive of me, I ſee. I have ſtudied before her and Miſs Howe, as often as I have been with them, to paſs for a giddy thoughtleſs creature. What a folly then to be ſo expatiatingly ſincere, in my anſwer to her home-put, upon the noiſes within the garden?—But ſuch ſucceſs having attended that contrivance, [Succeſs, Jack, has blown many a man up!] my curſed vanity got uppermoſt, and kept down my caution. The menace to have ſecreted Solmes, and that other, that I had thoughts to run away with her fooliſh brother, and of my project to revenge her upon the two ſervants, ſo much terrified the dear creature, that I was forced to ſit down to muſe after means to put myſelf right in her opinion.

Some favourable incidents, at the time, tumbled in from my agent in her family; at leaſt ſuch as I was determined to make favourable: and therefore I deſired admittance; and this before ſhe could reſolve any-thing againſt me; that is to ſay, while her admiration of my intrepidity kept reſolution in ſuſpence.

Accordingly, I prepared myſelf to be all gentleneſs, all obligingneſs, all ſerenity; and as I have now-and-then, and always had, more or leſs, good motions pop up in my mind, I encouraged and collected every-thing of this ſort that I had ever had from novicehood to maturity, [Not long in recollecting, Jack] in order to bring the dear creature into good-humour with me: 'And who 'knows,' thought I, 'if I can hold it, 'and proceed, but I may be able to lay 'a foundation fit to build my grand 'ſcheme upon!—LOVE,' thought I, 'is 'not naturally a doubter—FEAR is: I 'will try to baniſh the latter; nothing 'then but Love will remain. CREDU-'LITY is the God of Love's prime-'miniſter; and they never are aſunder.'

He then acquaints his friend with what paſſed between him and the lady, in relation to his advices from Harlowe Place, and to his propoſal about lodgings, pretty much to the ſame purpoſe as in her preceding letter.

When he comes to mention his propoſal of the Windſor lodgings, thus he expreſſes himſelf:

Now, Belford, can it enter into thy leaden head, what I meant by this propoſal!—I know it cannot. And ſo I'll tell thee.

To leave her for a day or two, with a view to ſerve her by my abſence, would, as I thought, look like confiding in her favour. I could not think of leaving her, thou knoweſt, while I had reaſon to believe her friends would purſue us; and I began to apprehend, that ſhe would ſuſpect, that I made a pretence of that intentional purſuit, to keep about her and with her. But now that they had declared againſt it, and that they would not receive her if ſhe went back, (a declaration ſhe had better hear firſt from me, than from Miſs Howe, or any other) what ſhould hinder me from giving her this mark of my obedience; eſpecially as I could leave Will, who is a clever fellow, and can do any-thing but write and ſpell, and Lord M.'s Jonas, (not as guards, to be ſure, but as attendants only) the latter to be diſpatched to me occaſionally by the former, whom I could acquaint with my motions?

Then I wanted to inform myſelf, why I had not congratulatory letters from Lady Sarah and Lady Betty, and from my couſins Montague, to whom I had written, glorying in my beloved's eſcape; which letters, if properly worded, might be made neceſſary to ſhew her as matters proceed.

As to Windſor, I had no deſign to carry her particularly thither: but ſomewhere it was proper to name, as ſhe condeſcended to aſk my advice about it. London, I durſt not; but very cautiouſly; and ſo as to make it her own option: for I muſt tell thee, that there is ſuch a perverſeneſs in the ſex, that, when they aſk your advice, they do it only to know your opinion, that they may oppoſe it, though, had not the thing in queſtion been your choice, perhaps it had been theirs.

I could eaſily give reaſons againſt Windſor, after I had pretended to be there; and this would have looked the better, as it was a place of my own nomination; and ſhewn her, that I had no fixed ſcheme. Never was there in woman ſuch a ſagacious, ſuch an all-live apprehenſion, as in this. Yet it is a grievous thing to an honeſt man to be ſuſpected.

Then, in my going or return, I can call upon Mrs. Greme. She and my beloved had a great deal of talk together. If I knew what it was about; and that either, upon their firſt acquaintance, was for benefiting herſelf by the other; I might contrive to ſerve them both, without hurting myſelf: for theſe are the moſt prudent ways of doing friendſhips, and what are not followed by regrets, though the ſerved ſhould prove ingrateful. Then Mrs. Greme correſponds by pen and ink with her farmer-ſifter where we are: ſomething may poſſibly ariſe that way, either of a convenient nature, which I may purſue; or of an inconvenient, which I may avoid.

Always be careful of back-doors, is a maxim with me in all my exploits. Whoever knows me, knows that I am no proud man. I can talk as familiarly to ſervants as to principals, when I have a mind to make it worth their while to oblige me in any-thing. Then ſervants are but as the common ſoldiers in an army: they do all the miſchief; frequently without malice, and merely, good ſouls! for miſchief-ſake.

I am moſt apprehenſive about Miſs Howe. She has a confounded deal of wit, and wants only a ſubject, to ſhew as much roguery: and ſhould I be outwitted with all my ſententious, boaſting conceit of my own noſtrum-mongerſhip—[I love to plague thee, who art a pretender to accuracy, and a ſurface-ſkimmer in learning with out-of-the-way words and phraſes] I ſhould certainly hang, drown, or ſhoot myſelf.

Poor Hickman! I pity him for the proſpect he has with ſuch a virago! But the fellow's a fool, God wot! And now I think of it, it is abſolutely neceſſary for complete happineſs in the married-ſtate, that one ſhould be a fool [An argument I once held with this very Miſs Howe.] But then the fool ſhould know the other's ſuperiority; otherwiſe the obſtinate one will diſappoint the wiſe one.

But my agent Joſeph has helped me to ſecure this quarter, as I have hinted to thee more than once.

LETTER XXII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

IN CONTINUATION.

BUT is it not a confounded thing, that I cannot faſten an obligation upon this proud beauty? I have two motives, in endeavouring to prevail upon her to accept of money and raiment from me: one, the real pleaſure I ſhould have in the accomodating of the haughty maid; and to think there was ſomething near her, and upon her, that I could call mine: the other, in order to abate her ſeverity, and humble her a little.

Nothing more effectually brings down a proud ſpirit, than a ſenſe of lying under pecuniary obligations. This has always made me ſolicitous to avoid laying myſelf under any ſuch: yet ſometimes formerly have I been put to it, and curſed the tardy revolution of the quarterly periods. And yet I ever made ſhift to avoid anticipations: I never would eat the calf in the cow's belly, as Lord M.'s phraſe is: for what is that, but to hold our lands upon tenant-courteſy, the vileſt of all tenures? To be denied a fox chace, for fear of breaking down a fence, upon my own grounds? To be clamoured at for repairs ſtudied for, rather than really wanted? To be prated to by a bumkin with his hat on, and his arms folded, as if he defied your expectations of that ſort; his foot firmly fixed, as if upon his own ground, and you forced to take his arch leers, and ſtupid gybes? he intimating by the whole of his conduct, that he had had it in his power to oblige you, and, if you behave civilly, may oblige you again?—I, who think I have a right to break every man's head I paſs by, if I like not his looks, to bear this!—No more could I do it, than I could borrow of an inſolent uncle, or inquiſitive aunt, who would thence think themſelves entitled to have an account of all my life and actions laid before them for their review and cenſure.

My charmer, I ſee, has a pride like my own: but ſhe has no diſtinction in her pride: nor knows the pretty fool, that there is nothing nobler, nothing more delightful, than for lovers to be conferring and receiving obligations from each other. In this very farm-yard, to give thee a familiar inſtance, I have more than once ſeen this remark illuſtrated. A ſtrutting raſcal of a cock have I beheld chuck, chuck, chuck, chuck-ing his miſtreſs to him, when he has found a ſingle barley-corn, taking it up with his bill, and letting it drop five or ſix times, ſtill repeating his chucking invitation: and when two or three of his feathered ladies ſtrive who ſhall be the firſt for't, [O Jack! a cock is a Grand Signor of a bird!] he directs the bill of the foremoſt to it: and when ſhe has got the dirty pearl, he ſtruts over her with an erected creſt, and with an exulting chuck—a chuch-aw-aw-w, circling round her, with dropt wings, ſweeping the duſt in humble courtſhip: while the obliged ſhe, half-ſhy, half-willing, by her cowring tail, prepared wings, yet ſeemingly affrighted eyes, and contracted tracted neck, lets one ſee, that ſhe knows the barley-corn was not all he called her for.

When he comes to that part of his narrative, where he mentions the propoſing of the lady's maid Hannah, or one of the young Sorlings's, to attend her, thus he writes.

Now, Belford, canſt thou imagine what I meant by propoſing Hannah, or one of the girls here, for her attendant? I'll give thee a month to gueſs.

Thou wilt not pretend to gueſs, thou ſay'ſt.

Well, then, I'll tell thee.

Believing ſhe would certainly propoſe to have that favourite wench about her, as ſoon as ſhe was a little ſettled, I had cauſed the girl to be enquired after, with an intent to make intereſt, ſome how or other, that a month's warning ſhould be inſiſted on by her maſter or miſtreſs, or by ſome other means, which I had not determined upon, to prevent her coming to her. But fortune fights for me. The wench is luckily ill; a violent rheumatick diſorder, which has obliged her to leave her place, confines her to her chamber. Poor Hannah! How I pity the girl! Theſe things are very hard upon induſtrious ſervants!—I intend to make the poor wench a ſmall preſent on the occaſion—I know it will oblige my charmer.

And ſo, Jack, pretending not to know any thing of the matter, I preſſed her to ſend for Hannah. She knew I had always a regard for this ſervant, becauſe of her honeſt love to her lady: but now I have a greater regard for her than ever. Calamity, though a poor ſervant's calamity, will rather increaſe than diminiſh good will, with a truly generous maſter or miſtreſs.

As to one of the young Sorlings's attendance, there was nothing at all in propoſing that; for if either of them had been choſen by her, and permitted by the mother. [Two chances in that!] it would have been only till I had fixed upon another. And if afterwards they had been loth to part, I could eaſily have given my beloved a jealouſy, which would have done the buſineſs; or to the girl, who would have quitted her country dairy, ſuch a reliſh for a London one, as would have made it very convenient for her to fall in love with Will; or perhaps I could have done ſtill better for her with Lord M.'s chaplain, who is very deſirous of ſtanding well with his lord's preſumptive-heir.

'A bleſſing on thy honeſt heart, Love-'lace!' thou'lt ſay; 'for thou art for 'providing for every-body!'

He gives an account of the ſerious part of their converſation, with no great variation from the lady's account of it: and when he comes to that part of it, where he bids her remember, that reformation cannot be a ſudden thing, he aſks his friend—

Is not this fair play? Is it not dealing ingenuouſly? Then the obſervation, I will be bold to ſay, is founded in truth and nature. But there was a little touch of policy in it beſides; that the lady, if I ſhould fly out again, ſhould not think me too groſs an hypocrite; for, as I plainly told her, I was afraid, that my fits of reformation were but fits and fallies; but I hoped her example would fix them into habits. But it is ſo diſcouraging a thing, to have my monitreſs ſo very good!—I proteſt I know not how to look up at her! Now, as I am thinking, if I could pull her down a little nearer to my own level; that is to ſay, could prevail upon her to do ſomething that would argue imperfection, ſomething to repent of; we ſhould jog on much more equally, and be better able to comprehend one another: and ſo the comfort would be mutual. and the remorſe not all on one ſide.

He acknowledges that he was greatly affected and pleaſed with the lady's ſerious arguments at the time: but even then was apprehenſive that his temper would not hold. Thus he writes.

This lady ſays ſerious things in ſo agreeable a manner, (and then her voice is all harmony when ſhe touches a ſubject ſhe is pleaſed with) that I could have liſtened to her for half a day together. But yet I am afraid, if ſhe falls, as they call it, ſhe will loſe a good deal of that pathos, of that noble ſelf-confidence, which gives a good perſon, as I now ſee, a viſible ſuperiority over one not ſo good.

But, after all, Belford, I would fain know why people call ſuch free livers as you and me hypocrites.—That's a word I hate; and ſhould take it very ill to be called by it. For myſelf, I have as good motions, and perhaps have them as frequently, as any-body: all the buſineſs is, they don't hold; or, to ſpeak more in character, I don't take the care ſome do, to conceal my laſſes.

LETTER XXIII.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

SATURDAY, APRIL 15.

THOUGH pretty much preſſed in time, and oppreſſed by my mother's watchfulneſs, I will write a few lines upon the new light that has broken in upon your gentleman; and ſend it by a particular hand.

I know not what to think of him upon it. He talks well; but judge him by Rowe's lines, he is certainly a diſſembler. odious as the ſin of hypocriſy, and, as he ſays, that other of ingratitude, are to him.

And pray, my dear, let me aſk, Could he have triumphed, as it is ſaid he has done, over ſo many of our ſex, had he not been egregiouſly guilty of both ſins?

His ingenuouſneſs is the thing that ſtaggers me: yet is he cunning enough to know, that whoever accuſes himſelf firſt, blunts the edge of an adverſary's accuſation.

He is certainly a man of ſenſe: there is more hope of ſuch a one, than of a fool: and there muſt be a beginning to a reformation. Theſe I will allow in his favour.

But this, that follows, I think, is the only way to judge of his ſpecious confeſſions and ſelf-accuſations—Does he confeſs any thing that you knew not before, or that you are not likely to find out from others?—If nothing elſe, what does he confeſs to his own diſadvantage? You have heard of his duels: you have heard of his ſeductions.—All the world has. He owns therefore what it would be to no purpoſe to conceal; and his ingenuouſneſs is a ſalvo—'Why, this, Madam, 'is no more than Mr. Lovelace himſelf 'acknowledges.'

Well, but what is now to be done?—You muſt make the beſt of your ſituation: and as you ſay, ſo ſay I, I hope that will not be bad: for I like all that he has propoſed to you of Windſor, and his canon's houſe. His readineſs to leave you, and go himſelf in queſt of a lodging, likewiſe looks well. And I think there is nothing can be ſo properly done, as (whether you get to a canon's houſe or not) that the canon ſhould join you together in wedlock as ſoon as poſſible.

I much approve, however, of all your cautions, of all your vigilance, and of every thing you have done, but of your meeting him. Yet, in my diſapprobation of that, I judge by the event only: for who would have divined, it would have concluded as it did? But he is the devil, by his own account: and had he run away with the wretched Solmes, and your more wretched brother, and himſelf been tranſported for life, he ſhould have had my free conſent for all three.

What uſe does he make of that Joſeph Leman!—His ingenuouſneſs, I muſt once more ſay, confounds me; but if, my dear, you can forgive your brother for the part he put that fellow upon acting, I don't know whether you ought to be angry at Lovelace. Yet I have wiſhed fifty times, ſince Lovelace got you away, that you were rid of him, whether it were by a burning fever, by hanging, by drowning, or by a broken neck; provided it were before he laid you under a neceſſity to go into mourning for him.

I repeat my hitherto-rejected offer. May I ſend it ſafely by your old man? I have reaſons for not ſending it by Hickman's ſervant, unleſs I had a bank-note. Enquiring for ſuch may cauſe diſtruſt. My mother is ſo buſy, ſo inquiſitive—I don't love ſuſpicious tempers.

And here ſhe is continually in and out—I muſt break off.

MR. Hickman begs his moſt reſpectful compliments to you, with offer of his ſervices. I told him I would oblige him, becauſe minds in trouble take kindly any-body's civilities; but that he was not to imagine that he particularly obliged me by this; ſince I ſhould think the man or woman either blind or ſtupid who admired not a perſon of your exalted merit for your own ſake, and wiſhed not to ſerve you without view to other reward than the honour of ſerving you.

To be ſure, that was his principal motive; with great daintineſs he ſaid it: but with a kiſs of his hand, and a bow to my feet, he hoped, that that fine lady's being my friend did not leſſen the merit of the reverence he really had for her.

Believe me ever, what you, my dear, ſhall ever find me, your faithful and affectionate

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XXIV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SAT. AFTERNOON.

I Detain your meſſenger while I write in anſwer to yours; the poor old man not being very well.

You diſhearten me a good deal about Mr. Lovelace. I may be too willing from my ſad circumſtances to think the beſt of him. If his pretences to reformation are but pretence, what muſt be his intent? But can the heart of man be ſo very vile? Can he, dare he, mock the Almighty? But may I not, from one very ſad reflection, think better of him; that I am thrown too much into his power, power, to make it neceſſary for him (except he were to intend the very utmoſt villainy by me) to be ſuch a ſhocking hypocrite? He muſt, at leaſt, be in earneſt, at the time he gives the better hopes. Surely he muſt. You yourſelf muſt join with me in this hope, or you could not wiſh me to be ſo dreadfully yoked.

But after all, I had rather, much rather, be independent of him, and of his family, although I have an high opinion of them; at leaſt till I ſee what my own may be brought to.—Otherwiſe, I think, it were beſt for me, at once, to caſt myſelf into Lady Betty's protection. All would then be conducted with decency, and perhaps many mortifications would be ſpared me. But then I muſt be his, at all adventures, and be thought to defy my own family. And ſhall I not firſt ſee the iſſue of one application? And yet I cannot make this, till I am ſettled ſomewhere, and at a diſtance from him.

Mrs. Sorlings ſhewed me a letter this morning, which ſhe had received from her ſiſter Greme laſt night; in which Mrs. Greme (hoping I would forgive her forward zeal, if her ſiſter thinks fit to ſhew her letter to me) wiſhes (and that for all the noble family's ſake, and ſhe hopes ſhe may ſay for my own) that I will be pleaſed to yield to make his honour, as ſhe calls him, happy. She grounds her officiouſneſs, as ſhe calls it, upon what he was ſo condeſcending [her word alſo] to ſay to her yeſterday, in his way to Windſor, on her preſuming to aſk, if ſhe might ſoon give him joy? That no man ever loved a woman as he loves me: that no woman ever ſo well deſerved to be beloved: that in every converſation, he admires me ſtill more: that he loves me with ſuch a purity, as he had never believed himſelf capable of, or that a mortal creature could have inſpired him with; looking upon me as all ſoul; as an angel ſent down to ſave his; and a great deal more of this ſort: but that he apprehends, my conſent to make him happy is at a greater diſtance than he wiſhes, and complained of the too ſevere reſtrictions I had laid upon him before I honoured him with my confidence: which reſtrictions muſt be as ſacred to him, as if they were parts of the marriage-contract, &c.

What, my dear, ſhall I ſay to this? How ſhall I take it? Mrs. Greme is a good woman. Mrs. Sorlings is a good woman. And this letter agrees with the converſation between Mr. Lovelace and me, which I thought, and ſtill think, ſo agreeable. Yet what means the man by foregoing the opportunities he has had to declare himſelf?—What means his complaints of my reſtrictions to Mrs. Greme? He is not a baſhful man.—But you ſay, I inſpire people with an awe of me.—An awe, my dear!—As how?

I am quite petulant, fretful, and peeviſh, with myſelf, at times, to find, that I am bound to ſee the workings of this ſubtle, or this giddy ſpirit, which ſhall I call it?

How am I puniſhed, as I frequently think, for my vanity, in hoping to be an example to young perſons of my ſex! Let me be but a warning, and I will now be contented. For, be my deſtiny what it may, I ſhall never be able to hold up my head again among my beſt friends and worthieſt companions.

It is one of the cruelleſt circumſtances that attends the faults of the inconſiderate, that ſhe makes all who love her unhappy, and gives joy only to her own enemies, and to the enemies of her family.

What an uſeful leſſon would this afford, were it properly inculcated at the time that the tempted mind was balancing upon a doubtful adventure?

You know not, my dear, the worth of a virtuous man; and, noble-minded as you are in moſt particulars, you partake of the common weakneſs of human nature, in being apt to ſlight what is in your own power.

You would not think of uſing Mr. Lovelace, were he your ſuitor, as you do the much worthier Mr. Hickman—Would you?—You know who ſays in my mother's caſe, 'Much will bear, 'much ſhall bear, all the world through.' Mr. Hickman, I fancy, would be glad to know the lady's name, who made ſuch an obſervation. He would think it hardly poſſible, but ſuch a one ſhould benefit by her own remark; and would be apt to wiſh his Miſs Howe acquainted with her.

Gentleneſs of heart, ſurely, is not deſpicable in a man. Why, if it be, is the higheſt diſtinction a man can arrive at, that of a gentleman?—A diſtinction which a prince may not deſerve. For manners, more than birth, fortune, or title, are requiſite in this character. Manners are indeed the eſſence of it. And ſhall it be generally ſaid, and Miſs Howe not be an exception to it, (as once you wrote) that our ſex are beſt dealt with by boiſterous and unruly ſpirits?

Forgive me, my dear; and love me as you uſed to do. For although my fortunes are changed, my heart is not:

nor nor ever will, while it bids my pen tell you, that it muſt ceaſe to beat, when it is not as much yours, as your

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SATURDAY EVENING.

MR. Lovelace has ſeen divers apartments at Windſor; but not one, he ſays, that he thought fit for me, and which at the ſame time anſwered my deſcription.

He has been very ſolicitous to keep to the letter of my inſtructions; which looks well: and the better I like him, as, although he propoſed that town, he came back, diſſuading me from it; for he ſaid, that, in his journey from thence, he had thought Windſor, although of his own propoſal, a wrong choice; becauſe I coveted privacy, and that was a place generally viſited and admired.

I told him, that if Mrs. Sorlings thought me not an incumbrance, I would be willing to ſtay here a little longer; provided he would leave me, and go to Lord M.'s or to London, which-ever he thought beſt.

He hoped, he ſaid, that he might ſuppoſe me abſolutely ſafe from the inſults or attempts of my brother; and, therefore, if it would make me eaſier, he would obey, for a few days at leaſt.

He again propoſed to ſend for Hannah. I told him I deſigned to do ſo, through you—And ſhall I beg of you, my dear, to cauſe the honeſt creature to be ſent to? Your faithful Robert, I think, knows where ſhe is. Perhaps ſhe will be permitted to quit her place directly, by allowing a month's wages, which I will repay her. He took notice of the ſerious humour he found me in, and of the redneſs of my eyes. I had juſt been anſwering your letter; and had he not approached me, on his coming off his journey, in a very reſpectful manner; had he not made an unexceptionable report of his enquiries, and been ſo ready to go from me, at the very firſt word; I was prepared (notwithſtanding the good terms we parted upon when he ſet out for Windſor) to have given him a very unwelcome reception: for the contents of your laſt letter had ſo affected me, that the moment I ſaw him, I beheld with indignation the ſeducer, who had been the cauſe of all the evils I ſuffer, and have ſuffered.

He hinted to me, that he had received a letter from Lady Betty, and another (as I underſtood him) from one of the Miſs Montagues. If they take notice of me in them, I wonder that he did not acquaint me with the contents. I am afraid, my dear, that his relations are among thoſe, who think I have taken a raſh and inexcuſeable ſtep. It is not my credit to let even them know, how I have been frighted out of myſelf: and yet perhaps they would hold me unworthy of their alliance, if they were to think my flight a voluntary one. O my dear, how uneaſy to us are our reflections upon every doubtful occurrence, when we know we have been prevailed upon to do a wrong thing!

SUNDAY MORNING.

An! this man, my dear! We have had warmer dialogues than ever yet we have had. At fair argument, I find I need not fear him; but he is ſuch a wild, ſuch an ungovernable creature, [He reformed!] that I am half-afraid of him.

He again, on my declaring myſelf uneaſy at his ſtay with me here, propoſed that I would put myſelf into Lady Betty's protection; aſſuring me that he thought he could not leave me at Mrs. Sorlings's, with ſafety to myſelf. And upon my declining to do that, for the reaſons I gave you in my laſt, he urged to me to make a demand of my eſtate.

He knew it, I told him, to be my reſolution not to litigate with my father.

Nor would he put me upon it, he replied, but as the laſt thing. But if my ſpirit would not permit me to be obliged, as I called it, to any-body; and yet if my relations would refuſe me my own; he knew not how I could keep up that ſpirit, without being put to inconveniences, which would give him infinite concern—Unleſs-unleſs-unleſs, he ſaid, heſitating, as if afraid to ſpeak out—Unleſs I would take the only method I could take, to obtain the poſſeſſion of my own.

'What is that, Sir?'

Sure the man ſaw by my looks, when he came with his creeping unleſſes, that I gueſſed what he meant.

'Ah, Madam! can you be at a loſs 'to know what that method is?—They 'will not diſpute with a man that right 'which they would conteſt with you.'

Why ſaid he with a man, inſtead of with him? Yet he looked as if he wanted to be encouraged to ſay more.

'So, Sir, you would have me to em'ploy a lawyer, would you, notwith'ſtanding what I have ever declared, as 'to litigating with my father?'

'No, I would not, my deareſt crea-

'ture,'

'ture,' snatching my hand, and pressing it with his lips—'except you would 'make me the lawyer.'

Had he said me at first, I should have been above the affectation of mentioning a lawyer.

I blushed. The man pursued not the subject so ardently, but that it was more easy as well as more natural to avoid it, than to fall into it.

Would to Heaven he might, without offending!—But I so over-awed him!—[Over-awed him!—Your notion, my dear!] And so the over-awed bashful man went off from the subject, repeating his proposal, that I would demand my own estate, or empower some man of the law to demand it, if I would not [he put in] empower a happier man to demand it. But it could not be amiss, he thought, to acquaint my two trustees, that I intended to assume it.

I should know better what to do, I told him, when he was at a distance from me, and known to be so. 'I suppose, Sir, 'that if my father propose my return, 'and engage never to mention Solmes to 'me, nor any other man, but by my 'consent, and I agree upon that condi-'tion to think no more of you, you will 'acquiesce?'

I was willing to try whether he had the regard to all my previous declarations, which he pretended to have to some of them.

He was struck all of a heap.

'What say you, Mr. Lovelace? You 'know, all you mean is for my good. 'Surely I am my own mistress: surely 'I need not ask your leave to make what 'terms I please for myself, so long as I 'break none with you?'

He hemmed twice or thrice.—'Why, 'Madam—Why, Madam—I cannot 'say—' Then pausing—and rising from his seat, with petulance—'I see plain-'ly enough,' said he, 'the reason why 'none of my proposals can be accepted: 'at last I am to be a sacrifice to your 'reconciliation with your implacable fa-'mily.'

'It has always been your respectful 'way, Mr. Lovelace, to treat my fa-'mily in this free manner. But pray, 'Sir, when you call others implacable, 'see that you deserve not the same cen-'sure yourself.'

He must needs say, there was no love lost between some of my family and him; but he had not deserved of them what they had of him.

'Yourself being judge, I suppose, 'Sir?'

'All the world, you yourself, Ma-'dam, being judge.'

'Then, Sir, let me tell you, had you 'been less upon your defiances, they 'would not have been irritated so much 'against you. But nobody ever heard, 'that avowed despite to the relations of 'a person was a proper courtship, either 'to that person, or to her friends.'

'Well, Madam, all that I know, is, 'that their malice against me is such, 'that, if you determine to sacrifice 'me, you may be reconciled when you 'please.'

'And all that I know, Sir, is, that if 'I do give my father the power of a 'negative, and he will be contented 'with that, it will be but my duty to give 'it him; and if I preserve one to my-'self, I shall break through no obliga-'tion to you.'

'Your duty to your capricious bro-'ther, not to your father, you mean, 'Madam.'

'If the dispute lay between my bro-'ther and me at first, surely, Sir, a 'father may chuse which party he will 'take.'

'He may, Madam—But that exempts 'him not from blame for all that, if he 'take the wrong.'

'Different people will judge different-'ly, Mr. Lovelace, of the right and the 'wrong. You judge as you please. Shall 'not others as they please? And who has 'a right to controul a father's judgment 'in his own family, and in relation to 'his own child?'

'I know, Madam, there is no argu-'ing with you. But, nevertheless, I 'had hoped to have made myself some 'little merit with you, so as that I might 'not have been the preliminary sacrifice to 'a reconciliation.'

'Your hope, Sir, had been better 'grounded, if you had had my consent 'to my abandoning of my father's house.'

'Always, Madam, and for ever, to 'be reminded of the choice you would 'have made of that damned Solmes—'rather than—'

'Not so hasty! Not so rash, Mr. Love-'lace! I am convinced, that there was 'no intention to marry me to that Solmes 'on Wednesday.'

'So I am told they now give out, in 'order to justify themselves at your ex-'pence. Every-body living, Madam, 'is obliged to you for your kind thoughts, 'but I.'

'Excuse me, good Mr. Lovelace.' [waving my hand, and bowing]. 'that I 'am willing to think the best of my father.'

'Charming

'Charming creature!' said he, 'with 'what a bewitching air is that said!'—And with a vehemence in his manner, would have snatched my hand. But I withdrew it, being much offended with him.

'I think, Madam, my sufferings for 'your sake might have entitled me to 'some favour.'

'My sufferings, Sir, for your impetuous temper, set against your sufferings 'for my sake, I humbly conceive, leave 'me very little your debtor.'

'Lord, Madam!' [assuming a drolling air] 'What have you suffered!—'Nothing but what you can easily forgive. You have been only made a prisoner in your father's house, by the way 'of doing credit to your judgment!—'You have only had an innocent and 'faithful servant turned out of your service, because you loved her—You have 'only had your sister's confident servant 'set over you, with leave to teaze and 'affront you.'—

'Very well, Sir!'

'You have only had an insolent brother take upon him to treat you like 'a slave, and as insolent a sister to undermine you in every-body's favour, 'on pretence to keep you out of hands, 'which, if as vile as they vilely report, 'are not, however, half so vile and cruel 'as their own!'

'Go on, Sir, if you please!'

'You have only been persecuted, in 'order to oblige you to have a sordid 'fellow, whom you have professed to 'hate, and whom every-body despises! 'The licence has been only got! The 'parson has only been had in readiness! 'The day, a near, a very near day, has 'been only fixed! And you were only to 'be searched for your correspondences, 'and still closer confined, till the day 'came, in order to deprive you of all 'means of escaping the snare laid for 'you!—But all this you can forgive! 'You can wish you had stood all this; 'inevitable as the compulsion must have 'been!—And the man who, at the hazard of his life, has delivered you from 'all these mortifications, is the only person you cannot forgive!'

'Can't you go on, Sir? You see I 'have patience to hear you. Can't you 'go on, Sir?'

'I can, Madam, with my sufferings: 'which I confess ought not to be mentioned, were I at last to be rewarded 'in the manner I hoped.'

'Your sufferings then, if you please, 'Sir?'

'—Affrontingly forbidden your 'father's house, after encouragement 'given, without any reasons they knew 'not before, to justify the prohibition: 'forced upon a rencounter I wished to 'avoid; the first I ever, so provoked, 'wished to avoid. And that, because 'the wretch was your brother!'

'Wretch, Sir!—And my brother!—'This could be from no man breathing, 'but from him before me!'

'Pardon me, Madam!—But, oh! 'how unworthy to be your brother!—'The quarrel grafted upon an old one, 'when at college; he universally known 'to be the aggressor; and revived for 'views equally sordid, and injurious 'both to yourself and me—Giving life 'to him, who would have taken away 'mine!'

'Your generosity THIS, Sir; not your 'sufferings: a little more of your sufferings, if you please!—I hope you do not 'repent, that you did not murder my 'brother!'

'My private life hunted into! My 'morals decried! Some of the accusers 'not unfaulty!'

'That's an aspersion, Sir!'

'Spies set upon my conduct! One hired 'to bribe my own servant's fidelity; perhaps to have poisoned me at last, if the 'honest fellow had not—'

'Facts, Mr. Lovelace!—Do you want 'facts in the display of your sufferings? '—None of your perhaps's, I beseech 'you!'

'Menaces every day, and defiances, 'put into every-one's mouth against me! 'Forced to creep about in disguises—and 'to watch all hours—'

'And in all weathers, I suppose, Sir—'That I remember was once your grievance! In all weathers, Sir! And all these 'hardships arising from yourself, not imposed by me.'

'—Like a thief, or an eves-droper,' proceeded he: 'and yet neither by birth 'nor alliances unworthy of their relation, whatever I may be and am of 'their admirable daughter: of whom 'they, every one of them, are at least 'as unworthy!—These, Madam, I 'call sufferings: justly call so; if at last 'I am to be sacrificed to an imperfect 'reconciliation—Imperfect, I say: for 'can you expect to live so much as 'tolerably, under the same roof, after 'all that has passed, with that brother 'and sister?'

'O Sir, Sir! What sufferings have 'yours been! And all for my sake, I 'warrant!—I can never reward you for them!—

'them!—Never think of me more, I 'beſeech you—How can you have pa-'tience with me?—Nothing has been 'owing to your own behaviour, I pre-'ſume; nothing to your defiances for 'defiances; nothing to your reſolution 'declared more than once, that you 'would be related to a family, which, 'nevertheleſs, you would not ſtoop to 'aſk a relation of; nothing, in ſhort, 'to courſes which every-body blamed 'you for, you not thinking it worth 'your while to juſtify yourſelf. Had 'I not thought you uſed in an ungen-'tlemanly manner, as I have hereto-'fore told you, you had not had my 'notice by pen and ink. That notice 'gave you a ſuppoſed ſecurity, and you 'generouſly defied my friends the more 'for it: and this brought upon me (per-'haps not undeſervedly) my father's 'diſpleaſure; without which my bro-'ther's private pique, and ſelfiſh views, 'would have wanted a foundation to 'build upon: ſo that for all that fol-'lowed of my treatment, and your re-'dundant only's, I might thank you 'principally, as you may yourſelf for 'allyour ſufferings, your mighty ſufferings! '—And if, voluble Sir, you have found-'ed any merit upon them, be ſo good as 'to revoke it: and look upon me, with 'my forfeited reputation, as the only 'ſufferer—For what—Pray hear me out, Sir,' [for he was going to ſpeak]—'have 'you ſuffered in, but your pride? Your 'reputation could not ſuffer: that it was 'beneath you to be ſolicitous about. 'And had you not been an unmanagea-'ble man, I ſhould not have been driven 'to the extremity I now every hour, as 'the hour paſſes, deplore—With this 'additional reflection upon myſelf, that 'I ought not to have begun, or, having 'begun, not continued a correſpondence 'with one, who thought it not worth his 'while to clear his own character for my 'ſake, or to ſubmit to my father for his 'own, in a point wherein every father 'ought to have an option.'

'Darkneſs, light—Light, darkneſs—'by my ſoul!—Juſt as you pleaſe to 'have it. O charmer of my heart!'—ſnatching my hand, and preſſing it be-tween both his, to his lips, in a ſtrange wild way—'Take me, take me to your-'ſelf—Mould me as you pleaſe—I am 'wax in your hands—Give me your 'own impreſſion; and ſeal me for ever 'yours—We were born for each other! '—You to make me happy, and ſave a 'ſoul—I am all error, all crime. I ſee 'what I ought to have done. But do 'you think, Madam, I can willingly 'conſent to be ſacrificed to a partial re-'conciliation, in which I ſhall be ſo 'great, ſo irreparable a ſufferer!—Any-'thing but that—Include me in your 'terms; preſcribe to me; promiſe for 'me as you pleaſe—Put a halter about 'my neck, and lead me by it, upon 'condition of forgiveneſs on that diſ-'graceful penance, and of a proſtration 'as ſervile, to your father's preſence, '(your brother abſent;) and I will beg 'his conſent at his feet, and bear any-'thing but ſpurning from him, becauſe 'he is your father. But to give you up 'upon cold conditions, d—n me,' [ſaid the ſhocking wretch] 'if I either will, 'or can!'

Theſe were his words, as near as I can remember them; for his behaviour was ſo ſtrangely wild and fervent, that I was perfectly frighted. I thought he would have devoured my hand. I wiſh-ed myſelf a thouſand miles diſtant from him.

I told him, I by no means approved of his violent temper: he was too boiſ-terous a man for my liking. I ſaw now, by the converſation that had paſſed, what was his boaſted regard to my in-junctions; and ſhould take my meaſures accordingly, as he ſhould ſoon find. And with a half-frighted earneſtneſs I de-ſired him to withdraw, and leave me to myſelf.

He obeyed; and that with extreme complaiſance in his manner, but with his complexion greatly heightened, and a countenance as greatly diſſatisfied.

But, on recollecting all that paſſed, I plainly ſee, that he means not, if he can help it, to leave me to the liberty of re-fuſing him; which I had, nevertheleſs, preſerved a right to do; but looks upon me as his, by a ſtrange ſort of obligation, for having run away with me againſt my will.

Yet you ſee he but touches upon the edges of matrimony neither. And that at a time generally, when he has either excited one's paſſions or apprehenſions; ſo that one cannot at once deſcend. But ſurely this cannot be his deſign.—And yet ſuch ſeemed to be his behaviour to my ſiſter, when he provoked her to re-fuſe him, and ſo tamely ſubmitted, as he did, to her refuſal.—But he dare not—What can one ſay of ſo various a man?—I am now again out of conceit with him. I wiſh I were fairly out of his power.

He has ſent up three times to beg ad-mittance; in the two laſt, with unuſual earneſtneſs. But I have ſent him word I will firſt finiſh what I am about.

What to do about going from this place, I cannot tell. I could ſtay here with all my heart, as I have ſaid to him: the gentlewoman and her daughters are deſirous that I will; although not very convenient for them, I believe, neither; but I ſee he will not leave me, while I do —So I muſt remove ſomewhere.

I have long been ſick of myſelf: and now I am more and more ſo. But let me not loſe your good opinion. If I do, that loſs will complete the misfortunes of your CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XXVI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SUNDAY NIGHT, (APRIL 16.)

I May ſend to you, although you are forbid to write to me; may I not?—For that is not a correſpondence (Is it?) where letters are not anſwered.

I am ſtrangely at a loſs what to think of this man. He is a perfect Proteus. I can but write according to the ſhape he aſſumes at the time. Don't think me the changeable perſon, I beſeech you, if in one letter I contradict what I wrote in another; nay, if I ſeem to contradict what I ſaid in the ſame letter: for he is a perfect chameleon; or rather more variable than the chameleon; for that, it is ſaid, cannot aſſume the red and the white; but this man can. And though black ſeems to be his natural colour, yet has he taken great pains to make me think him nothing but white.

But you ſhall judge of him, as I proceed. Only, if I any-where appear to you to be credulous, I beg you to ſet me right: for you are a ſtander-by, as you ſay in a former—Would to Heaven I were not to play! For I think, after all, I am held to a deſperate game.

Before I could finiſh my laſt to you, he ſent up twice more to beg admittance. I returned for anſwer, that I would ſee him at my own time: I would neither be invaded, nor preſcribed to.

Conſidering how we parted, and my delaying his audience, as he ſometimes calls it, I expected him to be in no very good humour, when I admitted of his viſit; and by what I wrote, you will conclude that I was not. Yet mine ſoon changed, when I ſaw his extreme humility at his entrance, and heard what he had to ſay.

'I have a letter, Madam,' ſaid he, 'from Lady Betty Lawrance, and another from my couſin Charlotte. But 'of theſe more by-and-by. I came now 'to make my humble acknowledgment 'to you, upon the arguments that paſſed 'between us ſo lately.'

I was ſilent, wondering what he was driving at.

'I am a moſt unhappy creature,' proceeded he: 'unhappy from a ſtrange 'impatiency of ſpirit, which I cannot 'conquer.—It always brings upon me 'deſerved humiliation. But it is more 'laudable to acknowledge, than to perſevere, when under the power of conviction.'

I was ſtill ſilent.

'I have been conſidering what you 'propoſed to me, Madam, that I ſhould 'acquieſce with ſuch terms as you ſhould 'think proper to comply with, in order 'to a reconciliation with your friends.'

'Well, Sir,'

'And I find all juſt, all right, on your 'ſide; and all impatience, all inconſideration, on mine.'

I ſtared, you may ſuppoſe, 'Whence 'this change, Sir? And ſo ſoon?'

'I am ſo much convinced, that you 'muſt be in the right in all you think fit 'to inſiſt upon, that I ſhall for the future miſtruſt myſelf; and, if it be poſſible, whenever I differ with you, take 'an hour's time for recollection, before 'I give way to that vehemence, which 'an oppoſition, to which I have not been 'accuſtomed, too often gives me.'

'All this is mighty good, Sir: but to 'what does it tend?'

'Why, Madam, when I came to conſider what you had propoſed, as to the 'terms of reconciliation with your 'friends; and when I recollected, that 'you had always referred to yourſelf to approve or reject me, according to my 'merits or demerits; I plainly ſaw, that it 'was rather a condeſcenſion in you, that 'you were pleaſed to aſk my conſent to 'thoſe terms, than that you were impoſing a new law: and I now, Madam, 'beg your pardon for my impatience. 'Whatever terms you think proper to 'come into with your relations, which 'will enable you to honour me with the 'conditional effect of your promiſe to me, 'to theſe be pleaſed to conſent: and if 'I loſe you, inſupportable as that 'thought is to me; yet, as it muſt be by 'my own fault, I ought to thank myſelf 'for it.'

What think you, Miſs Howe?—Do you believe he can have any view in this?—I cannot ſee any he could have; and I thought it beſt, as he put it in ſo right a manner, a manner, to appear not to doubt the ſincerity of his confeſſion, and to accept of it, as ſincere.

He then read to me part of Lady Betty's letter; turning down the beginning, which was a little too ſevere upon him, he ſaid, for my eye: and I believe, by the ſtile, the remainder of it was in a corrective ſtrain.

It was too plain, I told him, that he muſt have great faults, that none of his relations could write to him, but with a mingled cenſure for ſome bad action.

'And it is as plain, my deareſt creature,' ſaid he, 'that you, who know 'not of any ſuch faults, but by ſurmize, 'are equally ready to condemn me.— 'Will not charity allow you to infer, 'that their charges are no better grounded?—And that my principal fault has 'been careleſſneſs of my character, and 'too little ſolicitude to clear myſelf 'when aſperſed? Which I do aſſure you 'is the caſe.'

Lady Betty, in her letter, expreſſes herſelf in the moſt obliging manner, in relation to me. She wiſhes him ſo to behave, as to encourage me to make him ſoon happy. She deſires her compliments to me; and expreſſes her impatience to ſee, as her niece, ſo celebrated a lady; [thoſe are her high words.] She ſhall take it for an honour, ſhe ſays, to be put into a way to oblige me. She hopes I will not too long delay the ceremony; becauſe that performed, will be to her, and to Lord M. and Lady Sarah, a ſure pledge of her nephew's merits, and good behaviour.

She ſays, ſhe was always ſorry to hear of the hardſhips I had met with on his account: that he will be the moſt ungrateful of men, if he make not all up to me. And that ſhe thinks it incumbent upon all their family to ſupply to me the loſt favour of my own: and, for her part, nothing of that kind, ſhe bids him aſſure me, ſhall be wanting.

Her ladyſhip obſerves, that the treatment he had received from my family, would have been more unaccountable than it was, with ſuch natural and accidental advantages as he had; had it not been owing to his own careleſs manners. But ſhe hopes that he will convince the Harlowe-family, that they had thought worſe of him than he had deſerved; ſince now it was in his power to eſtabliſh his character for ever. This ſhe prays to God to enable him to do, as well for his own honour, as for the honour of their houſe, was the magnificent word.

She concludes, with deſiring to be informed of our nuptials the moment they are celebrated, that ſhe may be with the earlieſt in felicitating me on the happy occaſion.

But her ladyſhip gives me no direct invitation to attend her before the marriage: which I might have expected from what he had told me.

He then ſhewed me part of Miſs Montague's more ſprightly letter, congratulating him upon the honour he had obtained, of the confidence of ſo admirable a lady. Theſe are her words. Confidence, my dear! Nobody, indeed, as you ſay, will believe otherwiſe, were they to be told the truth: and you ſee that Miſs Montague (and all his family, I ſuppoſe) think the ſtep I have taken, an extraordinary one. She alſo wiſhes for his ſpeedy nuptials; and to ſee her new couſin at M. Hall: as do Lord M. ſhe tells him and her ſiſter; and in general all the well-wiſhers of their family.

Whenever this happy day ſhall be paſſed, ſhe propoſes, ſhe ſays, to attend me, and to make one in my train to M. Hall, if his lordſhip ſhall continue as ill of the gout as he is at preſent. But that ſhould he get better, he will himſelf attend me, ſhe is ſure, and conduct me thither: and afterwards quit either of his three ſeats to us, till we ſhall be ſettled to our mind.

This young lady ſays nothing in excuſe for not meeting me on the road, or at St. Alban's, as he had made me expect ſhe would: yet mentions her having been indiſpoſed. Mr. Lovelace had alſo told me, that Lord M. was ill of the gout; which Miſs Montague's letter confirms.

But why did not the man ſhew me theſe letters laſt night? Was he afraid of giving me too much pleaſure?

LETTER XXVII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

YOU may believe, my dear, that theſe letters put me in good-humour with him. He ſaw it in my countenance, and congratulated himſelf upon it. Yet I cannot but repeat my wonder, that I could not have the contents of them communicated to me laſt night.

He then urged me to go directly to Lady Betty's, on the ſtrength of her letter.

'But how,' ſaid I, 'can I do that, 'were I even out of all hope of a reconciliation with my friends, (which yet, 'however unlikely to be effected, is my 'duty to attempt) as her ladyship has 'given me no particular invitation?'

That, he was sure, was owing to her doubt that it would be accepted—Else she had done it with the greatest pleasure in the world.

That doubt itself, I said, was enough to deter me: since her ladyship, who knew so well the boundaries of the fit and the unfit, by her not expecting I would accept of an invitation, had she given it, would have reason to think me very forward, if I had accepted it; and much more forward to go without it.

'Then,' said I, 'I thank you, Sir, I 'have no cloaths fit to go any-whither, 'or to be seen by any-body.'

O, I was fit to appear in the drawing-room, were full dress and jewels to be excused; and should make the most amiable [he must mean extraordinary] figure there. He was astonished at the elegance of my dress. By what art he knew not, but I appeared to such advantage, as if I had a different suit every day. Besides, his coulins Montague would supply me with all I wanted for the present; and he would write to Miss Charlotte accordingly, if I would give him leave.

'Do you think me the jay in the fa-'ble?' said I. 'Would you have me 'visit the owners of the borrowed dresses 'in their own cloaths? Surely, Mr. 'Lovelace, you think I have either a 'very low, or a very confident mind.'

Would I chuse to go to London (for a few days only) in order to furnish myself with cloaths?

'Not at your expence, Sir,' said I, in an angry tone.

I could not have appeared in earnest to him, in my displeasure at his artful contrivances to get me away, if I were not occasionally to shew my real fretfulness upon the destitute condition to which he has reduced me. When people set out wrong together, it is very difficult to avoid recriminations.

He wished he knew but my mind—That should direct him in his proposals, and it would be his delight to observe it, whatever it were.

'My mind is, that you, Sir, should 'leave me out of hand—How often must 'I tell you so?'

If I were any-where but here, he would obey me, he said, if I insisted upon it. But if I would assert my right, that would be infinitely preferable, in his opinion, to any other measure but one: (which he durst only hint at) for then admitting his visits, or refusing them, as I pleased, (granting a correspondence by letter only) it would appear to all the world, that what I had done, was but in order to do myself justice.

'How often, Mr. Lovelace, must I 'repeat, that I will not litigate with my 'father?—Do you think that my unhappy 'circumstances will alter my notions of 'my own duty so far as I shall be enabled 'to perform it? How can I obtain pos-'session without litigation, and but by 'my trustees? One of them will be 'against me; the other is abroad. Then 'the remedy proposed by this measure, 'were I disposed to fall in with it, will 'require time to bring it to effect; and 'what I want, is present independence, 'and your immediate absence.'

Upon his soul, the wretch swore, he did not think it safe, for the reasons he had before given, to leave me here. He wished I would think of some place, to which I should like to go. But he must take the liberty to say, that he hoped his behaviour had not been so exceptionable, as to make me so very earnest for his absence in the interim: and the less, surely, as I was almost eternally shutting up myself from him; although he presumed to assure me, that he never went from me, but with a corrected heart, and with strengthened resolutions of improving by my example.

'Eternally shutting myself up from you!' repeated I—'I hope, Sir, that you will 'not pretend to take it amiss, that I ex-'pect to be uninvaded in my retire-'ments. I hope you do not think me 'so weak a creature (novice as you have 'found me in a very capital instance) as 'to be fond of occasions to hear your 'fond speeches, especially as no differing 'circumstances require your over-frequent 'visits; nor that I am to be addressed to 'as if I thought hourly professions need-'ful to assure me of your honour.'

He seemed a little disconcerted.

'You know, Mr. Lovelace,' proceeded I, 'why I am so earnest for your 'absence. It is, that I may appear to 'the world independent of you; and in 'hopes, by that means, to find it less 'difficult to set on foot a reconciliaton 'with my friends. And now let me add, '(in order to make you easier as to the 'terms of that hoped-for reconciliation) 'that since I find I have the good for-'tune to stand so well with your relati-'ons, I will, from time to time, ac-'quaint you, by letter, when you are 'absent, with every step I shall take, 'and with every overture that shall be 'made to me: but not with an intention 'to render myself accountable to you,

'neither,

'neither, as to my acceptance or non-'acceptance of those overtures. They 'know, that I have a power given me 'by my grandfather's will, to bequeath 'the estate he left me, with other of his 'bounties, in a way that may affect 'them, though not absolutely from 'them; this consideration, I hope, will 'procure me some from them when their 'passion subsides, and when they know 'I am independent of you.'

'Charming reasoning!'—And let him tell me, that the assurance I had given him was all he wished for. It was more than he could ask. What a happiness to have a woman of honour and generosity to depend upon! Had he, on his first entrance into the world, met with such a one, he had never been other than a man of strict virtue.—But all, he hoped, was for the best; since, in that case, he had never perhaps had the happiness he had now in view; because his relations had been always urging him to marry; and that before he had the honour to know me. And now, as he had not been so bad as some people's malice reported him to be, he hoped he should have near as much merit in his repentance, as if he had never erred.—A fine rakish notion and hope! And too much encouraged, I doubt, my dear, by the generality of our sex!

This brought on a more serious question or two. You'll see by it what a creature an unmortified libertine is.

I asked him, if he knew what he had said alluded to a sentence in the best of books, That there was more joy in heaven—

He took the words out of my mouth,

'Over one sinner that repenteth, than over 'ninety-and-nine just persons which need no 'repentance,' were his words.

'Yes, Madam, I thought of it as soon 'as I said it, but not before. I have 'read the story of the Prodigal Son, I'll 'assure you: and one day, when I am 'settled as I hope to be, will write a 'dramatick piece on the subject. I have 'at times had it in my head; and you 'will be too ready, perhaps, to allow 'me to be qualified for it.'

'You so lately, Sir, stumbled at a 'word, with which you must be better 'acquainted, ere you can be thoroughly 'master of such a subject, that I am a-'mazed you should know any-thing of 'the Scripture, and be so ignorant of 'that.'

'O, Madam, I have read the Bible, 'as a fine piece of ancient history—But 'as I hope to be saved, it has for some 'few years past made me so uneasy, when 'I have popped upon some passages in 'it, that I have been forced to run to 'musick or company to divert myself.'

'Poor wretch!' lifting up my hands and eyes.

'The denunciations come so flapdash 'upon one, so unceremoniously, as I 'may say, without even the By-your-'leave of a rude London chairman, that 'they overturn one, horse and man, as 'St. Paul was overturned. There's 'another Scripture allusion, Madam!' The light in short, as his was, is too glaring to be borne.

'O, Sir, do you want to be complimented 'into repentance and salvation? But pray, 'Mr. Lovelace, do you mean any-thing 'at all, when you swear so often as you 'do, By your soul, or bind an asseveration with the words, As you hope to be 'saved?'

'O my beloved creature,' shifting his seat, 'let us call another cause.'

'Why, Sir, don't I neither use cere-'mony enough with you?'

'Dearest Madam, forbear for the 'present: I am but in my noviciate. 'Your foundation must be laid brick by 'brick: you'll hinder the progress of 'the good work you would promote, if 'you tumble in a whole waggon-load at 'once upon me.'

'Lord bless me,' thought I, 'what a 'character is that of a libertine! What 'a creature am I, who have risqued 'what I have risqued with such a one! '—What a task before me, if my hopes 'continue of reforming such a wild In-'dian as this!—Nay worse than a wild 'Indian; for a man who errs with his 'eyes open, and against conviction, is a 'thousand times worse for what he 'knows, and much harder to be reclaim-'ed, than if he had never known any-'thing at all.'

I was equally shocked at him, and concerned for him; and, having laid so few bricks, (to speak to his allusion) and those so ill cemented, I was as willing as the gay inconsiderate, to call another cause, as he termed it—Another cause, too, more immediately pressing upon me, from my uncertain situation.

I said, I took it for granted, that he assented to the reasoning he seemed to approve, and would leave me. And then I asked him, what he really, and in his most deliberate mind, would advise me to, in my present situation? He must needs see, I said, that I was at a great loss what to resolve upon; entirely a stranger to London, having no ad-

viſer, no protector, at preſent: himſelf, he muſt give me leave to tell him, greatly deficient in practice, if not in the knowledge, of thoſe decorums, which, I had ſuppoſed, were always to be found in a man of birth, fortune, and education.

He imagines himſelf, I find, to be a very polite man, and cannot bear to be thought otherwiſe. He put up his lip —'I am ſorry for it, Madam—A man 'of breeding, a man of politeneſs, give 'me leave to ſay,' [colouring] 'is much 'more of a black ſwan with you, than 'with any lady I ever met with.'

'Then that is your misfortune, Mr. 'Lovelace, as well as mine, at preſent. 'Every woman of diſcernment, I am 'confident, knowing what I know of 'you now, would ſay as I ſay;' [I had a mind to mortify a pride, that I am ſure deſerves to be mortified] 'that your politeneſs is not regular, nor conſtant. It 'is not habit. It is too much ſeen by fits 'and ſtarts, and fallies, and thoſe not 'ſpontaneous. You muſt be reminded 'into them.'

'O Lord! O Lord!—Poor I!'—was the light, yet the half-angry wretch's ſelf-pitying expreſſion!

I proceeded.—'Upon my word, Sir, you 'are not the accompliſhed man, which 'your talents and opportunities would 'have led one to expect you to be. You 'are indeed in your noviciate, as to every 'laudable attainment.'

LETTER XXVIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

IN CONTINUATION.

AS this ſubject was introduced by himſelf, and treated ſo lightly by him, I was going on to tell him more of my mind; but he interrupted me—'Dear, dear Madam, ſpare me. I am 'ſorry that I have lived to this hour for 'nothing at all. But ſurely you could 'not have quitted a ſubject ſo much 'more agreeable, and ſo much more 'ſuitable, I will ſay, to your preſent ſituation, if you had not too cruel a pleaſure in mortifying a man, who the leſs 'needed to be mortified, as he before 'looked up to you with a diffidence in 'his own merits too great to permit him 'to ſpeak half his mind to you. Be 'pleaſed but to return to the ſubject 'we were upon; and at another time I 'will gladly embrace correction from 'the only lips in the world ſo qualified to 'give it.'

'You talk of reformation ſometimes, 'Mr. Lovelace; and in ſo talking, ac'knowledge errors. But I ſee you can 'very ill bear the reproof, for which 'perhaps you are not ſolicitous to avoid 'giving occaſion. Far be it from me to 'take delight in finding fault: I ſhould 'be glad for both our ſakes, ſince my 'ſituation is what it is, that I could do 'nothing but praiſe you. But failures 'which affect a mind that need not to be 'very delicate to be affected by them, 'are too grating to be paſſed over in ſi'lence by a perſon who wiſhes to be 'thought in earneſt in her own duties.'

'I admire your delicacy, Madam,' again interrupted he. 'Although I 'ſuffer by it, yet would I not have it 'otherwiſe: indeed I would not, when 'I conſider of it. It is an angelick deli'cacy, which ſets you above all our ſex, 'and even above your own. It is natu'ral to you, Madam; ſo you may think 'it extraordinary: but there is nothing 'like it on earth,' ſaid the flatterer.—What company has he kept! 'But let us 'return to the former ſubject—You were 'ſo good as to aſk me, what I would ad'viſe you to do: I want but to make 'you eaſy; I want but to ſee you fixed 'to your liking. Your faithful Hannah 'with you; your reconciliation with 'thoſe to whom you wiſh to be recon'ciled, ſet on foot and in a train. And 'now let me mention to you different 'expedients; in hopes that ſome of them 'may be acceptable to you.

'I will go to Mrs. Howe, or to Miſs 'Howe, or to whomſoever you would 'have me to go, and endeavour to pre'vail upon them to receive you.

'Do you incline to go to Florence to 'your couſin Morden? I will furniſh 'you with an opportunity of going 'thither, either by ſea to Leghorn, or 'by land through France. Perhaps I 'may be able to procure one of the la'dies of my family to attend you. Ei'ther Charlotte or Patty would rejoice 'in ſuch an opportunity of ſeeing France 'and Italy. As for myſelf, I will only 'be your eſcort, in diſguiſe, if you will 'have it ſo, even in your livery, that 'your punctilio may not receive offence 'by my attendance.'

I told him, I would conſider of all he had ſaid: but that I hoped for a line or two from my aunt Hervey, if not from my ſiſter, to both of whom I had written; which, if I were to be ſo favoured, might help to determine me. Mean time if he would withdraw, I would particularly conſider of this propoſal of his, in relation to my couſin Morden. And if it held it's weight with me, ſo far as to write for your opinion upon it, he ſhould know my mind in an hour's time.

He withdrew with great reſpect: and in an hour's time returned. And then I told him it was unneceſſary to trouble you for your opinion about it. My couſin Morden was ſoon expected. If he were not, I could not admit him to accompany me to him upon any condition. It was highly improbable that I ſhould obtain the favour of either of his couſins company: and if that could be brought about, it would be the ſame thing in the world's eye, as if he went himſelf.

This led us into another converſation; which ſhall be the ſubject of my next.

LETTER XXIX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

IN CONTINUATION.

MR. Lovelace told me, that on the ſuppoſition that his propoſal in relation to my couſin Morden might not be accepted, he had been ſtudying to find out, if poſſible, ſome other expedient that might be agreeable, in order to convince me, that he preferred my ſatisfaction to his own.

He then offered to go himſelf, and procure my Hannah to come and attend me. As I had declined the ſervice of either of the young Mrs. Sorlings's, he was extremely ſolicitous, he ſaid, that I ſhould have a ſervant, in whoſe integrity I might confide.

I told him that you would be ſo kind, as to ſend to engage Hannah, if poſſible.

If any thing, he ſaid, ſhould prevent Hannah from coming, ſuppoſe he himſelf waited upon Miſs Howe, to deſire her to lend me her ſervant till I was provided to my mind?

I ſaid, your mother's high diſpleaſure at the ſtep I had taken (as ſhe ſuppoſed, voluntarily) had deprived me of an open aſſiſtance of that ſort from you.

He was amazed, ſo much as Mrs. Howe herſelf uſed to admire me, and ſo great an influence as Miſs Howe was ſuppoſed, and deſerved to have over her mother, that Mrs. Howe ſhould take upon herſelf to be ſo much offended with me. He wiſhed that the man who took ſuch pains to keep up and inflame the paſſions of my father and uncles, were not at the bottom of this miſchief too.

I was afraid, I ſaid, that my brother was: or elſe my uncle Antony, I dared to ſay, would not have taken ſuch pains to ſet Mrs. Howe againſt me, as I underſtood he had done.

Since I had declined viſiting Lady Sarah, and Lady Betty, he aſked me, if I would admit of a viſit from his couſin Montague, and accept of a ſervant of hers for the preſent?

That was not, I ſaid, an acceptable propoſal; but I would firſt ſee, if my friends would ſend me my cloaths, that I might not make ſuch a giddy and runaway appearance to any of his relations.

If I pleaſed, he would take another journey to Windſor, to make more particular enquiry amongſt the canons, or in any worthy family.

Were not his objections as to the publickneſs of the place, I aſked him, as ſtrong now as before?

I remember, my dear, in one of your former letters, you mentioned London as the moſt private place to be in: and I ſaid, that ſince he made ſuch pretences againſt leaving me here, as ſhewed he had no intention to do ſo; and ſince he engaged to go from me, and leave me to purſue my own meaſures, if I were elſewhere; and ſince his preſence made theſe lodgings inconvenient to me; I ſhould not be diſinclined to go to London, did I know any body there.

As he had ſeveral times propoſed London to me, I expected that he would eagerly have embraced that motion from me. But he took not ready hold of it: yet I thought his eye approved of it.

We are both great watchers of each other's eyes! and indeed ſeem to be more than half-afraid of each other.

He then made a grateful propoſal to me; that I would ſend for my Norton to attend me.

He ſaw by my eyes, he ſaid, that he had at laſt been happy in an expedient, which would anſwer the wiſhes of us both. 'Why,' ſaid he, 'did not I 'think of it before?'—And ſnatching my hand, 'Shall I write, Madam? Shall 'I ſend? Shall I go and fetch the wor-'thy woman myſelf?'

After a little conſideration, I told him, that this was indeed a grateful motion: but that I apprehended it would put her to a difficulty, which ſhe would not be able to get over; as it would make a woman of her known prudence appear to countenance a fugitive daughter, in oppoſition to her parents; and as her coming to me would deprive her of my mother's favour, without it's being in my power to make it up to her.

'O my beloved creature!' ſaid he, generouſly enough, 'let not this be an ob-'ſtacle. I will do every thing for Mrs. 'Norton you wiſh to have done.—Let 'me go for her.'

More coolly than perhaps his generofity deſerved, I told him it was impoſſible but I muſt ſoon hear from my friends. I ſhould not, mean time, embroil any-body with them. Not Mrs. Norton eſpecially, from whoſe intereſt in, and mediation with, my mother, I might expect ſome good, were ſhe to keep herſelf in a neutral ſtate: that, beſides, the good woman had a mind above her fortune; and would ſooner want than be beholden to any-body improperly.

'Improperly!' ſaid he.—'Have not 'perſons of merit a right to all the be'neſits conferred upon them?—Mrs. 'Norton is ſo good a woman, that I 'ſhall think ſhe lays me under an obli'gation, if ſhe will put it in my power 'to ſerve her; although ſhe were not to 'augment it, by giving me the oppor'tunity, at the ſame time, of contribut'ing to your pleaſure and ſatisfaction.

How could this man, with ſuch powers of right thinking, be ſo far depraved by evil habits, as to diſgrace his talents by wrong acting?

'Is there not room, after all,' thought I, at the time, 'to hope, (as he ſo lately 'led me to hope) that the example it 'will behove me, for both our ſakes, to 'endeavour to ſet him, may influence 'him to a change of manners, in which 'both may find our account?

'Give me leave, Sir,' ſaid I, 'to tell 'you, there is a ſtrange mixture in your 'mind. You muſt have taken pains to 'ſuppreſs many good motions and re'flections, as they aroſe, or levity muſt 'have been ſurprizingly predominant 'in it.—But as to the ſubject we were 'upon, there is no taking any reſoluti'ons till I hear from my friends.'

'Well, Madam, I can only ſay, I 'would find out ſome expedient, if I 'could, that ſhould be agreeable to you. 'But ſince I cannot, will you be ſo good 'as to tell me what you would wiſh to 'have done? Nothing in the world but 'I will comply with, excepting leaving 'you here, at ſuch a diſtance from the 'place I ſhall be in, if any thing ſhould 'happen; and in a place where my goſ'ſiping raſcals have made me in a man'ner publick, for want of proper cau'tions at firſt.

'Theſe vermin,' added he, 'have a 'pride they can hardly rein-in, when 'they ſerve a man of family. They 'boaſt of their maſter's pedigree and 'deſcent, as if they were related to him. 'Nor is any-thing they know of him, or 'of his affairs, a ſecret to one another, 'were it a matter that would hang 'him.'

'If ſo,' thought I, 'men of family 'ſhould take care to give them ſubjects 'worth boaſting of.'

'I am quite at a loſs,' ſaid I, 'what 'to do or whither to go. Would you, 'Mr. Lovelace, in earneſt, adviſe me to 'think of going to London?'

And I looked at him with ſtedfaſtneſs. But nothing could I gather from his looks.

'At firſt, Madam,' ſaid he, 'I was 'for propoſing London, as I was then 'more apprehenſive of purſuit. But as 'your relations ſeem cooler on that 'head, I am the more indifferent about 'the place you go to.—So as you are 'pleaſed, ſo as you are eaſy, I ſhall be 'happy.'

This indifference of his to London, I cannot but ſay, made me incline the more to go thither. I aſked him (to hear what he would ſay) if he could recommend me to any particular place in London?

No, he ſaid: none that was fit for me, or that I ſhould like. His friend Belford, indeed, had very handſome lodgings near Soho Square, at a relation's, whoſe wife was a woman of virtue and honour. Theſe, as Mr. Belford was generally in the country, he could borrow till I were better accommodated.

I was reſolved to refuſe theſe at the firſt mention, as I ſhould any other he had named. 'Nevertheleſs, I will ſee,' thought I, 'if he has really thoughts of 'theſe for me. If I break off the talk 'here, and he reſume his propoſal with 'earneſtneſs in the morning, I ſhall ap'prehend, that he is leſs indifferent 'than he ſeems to be, about my going 'to London; and that he has already a 'lodging in his eye for me.—And then 'I will not go at all.'

But after ſuch generous motions from him, I really think it a little barbarous to act and behave as if I thought him capable of the blackeſt and moſt ungrateful baſeneſs. But his character, his principles, are ſo faulty!—He is ſo light, ſo vain, ſo various, that there is no certainty that he will be next hour what he is this. Then, my dear, I have no guardian now; no father, no mother! Only God and my vigilance to depend upon. And I have no reaſon to expect a miracle in my favour.

'Well, Sir,' ſaid I, [riſing to leave him] 'ſomething muſt be reſolved upon: 'but I will poſtpone this ſubject till to'morrow morning.'

He would fain have engaged me longer; but I ſaid I would ſee him as early as he pleaſed in the morning. He might think of any convenient place in London, or near it, mean time.

And so I retired from him. As I do from my pen; hoping for better rest for the few hours that remain of this night, than I have had of a long time.

CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XXX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

IN CONTINUATION.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 17.

LATE as I went to bed, I have had very little rest. Sleep and I have quarrelled; and although I court it, it will not be friends. I hope it's fellow-irreconcileables at Harlowe Place enjoy it's balmy comforts. Else, that will be an aggravation of my fault. My brother and sister, I dare say, want it not.

Mr. Lovelace, who is an early riser, as well as I, joined me in the garden about six; and, after the usual salutations, asked me to resume our last night's subject. It was upon lodgings at London, he said.

'I think you mentioned one to me, 'Sir—Did you not?'

'Yes, Madam, but' [watching the turn of my countenance] 'rather as 'what you would be welcome to, than 'perhaps approve of.'

'I believe so too. To go to town 'upon an uncertainty, I own, is not 'agreeable: but to be obliged to any 'persons of your acquaintance, when I 'want to be thought independent of 'you; and to a person especially, to 'whom my friends are to direct to me, 'if they vouchsafe to take notice of me 'at all; is an absurd thing to mention.'

He did not mention it as what he imagined I would accept, but only to confirm to me what he had said, that he himself knew of none fit for me.

'Has not your family, Madam, some 'one tradesman they deal with, who 'has conveniences of this kind? I would 'make it worth such a person's while, to 'keep the secret of your being at his 'house. Traders are dealers in pins,' said he; 'and will be more obliged by 'a penny customer, than by a pound 'present, because it is in their way:—yet 'will refuse neither, any more than a 'lawyer or a man of office his fee.'

My father's tradesmen, I said, would no doubt be the first employed to find me out. So that that proposal was as wrong as the other. And who is it that a creature so lately in favour with all her friends can apply to, in such a situation as mine, but must be (at least) equally the friends of her relations?

We had a good deal of discourse upon the same topick. But, at last, the result was this—He wrote a letter to one Mr. Doleman, a married man of fortune and character, (I excepting to Mr. Belford) desiring him to provide decent apartments ready-furnished [I had told him what they should be] for a single woman; consisting of a bed-chamber; another for a maid-servant; with the use of a dining-room or parlour. This letter he gave me to peruse; and then sealed it up, and dispatched it away in my presence, by one of his own servants, who having business in town, is to bring back an answer.

I attended the issue of it; holding myself in readiness to set out for London, unless you, my dear, advise the contrary.

LETTER XXXI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

SAT. SUNDAY, MONDAY.

HE gives, in several letters, the substance of what is contained in the last seven of the lady's.

He tells his friend, that calling at the Lawn, in his way to M. Hall. (for he owns that he went not to Windsor) he found the letters from Lady Betty Lawrance, and his cousin Montague, which Mrs. Greme was about sending to him by a special messenger.

He gives the particulars from Mrs. Greme's report of what passed between the lady and her, and makes such declarations to Mrs. Greme of his honour and affection to the lady, as put her upon writing the letter to her sister Sorlings.

He then accounts, as follows, for the serious humour he found her in on his return—

UPON such good terms when we parted, I was surprized to find so solemn a brow upon my return, and her charming eyes red with weeping. But when I had understood she had received letters from Miss Howe, it was natural to imagine, that that little devil had put her out of humour with me.

It is easy for me to perceive, that my charmer is more sullen when she receives, and has perused, a letter from that vixen, than at other times. But as the sweet maid shews, even then, more of passive grief, than of active spirit, I hope she is rather lamenting than plotting. And indeed for what now ſhould ſhe plot? when I am become a reformed man, and am hourly improving in my morals?—Nevertheleſs I muſt contrive ſome way or other to get at their correſpondence—Only to ſee the turn of it; that's all.

But no attempt of this kind muſt be made yet. A detected invaſion in an article ſo ſacred, would ruin me beyond retrieve. Nevertheleſs it vexes me to the heart to think that ſhe is hourly writing her whole mind on all that paſſes between her and me, I under the ſame roof with her, yet kept at ſuch awful diſtance, that I dare not break into a correſpondence, that may perhaps be a means to defeat all my devices.

Would it be very wicked, Jack, to knock her meſſenger o' the head, as he is carrying my beloved's letters, or returning with Miſs Howe's?—To attempt to bribe him, and not ſucceed, would utterly ruin me. And the man ſeems to be one uſed to poverty, one who can ſit down ſatisfied with it, and enjoy it; contented with hand-to-mouth conveniences, and not aiming to live better to-morrow, than he does to-day, and than he did yeſterday. Such a one is above temptation, unleſs it could come cloathed in the guiſe of truth and truſt. What likelihood of corrupting a man who has no hope, no ambition?

Yet the raſcal has but half life, and groans under that. Should I be anſwerable in this caſe for a whole life?—But hang the fellow! Let him live. Were I a king, or a miniſter of ſtate, an Antonio Perez, it were another thing. And yet, on ſecond thoughts, am I not a rake, as it is called? And who ever knew a rake ſtick at any-thing? But thou knoweſt, Jack, that the greateſt half of my wickedneſs is vapour, to ſhew my invention; and to prove that I could be miſchievous if I would.

When he comes to that part, where the lady ſays, in a ſarcaſtick way, waving her hand, and bowing, 'Excuſe me, good 'Mr. Lovelace, that I am willing to 'think the beſt of my father,' he gives a deſcription of her air and manner, greatly to her advantage; and ſays—

I could hardly forbear taking her into my arms upon it, in ſpite of an expected tempeſt. So much wit, ſo much beauty, ſuch a lively manner, and ſuch exceeding quickneſs and penetration! O Belford! ſhe muſt be nobody's but mine. I can now account for, and juſtify, Herod's command to deſtroy his Mariamne, if he returned not alive from his interview with Cæſar: for were I to know, that it were but probable, that any other man were to have this charming creature, even after my death, the very thought would be enough to provoke me to cut that man's throat, were he a prince.

I may be deemed by this lady a rapid, a boiſterous lover—and ſhe may like me the leſs for it: but all the ladies I have met till now, loved to raiſe a tempeſt, and to enjoy it: nor did they ever raiſe it, but I enjoyed it too!—Lord ſend us once happily to London!

Mr. Lovelace gives the following account of his rude rapture, when he ſeized her hand, and put her, by his WILD manner, as ſhe expreſſes it, in ſuch terror.

Darkneſs and light, I ſwore, were convertible at her pleaſure: ſhe could make any ſubject plauſible. I was all error: ſhe all perfection. And I ſnatched her hand; and more than kiſſed it, I was ready to devour it. There was, I believe, a kind of phrenzy in my manner, which threw her into a panick, like that of Semele perhaps, when the thunderer, in all his majeſty, ſurrounded with ten thouſand celeſtial burning-glaſſes, was about to ſcorch her into a cinder.

HAD not my heart miſgiven me, and had I not juſt in time, recollected that ſhe was not ſo much in my power, but that ſhe might abandon me at her pleaſure, having more friends in that houſe than I had, I ſhould at that moment have made offers, that would have decided all, one way or other.—But, apprehending that I have ſhewn too much meaning in my paſſion, I gave it another turn.—But little did the charmer think what an eſcape either ſhe or I had (as the event might have proved) from the ſudden guſt of paſſion, which had like to have blown me into her arms. She was born, I told her, to make me happy and to ſave a ſoul*

He gives the reſt of his vehement ſpeech pretty nearly in the ſame words as the lady gives them. And then proceeds—

I ſaw ſhe was frighted: and ſhe would have had reaſon, had the ſcene been London: and that place in London, which I have in view to carry her to. She confirmed me in my apprehenſion that I had alarmed her too much: ſhe told me, that ſhe ſaw what my boaſted regard to her injunctions was; and ſhe would take proper meaſures upon it, as I ſhould find: that ſhe was ſhocked at my violent airs; and if I hoped any favour from her, I muſt that inſtant withdraw, and leave her to her recollection.

She pronounced this in ſuch a manner, as ſhewed ſhe was ſet upon it; and, having ſtept out of the gentle, the polite part I had ſo newly engaged to act, I thought ready obedience was the beſt atonement. And indeed I was ſenſible, from her anger and repulſes, that I wanted time myſelf for recollection. And ſo I withdrew, with the ſame veneration as a petitioning ſubject would withdraw from the preſence of his ſovereign. But, oh! Belford, had ſhe had but the leaſt patience with me—Had ſhe but made me think, that ſhe would forgive this initiatory ardour—Surely ſhe will not be always thus guarded.

I had not been a moment by myſelf, but I was ſenſible, that I had half-forfeited my newly-aſſumed character. It is exceedingly difficult, thou ſeeſt, for an honeſt man to act in diſguiſes: as the poet ſays, Thruſt nature back with a pitch-fork, it will return. I recollected, that what ſhe had inſiſted upon, was really a part of that declared will, before ſhe left her father's houſe, to which in another caſe (to humble her) I had pretended to have an inviolable regard. And when I had remembered her words of taking her meaſures accordingly, I was reſolved to ſacrifice a leg or an arm to make all up again, before ſhe had time to determine upon any new meaſures.

How ſeaſonably to this purpoſe have come in my aunt's and couſin's letters!

I HAVE ſent in again and again to implore her to admit me to her preſence. But ſhe will conclude a letter ſhe is writing to Miſs Howe, before ſhe will ſee me.—I ſuppoſe to give an account of what has juſt paſſed.

CURSE upon her perverſe tyranny! How ſhe makes me wait for an humble audience, though ſhe has done writing ſome time! A prince begging for her upon his knees ſhould not prevail upon me to ſpare her if I can but get her to London—Oons! Jack, I believe I have bit my lip through for vexation!—But one day hers ſhall ſmart for it.

Mr. Lovelace beginning a new date, gives an account of his admittance, and of the converſation that followed; which differing only in ſtyle from that the lady gives in the next letter, is omitted.

He collects the lady's expreſſions, which his pride cannot bear: ſuch as, that he is a ſtranger to the decorums which ſhe thought inſeparable from a man of birth and education; and that he is not the accompliſhed man he imagines himſelf to be; and threatens to remember them againſt her.

He values himſelf upon his propoſals and ſpeeches, which he gives to his friend pretty much to the ſame purpoſe that the lady does in her four laſt letters.

After mentioning his propoſal to her that ſhe would borrow a ſervant from Miſs Howe, till Hannah could come, he writes as follows—

Thou ſeeſt, Belford, that my charmer has no notion, that Miſs Howe herſelf is but a puppet danced upon my wires at ſecond or third hand. To outwit, and impel, as I pleaſe, two ſuch girls as theſe, who think they know every thing; and, by taking advantage of the pride and ill-nature of the old ones of both families, to play them off likewiſe at the very time they think they are doing me ſpiteful diſpleaſure; what charming revenge! Then the ſweet creature, when I wiſhed that her brother was not at the bottom of Mrs. Howe's reſentment, to tell me, that ſhe was afraid he was, or her uncle would not have appeared againſt her to that lady!—Pretty dear! how innocent!

But don't think me the cauſe neither of her family's malice and reſentment. It is in all their hearts. I work but with their materials. They, if left to their own wicked direction, would perhaps expreſs their revenge by fire and faggot; that is to ſay, by the private dagger, or by lord chief juſtices warrants, by law, and ſo forth: I only point the lightning, and teach it where to dart, without the thunder. In other words, I only guide the effects: the cauſe is in their malignant hearts: and while I am doing a little miſchief, I prevent a great deal.

Thus he exults on her mentioning London—

I wanted her to propoſe London herſelf. This made me again mention Windſor. If you would have a woman do one thing, you muſt always propoſe another, and that the very contrary. The ſex! the very ſex! as I hope to be ſaved!—Why, Jack, they lay a man under a neceſſity to deal doubly with them! And, when they find themſelves outwitted, they cry out upon an honeſt fellow, who has been too hard for them at their own weapons.

I could hardly contain myſelf. My heart was at my throat.—'Down, down,' ſaid I to myſelf, 'exuberant exultation!' A ſudden cough befriended me; I again turned to her, all as indifferenced ever as a girl at the firſt long-expected queſtion, who waits for two more. I heard out the reſt of her ſpeech: and when ſhe had done, inſtead of ſaying any-thing to her of London, I adviſed her to ſend for her Mrs. Norton.

As I knew ſhe would be afraid of lying under obligation, I could have propoſed to do ſo much for the good woman and her ſon, as would have made her reſolve, that I ſhould do nothing: this, however, not merely to avoid expence. But there was no ſuch thing as allowing of the preſence of Mrs. Norton. I might as well have had her mother or her aunt Hervey with her. Hannah, had ſhe been able to come, and had ſhe actually come, I could have done well enough with. What do I keep fellows idling in the country for, but to fall in love, and even to marry thoſe whom I would have them to marry? Nor, upon ſecond thoughts, would the preſence of her Norton, or of her aunt, or even of her mother, have ſaved the dear creature, had I decreed her fall.

How unequal is a modeſt woman to the adventure, when ſhe throws herſelf into the power of a rake!—Punctilio will, at any time, ſtand for reaſon with ſuch an one. She cannot break through a well-teſted modeſty. None but the impudent little rogues, who can name the parſon and the church before you think of either, and undreſs and go to bed before you the next hour, ſhould think of running away with a man.

I AM in the right train now. Every hour, I doubt not, will give me an increaſing intereſt in the affections of this proud beauty. I have juſt carried unpolitenеſs far enough to make her afraid of me; and to ſhew her that I am no whiner. Every inſtance of politeneſs, now, will give me double credit with her. My next point will be to make her acknowledge a lambent flame, a preference of me to all other men, at leaſt: and then my happy hour is not far off. An acknowledged reciprocality in love ſanctifies every little freedom: and little freedoms beget greater. And if ſhe call me ungenerous, I can call her cruel. The ſex love to be called cruel. Many a time have I complained of cruelty, even in the act of yielding, becauſe I knew it gratified the fair one's pride.

Mentioning that he had only hinted at Mr. Belford's lodgings as an inſtance to confirm what he had told her, that he knew of none in London fit for her, he ſays—

I had a mind to alarm her with ſomething fartheſt from my purpoſe; for (as much as ſhe diſliked my motion) I intend nothing by it: Mrs. Oſgood is too pious a woman: and would have been more her friend than mine.

I had a view, moreover, to give her an high opinion of her own ſagacity. I love, when I dig a pit, to have my prey tumble in with ſecure feet, and open eyes: then a man can look down upon her, with an 'O-ho, charmer, how 'came you there?

MONDAY, APRIL 17.

I HAVE juſt now received a freſh piece of intelligence from my agent, honeſt Joſeph Leman. Thou knoweſt the hiſtory of poor Miſs Betterton of Nottingham. James Harlowe is plotting to revive the reſentments of her family againſt me. The Harlowes took great pains, ſome time ago, to endeavour to get to the bottom of that ſtory. But now the fooliſh devils are reſolved to do ſomething in it, if they can. My head is working to make this booby 'ſquire a plotter and a clever fellow, in order to turn his plots to my advantage, ſuppoſing his ſiſter ſhall aim to keep me at arms-length when in town, and to ſend me from her. But I will, in proper time, let thee ſee Joſeph's letter, and what I ſhall anſwer to it. To know in time a deſigned miſchief, is, with me, to diſappoint it, and to turn it upon the contriver's head.

Joſeph is plaguy ſqueamiſh again; but I know he only intends by his qualms to ſwell his merits with me. O Belford, Belford! what a vile corruptible rogue, whether in poor or rich, is human nature!

LETTER XXXII.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

[IN ANSWER TO LETTERS XXIV.—XXX. INCLUSIVE.]

TUESDAY, APRIL 18.

YOU have a moſt implacable family. Another viſit from your uncle Antony has not only confirmed my mother an enemy to our correſpondence, but has almoſt put her upon treading in their ſteps.

But to other ſubjects:

You plead generouſly for Mr. Hickman. Perhaps, with regard to him, I may have done, as I have often done in ſinging ſinging—Begun a note or key too high; and yet, rather than begin again, proceed, though I ſtrain my voice, or ſpoil my tune. But this is evident, the man is the more obſervant of it; and you have taught me, that the ſpirit which is the humbler for ill uſage, will be inſolent upon better. So, good and grave Mr. Hickman, keep your diſtance a little longer, I beſeech you. You have erected an altar to me; and I hope you will not refuſe to bow to it.

But you aſk me, If I would treat Mr. Lovelace, were he to be in Mr. Hickman's place, as I do Mr. Hickman? Why really, my dear, I believe I ſhould not.—I have been very ſagely conſidering this point of behaviour (in general) on both ſides in courtſhips and I will very candidly tell you the reſult. I have concluded that politeneſs, even to exceſs, is neceſſary on the men's part, to bring us to liſten to their firſt addreſſes, in order to induce us to bow our necks to a yoke ſo unequal. But, upon my conſcience, I very much doubt whether a little intermingled inſolence is not requiſite from them, to keep up that intereſt, when once it has got footing. Men muſt not let us ſee, that we can make fools of them. And I think, that ſmooth love; that is to ſay, a paſſion without rubs; in other words, a paſſion without paſſion; is like a ſleepy ſtream that is hardly ſeen to give motion to a ſtraw. So that, ſometimes to make us fear, and even, for a ſhort ſpace, to hate the wretch, is productive of the contrary extreme.

If this be ſo, Lovelace, than whom no man was ever more polite and obſequious at the beginning, has hit the very point. For his turbulence ſince, his readineſs to humble himſelf, (as he is known to be a man of ſenſe, and of courage too) muſt keep a woman's paſſion alive; and at laſt, tire her into a non-reſiſtance that ſhall make her as paſſive as a tyrant-huſband would wiſh her to be.

I verily think that the different behaviour of our two heroes to their heroines makes out this doctrine to demonſtration. I am ſo much accuſtomed, for my own part, to Hickman's whining, creeping, ſubmiſſive courtſhip, that I now expect nothing but whine and cringe from him; and am ſo little moved with his nonſenſe, that I am frequently forced to go to my harpſichord, to keep me awake, and to ſilence his humdrum. Whereas Lovelace keeps up the ball with a witneſs, and all his addreſs and converſation is one continual game at raquet.

Your frequent quarrels and reconciliations verify this obſervation: and I really believe, that, could Hickman have kept my attention alive after the Lovelace manner, only that he had preſerved his morals, I ſhould have married the man by this time. But then he muſt have ſet out accordingly. For now he can never, never recover himſelf, that's certain; but muſt be a dangler to the end of the courtſhip-chapter; and, what is ſtill worſe for him, a paſſive to the end of his life.

'Poor Hickman!' perhaps you'll ſay. I have been called your echo—'Poor 'Hickman,' ſay I.

You wonder, my dear, that Mr. Lovelace took not notice to you over-night of the letters of Lady Betty, and his couſin. I don't like his keeping ſuch a material and relative circumſtance, as I may call it, one moment from you. By his communicating the contents of them to you next day, when you was angry with him, it looks as if he withheld them for occaſional pacifiers; and if ſo, muſt not he have a forethought that he might give you cauſe for anger? Of all the circumſtances that have happened ſince you have been with him, I think I like this the leaſt. This alone, my dear, ſmall as it may look to an indifferent eye, in mine warrants all your caution. Yet I think, that Mrs. Greme's letters to her ſiſter Sorlings; his repeated motions for Hannah's attendance; and for that of one of the widow Sorlings's daughters; and, above all, for that of Mrs Norton; are agreeable counterbalances. Were it not for theſe circumſtances, I ſhould have ſaid a great deal more of the other. Yet what a fooliſh fellow, to let you know overnight that he had ſuch letters?—I can't tell what to make of him.

I am pleaſed with the contents of theſe ladies letters. And the more, as I have cauſed the family to be again founded, and find that they are all as deſirous as ever of your alliance.

They really are, (every one of them) your very great admirers. And, as for Lord M. he is ſo much pleaſed with you, and with the confidence, as he calls it, which you have repoſed in his nephew, that he vows he will diſinherit him, if he reward it not as he ought. You muſt take care, that you loſe not both families.

I hear Mrs Norton is enjoined, as ſhe values the favour of the other family,

ly, not to correſpond either with you or with me—Poor creatures!—But they are your—Yet they are not your relations neither, I believe. Had you had any other nurſe, I ſhould have concluded you had been changed. I ſuffer by their low malice—Excuſe me therefore.

You really hold this man to his good behaviour with more ſpirit than I thought you miſtreſs of; eſpecially when I judged of you by that meekneſs which you always contended for, as the proper diſtinction of the female character; and by the love which (think as you pleaſe) you certainly have for him. You may rather be proud of than angry at the imputation; ſince you are the only woman I ever knew, read, or heard of, whoſe love was ſo much governed by her prudence. But when once the indifference of the huſband takes place of the ardour of the lover, it will be your turn: and, if I am not miſtaken, this man, who is the only ſelf-admirer I ever knew who was not a coxcomb, will rather in his day expect homage than pay it.

Your handſome huſbands, my dear, make a wife's heart ache very often: and though you are as fine a perſon of a woman, at the leaſt, as he is of a man, he will take too much delight in himſelf to think himſelf more indebted to your favour, than you are to his diſtinction and preference of you. But no man, take your finer mind with your very fine perſon, can deſerve you. So you muſt be contented, ſhould your merit be under-rated; ſince that muſt be ſo, marry whom you will. Perhaps you will think I indulge theſe ſorts of reflections againſt your Narciſſuſes of men, to keep my mother's choice for me of Hickman in countenance with myſelf—I don't know but there is ſomething in it; at leaſt, enough to have given birth to the reflection.

I think there can be no objection to your going to London. There, as in the centre, you will be in the way of hearing from every-body, and ſending to any-body. And then you will put all his ſincerity to the teſt, as to his promiſed abſence, and ſuch-like.

But indeed, my dear, I think you have nothing for it but marriage. You may try (that you may ſay you have tried) what your relations can be brought to: but the moment they refuſe your propoſals, ſubmit to the yoke, and make the beſt of it. He will be a ſavage indeed, if he makes you ſpeak out. Yet, it is my opinion, that you muſt bend a little; for he cannot bear to be thought ſlightly of.

This was one of his ſpeeches once, I believe deſigned for me—'A woman 'who means one day to favour her lover 'with her hand, ſhould ſhew the world, 'for her own ſake, that ſhe diſtinguiſhes 'him from the common herd.'

Shall I give you another fine ſentence of his, and in the true libertine ſtile, as he ſpoke it, throwing out his challenging hand? — D—n him, if he would marry the firſt princeſs on earth, if he but thought ſhe balanced a minute in her choice of him, or of an emperor.

All the world, in ſhort, expect you to have this man. They think, that you left your father's houſe for this very purpoſe. The longer the ceremony is delayed, the worſe appearance it will have in the world's eye. And it will not be the fault of ſome of your relations, if a ſtur be not thrown upon your reputation, while you continue unmarried. Your uncle Antony, in particular, ſpeaks rough and vile things, grounded upon the morals of his brother Orſon. But hitherto your admirable character has antidoted the poiſon; the detector is deſpiſed, and every-one's indignation raiſed againſt him.

I have written through many interruptions: and you will ſee the firſt ſheet creaſed and rumpled, occaſioned by putting it into my boſom, on my mother's ſudden coming upon me. We have had one very pretty debate, I will aſſure you; but it is not worth while to trouble you with the particulars. — But upon my word—No matter though.

Your Hannah cannot attend you. The poor girl left her place about a fortnight ago, on account of a rheumatick diſorder, which has confined her to her room ever ſince. She burſt into tears, when Kitty carried to her your deſire of having her with you; and called herſelf doubly unhappy, that ſhe could not wait upon a miſtreſs whom ſhe ſo dearly loved.

Had my mother anſwered my wiſhes, I ſhould have been ſorry Mr. Lovelace had been the firſt propoſer of my Kitty for your attendant, till Hannah could come. To be altogether among ſtrangers, and a ſtranger to attend you every time you remove, is a very diſagreeable thing. But your conſiderateneſs and bounty will make you faithful ones wherever you go.

You muſt take your own way: but if you ſuffer any inconvenience, either as to cloaths or money, that it is in my power to remedy, I will never forgive you. My mother (if that be your objection) need not know any-thing of the matter.

We have all our defects: we have often regretted the particular fault, which though in venerable characters, we muſt have been blind not to ſee.

I remember what you once ſaid to me; and the caution was good: 'Let 'us, my Nancy,' were your words; 'let 'us, who have not the ſame failings as 'thoſe we cenſure, guard againſt other 'and greater in ourſelves.' Nevertheleſs I muſt needs tell you, that my mother has vexed me a little very lately, by ſome inſtances of her jealous narrowneſs. I will mention one of them, though I did not intend it.—She wanted to borrow thirty guineas of me: only while ſhe got a note changed. I ſaid, I could lend her but eight or ten. Eight or ten would not do: ſhe thought I was much richer. I could have told her, I was much cunninger than to let her know my ſtock; which, on a review, I find ninety-five guineas; and all of them moſt heartily at your ſervice.

I believe your uncle Tony put her upon this wiſe project; for ſhe was out of caſh in an hour after he left her. If he did, you will judge that they intend to diſtreſs you. If it will provoke you to demand your own in a legal way, I wiſh they would; ſince their putting you upon that courſe will juſtify the neceſſity of your leaving them. And as it is not for your credit to own, that you were tricked away contrary to your intention, this would afford a reaſon for your going off, that I ſhould make very good uſe of. You'll ſee, that I approve of Lovelace's advice upon this ſubject. I am not willing to allow the weight to your anſwer to him on that head, which perhaps ought to be allowed it.

You muſt be the leſs ſurprized at the inventions of this man, becauſe of his uncommon talents. Whatever he had turned his head to, he would have excelled in; or been (or done things) extraordinary. He is ſaid to be revengeful: a very bad quality! I believe, indeed, he is a devil in every-thing but his foot—This, therefore, is my repeated advice—Provoke him not too much againſt yourſelf: but unchain him, and let him looſe upon your ſiſter's vile Betty, and your brother's Joſeph Leman. This is reſenting low: but I know to whom I write, or elſe I would go a good deal higher, I'll aſſure you.

Your next, I ſuppoſe, will be from London. Pray direct it, and your future letters, till further notice, to Mr. Hickman, at his own houſe. He is entirely devoted to you. Don't take ſo heavily my mother's partiality and prejudices. I hope I am paſt a baby.

Heaven preſerve you, and make you as happy as I think you deſerve to be, prays your ever-affectionate

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XXXIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

WEDN. MORN. APRIL 19.

I Am glad, my dear friend, that you approve of my removal to London.

The diſagreement between your mother and you gives me inexpreſſible affliction. I hope I think you both more unhappy than you are. But I beſeech you let me know the particulars of the debate you call a very pretty one. I am well acquainted with your dialect. When I am informed of the whole, let your mother have been ever ſo ſevere upon me, I ſhall be eaſier a great deal.—Faulty people ſhould rather deplore the occaſion they have given for anger than reſent it.

If I am to be obliged to any-body in England for money, it ſhall be to you. Your mother need not know of your kindneſs to me, you ſay—But ſhe muſt know it, if it be done, and if ſhe challenge my beloved friend upon it; for would you either falſify or prevaricate?—I wiſh your mother could be made eaſy on this head.—Forgive me, my dear.—But I know—Yet once ſhe had a better opinion of me.—O my inconſiderate raſhneſs!—Excuſe me once more, I pray you.—Pride, when it is native, will ſhew itſelf ſometimes in the midſt of mortifications—But my ſtomach is down already.

I AM unhappy that I cannot have my worthy Hannah. I am ſorry for the poor creature's illneſs and for my own diſappointment by it. Come, my dear Miſs Howe, ſince you preſs me to be beholden to you; and would think me proud if I abſolutely refuſed your favour; pray be ſo good as to ſend her two guineas in my name.

If I have nothing for it, as you ſay, but matrimony, it yields a little comfort, that his relations do not deſpiſe the fugitive, as perſons of their rank and quality-pride might be ſuppoſed to do, for having been a fugitive.

But, O my cruel, thrice cruel uncle! to ſuppoſe—But my heart checks my pen, and will not let it proceed, on an intimation ſo extremely ſhocking as that which he ſuppoſes!—Yet, if thus they have have been perſuaded, no wonder if they are irreconcileable.

This is all my hard-hearted brother's doings!—His ſurmiſings—God forgive him—Prays his injured ſiſter!

LETTER XXXIV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

THURSDAY, APRIL 20.

MR. Lovelace's ſervant is already returned with an anſwer from his friend Mr. Doleman, who has taken pains in his enquiries, and is very particular. Mr. Lovelace brought me the letter as ſoon as he had read it: and as he now knows that I acquaint you with every-thing that offers, I deſired him to let me ſend it to you for your peruſal. Be pleaſed to return it by the firſt opportunity. You will ſee by it, that his friends in town have a notion, that we are actually married.

'TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

'TUESDAY NIGHT, APRIL 18.

'DEAR SIR,

'I AM extremely rejoiced to hear, 'that we ſhall ſo ſoon have you in town, 'after ſo long an abſence. You will be 'the more welcome ſtill, if what report 'ſays be true; which is, that you are actually married to the fair lady upon whom 'we have heard you make ſuch encomiums. Mrs. Doleman, and my ſiſter, 'both wiſh you joy if you are; and joy 'upon your near proſpect if you are not.

'I have been in town for this week 'paſt, to get help, if I could, from my 'paralytic complaints; and am in a 'courſe for them. Which, nevertheleſs, did not prevent me from making 'the deſired enquiries. This is the reſult.

'You may have a firſt floor, well furniſhed, at a mercer's in Bedford Street, 'Covent Garden, with conveniences for 'ſervants: and theſe either by the quarter or month. The terms according to 'the conveniences required.

'Mrs. Doleman has ſeen lodgings in 'Norfolk Street, and others in Cecil 'Street; but though the proſpects to 'the Thames and Surry Hills look inviting from both theſe ſtreets, yet I ſuppoſe they are too near the city.

'The owner of thoſe in Norfolk Street 'would have half the houſe go together. 'It would be too much for your deſcription therefore: and I ſuppoſe, that 'when you think fit to declare your marriage, you will hardly be in lodgings.

'Thoſe in Cecil Street are neat and 'convenient. The owner is a widow 'of good character; but ſhe inſiſts, that 'you take them for a twelvemonth 'certain.

'You may have good accommodations in Dover Street, at a widow's, the 'relict of an officer in the guards, who 'dying ſoon after he had purchaſed his 'commiſſion, (to which he had a good 'title by ſervice, and which coſt him 'moſt part of what he had) ſhe was obliged to lett lodgings.

'This may poſſibly be an objection. 'But ſhe is very careful, ſhe ſays, that 'ſhe takes no lodgers, but of figure and 'reputation. She rents two good houſes, 'diſtant from each other, only joined 'by a large handſome paſſage. The inner-houſe is the genteeleſt, and very elegantly furniſhed; but you may have 'the uſe of a very handſome parlour in 'the outer-houſe, if you chuſe to look 'into the ſtreet.

'A little garden belongs to the inner-houſe, in which the old gentlewoman 'has diſplayed a true female fancy; having crammed it with vaſes, flowerpots, 'and figures, without number.

'As theſe lodgings ſeemed to me the 'moſt likely to pleaſe you, I was more 'particular in my enquiries about them. 'The apartments ſhe has to lett are in 'the inner-houſe: they are a dining-room, two or three handſome bed-chambers; one with a pretty light cloſet 'in it, which looks into the little garden, 'all furniſhed in taſte.

'A dignified clergyman, his wife, and 'maiden-daughter, were the laſt who lived in them. They have but lately quitted them, on his being preſented to a 'conſiderable church preferment in Ireland. The gentlewoman ſays that he 'took the lodgings but for three months 'certain; but liked them and her uſage 'ſo well, that he continued in them two years; and left them with regret, 'though on ſo good an account. She 'bragged, that this was the way of all 'the lodgers ſhe ever had, who ſtaid with 'her four times as long as they at firſt intended.

'I had ſome knowledge of the colonel, 'who was always looked upon as a man 'of honour. His relict I never ſaw before. I think ſhe has a maſculine air, 'and is a little forbidding at firſt: but 'when I ſaw her behaviour to two agreeable maiden gentlewomen, her huſband's 'nieces, whom, for that reaſon, ſhe calls 'doubly hers, and heard their praiſes of 'her, I could impute her very bulk to 'good-humour; ſince we ſeldom ſee

'your four, peevish people, plump. She 'lives reputably, and is, as I find, afore- 'hand in the world.

'If these, or any other of the lodgings 'I have mentioned, be not altogether 'to your lady's mind, she may continue 'in them the less while, and chuse others for 'herself.

'The widow consents that you shall 'take them for a month only, and what of 'them you please. The terms, she says, 'she will not fall out upon, when she 'knows what your lady expects, and 'what her servants are to do, or yours will 'undertake; for she observed that ser-'vants are generally worse to deal with, 'than their masters or mistresses.

'The lady may board or not, as she 'pleases.

'As we suppose you married, but that 'you have reason, from family differ-'ences, to keep it private for the pre-'sent, I thought it not amiss to hint as 'much to the widow, (but as uncertainty, 'however;) and asked her, if she could, 'in that case, accommodate you and your 'servants, as well as the lady and hers? 'She said, she could; and wished by all 'means, it were to be so; since the cir-'cumstance of a person's being single, if 'not as well recommended as this lady, 'was one of her usual exceptions.

'If none of these lodgings please, you 'need not doubt very handsome ones in 'or near Hanover Square, Soho Square, 'Golden Square, or in some of the new 'streets about Grosvenor Square. And 'Mrs. Doleman, her sister, and myself, 'most cordially join to offer to your 'good lady the best accommodations we 'can make for her at Uxbridge, (and 'also for you, if you are the happy man 'we wish you to be) till she fits herself 'more to her mind.

'Let me add, that the lodgings at the 'mercer's, those in Cecil Street, those 'at the widow's in Dover Street, any 'of them, may be entered upon at a 'day's warning. I am, my dear Sir, 'your sincere and affectionate friend and 'servant, THO. DOLEMAN.'

You will easily guess, my dear, when you have read the letter, which lodgings I made choice of. But first to try him (as in so material a point I thought I could not be too circumspect) I seemed to prefer those in Norfolk Street, for the very reason the writer gives why he thought I would not; that is to say, for it's neighbourhood to a city so well gov-erned as London is said to be. Nor should I have disliked a lodging in the heart of it, having heard but indifferent accounts of the liberties sometimes taken at the other end of the town.—Then seeming to incline to the lodgings in Cecil Street—Then to the mercer's. But he made no visible preference: and when I asked his opinion of the widow-gentlewoman's, he said, He thought those the most to my taste and conveni-ence. But as he hoped that I would think lodgings necessary but for a very little while, he knew not which to give his vote for.

I then fixed upon the widow's; and he has written accordingly to Mr. Dole-man, making my compliments to his lady and sister, for their kind offer.

I am to have the dining-room, the bed-chamber with the light closet, (of which, if I stay any time at the widow's, I shall make great use) and a servant's room; and we propose to set out on Saturday morning. As for a maid-ser-vant, poor Hannah's illness is a great disappointment to me: but, as he ob-serves, I can make the widow satisfacti-on for one of hers, till I can get a ser-vant to my mind. And you know, I want not much attendance.

MR. Lovelace has just now, of his own accord, given me five guineas for poor Hannah. I send them inclosed. Be so good as to cause them to be conveyed to her: and to let her know from whom they came.

He has obliged me much by this little mark of his considerateness. Indeed I have had the better opinion of him ever since he proposed her return to me.

I HAVE just now another instance of his considerateness. He came to me, and said, that, on second thoughts, he could not bear that I should go up to town without some attendant, were it but for the look of the thing to the London widow and her nieces, who, according to his friend's account, lived so genteelly; and especially as I required him to leave me soon after I arrived there, and so would be left alone among strangers. He therefore thought, that I might en-gage Mrs. Sorlings to lend me one of her two maids, or let one of her daugh-ters go up with me, and stay till I were provided. And if the latter, the young gentlewoman, no doubt, would be glad of so good an opportunity to see the cu-riosities of the town, and would be a proper attendant on the same occasions.

I told him, as I had done before, that the two young gentlewomen were so equally uſeful in their way, and ſervants in a buſy farm were ſo little to be ſpared, that I ſhould be loth to take them off their laudable employments. Nor ſhould I think much of diverſions for one while; and ſo the leſs want an attendant out of doors.

And now, my dear, leſt any-thing ſhould happen, in ſo variable a ſituation as mine, to over-cloud my proſpects, (which at preſent are more promiſing than ever yet they have been ſince I quitted Harlowe Place) I will ſnatch the opportunity to ſubſcribe myſelf your not unhoping, and ever-obliged friend and ſervant,

CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XXXV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

THURSDAY, APRIL 20.

HE begins with communicating to him the letter he wrote to Mr. Doleman, to procure ſuitable lodgings in town, and which he ſent away by the lady's approbation: and then gives him a copy of the anſwer to it: upon which he thus expreſſes himſelf:

THOU knoweſt the widow; thou knoweſt her nieces; thou knoweſt the lodgings: and didſt thou ever read a letter more artfully couched, than this of Tom Doleman? Every poſſible objection anticipated! Every accident provided againſt! Every tittle of it plot-proof!

Who could forbear ſmiling, to ſee my charmer, like a farcical dean and chapter, chuſe what was before choſen for her; and ſagaciouſly (as they go in form to prayers, that Heaven would direct their choice) pondering upon the different propoſals, as if ſhe would make me believe, ſhe had a mind for ſome other? The dear fly rogue looking upon me, too, with a view to diſcover ſome emotion in me. Emotions I had; but I can tell her, that they lay deeper than her eye could reach, though it had been a ſun-beam.

No confidence in me, fair-one! None at all, 'tis plain. Thou wilt not, if I were inclined to change my views, encourage me by a generous reliance on my honour!—And ſhall it be ſaid, that I, a maſter of arts in love, ſhall be overmatched by ſo unpractiſed a novice?

But to ſee the charmer ſo far ſatisfied with my contrivance, as to borrow my friend's letter, in order to ſatisfy Miſs Howe likewiſe!

Silly little rogues! to walk out into by-paths on the ſtrength of their own judgment!—When nothing but experience can enable them to diſappoint us, and teach them grandmother-wiſdom! When they have it indeed, then may they ſit down, like ſo many Caſſandra's, and preach caution to others; who will as little mind them, as they did their inſtructreſſes, whenever a fine handſome confident young fellow, ſuch a one as thou knoweſt who, comes acroſs them.

But, Belford, didſt thou not mind that ſly rogue Doleman's naming Dover Street for the widow's place of abode?—What doſt think could be meant by that?—'Tis impoſſible thou ſhouldſt gueſs. So, not to puzzle thee about it, ſuppoſe the widow Sinclair's in Dover Street ſhould be enquired after by ſome officious perſon in order to come at characters; [Miſs Howe is as ſly as the devil, and as buſy to the full] and neither ſuch a name, nor ſuch a houſe, can be found in that ſtreet, nor a houſe to anſwer the deſcription; then will not the keeneſt hunter in England be at a fault?

'But how wilt thou do,' methinks thou aſkeſt, 'to hinder the lady from 'reſenting the fallacy, and miſtrufting 'thee the more on that account, when 'ſhe finds it out to be in another ſtreet?'

Pho! never mind that: either I ſhall have a way for it; or we ſhall thoroughly underſtand one another by that time: or if we don't, ſhe'll know enough of me, not to wonder at ſuch a peccadillo.

'But how wilt thou hinder the lady 'from apprizing her friend of the real 'name?'

She muſt firſt know it herſelf, monkey, muſt ſhe not?

'Well, but, how wilt thou do to hin'der her from knowing the ſtreet, and 'her friend from directing letters thi'ther; which will be the ſame thing as 'if the name were known?'

Let me alone for that too.

If thou further objecteſt, that Tom Doleman is too great a dunce to write ſuch a letter in anſwer to mine—Canſt thou not imagine, that, in order to ſave honeſt Tom all this trouble, I, who know the town ſo well, could ſend him a copy of what he ſhould write, and leave him nothing to do, but tranſcribe?

What now ſayeſt thou to me, Belford?

And ſuppoſe I had deſigned this taſk of enquiry for thee; and ſuppoſe the lady excepted againſt thee for no other reaſon in the world, but becauſe of my value for thee? What ſayeſt thou to the lady, Jack?

This it is to have leiſure upon my hands!

hands!—What a matchleſs plotter thy friend!—Stand by, and let me ſwell!—I am already as big as an elephant; and ten times wiſer!—Mightier too by far!—Have I not reaſon to ſnuff the moon with my proboſcis?—Lord help thee for a poor, for a very poor creature!—Wonder not, that I deſpiſe thee heartily; ſince the man who is diſpoſed immoderately to exalt himſelf, cannot do it but by deſpiſing every-body elſe in proportion.

I ſhall make good uſe of the Dolemanick hint of being married. But I will not tell thee all at once. Nor, indeed, have I thoroughly digeſted that part of my plot. When a general muſt regulate himſelf by the motions of a watchful adverſary, how can he ſay before-hand what he will, or what he will not, do?

'Widow SINCLAIR, didſt thou not 'ſay, Lovelace?'

Ay, SINCLAIR, Jack!—Remember the name! SINCLAIR, I repeat. She has no other. And her features being broad, and full-blown, I will ſuppoſe her to be of Highland extraction; as her huſband the colonel [Mind that too] was a Scot, as brave, as honeſt.

I never forget the minutiæ in my contrivances. In all matters that admit of doubt, the minutiæ cloſely attended to, and provided for, are of more ſervice than a thouſand oaths, vows, and proteſtations, made to ſupply the neglect of them, eſpecially when jealouſy has made it's way in the working mind.

Thou wouldſt wonder if thou kneweſt one half of my providences. To give thee but one—I have already been ſo good as to ſend up a liſt of books to be procured for the lady's cloſet, moſtly at ſecond hand. And thou knoweſt, that the women there are all well read. But I will not anticipate—Beſides, it looks as if I were afraid of leaving any-thing to my old friend CHANCE; which has many a time been an excellent ſecond to me; and ought not to be affronted or deſpiſed; eſpecially by one, who has the art of making unpromiſing incidents turn out in his favour.

LETTER XXXVI.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 19.

I Have a piece of intelligence to give you, which concerns you much to know.

Your brother having been aſſured, that you are not married, has taken a reſolution to find you out, way lay you, and carry you off. A friend of his, a captain of a ſhip, undertakes to get you on ſhip-board; and to ſail away with you, either to Hull or Leith, in the way to one of your brother's houſes.

They are very wicked: for in ſpite of your virtue they conclude you to be ruined. But if they can be aſſured when they have you, that you are not, they will ſecure you till they can bring you out Mrs. Solmes. Mean time, in order to give Mr. Lovelace full employment, they talk of a proſecution which will be ſet up againſt him, for ſome crime they have got a notion of, which they think, if it do not coſt him his life, will make him fly his country.

This is very early news. Miſs Bell told it in confidence, and with mighty triumph over Lovelace, to Miſs Lloyd; who is at preſent her favourite; though as much your admirer as ever. Miſs Lloyd, being very apprehenſive of the miſchief which might follow ſuch an attempt, told it to me, with leave to apprize you privately of it—And yet neither ſhe nor I would be ſorry perhaps, if Lovelace were to be fairly hanged—that is to ſay, if you, my dear, had no objection to it. But we cannot bear that ſuch an admirable creature ſhould be made the tennis-ball of two violent ſpirits—Much leſs, that you ſhould be ſeized, and expoſed to the brutal treatment of wretches who have no bowels.

If you can engage Mr. Lovelace to keep his temper upon it, I think you ſhould acquaint him with it; but not to mention Miſs Lloyd. Perhaps his wicked agent may come at the intelligence, and reveal it to him. But leave it to your own diſcretion to do as you think fit in it. All my concern is, that this daring and fooliſh project, if carried on, will be a means of throwing you more into his power than ever. But as it will convince you, that there can be no hope of a reconciliation, I wiſh you were actually married, let the cauſe for the proſecution hinted at be what it will, ſhort of murder or a rape.

Your Hannah was very thankful for your kind preſent. She heaped a thouſand bleſſings upon you for it. She has Mr. Lovelace's too by this time.

I am pleaſed with Mr. Hickman, I can tell you:—for he has ſent her two guineas by the perſon who carries Mr. Lovelace's five, as from an unknown hand: nor am I, or you, to know it. But he does a great many things of this ſort; and is as ſilent as the night in his charities; for nobody knows of them, till the gratitude of the benefited will not let them be concealed. He is now-and-then my almoner, and I believe always adds to my little benefactions.

But his time is not come to be praiſed to his face for theſe things; nor does he ſeem to want that encouragement.

The man has certainly a good mind. Nor can we expect in one man every good quality. But he is really a ſilly fellow, my dear, to trouble his head about me, when he ſees how much I deſpiſe his whole ſex; and muſt of courſe make a common man look like a fool, were he not to make himſelf look like one, by wiſhing to pitch his tent ſo oddly. Our likings and diſlikings, as I have often thought, are ſeldom governed by prudence, or with a view to happineſs. The eye, my dear, the wicked eye—has ſuch a ſtrict alliance with the heart—And both have ſuch enmity to the judgment!—What an unequal union, the mind and body! All the ſenſes, like the family at Harlowe Place, in a confederacy againſt that which would animate, and give honour to the whole, were it allowed it's proper precedence.

Permit me, I beſeech you, before you go to London, to ſend you forty-eight guineas. I mention that ſum to oblige you, becauſe, by accepting back the two to Hannah, I will hold you indebted to me fifty.—Surely this will induce you! You know that I cannot want the money. I told you, that I have near double that ſum; and that the half of it is more than my mother knows I am miſtreſs of. You are afraid, that my mother will queſtion me on this ſubject; and then you think I muſt own the truth—But little as I love equivocation, and little as you would allow of it in your Anna Howe, it is hard, if I cannot (were I to be put to it ever ſo cloſely) find ſomething to ſay, that would bring me off, and not impeach my veracity. With ſo little money as you have, what can you do at ſuch a place as London?—You don't know what occaſion you may have for meſſengers, intelligence, and ſuch-like. If you don't oblige me, I ſhall not think your ſtomach ſo much down as you ſay it is, and as, in this one particular, I think it ought to be.

As to the ſtate of things between my mother and me, you know enough of her temper, not to need to be told, that ſhe never eſpouſes or reſents with indifference. Yet will ſhe not remember, that I am her daughter. No, truly, I am all my papa's girl.

She was very ſenſible, ſurely, of the violence of my poor father's temper, that ſhe can ſo long remember that, when acts of tenderneſs and affection ſeem quite forgotten. Some daughters would be tempted to think, that controul ſat very heavy upon a mother who can endeavour to exert the power ſhe has over a child, and regret, for years after death, that ſhe had not the ſame over a huſband.

If this manner of expreſſion becomes not me, of my mother, the fault will be ſomewhat extenuated by the love I always bore to my father, and by the reverence I ſhall ever pay to his memory; for he was a fond father, and perhaps would have been as tender a huſband, had not my mother and he been too much of a temper to agree.

The misfortune was, in ſhort, that, when one was out of humour, the other would be ſo too: yet neither of their tempers comparatively bad. Notwithſtanding all which, I did not imagine, girl as I was in my father's life-time, that my mother's part of the yoke ſat ſo heavy upon her neck as ſhe gives me room to think it did whenever ſhe is pleaſed to diſclaim her part of me.

Both parents, as I have often thought, ſhould be very careful, if they would ſecure to themſelves the undivided love of their children, that, of all things, they ſhould avoid ſuch durable contentions with each other, as ſhould diſtreſs their children in chuſing their party, when they would be glad to reverence both as they ought.

But here is the thing: there is not a better manager of her affairs in the ſex, than my mother; and I believe a notable wife is more impatient of controul, than an indolent one. An indolent one, perhaps, thinks ſhe has ſomething to compound for; while women of the other character, I ſuppoſe, know too well their own ſignificance to think highly of that of any-body elſe. All muſt be their own way. In one word, becauſe they are uſeful, they will be more than uſeful.

I do aſſure you, my dear, were I a man, and a man who loved my quiet, I would not have one of theſe managing wives on any conſideration. I would make it a matter of ſerious enquiry beforehand, whether my miſtreſs's qualifications, if I heard ſhe was notable, were maſculine or feminine ones. If indeed I were an indolent, ſupine mortal, who might be in danger of becoming the property property of my ſteward, I would then perhaps chuſe to marry for the qualifications of a ſteward.

But, ſetting my mother out of the queſtion, becauſe ſhe is my mother, have I not ſeen how Lady Hartley pranks up herſelf above all her ſex, becauſe ſhe knows how to manage affairs that do not belong to her ſex to manage?—Affairs that do no credit to her as a woman to underſtand; practically, I mean; for the theory of them may not be amiſs to be known.

Indeed, my dear, I do not think a man-woman a pretty character at all: and, as I ſaid, were I a man, I would ſooner chuſe a dove, though it were fit for nothing, but, as the play ſays, to go tame about houſe, and breed, than a wife that is ſetting at work (my inſignificant ſelf preſent perhaps) every buſy hour my never reſting ſervants, thoſe of the ſtud not excepted; and who, with a beſom in her hand, as I may ſay, would be continually filling me with apprehenſions, that ſhe wanted to ſweep me out of my own houſe as uſeleſs lumber.

Were indeed the miſtreſs of a family (like the wonderful young lady I ſo much and ſo juſtly admire) to know how to confine herſelf within her own reſpectable rounds of the needle, the pen, the houſekeeper's bills, the dairy for her amuſement; to ſee the poor fed from ſuperfluities that would otherwiſe be waſted; and exert herſelf in all the really uſeful branches of domeſtick management; then would ſhe move in her proper ſphere; then would ſhe render herſelf amiably uſeful, and reſpectably neceſſary; then would ſhe become the miſtreſs-wheel of the family; [Whatever you think of your Anna Howe, I would not have her be the maſter-wheel] and every-body would love her; as every-body did you, before your inſolent brother came back, flushed with his unmerited acquirements, and turned all things topſy-turvy.

If you will be informed of the particulars of our contention, after you have known in general, that your unhappy affair was the ſubject; why then, I think, I muſt tell you.

Yet how ſhall I?—I feel my cheek glow with mingled ſhame and indignation—Know then, my dear—that I have been—as I may ſay—that I have been beaten—Indeed 'tis true. My mother thought fit to ſlap my hands to get from me a ſheet of a letter ſhe caught me writing to you; which I tore, becauſe ſhe ſhould not read it, and burnt it before her face.

I know this will trouble you: ſo ſpare yourſelf the pains to tell me it does.

Mr. Hickman came in preſently after. I would not ſee him. I am either too much a woman to be beat, or too much a child to have an humble ſervant.—So I told my mother. What can one oppoſe but ſullens, when it would be unpardonable ſo much as to think of lifting up a finger?

In the Harlowe-ſtyle, ſhe will be obeyed, ſhe ſays: and even Mr. Hickman ſhall be forbid the houſe, if he contributes to the carrying on of a correſpondence which ſhe will not ſuffer to be continued.

Poor man! He ſtands a whimſical chance between us. But he knows he is ſure of my mother; but not of me. 'Tis eaſy then for him to chuſe his party, were it not his inclination to ſerve you, as it ſurely is. And this makes him a merit with me, which otherwiſe he would not have had; notwithſtanding the good qualities which I have juſt now acknowledged in his favour. For, my dear, let my faults in other reſpects be what they may, I will pretend to ſay, that I have in my own mind thoſe qualities which I praiſed him for: and if we are to come together, I could for that reaſon better diſpenſe with them in him. —So if a huſband, who has a bountiful-tempered wife, is not a niggard, nor ſeeks to reſtrain her, but has an opinion of all ſhe does, that is enough for him: as, on the contrary, if a bountiful-tempered huſband has a frugal wife, it is beſt for both. For one to give, and the other to give, except they have prudence, and are at ſo good an underſtanding with each other, as to compare notes, they may perhaps put it out of their power to be juſt. Good frugal doctrine, my dear! But this way of putting it, is middling the matter between what I have learnt of my mother's ever-prudent and your enlarged notions.—But from doctrine to fact.

I ſhut myſelf up all that day; and what little I did eat, eat alone. But at night ſhe ſent up Kitty, with a command, upon my obedience, to attend her at ſupper.

I went down: but moſt gloriouſly in the ſullens. YES, and NO, were great words with me, to every-thing ſhe aſked, for a good while.

That behaviour, ſhe told me, ſhould not do for her.

Beating

Beating ſhould not with me, I ſaid.

My bold reſiſtance, ſhe told me, had provoked her to ſlap my hand: and ſhe was ſorry to have been ſo provoked. But again inſiſted, that I would either give up my correſpondence abſolutely, or let her ſee all that paſſed in it.

I muſt not do either, I told her. It was unſuitable both to my inclination and to my honour, at the inſtigation of baſe minds, to give up a friend in diſtreſs.

She rung all the maternal changes upon the words duty, obedience, filial obligation, and ſo-forth.

I told her, that a duty too rigorouſly and unreaſonably exacted had been your ruin, if you were ruined.

If I were of age to be married, I hoped ſhe would think me capable of making, or at leaſt of keeping, my own friendſhips; ſuch a one eſpecially as this, with a woman too, and one whoſe friendſhip ſhe herſelf, till this diſtreſsful point of time, had thought the moſt uſeful and edifying that I had ever contracted.

The greater the merit, the worſe the action: the finer the talents, the more dangerous the example.

There were other duties, I ſaid, beſides the filial one; and I hoped I need not give up a ſuffering friend, eſpecially at the inſtigation of thoſe by whom ſhe ſuffered. I told her, that it was very hard to annex ſuch a condition as that to my duty; when I was perſuaded, that both duties might be performed, without derogating from either: that an unreaſonable command (ſhe muſt excuſe me; I muſt ſay it, though I were ſlapped again) was a degree of tyranny: and I could not have expected, that at theſe years I ſhould be allowed no will, no choice of my own! where a woman only was concerned, and the deviliſh ſex not in the queſtion.

What turned moſt in favour of her argument was, that I deſired to be excuſed from letting her read all that paſſes between us. She inſiſted much upon this: and ſince, ſhe ſaid, you were in the hands of the moſt intriguing man in the world; and a man, who had made a jeſt of her favourite Hickman, as ſhe has been told; ſhe knows not what conſequences, unthought of by you or me, may flow from ſuch a correſpondence.

So you ſee, my dear, that I fare the worſe on Mr. Hickman's account! My mother might ſee all that paſſes between us, did I not know, that it would cramp your ſpirit, and reſtrain the freedom of your pen, as it would alſo the freedom of mine: and were ſhe not moreover ſo firmly attached to the contrary ſide, that inferences, conſequences, ſtrained deductions, cenſures and conſtructions the moſt partial, would for ever be hawled in to teaze me, and would perpetually ſubject us to the neceſſity of debating and canvaſſing.

Beſides, I don't chuſe that ſhe ſhould know how much this artful wretch has outwitted, as I may call it, a perſon ſo much his ſuperior in all the nobler qualities of the human mind.

The generoſity of your heart, and the greatneſs of your ſoul, full well I know; but do not offer to diſſuade me from this correſpondence.

Mr. Hickman, immediately on the contention above, offered his ſervice; and I accepted of it, as you will ſee by my laſt. He thinks, though he has all honour for my mother, that ſhe is unkind to us both. He was pleaſed to tell me, (with an air, as I thought) that he not only approved of our correſpondence, but admired the ſteadineſs of my friendſhip; and having no opinion of your man, but a great one of me, thinks that my advice or intelligence from time to time may be of uſe to you; and on this preſumption, ſaid, that it would be a thouſand pities that you ſhould ſuffer for want of either.

Mr. Hickman pleaſed me in the main of his ſpeech; and it is well the general tenor of it was agreeable; otherwiſe, I can tell him, I ſhould have reckoned with him for his word approve; for it is a ſtile I have not yet permitted him to talk to me in. And you ſee, my dear, what theſe men are—No ſooner do they find that you have favoured them with the power of doing you an agreeable ſervice, but they take upon them to approve, forſooth, of your actions! By which is implied a right to diſapprove, if they think fit.

I have told my mother, how much you wiſh to be reconciled to your relations, and how independent you are upon Lovelace.

Mark the end of the latter aſſertion, ſhe ſays. And as to reconciliation, ſhe knows that nothing will do (and will have it, that nothing ought to do) but your returning back, without preſuming to condition with them. And this if you do, ſhe ſays, will beſt ſhew your independence on Lovelace.

You ſee, my dear, what your duty is, in my mother's opinion.

I ſuppoſe your next directed to Mr. Hickman,

Hickman, at his own houſe, will be from London.

Heaven preſerve you in honour and ſafety, is my prayer.

What you do for change of cloaths, I cannot imagine.

It is amazing to me what your relations can mean by diſtreſſing you as they ſeem reſolved to do. I ſee they will throw you into his arms, whether you will or not.

I ſend this by Robert, for diſpatch-ſake: and can only repeat the hitherto-rejected offer of my beſt ſervices. Adieu, my deareſt friend. Believe me ever your affectionate and faithful

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XXXVII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

THURSDAY, APRIL 20.

I Should think myſelf utterly unworthy of your friendſhip, did my own concerns, heavy as they are, ſo engroſs me, that I could not find leiſure for a few lines to declare to my beloved friend my ſincere diſapprobation of her conduct, in an inſtance where ſhe is ſo generouſly faulty, that the conſciouſneſs of that very generoſity may hide from her the fault, which I, more than any other, have reaſon to deplore as being the unhappy occaſion of it.

You know, you ſay, that your account of the contentions between your mother and you will trouble me; and ſo you bid me ſpare myſelf the pains to tell you that they do.

You did not uſe, my dear, to forbid me thus beforehand. You were wont to ſay, you loved me the better for my expoſtulations with you on that acknowledged warmth and quickneſs of your temper which your own good ſenſe taught you to be apprehenſive of. What though I have ſo miſerably fallen, and am unhappy? If ever I had any judgment worth regarding, it is now as much worth as ever, becauſe I can give it as freely againſt myſelf as againſt any-body elſe. And ſhall I not, when there ſeems to be an infection in my fault, and that it leads you likewiſe to reſolve to carry on a correſpondence againſt prohibition, expoſtulate with you upon it; when whatever conſequences flow from your diſobedience, they but widen my error, which is as the evil root, from which ſuch ſad branches ſpring?

The mind that can glory in being capable of ſo noble, ſo firm, ſo unſhaken friendſhip, as that of my dear Miſs Howe; a friendſhip which no caſualty or diſtreſs can leſſen, but which increaſes with the misfortunes of it's friend—Such a mind muſt be above taking amiſs the well-meant admonitions of that diſtinguiſhed friend. I will not therefore apologize for my freedom on this ſubject: and the leſs need I, when that freedom is the reſult of an affection, in the very inſtance, ſo abſolutely diſintereſted, that it tends to deprive myſelf of the only comfort left me.

Your acknowledged ſullens; your tearing from your mother's hands the letter ſhe thought ſhe had a right to ſee; and burning it, as you own, before her face; your refuſal to ſee the man, who is ſo willing to obey you for the ſake of your unhappy friend; and this purely to vex your mother; can you think, my dear, upon this brief recapitulation of hardly one half of the faulty particulars you give, that theſe faults are excuſable in one who ſo well knows her duty?

Your mother had a good opinion of me once: is not that a reaſon why ſhe ſhould be more regarded now, when I have, as ſhe believes, ſo deſervedly forfeited it? A prejudice in favour is as hard to be totally overcome, as a prejudice in diſfavour. In what a ſtrong light, then, muſt that error appear to her, that ſhould ſo totally turn her heart againſt me, herſelf not a principal in the caſe?

There are other duties, you ſay, beſides the filial-duty: but that, my dear, muſt be a duty prior to all other duties; a duty anterior, as I may ſay, to your very birth. And what duty ought not to give way to that, when they come in competition?

You are perſuaded, that the duty to your friend, and the filial duty, may be performed without derogating from either. Your mother thinks otherwiſe. What is the concluſion to be drawn from theſe premiſes?

When your mother ſees how much I ſuffer in my reputation from the ſtep I have taken, from whom ſhe and all the world expected better things, how much reaſon has ſhe to be watchful over you! One evil draws on another after it; and how knows ſhe, or any-body, where it may ſtop?

Does not the perſon who will vindicate, or ſeek to extenuate, a faulty ſtep in another, [In this light muſt your mother look upon the matter in queſtion between her and you] give an indication either either of a culpable will, or a weak judgment; and may not she apprehend, that the cenſorious will think, that ſuch a one might probably have equally failed, under the ſame inducements and provocations, to uſe your own words, as applied to me in a former letter?

Can there be a ſtronger inſtance in human life than mine has ſo early furniſhed within a few months paſt, (not to mention the uncommon provocations to it, which I have met with) of the neceſſity of the continuance of a watchful parent's care over a daughter; let that daughter have obtained ever ſo great a reputation for her prudence?

Is not the ſpace from ſixteen to twenty-one, that which requires this care, more than any time of a young woman's life? For in that period, do we not generally attract the eyes of the other ſex, and become the ſubject of their addreſſes, and not ſeldom of their attempts? And is not that the period in which our conduct or miſconduct gives us a reputation or diſreputation, that almoſt inſeparably accompanies us throughout our whole future lives?

Are we not likewiſe then moſt in danger from ourſelves, becauſe of the diſtinction with which we are apt to behold particulars of that ſex?

And when our dangers multiply, both from within and without, do not our parents know, that their vigilance ought to be doubled? And ſhall that neceſſary increaſe of care ſit uneaſy upon us, becauſe we are grown up to ſtature and womanhood?

Will you tell me, if ſo, what is the preciſe ſtature and age, at which a good child ſhall conclude herſelf abſolved from the duty ſhe owes to a parent?—And at which a parent, after the example of the dams of the brute creation, is to lay aſide all care and tenderneſs for her offſpring?

Is it ſo hard for you, my dear, to be treated like a child? And can you not think it is hard for a good parent to imagine herſelf under the unhappy neceſſity of ſo treating her woman-grown daughter?

Do you think, if your mother had been you, and you your mother, and your daughter had ſtruggled with you, as you did with her, that you would not have been as apt as your mother was to have ſlapt your daughter's hands, to have made her quit her hold, and give up the prohibited letter?

Your mother told you with great truth, that you provoked her to this harſhneſs; and it was a great condeſcenſion in her (and not taken notice of by you as it deſerved) to ſay that ſhe was ſorry for it.

At every age on this ſide matrimony (for then we come under another ſort of protection, though that is far from abrogating the filial duty) it will be found, that the wings of our parents are our moſt neceſſary and moſt effectual ſafeguard from the vultures, the hawks, the kites, and other villainous birds of prey, that hover over us with a view to ſeize and deſtroy us the firſt time we are caught wandering out of the eye or care of our watchful and natural guardians and protectors.

Hard as you may ſuppoſe it, to be denied the continuance of a correſpondence once ſo much approved, even by the venerable denier; yet, if your mother think my fault to be of ſuch a nature, as that a correſpondence with me will caſt a ſhade upon your reputation; all my own friends have given me up—that hardſhip is to be ſubmitted to. And muſt it not make her the more ſtrenuous to ſupport her own opinion when ſhe ſees the firſt fruits of this tenaciouſneſs on your ſide, is to be glorioufly in the ſullens, as you call it; and in a diſobedient oppoſition?

I know that you have an humorous meaning in that expreſſion, and that this turn, in moſt caſes, gives a delightful poignancy both to your converſation and correſpondence; but indeed, my dear, this caſe will not bear humour.

Will you give me leave to add to this tedious expoſtulation, that I by no means approve of ſome of the things you write, in relation to the manner in which your father and mother lived—at times lived—Only at times, I dare ſay; though perhaps too often.

Your mother is anſwerable to any-body, rather than to her child, for whatever was wrong in her conduct, if any-thing was wrong, towards Mr. Howe: a gentleman, of whoſe memory I will only ſay, that it ought to be revered by you—But yet, ſhould you not examine yourſelf, whether your diſpleaſure at your mother had no part in your revived reverence for your father, at the time you wrote?

No one is perfect: and although your mother may not be ſo right to remember diſagreeableneſs againſt the departed, yet ſhould you not want to be reminded on whoſe account, and on what occaſion, ſhe remembered them. You cannot judge, nor ought you to attempt to judge, of what might have paſſed between both, to embitter and keep awake disagreeable remembrances in the survivor.

to

LETTER XXXVIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

IN CONTINUATION.

BUT this subject must not be pursued. Another might, with more pleasure, (though not with more approbation) upon one of your lively excursions. It is upon the high airs you give yourself upon the word approve.

How comes it about, I wonder, that a young lady so noted for a predominating generosity should not be uniformly generous? That your generosity should fail in an instance, where policy, prudence, gratitude, would not permit it to fail? Mr. Hickman (as you confess) has indeed a worthy mind. If I had not long ago known that, he would never have found an advocate in me for my Anna Howe's favour to him. Often and often have I been concerned, when I was your happy guest, to see him, after a conversation in which he had well supported his part in your absence, sink at once into silence the moment you came into company.

I have told you of this before: and I believe I hinted to you once, that the superciliousness you put on only to him, was capable of a construction, which at the time would have very little gratified your pride to have had made; since it would have been as much in his favour, as in your disfavour.

Mr. Hickman, my dear, is a modest man. I never see a modest man, but I am sure (if he has not wanted opportunities) that he has a treasure in his mind, which requires nothing but the key of encouragement to unlock it, to make him shine—While a confident man, who, to be confident, must think as meanly of his company, as highly of himself, enters with magisterial airs upon any subject; and, depending upon his assurance to bring himself off when found out, talks of more than he is master of.

But a modest man!—O my dear, shall not a modest woman distinguish and wish to consort with a modest man?—A man, before whom, and to whom she may open her lips secure of his good opinion of all she says, and of his just and polite regard for her judgment? and who must therefore inspire her with an agreeable self confidence.

What a lot have I drawn!—We are all indeed apt to turn teachers—But, surely, I am better enabled to talk, to write upon these subjects, than ever I was.—But I will banish myself, if possible, from an address, which, when I began to write, I was determined to confine wholly to your own particular.

My dearest, dearest friend, how ready are you to tell us what others should do, and even what a mother should have done! But indeed you once, I remember, advanced, that, as different attainments required different talents to master them, so, in the writing way, a person might not be a bad critck upon the works of others, although he might himself be unable to write with excellence. But will you permit me to account for all this readiness of finding fault, by placing it to human nature, which, being sensible of the defects of human nature, (that is to say, of it's own defects) loves to be correcting? But in exercising that talent, chuses rather to turn it's eye outward than inward? In other words, to employ itself rather in the out-door search, than in the in-door examination?

And here give me leave to add (and yet it is with tender reluctance) that although you say very pretty things of notable wives; and although I join with you in opinion, that husbands may have as many inconveniences to encounter with, as conveniences to boast of, from women of that character; yet Lady Hartley perhaps would have had milder treatment from your pen, had it not been dipt in gall with a mother in your eye.

As to the money you so generously and repeatedly offer, don't be angry with me, if I again say, that I am very desirous that you should be able to aver, without the least qualifying or reserve, that nothing of that sort, has passed between us. I know your mother's strong way of putting the question she is intent upon having answered. But yet I promise that I will be obliged to nobody but you, when I have occasion.

LETTER XXXIX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

IN CONTINUATION.

AND now, my dear, a few words, as to the prohibition laid upon you; a subject that I have frequently touched upon, but cursorily, because I was afraid to trust myself with it, knowing that my judgment, if I did, would condemn my practice.

You command me not to attempt to dissuade you from this correspondence; and you tell me how kindly Mr. Hickman approves of it; and how obliging he is to me, to permit it to be carried on under cover to him—But this does not quite satisfy me.

I am a very bad casuist; and the pleasure I take in writing to you, who are the only one to whom I can disburden my mind, may make me, as I have hinted, very partial to my own wishes:—else, if it were not an artful evasion beneath an open and frank heart to wish to be complied with, I would be glad methinks to be permitted still to write to you; and only to have such occasional returns by Mr. Hickman's pen, as well as cover, as might set me right when I am wrong; confirm me, when right; and guide me where I doubt. This would enable me to proceed in the difficult path before me with more assuredness. For whatever I suffer from the censures of others, if I can preserve your good opinion, I shall not be altogether unhappy, let what will befall me.

And indeed, my dear, I know not how to forbear writing. I have now no other employment or diversion. And I must write on, although I were not to send it to any-body. You have often heard me own the advantages I have found from writing down every-thing of moment that befalls me; and of all I think, and of all I do, that may be of future use to me; for, besides that this helps to form one to a style, and opens and expands the ductile mind, every one will find, that many a good thought evaporates in thinking; many a good resolution goes off, driven out of memory perhaps by some other not so good. But when I set down what I will do, or what I have done, on this or that occasion; the resolution or action is before me either to be adhered to, or withdrawn, or amended; and I have entered into compact with myself, as I may say; having given it under my own hand to improve, rather than to go backward, as I live longer.

I would willingly therefore write to you, if I might; the rather as it would be the more inspiriting to have some end in view in what I write; some friend to please, besides merely seeking to gratify my passion for scribbling.

But why, if your mother will permit our correspondence on communicating to her all that passes in it, and if she would condescend to one only condition, may it not be complied with?

Would she not, do you think, my dear, be prevailed upon to have the communication made to her, in confidence?

If there were any prospect of a reconciliation with my friends, I should not have so much regard for my pride, as to be afraid of any-body's knowing how much I have been outwitted, as you call it. I would in that case (when I had left Mr. Lovelace) acquaint your mother, and all my own friends, with the whole of my story. It would behove me so to do, for my own reputation, and for their satisfaction.

But if I have no such prospect, what will the communication of my reluctance to go away with Mr. Lovelace, and of his arts to frighten me away, avail me? Your mother has hinted, that my friends would insist upon my returning to them (as a proof of the truth of my plea) to be disposed of, without condition, at their pleasure. If I scrupled this, my brother would rather triumph over me than keep my secret. Mr. Lovelace, whose pride already so ill brooks my regrets for meeting him, (when he thinks, if I had not, I must have been Mr. Solmes's wife) would perhaps treat me with indignity: and thus deprived of all refuge and protection, I should become the scoff of men of intrigue; and be thought with too great an appearance of reason, a disgrace to my sex—While that avowed love, however indiscreetly shewn, which is followed by marriage, will find more excuses made for it, than generally it ought to find.

But if your mother will receive the communication in confidence, pray shew her all that I have written, or will write. If my past conduct in that case shall not be found to deserve heavy blame, I shall then perhaps have the benefit of her advice, as well as yours. And if after a re-establishment in her favour, I shall wilfully deserve blame for the time to come, I will be content to be denied yours as well as hers for ever.

As to cramping my spirit, as you call it, (were I to sit down to write what I know your mother must see) that, my dear, is already cramped. And do not think so unhandsomely of your mother, as to fear that she would make partial constructions against me. Neither you nor I can doubt, but that, had she been left unprepossessedly to herself, she would have shewn favour to me. And so, I dare say, would my uncle Antony. Nay, my dear, I can extend my charity still farther: for I am sometimes of opinion, that were my brother and sister absolutely certain, that they had so far ruined me in the opinion of both my uncles, as that they need not be apprehensive of my clashing with their interests; nterests; they would not oppose a pardon, although they might not wish a reconciliation; especially if I would make a few sacrifices to them: which I assure you, I should be inclined to make were I wholly free, and independent on this man. You know I never valued myself upon worldly acquisitions, but as they enlarged my power to do things I loved to do. And if I were denied the power, I must, as I now do, curb my inclination.

Do not however think me guilty of an affectation in what I have said of my brother and sister. Severe enough I am sure it is, in the most favourable sense. And an indifferent person will be of opinion, that they are much better warranted than ever for the sake of the family-honour, to seek to ruin me in the favour of all my friends.

But to the former topick—try, my dear, if your mother will, upon the condition above given, permit our correspondence, on seeing all we write. But if she will not, what a selfishness would there be in my love to you, were I to wish you to forego your duty for my sake?

And now, one word, as to the freedom I have treated you with in this tedious expostulatory address. I presume upon your forgiveness of it, because few friendships are founded on such a basis as ours:—which is, freely to give reproof, and thankfully to receive it as occasions arise; that so either may have opportunity to clear up mistakes, to acknowledge and amend errors, as well in behaviour as in words and deeds; and to rectify and confirm each other in the judgment each shall form upon persons, things and circumstances. And all this upon the following consideration; That it is much more eligible, as well as honourable, to be corrected with the gentleness that may be expected from an undoubted friend, than by continuing either blind or wilful, to expose ourselves to the censures of an envious, and perhaps malignant world.

But it is as needless, I dare say, to remind you of this, as it is to repeat my request, so often repeated, that you will not, in your turn, spare the follies and the faults of your ever affectionate

CL. HARLOWE.

SUBJOINED TO THE ABOVE.

I SAID, that I would avoid writing any-thing of my own particular affairs in the above address, if I could.

I will write one letter more, to inform you how I stand with this man. But, my dear, you must permit that one and your answer to it, (for I want your advice upon the contents of mine) and the copy of one I have written to my aunt, to be the last that shall pass between us, while the prohibition continues.

I fear, I very much fear, that my unhappy situation will draw me to be guilty of evasion, of little affectations, and of curvings from the plain simple truth which I was wont to delight in, and prefer to every other consideration. But allow me to say, and this for your sake, and in order to lessen your mother's fears of any ill consequences that she might apprehend from our correspondence, that if I am at any time guilty of a failure in these respects, I will not go on in it; but endeavour to recover my lost ground, that I may not bring error into habit.

I have deferred going to town, at Mrs. Sorlings's earnest request. But have fixed my removal to Monday, as I shall acquaint you in my next.

I have already made a progress in that next; but having an unexpected opportunity, will send this by itself.

LETTER XL.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

FRIDAY MORN. APRIL 21.

MY mother will not comply with your condition, my dear. I hinted it to her, as from myself. But the Harlowes (excuse me) have got her entirely in with them. It is a scheme of mine, she told me, formed to draw her into your party against your parents. Which, for your own sake, she is very careful about.

Don't be so much concerned about my mother and me, once more I beg of you. We shall do well enough together—Now a falling out, now a falling in.

It used to be so, when you were not in the question.

Yet do I give you my sincere thanks for every line of your reprehensive letters; which I intend to read as often as I find my temper rises.

I will freely own, however, that I winced a little at first reading them. But I see, that on every re-perusal, I shall love and honour you still more, if possible, than before.

Yet I think, I have one advantage over you; and which I will hold through this letter, and through all my future letters; that is, that I will treat you as freely as you treat me; and yet will never think an apology neceſſary to you for my freedom.

But that you ſo think with reſpect to me, is the effect of your gentleneſs of temper, with a little ſketch of implied reflection on the warmth of mine. Gentleneſs in a woman you hold to be no fault: nor do I, a little due or provoked warmth—But what is this but praiſing on both ſides, what neither of us can help; nor perhaps wiſh to help? You can no more go out of your road, than I can go out of mine. It would be a pain to either to do ſo:—what then is it in either's approving of her own natural bias, but making a virtue of neceſſity?

But one obervation I will add, that were your character, and my character, to be truly drawn, mine would be allowed to be the moſt natural. Shades and lights are equally neceſſary in a fine picture. Yours would be ſurrounded with ſuch a flood of brightneſs, with ſuch a glory, that it would indeed dazzle; but leave one heartleſs to imitate it.

O may you not ſuffer from a baſe world for your gentleneſs; while my temper, by its warmth, keeping all impoſition at a diſtance, though leſs amiable in general, affords me not reaſon, as I have mentioned heretofore, to wiſh to make an exchange with you!

I ſhould indeed be inexcuſable to open my lips by way of contradiction to my mother, had I ſuch a fine ſpirit as yours to deal with. Truth is truth, my dear! Why ſhould narrowneſs run away with the praiſes due to a noble expanſion of heart? If every-body would ſpeak out, as I do, (that is to ſay, give praiſe where only praiſe is due; diſpraiſe where due likewiſe) ſhame, if not principle, would mend the world—Nay, ſhame would introduce principle in a generation or two. Very true, my dear: do you apply. I dare not.—For I fear you almoſt as much as I love you.

I will give you an inſtance, nevertheleſs, which will a-new demonſtrate, that none but very generous and noble-minded people ought to be implicitly obeyed. You know what I ſaid above, that truth is truth.

Inconveniences will ſometimes ariſe from having to do with perſons of modeſty and ſcrupuloufneſs. Mr. Hickman, you ſay, is a modeſt man. He put your corrective packet into my hand with a very fine bow, and a ſelf-ſatisfied air; [we'll conſider what you ſay of this honeſt man by-and-by, my dear] his ſtrut was not gone off, when in came my mother, as I was reading it.

When ſome folks find their anger has made them conſiderable, they will be always angry, or ſeeking occaſion for anger.

'Why now, Mr. Hickman—Why, 'now, Nancy,' [as I was huddling in the packet between my gown and my ſtays at her entrance.] 'You have a 'letter brought you this inſtant.'—While the modeſt man, with his pauſing bravings, 'Mad-da—Mad-dam,' looked as if he knew not whether he had beſt to run, and leave me and my mother to fight it out, or ſtand his ground and ſee fair-play.

It would have been poor to tell a lye for it. She flung away. I went out at the oppoſite door, to read the contents; leaving Mr. Hickman to exercite his white teeth upon his thumb-nails.

When I had read your letters, I went to find out my mother. I told her the generous contents, and that you deſired that the prohibition might be adhered to. I propoſed your condition, as for myſelf; and was rejected, as above.

She ſuppoſed, ſhe was finely painted between two young creatures, who had more wit than prudence: and inſtead of being prevailed upon by the generoſity of your ſentiments, made uſe of your opinion only to confirm her own, and renewed her prohibitions, charging me to return no other anſwer, but that ſhe did renew them: adding, that they ſhould ſtand, till your relations were reconciled to you; hinting as if ſhe had engaged for as much; and expected my compliance.

I thought of your reprehenſions, and was meek; though not pleaſed. And let me tell you, my dear, that as long as I can ſatisfy my own mind, that good is intended, and that it is hardly poſſible that evil ſhould enſue from our correſpondence—As long as I know, that this prohibition proceeds originally from the ſame ſpiteful minds which have been the occaſion of all theſe miſchiefs—As long as I know, that it is not your fault if your relations are not reconciled to you; and that upon conditions which no reaſonable people would refuſe—You muſt give me leave, with all deference to your judgment, and to your excellent leſſons, (which would reach almoſt every caſe of this kind but the preſent) to inſiſt upon your writing to me, and that minutely, as if this prohibition had not been laid.

It is not from humour, from perverſeneſs, that I inſiſt upon this. I cannot expreſs how much my heart is in your concerns. And you muſt, in ſhort, allow me to think, that if I can do you ſervice by writing, I ſhall be better juſtified in continuing to write, than my mother is in her prohibition.

But yet, to ſatisfy you all I can, I will as ſeldom return anſwers, while the interdict laſts, as may be conſiſtent with my notions of friendſhip, and with the ſervice I owe you, and can do you.

As to your expedient of writing by Hickman, [and now, my dear, your modeſt man comes in: and as you love modeſty in that ſex, I will do my endeavour, by holding him at a proper diſtance, to keep him in your favour] I know what you mean by it, my ſweet friend. It is to make that man ſignificant with me. As to the correſpondence, THAT ſhall go on, I do aſſure you, be as ſcrupulous as you pleaſe—So that that will not ſuffer if I do not cloſe with your propoſal as to him.

I muſt tell you, that I think it will be honour enough for him to have his name made uſe of ſo frequently betwixt us. This, of itſelf, is placing a confidence in him, that will make him walk bolt upright, and diſplay his white hand, and his fine diamond ring; and moſt mightily lay down his ſervices, and his pride to oblige, and his diligence, and his fidelity, and his contrivances to keep our ſecret, and his excuſes, and his evaſions to my mother, when challenged by her; with fifty and's beſide: and will it not moreover give him pretence and excuſe oftner than ever to pag-nag it hither to good Mrs. Howe's fair daughter?

But to admit him into my company tête à tête, and into my cloſet, as often as I would wiſh to write to you; I only to dictate to his pen—my mother all the time ſuppoſing that I was going to be heartily in love with him—To make him maſter of all my ſentiments, and of my heart, as I may ſay, when I write to you—Indeed, my dear, I won't. Nor were I married to the beſt HE in England, would I honour him with the communication of my correſpondences.

No, my dear, it is ſufficient ſurely, for him to parade it in the character of our letter-conveyer, and to be honoured in a cover. And never fear but, modeſt as you think him, he will make enough of that.

You are always blaming me for want of generoſity to this man, and for abuſe of power. But I profeſs, my dear, I cannot tell how to help it. Do, dear now, let me ſpread my plumes a little, and now-and-then make myſelf feared. This is my time, you know, ſince it would be no more to my credit than his, to give myſelf thoſe airs when I am married. He has a joy when I am pleaſed with him that he would not know, but for the pain my diſpleaſure gives him.

Men, no more than women, know how to make a moderate uſe of power. Is not that ſeen every day from the prince to the peaſant? If I do not make Hickman quake now-and-then, he will endeavour to make me fear. All the animals in the creation are more or leſs in a ſtate of hoſtility with each other. The wolf that runs away from the lion, will devour a lamb the next moment. I remember, that I was once ſo enraged at a game chicken that was continually pecking at another, (a poor humble one, as I thought him) that I had the offender caught, and without more ado, in a pet of humanity, wrung his neck off. What followed this execution? Why that other grew inſolent, as ſoon as his inſulter was gone, and was continually pecking at one or two under him. 'Peck 'and be hanged,' ſaid I,—'I might as 'well have preſerved the firſt; for I ſee 'it is in the nature of the beaſt.'

Excuſe my flippancies. I wiſh I were with you. I would make you ſmile in the midſt of your graveſt airs, as I uſed to do. O that you had accepted of my offer to attend you! But nothing that I offer, will you accept—Take care!—You will make me very angry with you: and when I am, you know I value nobody: for, dearly as I love you, I muſt be, and cannot always help it, your ſaucy

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XLI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

FRIDAY, APRIL 21.

MR. Lovelace communicated to me this morning early, from his intelligencer, the news of my brother's ſcheme. I like him the better for making very light of it; and for his treating it with contempt. And indeed, had I not the hint of it from you, I ſhould have ſuſpected it to be ſome contrivance of his, in order to haſten me to town, where he has long wiſhed to be himſelf.

He read me the paſſage in that Leman's letter, which is pretty much to the effect of what you wrote to me from

Miſs

Miſs Lloyd; with this addition, that one Singleton, a maſter of a Scots veſſel, is the man, who is to be the principal in this act of violence.

I have ſeen him. He has been twice entertained at Harlowe Place, as my brother's friend. He has the air of a very bold and fearleſs man; and I fancy it muſt be his project; as my brother, I ſuppoſe, talks to every-body of the raſh ſtep I have taken; for he did not ſpare me before he had this ſeeming reaſon to cenſure me.

This Singleton lives at Leith; ſo, perhaps, I am to be carried to my brother's houſe not far from that port.

Putting theſe paſſages together, I am not a little apprehenſive, that the deſign, lightly as Mr. Lovelace, from his fearleſs temper, treats it, may be attempted to be carried into execution; and of the conſequences that may attend it, if it be.

I aſked Mr. Lovelace, ſeeing him ſo frank and cool, what he would adviſe me to do?

'Shall I aſk you, Madam, what are 'your own thoughts?—Why I return 'the queſtion,' ſaid he, 'is, becauſe you 'have been ſo very earneſt that I ſhould 'leave you as ſoon as you are in London, 'that I know not what to propoſe, with-'out offending you.'

'My opinion is,' ſaid I, 'that I 'ſhould ſtudiouſly conceal myſelf from 'the knowledge of every-body but Miſs 'Howe; and that you ſhould leave me 'out of hand; ſince they will certainly 'conclude, that where one is, the other 'is not far off: and it is eaſier to trace 'you than me.'

'You would not ſurely wiſh,' ſaid he, 'to fall into your brother's hands by 'ſuch a violent meaſure as this? I pro-'poſe not to throw myſelf officiouſly 'in their way; but ſhould they have 'reaſon to think I avoided them, would 'not that whet their diligence to find 'you, and their courage to attempt to 'carry you off; and ſubject me to inſults 'that no man of ſpirit can bear?'

'Lord bleſs me!' ſaid I, 'to what 'has this one fatal ſtep that I have been 'betrayed into——'

'Deareſt Madam, let me beſeech you 'to forbear this harſh language, when 'you ſee, by this new ſcheme, how de-'termined they were upon carrying 'their old ones, had you not been betray-'ed, as you call it. Have I offered to 'defy the laws of ſociety, as this brother 'of yours muſt do, if any-thing be in-'tended by this project? I hope you will 'be pleaſed to obſerve, that there are as 'violent and as wicked enterprizers as 'myſelf—But this is ſo very wild a pro-'ject, that I think there can be no room 'for apprehenſions from it. I know your 'brother well. When at college, he 'had always a romantick turn: but 'never had a head for any-thing but to 'puzzle and confound himſelf. A half 'invention, and a whole conceit; but 'not maſter of talents to do himſelf good, 'or others harm, but as thoſe others gave 'him the power by their own folly.'

'This is very volubly run off, Sir!—'But violent ſpirits are but too much 'alike; at leaſt in their methods of re-'ſenting. You will not preſume to make 'yourſelf a leſs innocent man ſurely, 'who had determined to brave my whole 'family in perſon, if my folly had not 'ſaved you the raſhneſs, and them the 'inſult.'

'Dear Madam!—Still muſt it be folly, 'raſhneſs!—It is as impoſſible for you to 'think tolerably of any-body out of your 'own family, as it is for any-one in it to 'deſerve your love! Forgive me, deareſt 'creature! If I did not love you as never 'man loved a woman, I might appear 'more indifferent to preferences ſo un-'deſervedly made. But let me aſk you, 'Madam, What have you borne from 'me?—What cauſe have I given you to 'treat me with ſo much ſeverity, and ſo 'little confidence?—And what have you 'not borne from them? Malice and ill-'will, indeed, ſitting in judgment upon 'my character, may not give ſentence in 'my favour: but what of your own know-'ledge have you againſt me?'

Spirited queſtions, were they not, my dear?—And they were aſked with as ſpi-rited an air. I was ſtartled. But I was reſolved not to deſert myſelf.

'Is this a time, Mr. Lovelace, is this 'a proper occaſion taken, to give your-'ſelf theſe high airs to me, a young 'creature deſtitute of protection? It is 'a ſurprizing queſtion you aſk me. Had 'I aught againſt you of my own knowledge? '—I can tell you, Sir——' And away I would have flung.

He ſnatched my hand, and beſought me not to leave him in diſpleaſure. He pleaded his paſſion for me, and my ſe-verity to him, and partiality for thoſe from whom I had ſuffered ſo much; and whoſe intended violence, he ſaid, was now the ſubject of our deliberation.

I was forced to hear him.

'You condeſcended, deareſt creature,' ſaid he, 'to aſk my advice. It is very 'eaſy, give me leave to ſay, to adviſe

'you

'you what to do. I hope I may on this 'new occafion, fpeak without offence, 'notwithſtanding your former injunctions— 'You ſee that there can be no hope of 'reconciliation with your relations. Can 'you, Madam, conſent to honour with 'your hand, a wretch whom you have 'never yet obliged with one voluntary 'favour!'

What a recriminating, what a reproachful way, my dear, was this, of putting a queſtion of this nature!

I expected not from him, at the time, and juſt as I was very angry with him, either the queſtion or the manner. I am aſhamed to recollect the confuſion I was thrown into; all your advice in my head at the moment: yet his words ſo prohibitory. He confidently ſeemed to enjoy my confuſion. [Indeed, my dear, he knows not what reſpectful love is!] and gazed upon me, as if he would have looked me through.

He was ſtill more declarative afterwards indeed, as I ſhall mention by-and-by: but it was half extorted from him.

My heart ſtruggled violently between reſentment and ſhame, to be thus teazed by one who ſeemed to have all his paſſions at command, at a time when I had very little over mine! till at laſt I burſt into tears, and was going from him in high diſguſt: when throwing his arms about me, with an air, however, the moſt tenderly reſpectful, he gave a ſtupid turn to the ſubject.

It was far from his heart, he ſaid, to take ſo much advantage of the ſtreight, which the diſcovery of my brother's fooliſh project had brought me into, as to renew, without my permiſſion, a propoſal which I had hitherto diſcountenanced; and which for that reaſon—

And then he came with his half-ſentences, apologizing for what he had not ſo much as half-propoſed.

Surely, he had not the inſolence to intend to teaze me, to ſee if I could be brought to ſpeak what became me not to ſpeak—But, whether he had or not, it did teaze me; inſomuch that my very heart was fretted, and I broke out at laſt into freſh tears, and a declaration, that I was very unhappy. And juſt then recollecting how like a tame fool I ſtood with his arms about me, I flung from him with indignation. But he ſeized my hand, as I was going out of the room, and upon his knees beſought my ſtay for one moment: and then, in words the moſt clear and explicit, tendered himſelf to my acceptance, as the moſt effectual means to diſappoint my brother's ſcheme, and ſet all right.

But what could I ſay to this?—Extorted from him, as it ſeemed to me, rather as the effect of his compaſſion, than his love? What could I ſay? I pauſed, I looked ſilly—I am ſure I looked very ſilly. He ſuffered me to pauſe, and look ſilly; waiting for me to ſay ſomething: and at laſt (aſhamed of my confuſion, and aiming to make an excuſe for it) I told him that I deſired he would avoid ſuch meaſures as might add to the uneaſineſs, which it muſt be viſible to him I had, when he reflected upon the irreconcileableneſs of my friends, and upon what might follow from this unaccountable project of my brother.

He promiſed to be governed by me in every-thing. And again the wretch, inſtead of preſſing his fromer queſtion, aſked me, if I forgave him for the humble ſuit he had made to me? What had I to do, but to try for a palliation of my confuſion, ſince it ſerved me not?

I told him I had hopes it would not be long before Mr. Morden arrived; and doubted not, that gentleman would be the readier to engage in my favour, when he found that I made no other uſe of his (Mr. Lovelace's) aſſiſtance, than to free myſelf from the addreſſes of a man ſo diſagreeable to me as Mr. Solmes: I muſt therefore wiſh, that every-thing might remain as it was, till I could hear from my couſin.

This, although teazed by him as I was, was not, you ſee, my dear, a denial. But he muſt throw himſelf into a heat, rather than try to perſuade; which any other man, in his ſituation, I ſhould think would have done: and this warmth obliged me to adhere to my ſeeming negative.

This was what he ſaid, with a vehemence that muſt harden any woman's mind, who had a ſpirit above being frightened into paſſiveneſs.

'Good God! And will you, Madam, 'ſtill reſolve to ſhew me, that I am to 'hope for no ſhare in your favour, while 'any the remoteſt proſpect remains, 'that you will be received by my bit'tereſt enemies, at the price of my utter 'rejection?'

This was what I returned, with warmth, and with a ſalving art too—'You 'have ſeen, Mr. Lovelace, how much 'my brother's violence can affect me: 'but you will be miſtaken, if you let 'looſe yours upon me, with a thought 'of terrifying me into meaſures the

'contrary

'contrary of which you have acquiesced 'with.'

He only beſought me to ſuffer his future actions to ſpeak for him; and, if I ſaw him worthy of any favour, that I would not let him be the only perſon within my knowledge who was not entitled to my conſideration.

'You refer to a future time, Mr. Love-'lace, ſo do I, for the future proof of a 'merit you ſeem to think for the paſt time 'wanting: and juſtly you think ſo.' And I was again going from him.

One word more he begged me to hear —He was determined ſtudiouſly to avoid all miſchief, and every ſtep that might lead to miſchief, let my brother's proceedings, ſhort of violence upon my perſon, be what they would: but if any attempt that ſhould extend to that, were to be made, would I have him to be a quiet ſpectator of my being ſeized, or carried back, or on board, by this Singleton; or, in any caſe of extremity, was he not permitted to ſtand up in my defence?

'Stand up in my defence, Mr. Lovelace! '—I ſhould be very miſerable, were 'there to be a call for that. But do you 'think I might not be ſafe and private in 'London? By your friend's deſcription 'of the widow's houſe, I ſhould think I 'might be ſafe there.'

The widow's houſe, he replied, as deſcribed by his friend, being a back-houſe within a front-one, and looking to a garden, rather than to a ſtreet, had the appearance of privacy: but if, when there, it was not approved, it would be eaſy to find another more to my liking—Though, as to his part, the method he would adviſe ſhould be, to write to my uncle Harlowe as one of my truſtees, and wait the iſſue of it here at Mrs. Sorlings's, fearleſsly directing it to be anſwered hither. To be afraid of little ſpirits, was but to encourage inſults, he ſaid. The ſubſtance of the letter ſhould be, To demand as a right, what they would refuſe if requeſted as a courteſy: to acknowledge that I had put myſelf [too well, he ſaid, did their treatment juſtify me] into the protection of the ladies of his family, [by whoſe orders, and Lord M.'s, he himſelf would appear to act:] but that upon my own terms; which were ſuch, that I was under no obligation to thoſe ladies for the favour; it being no more than they would have granted to any one of my ſex, equally diſtreſſed. If I approved not of this method, happy ſhould he think himſelf, he ſaid, if I would honour him with the opportunity of making ſuch a claim in his own name—But this was a point [with his buts again in the ſame breath!] that he durſt but juſt touch upon. He hoped, however, that I would think their violence a ſufficient inducement for me to take ſuch a wiſhed-for reſolution.

Inwardly vexed, I told him, That he himſelf had propoſed to leave me when I was in town: that I expected he would: and that, when I was known to be abſolutely independent, I ſhould conſider what to write, and what to do; but that, while he was with me, I neither would nor could.

He would be very ſincere with me, he ſaid: this project of my brother's had changed the face of things. He muſt, before he left me, ſee whether I ſhould or ſhould not approve of the London widow, and her family, if I chuſe to go thither. They might be people whom my brother might buy. But if he ſaw they were perſons of integrity, he then might go for a day or two, or ſo. But he muſt needs ſay, he could not leave me longer at a time.

'Do you propoſe, Sir,' ſaid I, 'to 'take up your lodgings in the houſe 'where I ſhall lodge?'

He did not, he ſaid; as he knew the uſe I intended to make of his abſence, and my punctilio—And yet the houſe where he had lodgings was new-fronting, and not in condition to receive him: but he could go to his friend Belford's, in Soho; or perhaps he might reach to the ſame gentleman's houſe at Edgware, over-night, and return on the mornings, till he had reaſon to think this wild project of my brother's laid aſide, But to no greater diſtance till then ſhould he care to venture.

The reſult of all was, to ſet out on Monday next for town. I hope it will be in a happy hour. CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER XLII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

FRIDAY, APRIL 21.

AS it was not probable, that the lady could give ſo particular an account of her own confuſion, in the affecting ſcene ſhe mentions on Mr. Lovelace's offering himſelf to her acceptance; the following extracts are made from his letter of the above date.

AND now, Belford, what wilt thou ſay, if like the fly buzzing about the bright taper, I had like to have ſinged the ſilken wings of my liberty? Never was man in greater danger of being caught caught in his own ſnares: all my views anticipated; all my ſchemes untried; the admirable creature not brought to town; nor one effort made to know if ſhe be really angel or woman.

I offered myſelf to her acceptance, with a ſuddenneſs, 'tis true, that gave her no time to wrap herſelf in reſerves; and in terms leſs tender than fervent, tending to upbraid her for her paſt indifference, and to remind her of her injunctions; for it was the fear of her brother, not her love of me, that had inclined her to diſpenſe with thoſe injunctions.

I never beheld ſo ſweet a confuſion. What a glory to the pencil, could it do juſtice to it, and to the mingled impatience which viſibly informed every feature of the moſt meaning and moſt beautiful face in the world! She hemmed twice or thrice: her look, now ſo charmingly ſilly, then ſo ſweetly ſignificant; till at laſt the lovely teazer, teazed by my heſitating expectation of her anſwer, out of all power of articulate ſpeech, burſt into tears, and was turning from me with precipitation, when, preſuming to fold her in my happy arms—'O 'think not, beſt beloved of my heart,' ſaid I, 'think not, that this motion, 'which you may believe to be ſo con'trary to your former injunctions, pro'ceeds from a deſign to avail myſelf of 'the cruelty of your relations: if I have 'diſobliged you by it, (and you know 'with what reſpectful tenderneſs I have 'preſumed to hint it) it ſhall be my ut'moſt care for the future——' There I ſtopt.

Then ſhe ſpoke; but with vexation—'I am—I am—very unhappy!'—Tears trickling down her crimſon cheeks; and her ſweet face, as my arms ſtill encircled the fineſt waiſt in the world, ſinking upon my ſhoulder; the dear creature ſo abſent that ſhe knew not the honour ſhe permitted me.

'But why, but why unhappy, my 'deareſt life?' ſaid I—'All the grati'tude that ever overflowed the heart of 'the moſt obliged of men—'

Juſtice to myſelf there ſtopped my mouth: for what gratitude did I owe her for obligations ſo involuntary?

Then recovering herſelf, and her uſual reſerves, and ſtruggling to free herſelf from my claſping arms, 'How 'now, Sir!' ſaid ſhe, with a cheek more indignantly glowing, and eyes of a fiercer luſtre.

I gave way to her angry ſtruggle; but, abſolutely overcome by ſo charming a diſplay of innocent confuſion, I caught hold of her hand as ſhe was flying from me; and kneeling at her feet, 'O my 'angel!' ſaid I, (quite deſtitute of reſerve, and hardly knowing the tenor of my own ſpeech; and had a parſon been there, I had certainly been a gone man) 'receive the vows of your faithful Love'lace. Make him yours, and only yours, 'for ever. This will anſwer every end. 'Who will dare to form plots and ſtra'tagems againſt my wife? That you are 'not ſo, is the ground of all their fooliſh 'attempts, and of their inſolent hopes 'in Solmes's favour.—O be mine!—I 'beſeech you (thus on my knee I beſeech 'you) to be mine. We ſhall then have 'all the world with us. And every-body 'will applaud an event that every-body 'expects.'

Was the devil in me! I no more intended all this extatick nonſenſe, than I thought the ſame moment of flying in the air! All power is with this charming creature. It is I, not ſhe, at this rate, that muſt fail in the arduous trial.

Didſt thou ever before hear of a man uttering ſolemn things by an involuntary impulſe, in defiance of premeditation, and of all his proud ſchemes? But this ſweet creature is able to make a man forego every purpoſe of his heart that is not favourable to her. And I verily think I ſhould be inclined to ſpare her all further trial, [And yet what trial has ſhe had?] were it not for the contention that her vigilance has ſet on foot, which ſhall overcome the other. Thou knoweſt my generoſity to my uncontending Roſebud—And ſometimes do I qualify my ardent aſpirations after even this very fine creature, by this reflection—That the moſt charming woman on earth, were ſhe an empreſs, can excel the meaneſt, in the cuſtomary viſibles only.—Such is the equality of the diſpenſation, to the prince and the peaſant, in this prime gift, WOMAN.

Well, but what was the reſult of this involuntary impulſe on my part?—Wouldſt thou not think, I was taken at my offer?—An offer ſo ſolemnly made, and on one knee too?

No ſuch thing!—The pretty trifler let me off as eaſily as I could have wiſhed.

Her brother's project; and to find, that there were no hopes of a reconciliation for her; and the apprehenſion ſhe had of the miſchiefs that might enſue—Theſe, not my offer, nor love of me, were the cauſes to which ſhe aſcribed all her ſweet confuſion—An aſcription that is high treaſon againſt my ſovereign pride—To make marriage with me, but a ſecond-place refuge; and as good as to tell me, that her confusion was owing to her concern that there were no hopes that my enemies would accept of her intended offer to renounce a man who had ventured his life for her, and was still ready to run the same risque in her behalf!

I re-urged her to make me happy—But I was to be postponed to her cousin Morden's arrival. On him are now placed all her hopes.

I raved; but to no purpose.

Another letter was to be sent, or had been sent, to her aunt Hervey; to which she hoped an answer.

Yet sometimes I think, that fainter and fainter would have been her procrastinations, had I been a man of courage —But so fearful was I of offending!

A confounded thing! The man to be so bashful; the woman to want so much courting!—How shall two such come together; no kind mediatress in the way?

But I must be contented. It is seldom, however, that a love so ardent as mine meets with a spirit so resigned in the same person. But true love, I am now convicted, only wishes: nor has it any active will but that of the adored object.

But, O the charming creature, again of herself to mention London! Had Singleton's plot been of my own contriving, a more happy expedient could not have been thought of to induce her to resume her purpose of going thither; nor can I divine what could be her reason for postponing it.

I inclose the letter from Joseph Leman, which I mentioned to thee in mine of Monday last, with my answer to it. I cannot resist the vanity that urges me to the communication. Otherwise, it were better, perhaps, that I suffer thee to imagine, that this lady's stars fight against her, and dispense the opportunities in my favour which are only the consequences of my own superlative invention.

LETTER XLIII.

TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ. HIS HONNER.

SAT. APRIL 15.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR HONNER,

THIS is to let your honner kno', as how I have been employed in a bisness I would have been excused from, if so be I could, for it is to gitt evidense from a young man, who has of late com'd out to be my cuzzen by my grandmother's side; and but lately come to live in these partes, about a very vile thing, as younge master calls it, relating to your honner. God forbid I should call it so without your leafe. It is not for so plane a man as I be, to tacks my betters. It is consarning one Miss Batirton, of Notingam; a very pritty crature, belike.

Your honner got her away, it seems, by a false letter to her, macking believe as howe her she cuzzen that she derely loved, was coming to see her; and was tacken ill upon the rode: and so Miss Batirton set out in a chase, and one sarvant, to set her cuzzen from the inne where she laid sick, as she thote: and the sarvant was tricked, and braute back the chase; but Miss Batirton was not harde of for a month, or so. And when it came to passe, that her friends founde her oute, and would have prossekutid your honner, your honner was gone abroad: and so she was broute to-bed, as one may say, before your honner's return: and she got colde in her lyin-inn, and languitched, and soon died: and the child is living; but your honner never troubles your honner's hedd about it in the least. And this and some such other matters of verry bad reporte, Squier Solmes was to tell my young lady of, if so be she would have harde him speke, before we lost her sweet company, as I may say, from heere.

I hope your honner will excuse me But I was forsed to tell all I harde, because they had my cuzzen in to them, and he would have said he had tolde me: so could not be melely-mouthed, for fere to be blone up, and plese your honner.

Your honner helped me to many ugly stories to tell against your honner to my younge master, and younge mistriss; but did not tell me about this.

I most humbelly beseeche your honner to be good and kinde and sethful to my dearest younge lady, now you have her; or I shall brake my harte for having done some dedes that have helped to bring things to this passe. Pray youre dere good honner, be just! Pravey do!—As God shall love ye! pravey do!—I cannot write no more for this present, for verry fear and grief.

But now I cumm'd to my writing agen, will your honner be pleased to tell me, if as how there be any danger to your honner's life from this bisness; for my cuzzen is actlie hier'd to go down to Miss Batirton's frendes, to see if they will stir in it: for you must kno' your honner, honner, as how he lived in the Batirton family at the time, and could be a good evidenſe, and all that.

I hope it was not ſo verry bad, as Titus ſays it was; for he ſes as how there was a rape in the caſe betwixt you at furſte, and pleſe your honner; and my cuzzen Titus is a very honiſt younge man as ever brocke bred. This is his carackter; and this made me willinger to owne him for my relation, when we came to talck.

If there ſhould be danger of your honner's life, I hope your honner will not be hanged like as one of us common men; only have your hedd cut off, or ſo: and yet it is pity ſuch a hedd ſhould be loſſed: but if as how it ſhoulde be proſſekutid to that furr, which God forbid, be pleſed, natheleſs, to thinck of youre feithful Joſeph Leman, before your hedd be condemned; for after condemnation, as I have been told, all will be the king's or the ſhreeve's.

I thote as how it was beſt to acquent your honner of this; and for you to let me kno' if I could do any-thing to ſarve your honner, and prevent miſchief with my cuzzen Titus, on his coming back from Nottingam, before he mackes his reporte.

I have gin him a hint already: 'For 'what,' as I ſed to him, 'cuzzen Titus, 'ſignifies ſtirring up the coles, and mack-'ing of ſtrife, to make rich gentilfolkes 'live at varience, and to be cutting of 'throtes, and ſuch-like?'

'Very trewe,' ſed little Titus. And this and pleſe your honner gis me hopes of him, if ſo be your honner gis me direction; ſen', as God kno'es, I have a poor, a verry poor invenſhon; only a willing mind to prevent miſchief, that is the chief of my aim, and always was, I bleſs my God! — Els I could have made much miſchief in my time; as indeed any ſarvant may. Your honner, natheleſs, praiſes my invenſhon every now-and-then: alas! and pleſe your honner, what invenſhon ſhould ſuche a plane man as I have?—But when your honner ſets me agoing by your fine invenſhon, I can do well enuff. And I am ſure I have a hearty good-will to deſerve your honner's faver, if I mought.

Two days, as I may ſay, off and on, have I been writing this long letter. And yet I have not ſed all I would ſay. For, be it knone unto your honner, as how I do not like that Capten Singelton, which I told you of in my two laſt letters. He is always laying his hedd and my young maſter's hedd together; and I ſuſpect much if ſo be ſome miſchief is not going on between them: and ſtill the more, as becauſe my eldeſt young lady ſemes to be joined to them ſometimes.

Laſt week my young maſter ſed before my faſe, 'My harte's blood boils over, 'Capten Singelton, for revenge upon this——' And he called your honner by a name it is not for ſuch a won as me to ſay what. Capten Singelton whiſpered my younge maſter, being I was by. So younge maſter ſed, 'You may ſay any-thing befor 'Joſeph; for althoff he looks ſo ſcallie, he 'has as good a harte, and as good a hedd 'as any ſarvant in the worlde nede to have.' My conſcience touched me juſt then. But why ſhoulde it? when all I do is to prevent miſcheff; and ſeing your honner has ſo much patience, which younge maſter has not; ſo am not affeard of telling your honner any-thing whatſomever.

And furthermore, I have ſuche a deſire to deſarve your honner's bounty to me, as mackes me let nothing paſs I can tell you of, to prevent harm: and toobeſides your honner's goodneſs about the Blew Bore; which I have ſo good an accounte of!—I am ſure I ſhall be bounden to bleſs your honner the longeſt day I have to live.

And then the Blew Bore is not all neither; ſen', and pleſe your honner, the pretty Sowe (God forgive me for geſting in ſo ſerus a matter) runs in my hedd likewiſe. I believe I ſhall love her maymap more than your honner would have me; for ſhe begins to be kind and good-humered, and liſtens, and pleſe your honner, licke as if ſhe was among beans, when I talke about the Blew Bore, and all that.

Prayey your honner forgive the geſting of a poor plane man. We common fokes have our joys, and pleſe your honner, lick as our betters have; and if we be ſometimes ſnubbed, we can find our underlings to ſnub them agen; and if not, we can get a wife mayhap, and ſnub her: ſo are maſters ſome how or other ourſells.

But how I try your honner's patience! —Sarvants will ſhew their joyful hartes, tho' off but in partinens, when encouredg'd.

Be pleſed from the prems's to let me kno' if as how I can be put upon any ſarvice to ſarve your honner, and to ſarve my deereſt younge lady; which God grant! For I begin to be affeard for her, hearing what peple talck—To be ſure your honner will not do her no harum, as a man may ſay. But I kno' your honner muſt be good to ſo wonderous a younge lady. How can you help it!—But herre my conſcience ſmites me, that but for ſome of my ſtories, which your honner taute me, my old maſter and my old lady, and the two old ſquires, would not have been able to be half ſo hard harted as they be. for all what my young maſter and young miſtreſs ſayes.

And here is the ſad thing; they cannot come to clere up matters with my deereſt young lady, becauſe, as your honner has ordered it, they have theſe ſtories as if bribed by me out of your honner's ſarvant; which muſt not be known for fere you ſhould kill'n and me too, and blacken the briber!—Ah! your honner!—I dout as that I am a very vild fellow, (Lord bleſs my ſoul, I pray God) and did not intend it.

But if my deereſt young lady ſhould come to harm and pleſe your honner, the horſepond at the Blew Bore—But Lord preſerve us all from all bad miſchieff, and all bad ends, I pray the Lord!—For tho'ſi your honner is kinde to me in worldly pelff, yet what ſhall a man get to loos his ſoul, as Holy Skritture ſays, and pleſe your honner?

But, natheleſs, I am in hope of reppentence hereafter, being but a younge man, if I do wrong thro' ignorens; your honner being a great man, and a great wit; and I a poor crature, not worthy notice; and your honner able to anſwer for all. But, howſomever, I am your honner's feithful ſarvant in all dowtie,

JOSEPH LEMAN.

APRIL 15 AND 16.

LETTER XLIV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOSEPH LEMAN.

MONDAY, APRIL 17.

HONEST JOSEPH,

YOU have a worſe opinion of your invention than you ought to have. I muſt praiſe it again. Of a plain man's head, I have not known many better than yours. How often have your foreca ſt and diſcretion anſwered my wiſhes in caſes which I could not foreſee, not knowing how my general directions would ſucceed, or what might happen in the execution of them! You are too doubtful of your own abilities, honeſt Joſeph; that's your fault. But it being a fault that is owing to natural modeſty, you ought rather to be pitied for it than blamed.

The affair of Miſs Betterton was a youthful frolick. I love dearly to exerciſe my invention. I do aſſure you, Joſeph, that I have ever had more pleaſure in my contrivances, than in the end of them. I am no ſenſual man; but a man of ſpirit—One woman is like another—You underſtand me, Joſeph——In courſing all the ſport is made by the winding hare. A barn-door chick is better eating. Now you take me, Joſeph.

Miſs Betterton was but a tradeſman's daughter. The family, indeed, were grown rich, and aimed at a new line of gentry; and were unreaſonable enough to expect a man of my family would marry her. I was honeſt. I gave the young lady no hope of that; for ſhe put it to me. She reſented: kept up, and was kept up. A little innocent contrivance was neceſſary to get her out—But no rape in the caſe, I aſſure you, Joſeph—She loved me: I loved her. Indeed, when I got her to the inn, I aſked her no queſtions. It is cruel to aſk a modeſt woman for her conſent. It is creating difficulties to both. Had not her friends been officious, I had been conſtant and faithful to her to this day, as far as I know—For then I had not known my angel.

I went not abroad upon her account. She loved me too well, to have appeared againſt me. She refuſed to ſign a paper they had drawn up for her, to found a proſecution upon. and the brutal creatures would not permit the midwife's aſſiſtance, till her life was in danger; and I believe to this her death was owing.

I went into mourning for her, though abroad at the time. A diſtinction I have ever paid to thoſe worthy creatures who died in childbed by me.

I was ever nice in my loves. Theſe were the rules I laid down to myſelf on my entrance into active life: To ſet the mother above want, if her friends were cruel, and if I could not get her a huſband worthy of her: to ſhun common women; a piece of juſtice I owed to innocent ladies, as well as to myſelf: to marry off a former miſtreſs, if poſſible, before I took to a new one: to maintain a lady handſomely in her lying-in: to provide for the little one, if it lived, according to the degree of it's mother: to go into mourning for the mother, if ſhe died. And the promiſe of this was a great comfort to the pretty dears, as they grew near their times.

All my errors, all my expences, have been with and upon women. So I could acquit my conſcience, (acting thus honourably nourably by them) as well as my diſcretion, as to point of fortune.

All men love women: and find me a man of more honour in theſe points, if you can, Joſeph.

No wonder the ſex love me as they do!

But now I am ſtrictly virtuous. I am reformed. So I have been for a long, long time: reſolving to marry, as ſoon as I can prevail upon the moſt admirable of women to have me. I think of nobody elſe: it is impoſſible I ſhould. I have ſpared very pretty girls for her ſake. Very true, Joſeph! So ſet your honeſt heart at reſt—You ſee the pains I take to ſatisfy your qualms.

But as to Miſs Betterton—No rape in the caſe I repeat. Rapes are unnatural things: and more are than are imagined, Joſeph. I ſhould be loth to be put to ſuch a ſtreight. I never was. Miſs Betterton was taken from me againſt her own will. In that caſe, her friends, not I, committed the rape.

I have contrived to ſee the boy twice, unknown to the aunt, who takes care of him; loves him; and would not now part with him, on any conſideration. The boy is a fine boy, I thank God. No father need be aſhamed of him. He will be well provided for. If not, I would take care of him. He will have his mother's fortune. They curſe the father, ungrateful wretches! but bleſs the boy—Upon the whole, there is nothing vile in this matter on my ſide; a great deal on the Bettertons.

Wherefore, Joſeph, be not thou in pain, either for my head, or for thy own neck; nor for the Blue Boar; nor for the pretty Sow.

I love your jeſting. Jeſting better becomes a poor man, than qualms.—I love to have you jeſt. All we ſay, all we do, all we wiſh for, is a jeſt. He that makes life itſelf not ſo, is a ſad fellow, and has the worſt of it.

I doubt not, Joſeph, but you have had your joys, as you ſay, as well as your betters. May you have more and more, honeſt Joſeph!—He that grudges a poor man joy, ought to have none himſelf. Jeſt on, therefore: jeſting, I repeat, better becomes thee than qualms.

I had no need to tell you of Miſs Betterton: did I not furniſh you with ſtories enough without hers, againſt myſelf, to augment your credit with your cunning maſters? Beſides, I was loth to mention Miſs Betterton, her friends being all living, and in credit. I loved her too; for ſhe was taken from me by her cruel friends while our joys were young.

But enough of dear Miſs Betterton. Dear, I ſay; for death endears.—Reſt to her worthy ſoul!—There, Joſeph, off went a deep ſigh to the memory of Miſs Betterton!

As to the journey of little Titus, (I now recollect the fellow by his name) let that take its courſe: a lady dying in child-bed eighteen months ago; no proceſs begun in her life-time; refuſing herſelf to give evidence againſt me while ſhe lived—Pretty circumſtances to found an indictment for a rape upon!

As to your young lady, the ever-admirable Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe, I always courted her for a wife. Others rather expected marriage from the vanity of their own hearts, than from my promiſes. For I was always careful of what I promiſed. You know, Joſeph, that I have gone beyond my promiſes to you. I do to every-body: and why? Becauſe it is the beſt way of ſhewing, that I have no grudging or narrow ſpirit. A promiſe is an obligation. A juſt man will keep his promiſe. A generous man will go beyond it. This is my rule.

If you doubt my honour to your young lady, it is more than ſhe does. She would not ſtay with me an hour if ſhe did. Mine is the ſteadieſt heart in the world. Haſt thou not reaſon to think it ſo?—Why this ſqueamiſhneſs then, honeſt Joſeph?

But it is becauſe thou art honeſt: ſo I forgive thee. Whoever loves my divine Clariſſa, loves me.

Let James Harlowe call me what names he will. For his ſiſter's ſake I will bear them. Do not be concerned for me. Her favour will make me rich amends. His own vilely malicious heart will make his blood boil over at any time: and when it does, thinkeſt thou that I will let it touch my conſcience?—And if not mine, why ſhould it touch thine? Ah! Joſeph, Joſeph! what a fooliſh teazer is thy conſcience!—Such a conſcience, as gives a plain man trouble, when he intends to do for the beſt, is weakneſs, not conſcience.

But ſay what thou wilt, write all thou knoweſt or heareſt of, to me: I'll have patience with every-body. Why ſhould I not, when it is as much the deſire of my heart, as it is of thine, to prevent miſchief?

So now, Joſeph, having taken all this pains to ſatisfy thy conſcience, and anſwer all thy doubts, and to baniſh all thy fears; let me come to a new point.

Your endeavours and mine, which were were deſigned, by round-about ways, to reconcile all, even againſt the wills of the moſt obſtinate, have not, we ſee, anſwered the end we hoped they would anſwer; but, on the contrary, have widened the unhappy differences between our families. But this has not been either your fault or mine: it is owing to the black pitch-like blood of your venomous-hearted young maſter, boiling over, as he owns, that our honeſt wiſhes have hitherto been fruſtrated.

Yet we muſt proceed in the ſame courſe: we ſhall tire them out in time, and they will propoſe terms; and when they do, they ſhall find how reaſonable mine ſhall be, little as they deſerve from me.

Perſevere therefore, Joſeph; honeſt Joſeph, perſevere; and, unlikely as you may imagine the means, our deſires will be at laſt obtained.

We have nothing for it now, but to go through with our work in the way we have begun. For ſince (as I told you in my laſt) my beloved miſtruſts you, ſhe will blow you up, if ſhe be not mine. If ſhe be, I can and will protect you; and as, if there will be any fault, in her opinion, it will be rather mine than yours, ſhe muſt forgive you, and keep her huſband's ſecrets, for the ſake of his reputation: elſe ſhe will be guilty of a great failure in her duty. So now, you have ſet your hand to the plough, Joſeph, there is no looking back.

And what is the conſequence of all this? One labour more, and that will be all that will fall to your lot; at leaſt, of conſequence.

My beloved is reſolved not to think of marriage till ſhe has tried to move her friends to a reconciliation with her. You know they are determined not to be reconciled. She has it in her head, I doubt not, to make me ſubmit to the people I hate; and if I did, they would rather inſult me, than receive my condeſcenſion as they ought. She even owns, that ſhe will renounce me, if they inſiſt upon it, provided they will give up Solmes! So, to all appearance, I am ſtill as far as ever from the happineſs of calling her mine: indeed I am more likely than ever to loſe her; (if I cannot contrive ſome way to avail myſelf of the preſent critical ſituation) and then, Joſeph, all I have been ſtudying, and all you have been doing, will ſignify nothing.

At the place where we are, we cannot long be private. The lodgings are inconvenient for us, while both together, and while ſhe refuſes to marry. She wants to get me at a diſtance from her. There are extraordinary convenient lodgings in my eye in London, where we could be private, and all miſchief avoided. When there, (if I get her thither) ſhe will inſiſt, that I ſhall leave her. Miſs Howe is for ever putting her upon contrivances. That, you know, is the reaſon I have been obliged, by your means, to play the family off at Harlowe Place upon Mrs. Howe, and Mrs. Howe upon her daughter—Ah! Joſeph! —Little need for your fears for my angel: I only am in danger—But were I the free liver I am reported to be, all this could I get over with a wet finger, as the ſaying is.

But, by the help of one of your hints, I have thought of an expedient which will do every-thing; and raiſe your reputation, though already ſo high, higher ſtill. This Singleton, I hear, is a fellow who loves enterprizing: the view he has to get James Harlowe to be his principal owner in a larger veſſel which he wants to be put into command of, may be the ſubject of their preſent cloſe converſation. But ſince he is taught to have ſo good an opinion of you, Joſeph, cannot you (ſtill pretending an abhorrence of me, and of my contrivances) propoſe to Singleton to propoſe to James Harlowe (who ſo much thirſts for revenge upon me) to aſſiſt him with his whole ſhip's crew, upon occaſion, to carry off his ſiſter to Leith, where both have houſes, or elſewhere?

You may tell them, that if this can be effected, it will make me raving mad; and bring your young lady into all their meaſures.

You can inform them, as from my ſervant, of the diſtance ſhe keeps me at, in hopes of procuring her father's forgiveneſs, by cruelly giving me up, if inſiſted upon.

You can tell them, that as the only ſecret my ſervant has kept from you, is, the place we are in, you make no doubt, that a two-guinea bribe will bring that out, and alſo an information when I ſhall be at a diſtance from her, that the enterprize may be conducted with ſafety.

You may tell them, (ſtill as from my ſervant) that we are about removing from inconvenient lodgings to others more convenient; (which is true) and that I muſt be often abſent from her.

If they liſten to your propoſal, you will promote your intereſt with Betty, by telling it to her as a ſecret. Betty will tell Arabella of it. Arabella will be be overjoyed at any-thing that will help forward her revenge upon me; and will reveal it (if her brother do not) to her uncle Antony. He probably will whiſper it to Mrs. Howe. She can keep nothing from her daughter, though they are always jangling. Her daughter will acquaint my beloved with it. And if it will not, or if it will, come to my ears from ſome of thoſe, you can write it to me, as in confidence, by way of preventing miſchief; which is the ſtudy of us both.

I can then ſhew it to my beloved. Then will ſhe be for placing a greater confidence in me. That will convince me of her love, which now I am ſometimes ready to doubt. She will be for haſtening to the ſafer lodgings. I ſhall have a pretence to ſtay about her perſon, as a guard. She will be convinced, that there is no expectation to be had of a reconciliation. You can give James Harlowe and Singleton continual falſe ſcents, as I ſhall direct you; ſo that no miſchief can poſſibly happen.

And what will be the happy, happy, thrice happy conſequence?—The lady will be mine in an honourable way. We ſhall all be friends in good time. The two guineas will be an agreeable addition to the many gratuities I have helped you to by the like contrivances from this ſtingy family. Your reputation, both for head and heart, as I hinted before, will be heightened. The Blue Boar will alſo be yours. Nor ſhall you have the leaſt difficulty about raiſing money to buy the ſtock, if it be worth your while to have it.

Betty will likewiſe then be yours. You have both ſaved money, it ſeems. The whole Harlowe family, whom you have ſo faithfully ſerved, ['Tis ſerving them, ſurely, to prevent the miſchief which their violent ſon would have brought upon them] will throw you in ſomewhat towards houſekeeping. I will ſtill add to your ſtore. So nothing but happineſs before you!

Crow, Joſeph, crow! A dunghill of thy own in view: ſervants to ſnub at thy pleaſure. A wife to quarrel with, or to love as thy humour leads thee: landlord and landlady at every word. To be paid, inſtead of paying, for thy eating and drinking. But not thus happy only in thyſelf; happy in promoting peace and reconciliation between two good families, in the long run; without hurting any Chriſtian ſoul. O Joſeph, honeſt Joſeph! what envy wilt thou raiſe! —And who would be ſqueamiſh with ſuch proſpects before him!

This one labour, I repeat, crowns the work. If you can get but ſuch a deſign entertained by them, whether they proſecute it, or not, it will be equally to the purpoſe of your loving friend, R. LOVELACE.

LETTER XLV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MRS. HERVEY.

[INCLOSED IN HER LAST TO MISS HOWE.]

THURSDAY, APRIL 20.

HONOURED MADAM,

HAVING not had the favour of an anſwer to a letter I took the liberty to write to you on the 14th, I am in ſome hopes that it may have miſcarried; for I had much rather it ſhould, than to have the mortification to think that my aunt Hervey deemed me unworthy of the honour of her notice.

In this hope, having kept a copy of it, and not being able to expreſs myſelf in terms better ſuited to the unhappy circumſtances of things, I tranſcribe and incloſe what I then wrote. And I humbly beſeech you to favour the contents of it with your intereſt.

Hitherto it is in my power to perform what I undertake for in this letter; and it would be very grievous to me to be precipitated upon meaſures, which may render the deſirable reconciliation more difficult.

If, Madam, I were permitted to write to you with the hopes of being anſwered, I could clear my intention with regard to the ſtep I have taken, although I could not perhaps acquit myſelf to ſome of my ſevereſt judges, of an imprudence previous to it. You, I am ſure, would pity me, if you knew all I could ſay, and how miſerable I am in the forfeiture of the good opinion of all my friends.

I flatter myſelf, that their favour is yet retrievable. But whatever be the determination at Harlowe Place, do not you, my deareſt aunt, deny me the favour of a few lines, to inform me if there can be any hope of a reconciliation upon terms leſs ſhocking than thoſe heretofore endeavoured to be impoſed upon me; or if (which God forbid!) I am to be for ever reprobated.

At leaſt, my dear aunt, procure for me the juſtice of my wearing apparel, and the little money and other things which I wrote to my ſiſter for, and mention in the incloſed to you; that I may not be deſtitute of common conveniences, or be under a neceſſity to owe an obligation for ſuch, where (at preſent, however) I would leaſt of all owe it.

Allow me to ſay, that had I deſigned what happened, I might (as to the money and jewels at leaſt) have ſaved myſelf ſome of the mortifications which I have ſuffered, and which I ſtill further apprehend, if my requeſt be not complied with.

If you are permitted to encourage an eclairciſſement of what I hint, I will open my whole heart to you, and inform you of every-thing.

If it be any pleaſure to have me mortified, be pleaſed to let it be known, that I am extremely mortified: and yet it is entirely from my own reflections that I am ſo; having nothing to find fault with, in the behaviour of the perſon from whom every evil was apprehended.

The bearer having buſineſs your way, will bring me your anſwer on Saturday morning, if you favour me according to my hopes. I knew not that I ſhould have this opportunity till I had written the above,

I am, my deareſt aunt, your ever-dutiful CL. HARLOWE.

Be pleaſed to direct for me, if I am to be favoured with a few lines, 'To be left at Mr. Oſgood's, near 'Soho Square,' and nobody ſhall ever know of your goodneſs to me, if you deſire it to be kept a ſecret.

LETTER XLVI.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

SATURDAY, APRIL 22.

I Cannot for my life account for your wretch's teazing ways. But he certainly doubts your love of him. In this he is a modeſt man, as well as ſomebody elſe; and tacitly confeſſes, that he does not deſerve it.

Your Iſraelitiſh hankerings after the Egyptian onion; (teſtified ſtill more in your letter to your aunt) your often-repeated regrets for meeting him; for being betrayed away by him—Theſe he cannot bear.

I have been looking back on the whole of his conduct, and comparing it with his general character; and find that he is more conſiſtently, more uniformly, mean, revengeful, and proud, than either of us once imagined.

From his cradle, as I may ſay, as an only child, and a boy, humourſome, ſpoiled, miſchievous; the governor of his governors.

A libertine in his riper years, hardly regardful of appearances; and deſpiſing the ſex in general, for the faults of particulars of it, who made themſelves too cheap to him.

What has been his behaviour in your family, a CLARISSA in view, (from the time your fooliſh brother was obliged to take a life from him) but defiance for defiances?—Getting you into his power by terror, by artifice. What politeneſs can be expected from ſuch a man?

Well, but what in ſuch a ſituation is to be done? Why, you muſt deſpiſe him: you muſt hate him—if you can—and run away from him—But whither? Whither indeed, now that your brother is laying fooliſh plots to put you in a ſtill worſe condition, as it may happen?

But if you cannot deſpiſe and hate him; if you care not to break with him; you muſt part with ſome punctilios, and if the ſo doing bring not on the ſolemnity, you muſt put yourſelf into the protection of the ladies of his family.

Their reſpect for you is of itſelf a ſecurity for his honour to you, if there could be any room for doubt. And at leaſt you ſhould remind him of his offer to bring one of the Miſs Montagues to attend you at your new lodgings in town, and accompany you till all is happily over.

This, you'll ſay, will be as good as declaring yourſelf to be his And ſo let it. You ought not now to think of anything elſe but to be his. Does not your brother's project convince you more and more of this?

Give over then, my deareſt friend, any thoughts of this hopeleſs reconciliation, which has kept you balancing thus long. You own, in the letter before me, that he made very explicit offers, though you give me not the very words. And he gave his reaſons, I perceive, with his wiſhes, that you ſhould accept them: which very few of the ſorry fellows do; whoſe plea is generally but a compliment to our ſelf-love—That we muſt love them, however preſumptuous and unworthy, becauſe they love us.

Were I in your place, and had your charming delicacies, I ſhould, perhaps, do as you do. No doubt but I ſhould expect that the man ſhould urge me with reſpectful warmth; that he ſhould ſup-plicate with conſtancy, and that all his words and actions ſhould tend to the one principal point—Nevertheleſs, if I ſuſpected art or delay, founded upon his doubts of my love, I would either condeſcend to clear up his doubts or renounce him for ever.

And in this laſt caſe, I, your Anna Howe, would exert myſelf, and either find you a private refuge, or reſolve to ſhare fortunes with you.

What a wretch, to be ſo eaſily anſwered by your reference to the arrival of your couſin Morden! But I am afraid that you was too ſcrupulous:—for did he not reſent that reference?

Could we have his account of the matter, I fancy, my dear, I ſhould think you over-nice, over-delicate. Had you laid hold of his acknowledged explicitneſs, he would have been as much in your power, as now you ſeem to be in his—You wanted not to be told, that the perſon who had been tricked into ſuch a ſtep as you had taken, muſt of neceſſity ſubmit to many mortifications.

But were it to me, a girl of ſpirit as I am thought to be, I do aſſure you, I would in a quarter of an hour (all the time I would allow to punctilio in ſuch a caſe as yours) know what he drives at: ſince either he muſt mean well or ill. If ill, the ſooner you know it, the better. If well, whoſe modeſty is it he diſtreſſes, but that of his own wife?

And meth'nks you ſhould endeavour to avoid all exaſperating recriminations, as to what you have heard of his failure in morals; eſpecially while you are ſo happy, as not to have occaſion to ſpeak of them by experience.

I grant, that it gives a worthy mind ſome ſatisfaction in having borne it's teſtimony againſt the immoralities of a bad one. But that correction which is unſeaſonably given, is more likely either to harden or make an hypocrite, than to reclaim.

I am pleaſed, however, as well as you, with his making light of your brother's wiſe project.—Poor creature! and muſt Maſter Jemmy Harlowe, with his half wit, pretend to plot, and contrive miſchief, yet rail at Lovelace for the ſame things?—A witty villain deſerves hanging at once; (and without ceremony if you pleaſe) but a half-witted one deſerves broken bones firſt, and hanging afterwards. I think Lovelace has given his character in few words.

Be angry at me, if you pleaſe; but as ſure as you are alive, now that this poor creature, whom ſome call your brother, finds he has ſucceeded in making you fly your father's houſe, and that he has nothing to fear but your getting into your own, and into an independence of him, he thinks himſelf equal to any-thing, and ſo has a mind to fight Lovelace with his own weapons.

Don't you remember his pragmatical triumph, as told you by your aunt, and prided in by that ſaucy Betty Barnes, from his own fooliſh mouth?

I expect nothing from your letter to your aunt. I hope Lovelace will never know the contents of it. In every-one of yours, I ſee that he as warmly reſents as he dares, the little confidence you have in him. I ſhould reſent it too, were I he; and knew I deſerved better.

Don't be ſcrupulous about cloaths, if you think of putting yourſelf into the protection of the ladies of his family. They know how matters ſtand between you and your relations, and love you never the worſe for the ſilly peoples cruelty.

I know you won't demand poſſeſſion of your eſtate. But give him a right to demand it for you; and that will be ſtill better.

Adieu, my dear! May Heaven guide and direct you in all your ſteps, is the daily prayer of your ever-affectionate and faithful

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XLVII.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

FRIDAY, APRIL 21.

THOU, Lovelace, haſt been long the entertainer; I the entertained. Nor have I been ſolicitous to animadvert, as thou wenteſt along, upon thy inventions, and their tendency. For I believed, that with all thy airs, the unequalled perfections and fine qualities of this lady would always be her protection and ſecurity. But now, that I find, thou haſt ſo far ſucceeded, as to induce her to come to town, and to chuſe her lodgings in a houſe, the people of which will too probably damp and ſuppreſs any honourable motions which may ariſe in thy mind in her favour, I cannot help writing: and that profeſſedly in her behalf.

My inducements to this are not owing to virtue: but if they were, what hope could I have of affecting thee, by pleas ariſing from it?

Nor would ſuch a man as thou art be deterred; were I to remind thee of the vengeance which thou mayeſt one day expect, expeſt, if thou inſulteſt a woman of her character, family, and fortune.

Neither are gratitude and honour motives to be mentioned in a woman's favour, to men, ſuch as we are, who conſider all thoſe of the ſex as fair prize, over whom we can obtain a power. For our honour, and honour in the general acceptation of the word, are two things.

What then is my motive?—What, but the true friendſhip that I bear thee, Lovelace; which makes me plead thy own ſake, and thy family's ſake, in the juſtice thou oweſt to this incomparable creature; who, however, ſo well deſerves to have her ſake to be mentioned as the principal conſideration.

Laſt time I was at M. Hall, thy noble uncle ſo earneſtly preſſed me to uſe my intereſt to perſuade thee to enter the pale, and gave me ſo many family reaſons for it that I could not help engaging myſelf heartily on his ſide of the queſtion; and the rather as I knew, that thy own intentions with regard to this fine woman were then worthy of her. And of this I aſſured his lordſhip; who was half-afraid of thee, becauſe of the ill uſage thou receiveſt from her family. But now, that the caſe is altered, let me preſs the matter home to thee from other conſiderations.

By what I have heard of this lady's perfections from every mouth, as well as from thine, and from every letter thou haſt written, where wilt thou find ſuch another woman? And why ſhouldſt thou tempt her virtue?—Why ſhouldſt thou wiſh to try where there is no reaſon to doubt!

Were I in thy caſe, and deſigned to marry, and if I preferred a woman as I know thou doſt this, to all the women in the world, I ſhould dread to make further trial, knowing what we know of the ſex, for fear of ſucceeding; and eſpecially if I doubted not, that if there were a woman in the world virtuous at heart, it is ſhe.

And let me tell thee, Lovelace, that in this lady's ſituation, the trial is not a fair trial. Conſidering the depths of thy plots and contrivances; conſidering the opportunities which I ſee thou muſt have with her, in ſpite of her own heart; all her relations follies acting in concert, though unknown to themſelves, with thy wicked ſcheming head; conſidering how deſtitute of protection ſhe is; conſidering the houſe ſhe is to be in, where ſhe will be ſurrounded with thy implements; ſpecious, well-bred, and genteel creatures, not eaſily to be detected when they are diſpoſed to preſerve appearances, eſpecially by the young, unexperienced lady wholly unacquainted with the town: conſidering all theſe things, I ſay, what glory, what cauſe of triumph, wilt thou have, if ſhe ſhould be overcome?—Thou, too, a man born for intrigue, full of invention, intrepid, remorſeleſs, able patiently to watch for thy opportunity, not hurried, as moſt men, by guſts of violent paſſion, which often nip a project in the bud, and make the ſnail that was juſt putting out his horns to meet the inviter, withdraw into it's ſhell—A man who has no regard to his word or oath to the ſex; the lady ſcrupulouſly ſtrict to her word, incapable of art or deſign; apt therefore to believe well of others—It would be a miracle if ſhe ſtood ſuch an attempter, ſuch attempts, and ſuch ſnares, as I ſee will be laid for her. And after all, I ſee not when men are ſo frail without importunity, that ſo much ſhould be expected from women, daughters of the ſame fathers and mothers, and made up of the ſame brittle compounds, (education all the difference) nor where the triumph is in ſubduing them.

'May there not be other Lovelaces,' thou aſkeſt, 'who, attracted by her beau-'ty, may endeavour to prevail with her?'

No, there cannot, I anſwer, be ſuch another man, perſon, mind, fortune, and thy character, as above given, taken in. If thou imagineſt there could, ſuch is thy pride, that thou wouldſt think the worſe of thyſelf.

But let me touch upon thy predominant paſſion, revenge; for love is but ſecond to that, as I have often told thee, though it has ſet thee into raving at me: what poor pretences for revenge are the difficulties thou hadſt in getting her off; allowing that ſhe had run a riſque of being Solmes's wife, had ſhe ſtaid? If theſe are other than pretences, why thankeſt thou not thoſe who, by their perſecutions of her, anſwered thy hopes and threw her into thy power?—Beſides, are not the pretences thou makeſt for further trial, moſt ungratefully as well as contradictorily, founded upon the ſuppoſition of error in her, occaſioned by her favour to thee?

And let me, for the utter confuſion of thy poor pleas of this nature, aſk thee—Would ſhe, in thy opinion, had ſhe willingly gone off with thee, have been entitled to better quarter?—For a miſtreſs indeed ſhe might: but wouldſt thou for a wife have had cauſe to like her half ſo well, as now?

Has

Has ſhe not demonſtrated, that even the higheſt provocations were not ſufficient to warp her from her duty to her parents, though a native, and, as I may ſay, an originally involuntary duty, becauſe native? And is not this a charming earneſt that ſhe will ſacredly obſerve ſtill a higher duty into which ſhe propoſes to enter, when ſhe does enter, by plighted vows, and entirely as a volunteer?

That ſhe loves thee, wicked as thou art, and cruel as a panther, there is no reaſon to doubt. Yet, what a command has ſhe over herſelf, that ſuch a penetrating ſelf-flatterer as thyſelf, is ſometimes ready to doubt it! Though perſecuted on the one hand, as ſhe was, by her own family, and attracted on the other, by the ſplendor of thine; every one of whom courts her to rank herſelf among them?

Thou wilt perhaps think, that I have departed from my propoſition, and pleaded the lady's ſake more than thine in the above—But no ſuch thing. All that I have written, is more in thy behalf than in her's; ſince ſhe may make thee happy; but it is next to impoſſible, I ſhould think, if ſhe preſerves her delicacy, that thou canſt make her ſo. What is the love of a rakiſh heart? There cannot be peculiarity in it. But I need not give my further reaſons. Thou wilt have ingenuouſneſs enough, I dare ſay, were there occaſion for it, to ſubſcribe to my opinion.

I plead not for the ſtate from any great liking to it myſelf. Nor have I, at preſent, thoughts of entering into it. But as thou art the laſt of thy name; as thy family is of note and figure in thy country; and as thou thyſelf thinkeſt that thou ſhalt one day marry: is it poſſible, let me aſk thee, that thou canſt have ſuch another opportunity as thou now haſt, if thou letteſt this ſlip? A woman in her family and fortune not unworthy of thine own; (though thou art ſo apt, from pride of anceſtry, and pride of heart to ſpeak ſlightly of the families, thou diſlikeſt) ſo celebrated for beauty; and ſo noted at the ſame time for prudence, for ſoul, (I will ſay, inſtead of ſenſe) and for virtue?

If thou art not ſo narrow-minded an elf, as to prefer thine own ſingle ſatisfaction to poſterity, thou, who ſhouldſt wiſh to beget children for duration, wilt not poſtpone till the rake's uſual time; that is to ſay, till diſeaſes or years, or perhaps both lay hold of thee; ſince in that caſe thou wouldſt entitle thyſelf to the curſes of thy legitimate progeny for giving them a being altogether miſerable: a being which they will be obliged to hold upon a worſe tenure than that tenant-courteſy, which thou calleſt the worſt; to wit, upon the doctor's courteſy; thy deſcendants alſo propogating a wretched race that ſhould entail the curſe, or the reaſon for it, upon remote generations.

Wicked as the ſober world accounts you and me, we have not yet, it is to be hoped, got over all compunction. Although we find religion againſt us, we have not yet preſumed to make a religion to ſuit our practices. We deſpiſe thoſe who do. And we know better than to be even doubters. In ſhort, we believe a future ſtate of rewards and puniſhments. But as we have ſo much youth and health in hand, we hope to have time for repentance. That is to ſay, in plain Engliſh, [nor think thou me too grave, Lovelace: thou art grave ſometimes, though not often] we hope to live to ſenſe, as long as ſenſe can reliſh, and purpoſe to reform when we can ſin no longer.

And ſhall this admirable woman ſuffer for her generous endeavours to ſet on foot thy reformation; and for inſiſting upon proofs of the ſincerity of thy profeſſions before ſhe will be thine?

Upon the whole matter, let me wiſh thee to conſider well what thou art about, before thou goeſt a ſtep farther in the path which thou haſt chalked out for thyſelf to tread, and art juſt going to enter upon. Hitherto all is ſo far right, that if the lady miſtruſts thy honour, ſhe has no proofs. Be honeſt to her, then, in her ſenſe of the word. None of thy companions, thou knoweſt, will offer to laugh at what thou doſt. And if they ſhould, (on entering into a ſtate which has been ſo much ridiculed by thee, and all of us) thou haſt one advantage—It is this; that thou canſt not be aſhamed.

Deferring to the poſt-day to cloſe my letter, I find one left at my coufin Ogood's, with directions to be forwarded to the lady. It was brought within theſe two hours by a particular hand, and has a Harlowe-ſeal upon it. As it may therefore be of importance, I diſpatch it with my own, by my ſervant, poſt-haſte*.

* This letter was from Miſs Arabella Harlowe. See Letter LI.

I ſuppoſe you will ſoon be in town. Without the lady, I hope. Farewel. Be honeſt and be happy.

J. BELFORD.

LETTER XLVIII.

MRS. HERVEY, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

[IN ANSWER TO LETTER XIV.]

DEAR NIECE,

IT would be hard not to write a few lines, ſo much preſſed to write to one I ever loved. Your former letter I received; yet was not at liberty to anſwer it. I break my word to anſwer you now.

Strange informations are every day received about you. The wretch you are with, we are told, is every hour triumphing and defying—Muſt not theſe informations aggravate? You know the uncontroulableneſs of the man. He loves his own humour better than he loves you—though ſo fine a creature as you are! I warned you over and over: no young lady was ever more warned! —Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe to do ſuch a thing!

You might have given your friends the meeting. If you had held your averſion, it would have been complied with. As ſoon as I was entruſted myſelf with their intention to give up the point, I gave you a hint—a dark one perhaps—But who would have thought—O Miſs! —Such an artful flight!—Such cunning preparation!

But you want to clear up things—What can you clear up? Are you not gone off?—With a Lovelace too? What, my dear, would you clear up?

You did not deſign to go, you ſay. Why did you meet him then, chariot-and-ſix, horſemen, all prepared by him? O, my dear, how art produces art!—Will it be believed?—If it would, what power will he be thought to have had over you!—He—Who?—Lovelace!—The vileſt of libertines!—Over whom! —A Clariſſa!—Was your love for ſuch a man above your reaſon? Above your reſolution?—What credit would a belief of this, if believed, bring you?—How mend the matter?—O! that you had ſtood the next meeting!

I'll tell you all that was intended if you had.

It was indeed, imagined, that you would not have been able to reſiſt your father's entreaties and commands. He was reſolved to be all condeſcenſion, if anew you had not provoked him. 'I 'love my Clary Harlowe,' ſaid he, but an hour before the killing tidings were brought him; 'I love her as my life: I 'will kneel to her, if nothing elſe will do, to 'prevail upon her to oblige me.'

Your father and mother (the reverſe of what ſhould have been!) would have humbled themſelves to you: and if you could have denied them, and refuſed to ſign the ſettlements previous to the meeting, they would have yielded, although with regret.

But it was preſumed, ſo naturally ſweet your temper, ſo ſelf-denying, as they thought you, that you could not have withſtood them, notwithſtanding all your diſlike of the one man, without a greater degree of head-ſtrong paſſion for the other, than you had given any of us reaſon to expect from you.

If you had, the meeting on Wedneſday would have been a lighter trial to you. You would have been preſented to all your aſſembled friends, with a ſhort ſpeech only, That this was the young creature, till very lately faultleſs, condeſcending, and obliging; now having cauſe to glory in a triumph over the wills of father, mother, uncles, the moſt indulgent; over family-intereſts, family-views; and preferring her own will to every body's; and this for a tranſitory preference to perſon only; there being no compariſon between the men as to their morals.

Thus complied with, and perhaps bleſſed, by your father and mother, and the conſequences of your diſobedience deprecated in the ſolemneſt manner by your inimitable mother, your generoſity would have been appealed to, ſince your duty would have been found too weak an inducement, and you would have been bid to withdraw for one half-hour's conſideration: then would the ſettlements have been again tendered for your ſigning, by the perſon leaſt diſobliging to you; by your good Norton perhaps; the perhaps ſeconded by your father again: and if again refuſed, you would have again been led in, to declare ſuch your refuſal. Some reſtrictions which you yourſelf had propoſed, would have been inſiſted upon. You would have been permitted to go home with me, or with your uncle Antony, (with which of us was not agreed upon, becauſe they hoped you might be perſuaded) there to ſtay till the arrival of your couſin Morden; or till your father could have borne to ſee you; or till aſſured, that the views of Lovelace were at an end.

This the intention, your father ſo ſet upon your compliance, ſo much in hopes that you would have yielded, that you would have been prevailed upon by methods ſo condeſcending and ſo gentle; no wonder that he, in particular, was like a diſtracted man, when he heard of your flight—of your flight ſo premeditated;—with your Ivy Summer Houſe dinings, your arts to blind me, and all of us!—naughty, naughty young creature!

I, for my part, would not believe it, when told of it. Your uncle Hervey would not believe it. We rather expected, we rather feared, a ſtill more deſperate adventure. There could be but one more deſperate; and I was readier to have the caſcade firſt reſorted to, than the garden back-door.—Your mother fainted away, while her heart was torn between the two apprehenſions.—Your father, poor man! your father was beſide himſelf for near an hour—What imprecations!—What dreadful imprecations!—To this day he can hardly bear your name: yet can think of nobody elſe. Your merits, my dear, but aggravate your fault.—Something of freſh aggravation almoſt every hour.—How can any favour be expected?

I am ſorry for it; but am afraid nothing you aſk will be complied with.

Why mention you, my dear, the ſaving you from mortifications, who have gone off with a man? What a poor pride is it to ſtand upon any thing elſe?

I dare not open my lips in your favour. Nobody dare. Your letter muſt ſtand by itſelf. This has cauſed me to ſend it to Harlowe Place. Expect therefore great ſeverity. May you be enabled to ſupport the lot you have drawn! O my dear! how unhappy have you made every-body! Can you expect to be happy? Your father wiſhes you had never been born. Your poor mother—But why ſhould I afflict you? There is now no help!—You muſt be changed indeed, if you are not very unhappy yourſelf in the reflections your thoughtful mind muſt ſuggeſt to you.

You muſt now make the beſt of your lot. Yet not married, it ſeems!

It is in your power you ſay, to perform whatever you ſhall undertake to do. You may deceive yourſelf: you hope that your reputation and the favour of your friends may be retrieved. Never, never, both, I doubt; if either. Every offended perſon (and that is all who loved you, and are related to you) muſt join to reſtore you: when can theſe be of one mind in a caſe ſo notoriouſly wrong?

It would be very grievous, you ſay, to be precipitated upon meaſures, that may make the deſirable reconciliation more difficult. Is it now, my dear, a time for you to be afraid of being precipitated? At preſent, if ever, there can be no thought of reconciliation. The upſhot of your precipitation muſt firſt be ſeen. There may be murder yet, as far as we know. Will the man you are with part willingly with you? If not, what may be the conſequence? If he will—Lord bleſs me! what ſhall we think of his reaſons for it?—I will fly this thought. I know your purity—But, my dear, are you not out of all protection?—Are you not unmarried?—Have you not (making your daily payers uſeleſs) thrown yourſelf into temptation? And is not the man the moſt wicked of plotters?

You have hitherto, you ſay (and I think, my dear, with an air unbecoming your declared penitence) no fault to find with the behaviour of a man from whom every evil was apprehended: like Cæſar to the Roman augur, which I heard you tell of, who had bid him beware of the ides of March: 'The ides of March,' ſaid Cæſar, ſeeing the augur among the crowd, as he marched in ſtate to the ſenate-houſe, from which he never was to return alive, 'the ides of March are come.'—'But they are not paſt,' the augur replied. Make the application, my dear: may you be able to make this reflection upon his good behaviour to the laſt of your knowledge of him! May he behave himſelf better to you, than he ever did to any body elſe over whom he had power! Amen!

No anſwer, I beſeech you. I hope your meſſenger will not tell any-body that I have written to you. And I dare ſay you will not ſhew what I have written to Mr. Lovelace—For I have written with the leſs reſerve, depending upon your prudence.

You have my prayers.

My Dolly knows not that I write. Nobody does *: not even Mr. Hervey.

Dolly would have ſeveral times written: but having defended your fault with heat, and with a partiality that

* Notwithſtanding what Mrs. Hervey here ſays, it will be hereafter ſeen that this ſevere letter of hers was written in private concert with the implacable Arabella.

alarmed

alarmed us, [such a fall as yours, my dear, must be alarming to all parents] she has been forbidden, on pain of losing our favour for ever: and this at your family's request, as well as by her father's commands.

You have the poor girl's hourly prayers, I will, however, tell you, though she knows not what I do, as well as those of your truly affectionate aunt,

D. HERVEY.

FRIDAY, APRIL 21.

LETTER XLIX

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

WITH THE PRECEDING.

SAT. MORN. APRIL 22.

I Have just now received the inclosed from my aunt Hervey. Be pleased, my dear, to keep her secret of having written to the unhappy wretch her niece.

I may go to London, I see, or where I will. No matter what becomes of me.

I was the willinger to suspend my journey thither, till I heard from Harlowe Place. I thought, if I could be encouraged to hope for a reconciliation, I would let this man see, that he should not have me in his power, but upon my own terms, if at all.

But I find I must be his, whether I will or not; and perhaps through still greater mortifications, than those great ones which I have already met with—And must I be so absolutely thrown upon a man, with whom I am not at all satisfied!

My letter is sent, you see, to Harlowe Place. My heart aches for the reception it may meet with there.

One comfort only arises to me from it's being sent; that my aunt will clear herself by the communication from the supposition of having corresponded with the poor creature whom they have all determined to reprobate. It is no small part of my misfortune that I have weakened the confidence one dear friend has in another, and made one look cool upon another. My poor cousin Dolly, you see, has reason to regret on this account, as well as my aunt. Miss Howe, my dear Miss Howe, is but too sensible of the effects of my fault, having had more words with her mother on my account, than ever she had on any other. Yet the man who has drawn me into all this evil, I must be thrown upon!—Much did I consider, much did I apprehend, before my fault, supposing I were to be guilty of it: but I saw it not in all it's shocking lights.

And now, to know that my father, an hour before he received the tidings of my supposed flight, owned that he loved me as his life; that he would have been all condescension: that he would—Oh! my dear, how tender, how mortifyingly tender, now in him! My aunt need not have been afraid, that it should be known that she has sent me such a letter as this!—A father to KNEEL to his child!—There would not indeed have been any bearing of that!—What I should have done in such a case, I know not. Death would have been much more welcome to me than such a sight, on such an occasion, in behalf of a man so very, very disgustful to me!—But I had deserved annihilation, had I suffered my father to kneel in vain.

Yet, had but the sacrifice of inclination and personal preference been all, less than KNEELING should have done. My duty should have been the conqueror of my inclination. But an aversion—an aversion so very sincere!—The triumph of a cruel and ambitious brother, ever so uncontroulable, joined with the insults of an envious sister, bringing wills to theirs, which otherwise would have been favourable to me: the marriage duties, so absolutely indispensable, so solemnly to be engaged for: the marriage-intimacies [permit me to say to you, my friend, what the purest, although with apprehension, must think of] so very intimate: myself one, who never looked upon any duty, much less a voluntary-vowed one, with indifference; could it have been honest in me to have given my hand to an odious hand, and to have consented to a more than reluctant, such an immiscible union, if I may so call it?—For life too!—Did I not think more and deeper than most young creatures think; did I not weigh, did I not reflect; I might perhaps have been less obstinate.—Delicacy, (may I presume to call it?) thinking, weighing, reflection, are not blessings (I have not found them such) in the degree I have them. I wish I had been able, in some very nice cases, to have known what indifference was; yet not to have my ignorance imputable to me as a fault. Oh! my dear! the finer sensibilities, if I may suppose mine to be such, make not happy!

What a method had my friends intended to take with me? This, I dare say, was a method chalked out by my brother. He, I suppose, was to have presented me to all my assembled friends, as the daughter capable of preferring her own will to the wills of them all. It would have have been a sore trial, no doubt. Would to Heaven, however, I had stood it—Let the issue have been what it would, would to Heaven I had stood it!

There may be murder, my aunt says. This looks as if she knew of Singleton's rash plot. Such an upshot, as she calls it, of this unhappy affair, Heaven avert!

She flies a thought, that I can less dwell upon—A cruel thought—But she has a poor opinion of the purity she compliments me with, if she thinks that I am not, by GOD's grace, above temptation, from this sex. Although I never saw a man, whose person I could like, before this man; yet his faulty character allowed me but little merit from the indifference I pretended to on his account. But, now I see him in nearer lights, I like him less than ever. Unpolite, cruel, insolent!—Unwise! A trifler with his own happiness; the destroyer of mine!—His last treatment—My fate too visibly in his power—Master of his own wishes, [shame to say it!] if he knew what to wish for.—Indeed I never liked him so little as now. Upon my word, I think I could hate him (if I do not already hate him) sooner than any man I ever thought tolerably of—A good reason why: because I have been more disappointed in my expectations of him; although they never were so high, as to have made him my choice in preference to the single life, had that been permitted me. Still, if the giving him up for ever will make my path to reconciliation easy, and if they will signify as much to me, they shall see that I never will be his: for I have the vanity to think my soul his soul's superior.

You will say I rave: forbidden to write to my aunt, and taught to despair of reconciliation, you, my dear, must be troubled with my passionate resentments. What a wretch was I to give him a meeting, since by that I put it out of my power to meet my assembled friends!—All would now, if I had met them, have been over; and who can tell when my present distresses will?—Rid of both men, I had been now perhaps at my aunt Hervey's, or at my uncle Antony's; wishing for my cousin Morden's arrival; who might have accommodated all.

I intended, indeed, to have stood it; and, if I had, how know I by whose name I might now have been called? For how should I have resisted a condescending, a kneeling father, had he been able to have kept his temper with me?

Yet my aunt says, he would have relented, if I had not. Perhaps he would have been moved by my humility, before he could have shewn such undue condescention. Such temper as he would have received me with, might have been improved upon in my favour. And that he had designed ultimately to relent, how it clears my friends, (at least to themselves) and condemns me! O why were my aunt's hints [I remember them now] so very dark?—Yet I intended to have returned after the interview; and then perhaps she would have explained herself.—O this artful, this designing Lovelace—Yet I must repeat, that most ought I to blame myself for meeting him.

But far, far, be banished from me fruitless recrimination! Far banished, because fruitless! Let me wrap myself about in the mantle of my own integrity, and take comfort in my unfaulty intention! Since it is now too late to look back, let me collect all my fortitude, and endeavour to stand those shafts of angry Providence, which it will not permit me to shun! That whatever the trials may be, which I am destined to undergo, I may not behave unworthily in them; and may come out amended by them.

Join with me in this prayer, my beloved friend; for your own honour's sake, as well as for love's sake, join with me in it: lest a deviation on my side should, with the censorious, cast a shade upon a friendship, which has no levity in it; and the basis of which is improvement, as well in the greater as lesser duties. CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER L.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 22.

O My best, my only friend! Now indeed is my heart broken! It has received a blow it never will recover. Think not of corresponding with a wretch who now seems absolutely devoted. How can it be otherwise, if a parent's curses have the weight I always attributed to them, and have heard so many instances in confirmation of that weight!—Yes, my dear Miss Howe, superadded to all my afflictions, I have the consequences of a father's curse to struggle with! How shall I support this reflection!—My past and my present situation so much authorizing my apprehensions!

I have, at last, a letter from my unrelenting sister. Would to Heaven I had had not provoked it by my second letter to my aunt Hervey! It lay ready for me, it seems. The thunder slept, till I awakened it. I inclose the letter itself. Transcribe it I cannot. There is no bearing the thoughts of it: for [shocking reflection!] the curse extends to the life beyond this.

I am in the depth of vapourish despondency. I can only repeat, Shun, fly, correspond not with a wretch so devoted, as CL. HARLOWE.

LETTER LI.

TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

TO BE LEFT AT MR. OSGOOD'S, NEAR SOHO SQUARE.

FRIDAY, APRIL 21.

IT was expected you would send again to me, or to my aunt Hervey. The inclosed has lain ready for you therefore by direction. You will have no answer from any-body, write to whom you will, and as often as you will, and what you will.

It was designed to bring you back by proper authority, or to send you whither the disgraces you have brought upon us all, should be in the likeliest way, after a while, to be forgotten. But I believe that design is over: so you may range securely—Nobody will think it worth while to give themselves any trouble about you. Yet my mother has obtained leave to send you your cloaths of all sorts: but your cloaths only. This is a favour you'll see by the within letter not designed you: and now not granted for your sake, but because my poor mother cannot bear in her sight any-thing you used to wear. Read the inclosed, and tremble.

ARABELLA HARLOWE.

'TO THE MOST UNGRATEFUL AND 'UNDUTIFUL OF DAUGHTERS.

'HARLOWE PLACE, APRIL 15.

'SISTER THAT WAS!

'FOR I know not what name you 'are permitted, or chuse to go by. You 'have filled us all with distraction. My 'father, in the first agitations of his 'mind, on discovering your wicked, 'your shameful elopement, imprecated 'on his knees, a fearful curse upon you. 'Tremble at the recital of it!—No less, 'than that you may meet your punish'ment both here and hereafter, by means 'of the very wretch, in whom you have 'chosen to place your wicked confidence.

'Your cloaths will not be sent you. 'You seem, by leaving them behind 'you, to have been secure of them, 'whenever you demanded them; but 'perhaps you could think of nothing 'but meeting your fellow;—nothing 'but how to get off your forward self! '—For every-thing seems to have been 'forgotten but what was to contribute 'to your wicked flight—Yet you judg'ed right, perhaps, that you would have 'been detected, had you endeavoured 'to get away your cloaths.—Cunning 'creature! not to make one step that we 'could guess at you by! Cunning to 'effect your own ruin, and the disgrace 'of all the family!

'But does the wretch put you upon 'writing for your things, for fear you 'should be too expensive to him?—'That's it, I suppose.

'Was there ever a giddier creature? '—Yet this is the celebrated, the blaz'ing Clarissa—Clarissa, what? Harlowe, 'no doubt!—And Harlowe it will be, to 'the disgrace of us all!

'Your drawings and your pieces are 'all taken down; as is also your own 'whole-length picture, in the Vandyke 'taste, from your late parlour; they 'are taken down, and thrown into your 'closet, which will be nailed up, as if 'it were not a part of the house, there 'to perish together: for who can bear 'to see them? Yet, how did they use to 'be shewn to every-body; the former, 'for the magnifying of your dainty 'finger works; the latter, for the im'puted dignity (dignity now in the dust!) 'of your boasted figure; and this by 'those fond parents from whom you 'have run away with so much, yet with 'so little contrivance!

'My brother vows revenge upon 'your liberine—For the family's sake 'he vows it—Not for yours!—For he 'will treat you, he declares, like a 'common creature, if ever he sees you: 'and doubts not that this will be your 'fate.

'My uncle Harlowe renounces you 'for ever.

'So does my uncle Antony.

'So does my aunt Hervey.

'So do I, base unworthy creature! 'the disgrace of a good family, and the 'property of an infamous rake, as ques'tionless you will soon find yourself, if 'you are not already.

'Your books, since they have not 'taught you what belongs to your fami'ly, to your sex, and to your education, 'will not be sent you. Your money 'neither. Nor yet the jewels so unde-

'servedly

'ſervedly made yours. For it is wiſhed 'you may be ſeen a beggar along Lon-'don ſtreets.

'If all this is heavy, lay your hand 'to your heart, and aſk yourſelf, Why 'you have deſerved it?

'Every man whom your pride taught 'you to reject with ſcorn, (Mr. Solmes 'excepted, who, however, has reaſon 'to rejoice that he miſſed you) triumphs 'in your ſhameful elopement; and now 'knows how to account for his being 'refuſed.

'Your worthy Norton is aſhamed of 'you, and mingles her tears with your 'mother's; both reproaching themſelves 'for their ſhares in you, and in ſo fruit-'leſs an education.

'Every-body, in ſhort, is aſhamed of 'you: but none more than

'ARABELLA HARLOWE.'

LETTER LII.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

TUESDAY, APRIL 25.

BE comforted; be not dejected; do not deſpond, my deareſt and beſt-beloved friend. God Almighty is juſt and gracious, and gives not his aſſent to raſh and inhuman curſes. Can you think that Heaven will ſeal to the black paſſions of it's depraved creatures? If it did, malice, envy, and revenge, would triumph; and the beſt of the humane race, blaſted by the malignity of the worſt, would be miſerable in both worlds.

This outrageouſneſs ſhews only what manner of ſpirit they are of, and how much their ſordid views exceed their parental love. 'Tis all owing to rage and diſappointment—Diſappointment in deſigns proper to be fruſtrated.

If you conſider this maledi&tion as it ought to be conſidered, a perſon of your piety muſt and will rather pity and pray for your raſh father, than terrify yourſelf on the occaſion. None but God can curſe. Parents, or others, whoever they be, can only pray to him to curſe: and ſuch prayers can have no weight with a juſt and all-perfect Being, the motives to which are unreaſonable, and the end propoſed by them cruel.

Has not God commanded us to bleſs and curſe not? Pray for your father then, I repeat, that he incur not the maledi&tion he has announced on you; ſince he has broken, as you ſee, a command truly divine; while you, by obeying that other precept which enjoins us to pray for them that perſecute and curſe us, will turn the curſe into a bleſſing.

My mother blames them for this wicked letter of your ſiſter; and ſhe pities you; and, of her own accord, wiſhed me to write to comfort you, for this once; for ſhe ſays, It is pity your heart, which was ſo noble, (and when the ſenſe of your fault, and the weight of a parent's curſe, are ſo ſtrong upon you) ſhould be quite broken.

Lord bleſs me, how your aunt writes!—Can there be two rights and two wrongs in palpable caſes!—But, my dear, ſhe muſt be wrong: ſo they all have been, juſtify themſelves now as they will. They can only juſtify themſelves to themſelves from ſelfiſh principles, reſolving to acquit, not fairly to try themſelves. Did your unkind aunt, in all the tedious progreſs of your contentions with them, give you the leaſt hope of their relenting?—Her dark hints now I recollect, as well as you. But why was any-thing good or hopeful to be darkly hinted?—How eaſy was it for her, who pretended always to love you; for her, who can give ſuch flowing licence to her pen for your hurt; to have given you one word, one line (in confidence) of their pretended change of meaſures!

But do not mind their after-pretences, my dear—All of them ſerve but for tacit confeſſions of their vile uſage of you. I will keep your aunt's ſecret, never fear. I would not, on any conſideration, that my mother ſhould ſee her letter.

You will now ſee, that you have nothing left, but to overcome all ſcrupuloufneſs, and marry as ſoon as you have an opportunity. Determine ſo to do, my dear.

I will give you a motive for it, regarding myſelf. For this I have reſolved, and this I have vowed, [O friend, the beſt beloved of my heart, be not angry with me for it!] That ſo long as your happineſs is in ſuſpenſe, I will never think of marrying. In juſtice to the man I ſhall have, I have vowed this: for, my dear, muſt not I be miſerable, if you are ſo? And what an unworthy wife muſt I be to any man who cannot have intereſt enough in my heart to make his obligingneſs a balance for an affliction he has not cauſed?

I would ſhew Lovelace your ſiſter's abominable letter, were it to me. I incloſe it. It ſhall not have a place in this houſe. This will enter him of courſe into the ſubject which now you ought to have moſt in view. Let him ſee what you ſuffer for him. He cannot prove baſe to ſuch an excellence. I ſhould never enjoy my head or my ſenſes, ſhould this man prove a villain to you! —With a merit ſo exalted, you may have puniſhment more than enough for your involuntary fault in that huſband.

I would not have you be too ſure, that their project to ſeize you is over. The words intimating that it is over, in the letter of that abominable Arabella, ſeem calculated to give you ſecurity.—She only ſays, ſhe believes that deſign is over —And I do not yet find from Miſs Lloyd, that it is diſavowed. So it will be beſt, when you are in London, to be private, and, for fear of the worſt, to let every direction be to a third place; for I would not, for the world, have you fall into the hands of ſuch flaming and malevolent ſpirits by ſurprize.

I will myſelf be content to direct to you at ſome third place; and I ſhall then be able to aver to my mother, or to any other, if occaſion be, that I know not where you are.

Beſides, this meaſure will make you leſs apprehenſive of the conſequences of their violence, ſhould they reſolve to attempt to carry you off in ſpite of Lovelace.

I would have you direct to Mr. Hickman, even your anſwer to this. I have a reaſon for it. Beſides, my mother, notwithſtanding this particular indulgence, is very poſitive. They have prevailed upon her, I know, to give her word to this purpoſe—Spiteful poor wretches! How I hate in particular your fooliſh uncle Antony.

I would not have your thoughts dwell on the contents of your ſiſter's ſhocking letter; but purſue other ſubjects—The ſubjects before you. And let me know your progreſs with Lovelace, and what he ſays to this diabolical curſe. So far you may enter into this hateful ſubject. I expect that this will aptly introduce the grand topick between you, without needing a mediator.

Come, my dear, when things are at worſt, they will mend. Good often comes, when evil is expected.—But if you deſpond, there can be no hopes of cure. Don't let them break your heart; for that is plain to me, is now what ſome people have in view to do.

How poor, to withold from you your books, your jewels, and your money! As money is all you can at preſent want, ſince they will vouchſafe to ſend your cloaths, I ſend fifty guines by the bearer, incloſed in ſingle papers in my Norris's Miſcellanies. I charge you, as you love me, return them not.

I have more at your ſervice. So if you like not your lodgings or his behaviour when you get to town, leave both them and him out of hand.

I would adviſe you to write to Mr. Morden without delay. If he intends for England, it may haſten him. And you will do very well till he can come. But ſurely Lovelace will be infatuated, if he ſecure not his happineſs by your conſent, before that of Mr. Morden's is made needful on his arrival.

Once more, my dear, let me beg of you to be comforted. Manage with your uſual prudence the ſtake before you, and all will ſtill be happy. Suppoſe yourſelf to be me, and me to be you, [You may—for your diſtreſs is mine;] and then you will add full day to theſe but glimmering lights which are held out to you by your ever-affectionate and faithful

ANNA HOWE.

I hurry this away by Robert. I will enquire into the truth of your aunt's pretences about the change of meaſures which ſhe ſays they intended in caſe you had not gone away.

LETTER LIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, APRIL 26.

YOUR letter, my beloved Miſs Howe, gives me great comfort. How ſweetly do I experience the truth of the wiſe man's obſervation, That a faithful friend is the medicine of life!

Your meſſenger finds me juſt ſetting out for London: the chaiſe at the door. Already I have taken leave of the good widow, who has obliged me with the company of her eldeſt daughter, at Mr. Lovelace's requeſt, while he rides by us. The young gentlewoman is to return in two or three days with the chaiſe, in it's way to my Lord M.'s Hertfordſhire ſeat.

I received my ſiſter's dreadful letter on Sunday, when Mr. Lovelace was out. He ſaw, on his return, my extreme anguiſh and dejection; and he was told how much worſe I had been: for I had fainted away more than once.

I think the contents of it have touched my head as well as my heart.

He would fain have ſeen it. But I would not permit that, becauſe of the threatenings he would have found in it againſt himſelf. As it was, the effect it had upon me, made him break out into execrations and menaces. I was ſo ill, ill, that he himſelf adviſed me to delay going to town on Monday, as I propoſed to do.

He is extremely regardful and tender of me. All that you ſuppoſe would follow this violent letter, from him, has followed it. He has offered himſelf to my acceptance, in ſo unreſerved a manner, that I am concerned I have written ſo freely and ſo diffidently of him. Pray, my deareſt friend, keep to yourſelf every-thing that may appear diſreputable of him from me.

I muſt acquaint you, that his kind behaviour, and my low-ſpiritedneſs, co-operating with your former advice, and my unhappy ſituation, made me that very Sunday evening receive unreſervedly his declarations: and now indeed I am more in his power than ever.

He preſſes me every hour [indeed as needleſsly, as unkindly] for freſh tokens of my eſteem for him, and confidence in him. And, as I have been brought to ſome verbal conceſſions, if he ſhould prove unworthy, I am ſure, I ſhall have great reaſon to blame this violent letter: for I have no reſolution at all. Abandoned thus of all my natural friends, of whoſe returning favour I have now no hopes, and only you to pity me, and you reſtrained, as I may ſay, I have been forced to turn my deſolate heart to ſuch protection as I could find.

All my comfort is, that your advice repeatedly given to the ſame purpoſe, in your kind letter before me, warrants me. I now ſet out the more cheerfully to London on that account: for before, a heavy weight hung upon my heart; and, although I thought it beſt and ſafeſt to go, yet my ſpirits ſunk, I know not why, at every motion I made towards a preparation for it.

I hope no miſchief will happen on the road.—I hope theſe violent ſpirits will not meet.

Every-one is waiting for me.—Pardon me, my beſt, my kindeſt friend, that I return your Norris. In theſe more promiſing proſpects, I cannot have occaſion for your favour. Beſides, I have ſome hope, that with my cloaths they will ſend me the money I wrote for, although it is denied me in the letter. If they do not, and if I ſhould have occaſion, I can but ſignify my wants to ſo ready a friend. And I have promiſed to be obliged only to you. But I had rather, methinks, you ſhould have it ſtill to ſay, if challenged, that nothing of this nature has been either requeſted or done. I ſay this, with a view entirely to my future hopes of recovering your mother's favour, which, next to that of my own father and mother, I am moſt ſolicitous to recover.

I muſt acquaint you with one thing more, notwithſtanding my hurry; and that is, that Mr. Lovelace offered either to attend me to Lord M.'s, or to ſend for his chaplain, yeſterday. He preſſed me to conſent to this propoſal, moſt earneſtly; and even ſeemed deſirous rather to have the ceremony paſs here, than in London: for when there, I had told him, it was time enough to conſider of ſo weighty and important a matter. Now, upon the receipt of your kind, your conſolatory letter, methinks I could almoſt wiſh it had been in my power to comply with his earneſt ſolicitations. But this dreadful letter has unhinged my whole frame. Then ſome little punctilio ſurely is neceſſary. No preparation made. No articles drawn. No licence ready. Grief ſo extreme: no pleaſure in proſpect, nor ſo much as in wiſh—O my dear, who could think of entering into ſo ſolemn an engagement? Who, ſo unprepared, could ſeem to be ſo ready!

If I could flatter myſelf, that my indifference to all the joys of this life proceeded from proper motives, and not rather from the diſappointments and mortifications my pride has met with, how much rather, I think, ſhould I chuſe to be wedded to my ſhroud, than to any man on earth!

Indeed I have at preſent no pleaſure, but in your friendſhip. Continue that to me, I beſeech you. If my heart riſes hereafter to a capacity of more, it muſt be built on that foundation.

My ſpirits ſink again, on ſetting out. Excuſe this depth of vapourith dejection, which forbids me even hope, the cordial that keeps life from ſtagnating, and which never was denied me till within theſe eight-and-forty hours.

But it is time to relieve you.

Adieu, my beſt beloved and kindeſt friend! Pray for your CLARISSA.

LETTER LIV.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

THURSDAY, APRIL 27.

I Am ſorry you ſent back my Norris. But you muſt be allowed to do as you pleaſe. So muſt I, in my turn. We muſt neither of us, perhaps, expect abſolutely of the other what is the righteſt to be done: and yet few folks, ſo young as we are, better know, what that right is.

I cannot ſeparate myſelf from you; although I give a double inſtance of my vanity in joining myſelf with you in this particular aſſertion.

I am moſt heartily rejoiced, that your proſpects are ſo much mended; and that, as I hoped, good has been produced out of evil. What muſt the man have been, what muſt have been his views, had he not taken ſuch a turn, upon a letter ſo vile, and upon a treatment ſo unnatural; himſelf principally the occaſion of it?

You know beſt your motives for ſuſpending: but I wiſh you could have taken him at offers ſo earneſt*. Why ſhould you not have permitted him to ſend for Lord M.'s chaplain? If punctilio only was in the way, and want of a licence, and of proper preparations, and ſuch-like, my ſervice to you, my dear: and there is ceremony tantamount to your ceremony.

Do not, do not, my dear friend, again be ſo very melancholy a decliner, as to prefer a ſhroud, when the matter you wiſh for is in your power; and when, as you have juſtly ſaid heretofore, perſons cannot die when they will.

But it is a ſtrange perverſeneſs in human nature, that we ſlight that when near us, which at a diſtance we wiſh for.

You have now but one point to purſue; that is marriage: let that be ſolemnized. Leave the reſt to Providence; and, to uſe your own words in a former letter, follow as that leads. You will have a handſome man; a genteel man; he would be a wiſe man, if he were not vain of his endowments, and wild and intriguing: but while the eyes of many of our ſex, taken by ſo ſpecious a form and ſo brilliant a ſpirit, encourage that vanity, you muſt be contented to ſtay till grey hairs and prudence enter upon the ſtage together. You would not have every-thing in the ſame man.

I believe Mr. Hickman treads no crooked paths; but he hobbles moſt ungracefully in a ſtrait one. Yet Mr. Hickman, though he pleaſes not my eye, nor diverts my ear, will not, as I believe, diſguſt the one, nor ſhock the other. Your man, as I have lately ſaid, will always keep up attention; you will always be alive with him, though perhaps more from fears than hopes: while Mr. Hickman will never ſay any-thing to keep one awake; nor yet, by ſhocking adventures, make one's ſlumbers uneaſy.

I believe I now know which of the two men ſo prudent a perſon as you would, at firſt, have choſen; nor doubt I, that you can gueſs which I would have made choice of, if I might. But proud as we are, the proudeſt of us all can only refuſe, and many of us accept the but half-worthy, for fear a ſtill worſe ſhould offer.

If men had choſen their miſtreſſes for ſpirits like their own, although Mr. Lovelace, at the long run, might have been too many for me, I don't doubt but I ſhould have given heart-ache for heart-ache, for one half-year at leaſt; while you, with my dull-ſwift, would have glided on as ſerenely, as calmly, as unaccountably, as the ſucceeding ſeaſons; and varying no otherwiſe than they, to bring on new beauties and conveniences to all about you.

I WAS going on in this ſtile—But my mother broke in upon me, with a prohibitory aſpect. She gave me leave for one letter only.—She had juſt parted with your odious uncle; and they have been in cloſe conference again.

She has vexed me. I muſt lay this by till I hear from you again; not knowing whither to ſend it.

Direct me to a third-place, as I deſired in my former.

I told my mother, (on her challenging me) that I was writing indeed, and to you: but it was only to amuſe myſelf; proteſting, that I knew not where to ſend to you.

I hope that your next may inform me of your nuptials, although the next to that were to acquaint me, that he was the ungratefulleſt monſter on earth; as he muſt be, if not the kindeſt huſband in it.

My mother has vexed me. But ſo, on reviſing, I wrote before.—But ſhe has unhinged me, as you call it: pretended to catechize Hickman, I aſſure you, for contributing to our ſuppoſed correſpondence. Catechized him ſeverely too, upon my word!—I believe I have a ſneaking kindneſs for the ſneaking-fellow; for I cannot endure that any-body ſhould treat him like a fool but myſelf.

I believe, between you and me, the good lady forgot herſelf. I heard her loud. She poſſibly imagined, that my father was come to life again.—Yet the meekneſs of the man might have ſoon convinced her, I ſhould have thought;

* Mr. Lovelace in his next letter tells his friend how extremely ill the lady was; recovering from fits to fall into ſtronger fits, and nobody expecting her life. She had not, he ſays, acquainted Miſs Howe, how very ill ſhe was. In page 374 ſhe tells Miſs Howe, that her motives for ſuſpending were not merely ceremonious ones.

for

for my father, it ſeems, would talk as loud as ſhe, I ſuppoſe, (though within a few yards of each other) as if both were out of their way, and were hallooing at half a mile's diſtance, to get in again.

I know you'll blame me for this faucineſs—But I told you I was vexed: and if I had not a ſpirit, my parentage on both ſides might be doubted.

You muſt not chide me too ſeverely, however, becauſe I have learned of you not to defend myſelf in an error; and I own I am wrong; and that's enough: you won't be ſo generous in this caſe, as you are in every other, if you don't think it is.

Adieu, my dear! I muſt, I will love you; and love you for ever! So ſubſcribes your ANNA HOWE.

LETTER LV.

FROM MISS HOWE. INCLOSED IN THE ABOVE.

THURSDAY, APRIL 27.

I Have been making enquiry, as I told you I would, whether your relations had really (before you left them) reſolved upon that change of meaſures which your aunt mentions in her letter; and by laying together ſeveral pieces of intelligence, ſome drawn from my mother, through your uncle Antony's communications; ſome from Miſs Lloyd, by your ſiſter's; and ſome by a third way, that I ſhall not tell you of; I have reaſon to think the following a true ſtate of the caſe.

That there was no intention of a change of meaſures, till within two or three days of your going away. On the contrary, your brother and ſiſter, though they had no hope of prevailing with you in Solmes's favour, were reſolved never to give over their perſecutions till they had puſhed you upon taking ſome ſtep, which, by help of their good offices, ſhould be deemed inexcuſable by the half-witted ſouls they had to play upon.

But that at laſt your mother (tired with and perhaps aſhamed of the paſſive part ſhe had acted) thought fit to declare to Miſs Bell, that ſhe was determined to try to put an end to the family-feuds; and to get your uncle Harlowe to ſecond her endeavours.

This alarmed your brother and ſiſter; and then a change of meaſures was reſolved upon. Solmes's offers were, however, too advantageous to be given up; and your father's condeſcenſion was now to be their ſole dependence, and (as they give it out) the trying of what that would do with you, their laſt effort.

And, indeed, my dear, this muſt have ſucceeded, I verily think, with ſuch a daughter as they had to deal with, could that father who never, I dare ſay, kneeled in his life but to his God, have ſo far condeſcended as your aunt writes he would.

But then, my dear, what would this have done?—Perhaps you would have given Lovelace the meeting, in hopes to pacify him, and prevent miſchief; ſuppoſing that they had given you time, and not hurried you directly into the ſtate. But if you had not met him, you ſee, that he was reſolved to viſit them, and well attended too: and what muſt have been the conſequence?

So that, upon the whole, we know not but matters may be beſt as they are, however diſagreeable that beſt is.

I hope your conſiderate and thoughtful mind will make a good uſe of this hint. Who would not with patience ſuſtain even a great evil, if ſhe could perſuade herſelf, that it was kindly diſpenſed, in order to prevent a ſtill greater?—Eſpecially, if ſhe could ſit down, as you can, and acquit her own heart?

Permit me one further obſervation—Do we not ſee, from the above ſtate of the matter, what might have been done before, by the worthy perſon of your family, had ſhe exerted the mother, in behalf of a child ſo meritorious, yet ſo much oppreſſed?

Adieu, my dear. I will be ever yours.

ANNA HOWE.

Clariſſa, in her anſwer to the firſt of the two laſt letters, chides her friend for giving ſo little weight to her advice, in relation to her behaviour to her mother. It may be proper to inſert here the following extracts from that anſwer, though a little before the time.

'You aſſume, my dear,' ſays ſhe, 'your 'uſual, and ever-agreeable ſtile, in what 'you write of the two gentlemen, and 'how unaptly you think they have choſen, 'Mr. Hickman in addreſſing you; Mr. 'Lovelace me. But I am inclinable to 'believe, that with a view to happineſs, 'however two mild tempers might agree, 'two high ones would make ſad work 'of it, both at one time violent and un-'yielding. You two might indeed have 'raqueted the ball betwixt you, as you 'ſay. But Mr. Hickman, by his gen-'tle manners, ſeems formed for you, if 'you go not too far with him. If you 'do,

'do, it would be a tameneſs in him to 'bear it, which would make a man more 'contemptible than Mr. Hickman can 'ever deſerve to be made. Nor is it a 'diſgrace for even a brave man, who 'knows what a woman is to vow to him 'afterwards, to be very obſequious be-'forehand.

'Do you think it is to the credit of 'Mr. Lovelace's character, that he can 'be offenſive and violent?—Does he not, 'as all ſuch ſpirits muſt, ſubject himſelf 'to the neceſſity of making ſubmiſſions 'for his exceſſes, far more mortifying 'to a proud heart than thoſe conde-'ſcenſions which the high-ſpirited are ſo 'apt to impute as a weakneſs of mind in 'ſuch a man as Mr. Hickman?

'Let me tell you, my dear, that Mr. 'Hickman is ſuch a one, as would rather 'bear an affront from a lady, than offer 'one to her. He had rather, I dare ſay, 'that ſhe ſhould have occaſion to aſk his 'pardon, than he hers. But, my dear, 'you have outlived your firſt paſſion; and 'had the ſecond man been an angel, he 'would not have been more than indiffe-'rent to you.

'My motives for ſuſpending,' proceeds ſhe, 'were not merely ceremonious ones. I 'was really very ill. I could not hold 'up my head. The contents of my ſiſter's 'letters had pierced my heart. Indeed, 'my dear, I was very ill. And was I, 'moreover, to be as ready to accept his 'offer, as if I were afraid he never would 'repeat it?

'I ſee with great regret, that your 'mamma is ſtill immoveably bent againſt 'our correſpondence. What ſhall I do 'about it?—It goes againſt me to con-'tinue it, or to wiſh you to favour me 'with returns.—Yet I have ſo managed 'my matters, that I have no friend but 'you to adviſe with. It is enough to 'make one, indeed, wiſh to be married 'to this man, though a man of errors; 'as he has worthy relations of my own 'ſex; and I ſhould have ſome friends, I 'hope—And having ſome, I might have 'more.—For as money is ſaid to increaſe 'money, ſo does the countenance of per-'ſons of character increaſe friends: 'while the deſtitute muſt be deſtitute.—'It goes againſt my heart to beg of you 'to diſcontinue correſponding with me; 'and yet it is againſt my conſcience to 'carry it on againſt parental prohibition. 'But I dare not uſe all the arguments 'againſt it that I could uſe—And why? '—For fear I ſhould convince you; and 'you ſhould reject me as the reſt of my 'friends have done. I leave, therefore, 'the determination of this point upon 'you.—I am not, I find, to be truſted 'with it. But be mine all the fault, and 'all the puniſhment, if it be puniſhable! '—And certainly it muſt, when it can 'be the cauſe of thoſe over-lively ſen-'tences wherewith you conclude the 'letter I have before me, and which I 'muſt no farther animadvert upon, be-'cauſe you forbid me to do ſo.'

To the ſecond letter, among other things, ſhe ſays,

'So, my dear, you ſeem to think, that 'there was a fate in my error. The cor-'dial, the conſiderate friend is ſeen in the 'obſervation you make on this occaſion. 'Yet ſince things have happened as 'they have, would to Heaven I could 'hear, that all the world acquitted my 'father, or, at leaſt, my mother! whoſe 'character, before theſe family-feuds 'broke out, was the ſubject of every 'one's admiration. Don't let any-body 'ſay from you, ſo that it may come to 'her ear, that ſhe might, by a timely 'exertion of her fine talents, have ſaved 'her unhappy child. You will obſerve, 'my dear, that in her own good time, when 'ſhe ſaw that there was not likely to be 'an end to my brother's perſecutions, 'ſhe reſolved to exert herſelf. But the 'pragmatical daughter, by the fatal meet-'ing, precipitated all, and fruſtrated her 'indulgent deſigns. O my love, I am 'now convinced, by dear experience, 'that while children are ſo happy as to 'have parents or guardians, whom they 'may conſult, they ſhould not preſume '(no, not with the beſt and pureſt in-'tentions) to follow their own conceits, 'in material caſes.

'A ray of hope of future reconciliation 'darts in upon my mind, from the inten-'tion you tell me my mother had to ex-'ert herſelf in my favour, had I not 'gone away. And my hope is the 'ſtronger, as this communication points 'out to me, that my uncle Harlowe's in-'tereſt is likely, in my mother's opinion, 'to be of weight, if it could be engaged. 'It will behove me, perhaps, to apply 'to that dear uncle, if a proper occa-'ſion offer.'

LETTER LVI.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

MONDAY, APRIL 24.

FATE is weaving a whimſical web for thy friend; and I ſee not but I ſhall be inevitably manacled.

Here

Here have I been at work, dig, dig, dig, like a cunning miner, at one time, and ſpreading my ſnares, like an artful fowler, at another, and exulting in my contrivances to get this inimitable creature abſolutely into my power. Everything made for me. Her brother and uncles were but my pioneers: her father ſtormed as I directed him to ſtorm. Mrs. Howe was acted by the ſprings I ſet at work: her daughter was moving for me, and yet imagined herſelf plumb againſt me: and the dear creature herſelf had already run her ſtubborn neck into my gin, and knew not that ſhe was caught, for I had not drawn my ſprindges cloſe about her—And juſt as all this was compleated, wouldſt thou believe, that I ſhould be my own enemy, and her friend?—That I ſhould be ſo totally diverted from all my favourite purpoſes, as to propoſe to marry her before I went to town, in order to put it out of my own power to reſume them?

When thou knoweſt this, wilt thou not think that my black angel plays me booty, and has taken it into his head to urge me on to the indiſſoluble tie, that he might be more ſure of me (from the complex tranſgreſſions to which he will certainly ſtimulate me, when wedded) than perhaps he thought he could be from the ſimple ſins, in which I have ſo long allowed myſelf, that they ſeem to have the plea of habit.

Thou wilt be ſtill the more ſurprized, when I tell thee, that there ſeems to be a coalition going forward between the black angels and the white ones; for here has hers induced her in one hour, and by one retrograde accident, to acknowledge, what the charming creature never before acknowledged, a preferable favour for me. She even avows an intention to be mine—Mine, without reformation-conditions.—She permits me to talk of love to her: of the irrevocable ceremony: yet, another extraordinary! poſtpones that ceremony; chuſes to ſet out for London; and even to go to the widow's in town.

'Well, but how comes all this about?' methinks thou aſkeſt.—'Thou, Love-'lace, dealeſt in wonders; yet aimeſt 'not at the marvellous—How did all this 'come about?'

I will tell thee—I was in danger of loſing my charmer for ever.—She was ſoaring upwards to her native ſkies. She was got above the earth, by means, too, of the earth-born; and ſomething extraordinary was to be done to keep her with us ſublunaries. And what ſo effectually as the ſoothing voice of love, and the attracting offer of matrimony from a man not hated, can fix the attention of the maiden heart aching with uncertainty; and before impatient of the queſtionable queſtion?

This, in ſhort, was the caſe—While ſhe was refuſing all manner of obligation to me, keeping me at haughty diſtance, in hopes that her couſin Morden's arrival would ſoon fix her in a full and abſolute independence of me; diſguſted likewiſe at her adorer, for holding himſelf the reins of his own paſſions, inſtead of giving them up to her controul—She writes a letter, urging an anſwer to a letter before ſent, for her apparel, her jewels, and ſome gold, which ſhe had left behind her; all which was to ſave her pride from obligation, and to promote the independence her heart was ſet upon. And what followed but a ſhocking anſwer, made ſtill more ſhocking by the communication of a father's curſe upon a daughter deſerving only bleſſings?—A curſe upon the curſer's heart, and a double one upon the tranſmitter's, the ſpiteful, the envious Arabella!

Abſent when it came; on my return, I found her recovering from fits, again to fall into ſtronger fits; and nobody expecting her life; half a dozen meſſengers diſpatched to find me out. Nor wonder at her being ſo affected; ſhe, whoſe filial piety gave her dreadful faith in a father's curſes; and the curſe of this gloomy tyrant extending (to uſe her own words when ſhe could ſpeak) to both worlds.—O that it had turned, in the moment of it's utterance, to a mortal quinſey, and ſticking in his gullet, had choaked the old execrator, as a warning to all ſuch unnatural fathers!

What a miſcreant had I been, not to have endeavoured to bring her back, by all the endearments, by all the vows, by all the offers that I could make her?

I did bring her back. More than a father to her; for I have given her a life her unnatural father had well-nigh taken away: ſhall I not cheriſh the fruits of my own benefaction? I was earneſt in my vows to marry; and my ardour to urge the preſent time was a real ardour. But extreme dejection, with a mingled delicacy, that in her dying moments I doubt not ſhe will preſerve, have cauſed her to refuſe me the time, though not the ſolemnity; for ſhe has told me, that now ſhe muſt be wholly in my protection, [being deſtitute of every other!]—More indebted ſtill, thy friend, as thou ſeeſt, to her cruel relations, than to herſelf, for her favour!

She has written to Miſs Howe an account of their barbarity; but has not acquainted her, how very ill ſhe was.

Low, very low, ſhe remains; yet, dreading her ſtupid brother's enterprize, ſhe wants to be in London; where but for this accident, and (wouldſt thou have believed it?) for my perſuaſions, ſeeing her ſo very ill, ſhe would have been this night; and we ſhall actually ſet out on Wedneſday morning, if ſhe be not worſe.

And now for a few words with thee, on thy heavy preachment of Saturday laſt.

Thou art apprehenſive, that the lady is now truly in danger; and it is a miracle, thou telleſt me, if ſhe withſtand ſuch an attempter; knowing what we know of the ſex, thou ſayeſt, thou ſhouldſt dread, wert thou to make farther trial, leſt thou ſhouldſt ſucceed. And in another place, telleſt me, that thou pleadeſt not for the ſtate for any favour thou haſt for it.

What an advocate art thou for matrimony!—Thou wert ever an unhappy fellow at argument. Does the trite ſtuff with which the reſt of thy letter abounds, in favour of wedlock, ſtrike with the force that this which I have tranſcribed does againſt it?

Thou takeſt great pains to convince me, and that from the diſtreſſes the lady is reduced to, (chiefly by her friends perſecutions and implacableneſs, I hope thou wilt own, and not from me, as yet) that the propoſed trial will not be a fair trial. But let me aſk thee, Is not calamity the teſt of virtue? And wouldſt thou not have me value this charming creature upon proof of her merits?—Do I not intend to reward her by marriage, if ſhe ſtand that proof?

But why repeat I what I have ſaid before?—Turn back, thou egregious arguer, turn back to my long letter of the 19th; [See letter XIV.] and thou wilt there find every ſyllable of what thou haſt written either anſwered or invalidated.

But I am not angry with thee, Jack. I love oppoſition. As gold is tried by fire, and virtue by temptation; ſo is ſterling wit by oppoſition. Have I not, before thou ſetteſt out as an advocate for my fair one, often brought thee in, as making objections to my proceedings, for no other reaſons than to exalt myſelf by proving thee a man of ſtraw? As Homer raiſes up many of his champions, and gives them terrible names, only to have them knocked on the head by his heroes.

However, take to thee this one piece of advice—Evermore be ſure of being in the right, when thou preſumeſt to ſit down to correct thy maſter.

And another, if thou wilt—Never offer to invalidate the force which a virtuous education ought to have in the ſex, by endeavouring to find excuſes for their frailty from the frailty of ours. For, are we not devils to each other? They tempt us; we tempt them. Becauſe we men cannot reſiſt temptation, is that a reaſon that women ought not, when the whole of their education is caution and warning againſt our attempts? Do not their grandmothers give them one eaſy rule?—Men are to aſk—Women are to deny.

Well, but to return to my principal ſubject; let me obſerve, that be my future reſolutions what they will as to this lady, the contents of the violent letter ſhe has received, have ſet me at leaſt a month forward with her. I can now, as I hinted, talk of love and marriage, without controul and reſtriction; her injunctions no more my terror.

In this ſweetly familiar way ſhall we ſet out together for London. Mrs. Sorlings's eldeſt daughter, at my motion, is to attend her in the chaiſe; while I ride by way of eſcort: for ſhe is extremely apprehenſive of the Singleton plot; and has engaged me to be all patience, if any thing ſhould happen on the road. But nothing I am ſure will happen: for by a letter received juſt now from Joſeph, I underſtand, that James Harlowe has already laid aſide his ſtupid project. And this by the earneſt deſire of all thoſe of his friends to whom he had communicated it; who were afraid of the conſequences that might attend it. But it is not over with me however; although I am not determined at preſent as to the uſes I may make of it.

My beloved tells me, ſhe ſhall have her cloaths ſent her: ſhe hopes alſo her jewels, and ſome gold which ſhe left behind her. But Joſeph ſays, cloaths only will be ſent. I will not, however, tell her that: on the contrary, I ſay, there is no doubt but they will ſend all ſhe wrote for. The greater her diſappointment from them, the greater muſt be her dependence on me.

But, after all, I hope, I ſhall be enabled to be honeſt to a merit ſo tranſcendent. The devil take thee though for thy opinion given so mal-à-propos, that she may be overcome.

'If thou designest to be honest,' methinks thou sayest, 'why should not 'Singleton's plot be over with thee, as it 'is with her brother?'

Because, (if I must answer thee) where people are so modestly doubtful of what they are able to do, it is good to leave a loop-hole. And let me add, that when a man's heart is set upon a point, and any thing occurs to beat him off, he will find it very difficult when the suspending reason ceases, to forbear resuming it.

LETTER LVII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

TUESDAY, APRIL 25.

ALL hands at work in preparation for London. What makes my heart beat so strong? Why rises it to my throat, in such half-choaked flutters, when I think of what this removal may do for me? I am hitherto resolved to be honest: and that increases my wonder at these involuntary commotions. 'Tis a plotting villain of a heart: it ever was; and ever will be, I doubt. Such a joy when any roguery is going forward!—I so little it's master!—A head likewise so well turned to answer the triangular varlet's impulses!—No matter. I will struggle with thee, old friend; and if I cannot overcome thee now, I never will again attempt to conquer thee.

The dear creature continues extremely low and dejected. Tender blossom! How unfit to contend with the rude and ruffling wings of passion, and haughty and insolent controul!—Never till now from under the wing (it is not enough to say of indulging, but) of admiring parents; the mother's bosom only fit to receive this charming flower!

This was the reflection, that with mingled compassion, and augmented love, arose to my mind, when I beheld the charmer reposing her lovely face upon the bosom of the widow Sorlings, from a recovered fit, as I entered soon after she had received her execrable sister's letter. How lovely in her tears!—And as I entered, her lifted-up face significantly bespeaking my protection, as I thought. And can I be a villain to such an angel!—I hope not—But why, Belford, why, once more, puttest thou me in mind, that she may be overcome? And why to her own reliance on my honour so late and so reluctantly shewn?

But after all, so low, so dejected continues she to be, that I am terribly afraid I shall have a vapourish wife, if I do marry. I should then be doubly undone. Not that I shall be much at home with her, perhaps, after the first fortnight or so. But when a man has been ranging, like the painful bee, from flower to flower, perhaps for a month together, and the thoughts of home and a wife begin to have their charms with him, to be received by a Niobe, who, like a wounded vine, weeps her vitals away, while she but involuntarily curls about him; how shall I be able to bear that?

May heaven restore my charmer to health and spirits, I hourly pray—that a man may see whether she can love anybody but her father and mother! In their power, I am confident, it will be, at any time to make her husband joyless; and that, as I hate them so heartily, is a shocking thing to reflect upon.—Something more than woman, an angel, in some things; but a baby in others: so father-sick! so family-fond! what a poor chance stands a husband with such a wife, unless, forsooth, they vouchsafe to be reconciled to her, and continue reconciled?

It is infinitely better for her and for me, that she should not marry. What a delightful manner of life [O that I could persuade her to it!] would the life of honour be with such a woman? The fears, the inquietudes, the uneasy days, the restless nights; all arising from doubts of having disobliged me! Every absence dreaded to be an absence for ever! And then how amply rewarded, and rewarding, by the rapture-causing return! Such a passion as this keeps love in a continual fervour; makes it all alive. The happy pair, instead of sitting dozing and nodding at each other in opposite chimney-corners in a winter-evening, and over a wintry love, always new to each other, and having always something to say.

Thou knowest, in my verses to my Stella, my mind on this occasion. I will lay those verses in her way, as if undesignedly, when we are together at the widow's; that is to say, if we do not soon go to church by consent. She will thence see what my notions are of wedlock. If she receives them with any sort of temper, that will be a foundation; and let me alone to build upon it.

Many a girl has been carried, who never would have been attempted, had she shewed a proper resentment, when her ears or her eyes were first invaded. I have tried a young creature by a bad book, a light quotation, or an indecent picture; and if she has borne that, or only blushed, and not been angry; and more especially if she has leered and smiled; that girl have I, and old Satan, put down for our own. O how I could warn these little rogues if I would! Perhaps envy, more than virtue, will put me upon setting up beacons for them, when I grow old and joyless.

TUESDAY AFTERNOON.

If you are in London when I get thither, you will see me soon. My charmer is a little better than she was. Her eyes shew it; and her harmonious voice, hardly audible last time I saw her, now begins to cheer my heart once more. But yet she has no love, no sensibility!—There is no addressing her with those meaning yet innocent freedoms, (innocent at first setting out, they may be called) which soften others of her sex. The more strange this, as she now acknowledges preferable favour for me; and is highly susceptible of grief. Grief mollifies and enervates. The grieved mind looks round it, silently implores consolation, and loves the soother. Grief is ever an inmate with joy. Though they won't shew themselves at the same window at one time; yet they have the whole house in common between them.

LETTER LVIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

WEDN. APRIL 26.

AT last my lucky star has directed us into the desired port, and we are safely landed. Well says Rowe—

'The wise and active conquer difficulties,
'By daring to attempt them. Sloth and folly
'Shiver and shrink at sight of toil and hazard,
'And make th' impossibility they fear.'

But in the midst of my exultation, something, I know not what to call it, checks my joys, and glooms over my brighter prospects. If it be not conscience, it is wonderfully like what I thought so, many, many years ago.

'Surely, Lovelace,' methinks thou sayest, 'thy good motions are not gone 'off already! Surely thou wilt not now 'at last be a villain to this lady!'

I can't tell what to say to it. Why would not the dear creature accept of me, when I so sincerely offered myself to her acceptance? Things already appear with a very different face now I have got her here. Already have our mother and her daughters been about me: 'Charming lady! What a complexion! 'What eyes! What majesty in her per-'son—O Mr. Lovelace, you are a happy 'man!—You owe us such a lady!' Then they remind me of my revenge, and of my hatred to her whole family.

Sally was so struck with her, at first sight, that she broke out to me in these lines of Dryden—

'——Fairer to be seen
'Than the fair lily on the flowery green!
'More fresh than May herself in blossoms
'new!'

I sent to thy lodgings within half an hour after our arrival, to receive thy congratulation upon it: but thou wert at Edgware, it seems.

My beloved, who is charmingly amended, is retired to her constant employment, writing. I must content myself with the same amusement, till she shall be pleased to admit me to her presence; for already have I given to everyone her cue.

And, among the rest, who dost thou think is to be her maid-servant?—Deb. Butler.

'Ah, Lovelace!'

And ah, Belford! It can't be otherwise. But what dost think Deb.'s name is to be!—Why, Dorcas, Dorcas Wykes. And won't it be admirable, if either through fear, fright, or good-liking, we can get my beloved to accept of Dorcas Wykes for a bed-fellow?

In so many ways will it be now in my power to have the dear creature, that I shall not know which of them to chuse!

But here comes the widow, with Dorcas Wykes in her hand; and I am to introduce them both to my fair-one.

So!—The honest girl is accepted—Of good parentage: but, through a neglected education, plaguy illiterate—She can neither write, nor read writing. A kinswoman of Mrs. Sinclair—Could not therefore well be refused, the widow in person recommending her; and the wench only taken till her Hannah can come. What an advantage has an imposing or forward nature over a courteous one! So here may something arise to lead into correspondences, and so forth. To be sure, a person need not be so wary, so cautious of what she writes, or what she leaves upon her table or toilette, when her attendant cannot read.

It would be a miracle, as thou sayest,

Rob.t Lovelace Esq.r Introducing Mr.s Sinclair to Dorcas Wykes.

Published by Alex.r Hogg Oct.r 5. 1793.

if this lady can ſave herſelf—And having gone ſo far, how can I recede?—Then my revenge upon the Harlowes!—To have run away with a daughter of theirs, to make her a Lovelace—To make her one of a family ſo ſuperior to her own, what a triumph, as I have heretofore obſerved, to them!—But to run away with her, and to bring her to my lure in the other light, what a mortification of their pride! What a gratification of my own!

Then theſe women are continually at me. Theſe women, who, before my whole ſoul and faculties were abſorbed in the love of this ſingle charmer, uſed always to oblige me with the flower and firſt-fruits of their garden! Indeed, indeed my goddeſs ſhould not have choſen this London widow's—But I dare ſay, if I had, ſhe would not. People who will be dealing in contradiction, ought to pay for it. And to be puniſhed by the conſequences of our own choice, what a moral lies there!—What a deal of good may I not be the occaſion of from a little evil!

Dorcas is a neat creature, both in perſon and dreſs; her countenance not vulgar. And I am in hopes, as I hinted above, that her lady will accept of her for her bed-fellow, in a ſtrange houſe, for a week or ſo. But I ſaw ſhe had a diſlike to her at her very firſt appearance: yet I thought the girl behaved very modeſtly—Over-did it a little, perhaps—Her lady ſhrunk back, and looked ſhy upon her. The doctrine of ſympathies and antipathies is a ſurprizing doctrine—But Dorcas will be exceſſively obliging, and win her lady's favour ſoon, I doubt not. I am ſecure in one of the wench's qualities however—She is not to be corrupted. A great point that—Since a lady and her maid, when heartily of one party, will be too hard for half a ſcore devils.

The dear creature was no leſs ſhy when the widow firſt accoſted her at her alighting. Yet I thought, that honeſt Doleman's letter had prepared her for her maſculine appearance.

And now I mention that letter, why doſt thou not wiſh me joy, Jack?

'Joy of what?'

Why, joy of my nuptials.—Know then, that 'ſaid is done with me, when I have a mind to have it ſo; and that we are actually man and wife: only that conſummation has not paſſed—Bound down to the contrary of that, by a ſolemn vow, till a reconciliation with her family take place. The women here are told ſo. They know it, before my beloved knows it; and that, thou wilt ſay, is odd.

But how ſhall I do to make my fair-one keep her temper on the intimation? Why, is ſhe not here?—At Mrs. Sinclair's? But if ſhe will hear reaſon, I doubt not to convince her, that ſhe ought to acquieſce.

She will inſiſt, I ſuppoſe, upon my leaving her, and that I ſhall not take up my lodgings under the ſame roof. But circumſtances are changed ſince I firſt made her that promiſe. I have taken all the vacant apartments; and muſt carry this point alſo.

I hope in a while to get her with me to the public entertainments. She knows nothing of the town, and has ſeen leſs of it's diverſions than ever woman of her taſte, her fortune, her endowments, did ſee. She has indeed a natural politeneſs, which tranſcends all acquirement. The moſt capable of any one I ever knew, of judging what an hundred things are, by ſeeing one of a like nature. Indeed ſhe took ſo much pleaſure in her own choſen amuſements till perſecuted out of them, that ſhe had neither leiſure nor inclination for the town-diverſions.

Theſe diverſions will amuſe. And the deuce is in it, if a little ſuſceptibility will not put forth, now ſhe receives my addreſs; eſpecially if I can manage it ſo, as to be allowed to live under one roof with her. What though the ſenſibility be at firſt faint and reluctant, like the appearance of an early ſpring-flower in frofty weather, which ſeems afraid of being nipt by an eaſterly blaſt? That will be enough for me.

I hinted to thee in a former, that I had provided books for the lady's indoor amuſement. Sally and Polly are readers. My beloved's light cloſet was their library. And ſeveral pieces of devotion have been put in, bought on purpoſe, at ſecond-hand.

I was always for forming a judgment of the reading part of the ſex by their books. The obſervations I have made on this occaſion have been of great uſe to me, as well in England as out of it. The ſagacious lady may poſſibly be as curious in this point as her Lovelace.

So much for the preſent. Thou ſeeſt, that I have a great deal of buſineſs before me. Yet I will write again ſoon.

Mr. Lovelace ſends another letter with this; in which he takes notice of young Mrs. Sorlings's ſetting out with them, and leaving them at Barnet: but as it's contents are nearly the ſame with thoſe in the lady's next letter, it is omitted.

LETTER LIX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

WEDN. AFTERNOON, APRIL 26.

AT length, my deareſt Miſs Howe, I am in London, and in my new lodgings. They are neatly furniſhed, and the ſituation, for the town, is pleaſant.

But, I think, you muſt not aſk me, how I like the old gentlewoman. Yet ſhe ſeems courteous and obliging. Her kinſwomen juſt appeared to welcome me at my alighting. They ſeem to be genteel young women. But more of their anſt and of them, as I ſhall ſee more.

Miſs Sorlings has an uncle at Barnet, whom ſhe found ſo very ill, that her uneaſineſs on that account (having large expectations from him) made me comply with her deſire to ſtay with him. Yet I wiſhed, as her uncle did not expect her, that ſhe would ſee me ſettled in London; and Mr. Lovelace was ſtill more earneſt that ſhe would, offering to ſend her back again in a day or two and urging, that her uncle's malady threatened not a ſudden change. But leaving the matter to her choice, after ſhe knew what would have been mine, ſhe made me not the expected compliment. Mr. Lovelace, however, made her a handſome preſent at parting.

His genteel ſpirit on all occaſions makes me often wiſh him more conſiſtent.

As ſoon as I arrived I took poſſeſſion of my apartment. I ſhall make good uſe of the light cloſet in it, if I ſtay here any time.

One of his attendants returns in the morning to The Lawn; and I made writing to you by him, an excuſe for my retiring.

And now give me leave to chide you, my deareſt friend, for your raſh, and I hope revocable reſolution, not to make Mr. Hickman the happieſt man in the world, while my happineſs is in ſuſpence. Suppoſe I were to be unhappy, what, my dear, would this reſolution of yours avail me? Marriage is the higheſt ſtate of friendſhip: if happy, it leſſens our cares by dividing them, at the ſame time that it doubles our pleaſures by a mutual participation. Why, my dear, if you love me, will you not rather give another friend to one who has not two that ſhe is ſure of?—Had you married on your mother's laſt birth-day, as ſhe would have had you, I ſhould not, I dare ſay, have wanted a refuge, that would have ſaved many mortifications, and much diſgrace.

HERE I was broke in upon by Mr. Lovelace; introducing the widow leading in a kinſwoman of hers to attend me, if I approved of her, till my Hannah ſhould come, or till I had provided myſelf with ſome other ſervant. The widow gave her many good qualities; but ſaid, that ſhe had one great defect; which was, that ſhe could not write, nor read writing; that part of her education having been neglected when ſhe was young: but for diſcretion, fidelity, obligingneſs, ſhe was not to be out-done by any-body. She commended her likewiſe for her ſkill at the needle.

As for her defect, I can eaſily forgive that. She is very likely and genteel; too genteel indeed, I think, for a ſervant. But, what I like leaſt of all in her, ſhe has a ſtrange ſly eye. I never ſaw ſuch an eye—Half-confident, I think. But indeed Mrs. Sinclair herſelf (for that is the widow's name) has an odd winking eye; and her reſpectfulneſs ſeems too much ſtudied, methinks, for the London eaſe and freedom. But people can't help their looks, you know; and after all, ſhe is extremely civil and obliging. And as for the young woman, (Dorcas is her name) ſhe will not be long with me.

I accepted her: how could I do otherwiſe, (if I had had a mind to make objections, which in my preſent ſituation I had not) her aunt preſent, and the young woman alſo preſent; and Mr. Lovelace officious in his introducing them, to oblige me? But, upon their leaving me, I told him, (who ſeemed inclinable to begin a converſation with me) that I deſired that this apartment might be conſidered as my retirement: that when I ſaw him, it might be in the dining-room; (which is up a few ſtairs; for this back-houſe being once two, the rooms do not all of them very conveniently communicate with each other) and that I might be as little broken in upon as poſſible, when I am here. He withdrew very reſpectfully to the door; but there ſtopt; and aſked for my company then in the dining-room. If he were about ſetting out for other lodgings, I would go with him now, I told him: but if he did not juſt then go, I would firſt finiſh my letter to Miſs Howe.

I ſee he has no mind to leave me, if he can help it. My brother's ſcheme may give him a pretence to try to engage me to diſpenſe with his promiſe;

But if I now do, I muſt acquit him of it entirely.

My approbation of his tender behaviour in the midſt of my grief has given him a right, as he ſeems to think, of addreſſing me with all the freedom of an approved lover. I ſee by this man, that when once a woman embarks with this ſex, there is no receding. One conceſſion is but the prelude to another with them. He has been ever ſince Sunday laſt continually complaining of the diſtance I keep him at; and thinks himſelf entitled now, to call in queſtion my value for him; ſtrengthening his doubts by my former declared readineſs to give him up to a reconciliation with my friends—And yet has himſelf fallen off from that obſequious tenderneſs, if I may couple the words, which drew from me the conceſſions he builds upon.

While we were talking at the door, my new ſervant came up, with an invitation to us both to tea. I ſaid, he might accept of it, if he pleaſed; but I muſt purſue my writing: and not chuſing either tea or ſupper, I deſired him to make my excuſes below, as to both; and inform them of my choice to be retired as much as poſſible. Yet to promiſe for me my attendance on the widow and her nieces at breakfaſt in the morning.

He objected particularity in the eye of ſtrangers, as to avoiding ſupper.

'You know,' ſaid I, 'and you can 'tell them, that I ſeldom eat ſuppers. 'My ſpirits are low. You muſt never 'urge me againſt a declared choice. 'Pray, Mr. Lovelace, inform them of 'all my particularities. If they are 'obliging, they will allow for them. 'I come not hither to make new ac'quaintance.'

I have turned over the books I found in my cloſet; and am not a little pleaſed with them; and think the better of the people of the houſe for their ſakes.

Stanhope's Goſpels; Sharp's, Tillotſon's, and South's Sermons; Nelſon's Feaſts and Faſts; a Sacramental piece of the Biſhop of Man, and another of Dr. Gauden, Biſhop of Exeter; and Inett's Devotions; are among the devout books: and among thoſe of a lighter turn, the following not ill choſen ones. A Telemachus in French, another in Engliſh; Steele's, Rowe's, and Shakeſpeare's plays; that genteel comedy of Mr. Cibber, The Careleſs Huſband, and others of the ſame author; Dryden's Miſcellanies; the Tatlers, Spectators, and Guardians; Pope's and Swift's, and Addiſon's works.

In the blank leaves of the Nelſon and Biſhop Gauden, is Mrs. Sinclair's name; and in thoſe of moſt of the others, either Sarah Martin, or Mary Horton, the names of the two nieces.

A

I AM exceedingly out of humour with Mr. Lovelace: and have great reaſon to be ſo. As you will allow, when you have read the converſation I am going to give you an account of; for he would not let me reſt till I gave him my company in the dining-room.

He began with letting me know, that he had been out to enquire after the character of the widow, which was the more neceſſary, he ſaid, as he ſuppoſed that I would expect his frequent abſence.

I did, I ſaid; and that he would not think of taking up his lodging in the ſame houſe with me. 'But what,' ſaid I, 'is the reſult of your enquiry?'

Why, indeed, the widow's character was, in the main, what he liked well enough. But as it was Miſs Howe's opinion, as I had told him, that my brother had not given over his ſcheme; as the widow lived by letting lodgings; and had others to lett in the ſame part of the houſe, which might be taken by an enemy; he knew no better way, than for him to take them all, as it could not be for a long time—unleſs I would think of removing to others.

So far was well enough: but as it was eaſy for me to ſee, that he ſpoke the ſlighter of the widow, in order to have a pretence to lodge here himſelf, I aſked him his intention in that reſpect. And he frankly owned, that if I choſe to ſtay here, he could not, as matters ſtood, think of leaving me for ſix hours together; and he had prepared the widow to expect, that we ſhould be here but for a few days—only till we could fix ourſelves in a houſe ſuitable to our condition; and this, that I might be under the leſs embarraſs, if I pleaſed to remove.

'Fix our-ſelves in a houſe, and 'and our, Mr. Lovelace—Pray, in what 'light—'

He interrupted me—'Why, my deareſt life, if you will hear me with pa'tience—Yet I am half-afraid, that I 'have been too forward, as I have not 'conſulted you upon it—But as my 'friends in town, according to what 'Mr. Doleman has written, in the letter you have ſeen, conclude us to be 'married—'

'Surely, Sir, you have not preſumed—'

'Hear

'Hear me out, dearest creature—You have received with favour my addresses —You have made me hope for the honour of your consenting hand: yet, by declining my most fervent tender of myself to you at Mrs. Sorlings's, have given me apprehensions of delay: I would not for the world be thought so ungenerous a wretch, now you have honoured me with your confidence, as to wish to precipitate you: yet your brother's schemes are not given up. Singleton, I am afraid, is actually in town; his vessel lies at Rotherhith—Your brother is absent from Harlowe Place; indeed not with Singleton yet, as I can hear. If you are known to be mine, or if you are but thought to be so, there will probably be an end of your brother's contrivances. The widow's character may be as worthy as it is said to be. But the worthier she is, the more danger, if your brother's agent should find us out; since she may be prevailed, that she ought in conscience to take a parent's part, against a child who stands in opposition to them. But if she believes us married, her good character will stand us in stead, and she will be of our party.—Then I have taken care to give her a reason why two apartments are requisite for us, at the hour of retirement.'

I perfectly raved at him. I would have flung from him in resentment; but he would not let me: and what could I do? Whither go, the evening advanced?

'I am astonished at you!' said I.—'If you are a man of honour, what need of all this strange obliquity? You delight in crooked ways—Let me know, since I must stay in your company, (for he held my hand) let me know all you have said to the people below.—Indeed, indeed, Mr. Lovelace, you are a very unaccountable man.'

'My dearest creature, need I to have mentioned any-thing of this? And could I not have taken up my lodgings in this house unknown to you, if I had not intended to make you the judge of all my proceedings? But this is what I have told the widow before her kinswomen, and before your new servant—That indeed we were privately married at Hertford; but that you had preliminarily bound me under a solemn vow, which I am most religiously resolved to keep, to be contented with separate apartments, and even not to lodge under the same roof, 'till a certain reconciliation shall take 'place, which is of high consequence 'to both. And further, that I might 'convince you of the purity of my intentions, and that my whole view in 'this was to prevent mischief, I have 'acquainted them, that I have solemnly 'promised to behave to you before every-'body, as if we were only betrothed, 'and not married; not even offering to 'take any of those innocent freedoms 'which are not refused in the most punc-'tilious loves.'

And then he solemnly vowed to me the strictest observance of the same respectful behaviour to me.

I said, that I was not by any means satisfied with the tale he had told, nor with the necessity he wanted to lay me under, of appearing what I was not: that every step he took was a wry one, a needless wry one: and since he thought it necessary to tell the people below anything about me, I insisted, that he should unsay all he had said, and tell them the truth.

What he had told them, he said, was with so many circumstances, that he could sooner die than contradict it. And still he insisted upon the propriety of appearing to be married, for the reasons he had given before—'And dearest crea-'ture,' said he, 'why this high displea-'sure with me upon so well-intended an 'expedient? You know, that I cannot 'wish to shun your brother, or his Sin-'gleton, but upon your account. The 'first step I would take, if left to myself, 'would be to find them out. I have al-'ways acted in this manner, when any-body 'has presumed to give out threatenings a-'gainst me.

''Tis true, I would have consulted 'you first, and had your leave. But 'since you dislike what I have said, let 'me implore you, dearest Madam, to 'give the only proper sanction to it, by 'naming an early day. Would to Hea-'ven that were to be to-morrow!—For 'God's sake, let it be to-morrow! But 'if not,' [Was it his business, my dear, before I spoke, (yet he seemed to be afraid of me) to say, if not?] 'let me 'beseech you, Madam, if my behaviour 'shall not be to your dislike, that you 'will not to-morrow, at breakfast-time, 'discredit what I have told them. The 'moment I give you cause to think, that 'I take any advantage of your conces-'sion, that moment revoke it, and ex-'pose me, as I shall deserve.—And once 'more, let me remind you, that I have 'no view either to serve or save myself

by

'by this expedient. It is only to pre'vent a probable miſchief, for your own
'mind's ſake, and for the ſake of thoſe
'who deſerve not the leaſt conſideration
'from me.'

What could I ſay? What could I do?—I verily think, that had he urged me again, in a proper manner, I ſhould have conſented (little ſatisfied as I am with him) to give him a meeting to-morrow morning at a more ſolemn place than in the parlour below.

But this I reſolve, that he ſhall not have my conſent to ſtay a night under this roof. He has now given me a ſtronger reaſon for this determination than I had before.

ALAS! my dear, how vain a thing to ſay, what we will or what we will not do, when we have put ourſelves into the power of this ſex!—He went down to the people below, on my deſiring to be left to myſelf; and ſtaid till their ſupper was juſt ready; and then, deſiring a moment's audience, as he called it, he beſought my leave to ſtay that one night, promiſing to ſet out either for Lord M.'s or for Edgware to his friend Belford's, in the morning, after breakfaſt. But if I were againſt it, he ſaid, he would not ſtay ſupper; and would attend me about eight next day—Yet he added, that my denial would have a very particular appearance to the people below, from what he had told them; and the more, as he had actually agreed for all the vacant apartments (indeed only for a month) for the reaſon he had before hinted at: but I need not ſtay here two days, if, upon converſing with the widow and her nieces in the morning, I ſhould have any diſlike to them.

I thought, notwithſtanding my reſolution above-mentioned, that it would ſeem too punctilious to deny him, under the circumſtances he had mentioned:—having, beſide, no reaſon to think he would obey me; for he looked, as if he were determined to debate the matter with me. And now as I ſee no likelihood of a reconciliation with my friends, and as I have actually received his addreſſes; I thought I would not quarrel with him, if I could help it, eſpecially as he aſked to ſtay but for one night, and could have done ſo without my knowing it; and you being of opinion, that the proud wretch, diſtruſting his own merits with me, or at leaſt my regard for him, will probably bring me to ſome conceſſions in his favour—For all theſe reaſons, I thought proper to yield this point: yet I was ſo vexed with him on the other, that it was impoſſible for me to comply with that grace which a conceſſion ſhould be made with, or not made at all.

This was what I ſaid—'What you
'will do, you muſt do, I think. You 'are very ready to promiſe; very ready
'to depart form your promiſe. You
'ſay, however, that you will ſet out
'to-morrow for the country. You know
'how ill I have been. I am not well 'enough now to debate with you upon
'your encroaching ways. I am utterly
'diſſatisfied with the tale you have told
'below. Nor will I promiſe to appear
'to the people of the houſe to-morrow
'what I am not.'

He withdrew in the moſt reſpectful manner, beſeeching me only to favour him with ſuch a meeting in the morning, as might not make the widow and her nieces think he had given me reaſon to be offended with him.

I retired to my own apartment, and Dorcas came to me ſoon after to take my commands. I told her, that I required very little attendance, and always dreſſed and undreſſed myſelf.

She ſeemed concerned, as if ſhe thought I had repulſed her; and ſaid, It ſhould be her whole ſtudy to oblige me.

I told her, that I was not difficult to be pleaſed: and ſhould let her know from time to time what aſſiſtance I ſhould expect from her. But for that night I had no occaſion for her further attendance.

She is not only genteel, but is well-bred, and well-ſpoken.—She muſt have had what is generally thought to be the polite part of education: but it is ſtrange, that fathers and mothers ſhould make ſo light, as they generally do, of that preferable part in girls, which would improve their minds, and give a grace to all the reſt.

As ſoon as ſhe was gone, I inſpected the doors, the windows, the wainſcot, the dark cloſet as well as the light one; and finding very good faſtenings to the door, and to all the windows, I again had recourſe to my pen.

MRS. SINCLAIR is juſt now gone from me. Dorcas, ſhe told me, had acquainted her, that I had diſmiſſed her for the night. She came to aſk me how I liked my apartment, and to wiſh me good reſt. She expreſſed her concern, that they could not have my company at ſupper. Mr. Lovelace, ſhe ſaid, had informed ſhewed them of my love of retirement. She aſſured me, that I ſhould not be broken in upon. She highly extolled him, and gave me a ſhare in the praiſe, as to perſon. But was ſorry, ſhe ſaid, that ſhe was likely to loſe us ſo ſoon as Mr. Lovelace talked of.

I anſwered her with a ſuitable civility; and ſhe withdrew with great tokens of reſpect. With greater, I think, than ſhould be from diſtance of years, as ſhe was the wife of a gentleman; and as the appearance of every-thing about her, as well houſe as dreſs, carries the marks of ſuch good circumſtances, as require not abaſement.

If, my dear, you will write againſt prohibition, be pleaſed to direct, 'To Miſs 'Laetitia Beaumont; to be left till called for, 'at Mr. Wilſon's in Pall Mall.'

Mr. Lovelace propoſed this direction to me, not knowing of your deſire that your letters ſhould paſs by a third hand. As his motive for it was, that my brother might not trace out where we are, I am glad, as well from this inſtance as from others, that he ſeems to think he has done miſchief enough already.

Do you know how my poor Hannah does?

Mr. Lovelace is ſo full of his contrivances and expedients, that I think it may not be amiſs to deſire you to look carefully to the ſeals of my letters, as I ſhall to thoſe of yours. If I find him baſe in this particular, I ſhall think him capable of any evil; and will fly him as my worſt enemy.

LETTER LX.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

WITH HER TWO LAST LETTERS, N° LIV. LV. INCLOSED.

THURSDAY NIGHT, APRIL 27.

I Have your's; juſt brought me. Mr. Hickman has helped me to a lucky expedient, which, with the aſſiſtance of the poſt, will enable me to correſpond with you every day. An honeſt higler [Simon Collins his name] by whom I ſhall ſend this, and the two incloſed, (now I have your direction whither) goes to town conſtantly on Mondays, Wedneſdays, and Fridays; and can bring back to me from Mr. Wilſon's what you ſhall have cauſed to be left for me.

I congratulate you on your arrival in town, ſo much amended in ſpirits. I muſt be brief. I hope you'll have no cauſe to repent returning my Norris. She is forthcoming on demand.

I am ſorry your Hannah can't be with you. She is very ill ſtill; but not dangerouſly.

I long for your account of the women you are with. If they are not right people, you will find them out in one breakfaſting.

I know not what to write upon his reporting to them that you are actually married. His reaſons for it are plauſible. But he delights in odd expedients and inventions.

Whether you like the people or not, do not, by your noble ſincerity and plain-dealing, make yourſelf enemies. You are in the world now, you know.

I am glad you had thoughts of taking him at his offer; if he had re-urged it. I wonder he did not. But if he do not ſoon, and in ſuch a way as you can accept of it, don't think of ſtaying with him.

Depend upon it, my dear, he will not leave you, either night or day, if he can help it, now he has got footing.

I ſhould have abhorred him for his report of your marriage, had he not made it with ſuch circumſtances as leave it ſtill in your power to keep him at a diſtance. If once he offer at the leaſt familiarity —But this is needleſs to ſay to you. He can have, I think, no other deſign but what he profeſſes; becauſe he muſt needs think, that his report of being married to you muſt increaſe your vigilance.

You may depend upon my looking narrowly into the ſealings of your letters. If, as you ſay, he be baſe in that point, he will be ſo in every-thing. But to a perſon of your merit, of your fortune, of your virtue, he cannot be baſe. The man is no fool. It is his intereſt, as well with regard to his expectations from his own friends, as from you, to be honeſt. Would to Heaven, however, that you were really married! This is now the predominant wiſh of your

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER LXI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

THURS. MORN. EIGHT O'CLOCK.

I Am more and more diſpleaſed with Mr. Lovelace, on reflection, for his boldneſs in hoping to make me, though but paſſively, as I may ſay, teſtify to his great untruth. And I ſhall like him ſtill leſs for it, if his view in it does not come out to be the hope of accelerating my reſolution in his favour, by the difficulty it

it will lay me under as to my behaviour to him. He has ſent me his compliments by Dorcas, with a requeſt that I will permit him to attend me in the dining-room—perhaps, that he may gueſs from thence whether I will meet him in good humour, or not: but I have anſwered, that as I ſhall ſee him at breakfaſt-time I deſired to be excuſed.

TEN O'CLOCK.

I TRIED to adjuſt my countenance, before I went down, to an eaſier air than I had a heart, and was received with the higheſt tokens of reſpect by the widow, and her two nieces: agreeable young women enough in their perſons; but they ſeemed to put on an air of reſerve; while Mr. Lovelace was eaſy and free to all, as if he were of long acquaintance with them: gracefully enough, I cannot but ſay; an advantage which travelled gentlemen have over other people.

The widow, in the converſation we had after breakfaſt, gave us an account of the military merit of the colonel her huſband, and, upon this occaſion, put her handkerchief to her eyes twice or thrice. I hope for the ſake of her ſincerity, ſhe wetted it, becauſe ſhe would be thought to have done ſo; but I ſaw not that ſhe did. She wiſhed that I might never know the loſs of a huſband ſo dear to me, as her beloved colonel was to her: and ſhe again put the handkerchief to her eyes.

It muſt, no doubt, be a moſt affecting thing to be ſeparated from a good huſband, and to be left in difficult circumſtances beſides, and that not by his fault, and expoſed to the inſults of the baſe and ungrateful, as ſhe repreſented her caſe to be at his death. This moved me a good deal in her favour.

You know, my dear, that I have an open and free heart; and naturally have as open and free a countenance; at leaſt my complimenters have told me ſo. At once, where I like, I mingle minds without reſerve, encouraging reciprocal freedoms, and am forward to diſſipate diffidences. But with theſe two nieces of the widow I never can be intimate —I don't know why.

Only, that circumſtances, and what paſſed in converſation, encouraged not the notion, or I ſhould have been apt to think, that the young ladies and Mr. Lovelace were of longer acquaintance than of yeſterday. For he, by ſtealth, as it were, caſt glances ſometimes at them, which they returned; and, on my ocular notice, their eyes fell, as I may ſay, under my eye, as if they could not ſtand examination.

The widow directed all her talk to me, as to Mrs. Lovelace; and I, with a very ill grace, bore it. And once ſhe expreſſed, more forwardly than I thanked her for, her wonder that any vow, any conſideration, however weighty, could have force enough with ſo charming a couple, as ſhe called him and me, to make us keep ſeparate beds.

Their eyes, upon this hint, had the advantage of mine. Yet was I not conſcious of guilt. How know I then, upon recollection, that my cenſures upon theirs are not too raſh? There are, no doubt, many truly modeſt perſons, (putting myſelf out of the queſtion) who, by bluſhes at an injurious charge, have been ſuſpected, by thoſe who cannot diſtinguiſh between the confuſion which guilt will be attended with, and the noble conſciouſneſs that overſpreads the face of a fine ſpirit, to be thought but capable of an imputed evil.

The great Roman, as we read, who took his ſirname from one part in three (the fourth not then diſcovered) of the world he had triumphed over, being charged with a mean crime to his ſoldiery, choſe rather to ſuffer exile (the puniſhment due to it, had he been found guilty) than to have it ſaid that Scipio was queſtioned in publick, on ſo ſcandalous a charge. And think you, my dear, that Scipio did not bluſh with indignation, when the charge was firſt communicated to him?

Mr. Lovelace, when the widow expreſſed her forward wonder, looked ſly and leering, as if to obſerve how I took it: and ſaid, they might take notice that his regard for my will and pleaſure (calling me his dear creature) had greater force upon him than the oath by which he had bound himſelf.

Rebuking both him and the widow, I ſaid, it was ſtrange to me to hear a mouth or vow ſo lightly treated, as to have it thought but of ſecond conſideration whatever were the firſt.

The obſervation was juſt, Miſs Martin ſaid; for that nothing could excuſe the breaking of a ſolemn vow, be the occaſion of making it what it would.

I aſked after the neareſt church, for I have been too long a ſtranger to the ſolemn worſhip. They named St. James's, St. Anne's, and another in Bloomſbury; and the two nieces ſaid, they often went went to St. James's church, becauſe of the good company, as well as the excellent preaching.

Mr. Lovelace ſaid, the Royal Chapel was the place he oftenеſt went to, when in town. Poor man! little did I expect to hear he went to any place of devotion. I aſked, if the preſence of the viſible king of, comparatively, but a ſmall territory, did not take off, too generally, the requiſite attention to the ſervice of the inviſible King and Maker of a thouſand worlds?

He believed this might be ſo with ſuch as came for curioſity, when the royal family were preſent. But otherwiſe, he had ſeen as many contrite faces at the Royal Chapel, as any-where elſe: 'And 'why not? Since the people about court 'have as deep ſcores to wipe off, as any 'people whatever.'

He ſpoke this with ſo much levity, that I could not help ſaying, that nobody queſtioned but he knew how to chuſe his company.

'Your ſervant, my dear,' bowing, were his words; and turning to them, 'You will obſerve upon numberleſs oc-'caſions, ladies, as we are further ac-'quainted, that my beloved never ſpares 'me upon theſe topicks. But I admire 'her as much in her reproofs, as I am 'fond of her approbation.'

Miſs Horton ſaid, There was a time for every-thing. She could not but ſay, that ſhe thought innocent mirth was mighty becoming in young people.

'Very true,' joined in Miſs Martin. 'And Shakeſpare ſays well, That youth 'is the ſpring of life, the bloom of gaudy 'years.' [With a theatrical air ſhe ſpoke it:] and, for her part, ſhe could not but admire in my ſpouſe, that charming vivacity which ſo well ſuited his time of life.

Mr. Lovelace bowed. The man is fond of praiſe. More fond of it, I doubt, than of deſerving it. Yet this ſort of praiſe he does deſerve. He has, you know, an eaſy free manner, and no bad voice: and this praiſe ſo expanded his gay heart, that he ſung the following lines from Congreve, as he told us they were—

'Youth does a thouſand pleaſures bring,
'Which from decrepit age will fly;
'Sweets that wanton in the boſom of the ſpring,
'In winter's cold embraces die.'

And this for a compliment, as he ſaid, to the two nieces. Nor was it thrown away upon them. They encored it; and his compliance fixed them in my memory.

We had ſome talk about meals; and the widow very civilly offered to conform to any rules I would ſet her. I told her how eaſily I was pleaſed, and how much I choſe to dine by myſelf, and that from a plate ſent me from any ſingle diſh. But I will not trouble you, my dear, with ſuch particulars.

They thought me very ſingular; and with reaſon: but as I liked them not ſo very well as to forego my own choice in compliment to them, I was the leſs concerned for what they thought.—And ſtill the leſs, as Mr. Lovelace had put me very much out of humour with him.

They, however, cautioned me againſt melancholy. I ſaid, I ſhould be a very unhappy creature, if I could not bear my own company.

Mr. Lovelace ſaid, That he muſt let the ladies into my ſtory; and then they would know how to allow for my ways. 'But, my dear, as you love me,' ſaid the confident wretch, 'give as little way 'to melancholy as poſſible. Nothing 'but the ſweetneſs of your temper, 'and your high notions of a duty that 'never can be deſerved where you place 'it, can make you ſo uneaſy as you are. '—Be not angry, my dear love, for ſay-'ing ſo,' [ſeeing me frown, I ſuppoſe:] and ſnatched my hand, and kiſſed it.—I left him with them; and retired to my cloſet and my pen.

Juſt as I have written thus far, I am interrupted by a meſſage from him that he is ſetting out on a journey, and deſires to take my commands—So here I will leave off, to give him a meeting in the dining room.

I WAS not diſpleaſed to ſee him in his riding-dreſs.

He ſeemed deſirous to know how I liked the gentlewomen below. I told him, that although I did not think them very exceptionable; yet as I wanted not, in my preſent ſituation, new acquaintance, I ſhould not be fond of cultivating theirs.

He urged me ſtill further on this head.

I could not ſay, I told him, that I greatly liked either of the young gentlewomen, any more than their aunt: and that were my ſituation ever ſo happy, they had much too gay a turn for me.

He did not wonder, he ſaid, to hear me ſay ſo. He knew not any of the ſex who had been accuſtomed to ſhew themſelves at the town-diverſions and amuſements, that would appear tolerable to me. 'Silences and bluſhes, Madam, are 'now no graces with our fine ladies in 'town.

'town. Hardened by frequent publick 'appearances, they would be as much 'aſhamed to be found guilty of theſe 'weakneſſes, as men.'

'Do you defend theſe two gentlewo- 'men, Sir, by reflections upon half the 'ſex? But you muſt ſecond me, Mr. 'Lovelace, (and yet I am not fond of 'being thought particular) in my deſire 'of breakfaſting and ſupping (when I 'do ſup) by myſelf.'

If I would have it ſo, to be ſure it ſhould be ſo. The people of the houſe were not of conſequence enough to be apologized to, in any point where my pleaſure was concerned. And if I ſhould diſlike them ſtill more on further knowledge of them, he hoped I would think of ſome other lodgings.

He expreſſed a great deal of regret at leaving me, declaring, that it was abſolutely in obedience to my commands: but that he could not have conſented to go, while my brother's ſchemes were on foot, if I had not done him the credit of my countenance in the report he had made that we were married; which, he ſaid, had bound all the family to his intereſt, ſo that he could leave me with the greater ſecurity and ſatisfaction.

He hoped, he ſaid, that on his return I would name his happy day; and the rather, as I might be convinced, by my brother's projects, that no reconciliation was to be expected.

I told him, that perhaps I might write one letter to my uncle Harlowe. He once loved me. I ſhould be eaſier when I had made one direct application. I might poſſibly propoſe ſuch terms, in relation to my grandfather's eſtate, as might procure me their attention; and I hoped he would be long enough abſent to give me time to write to him, and receive an anſwer from him.

That, he muſt beg my pardon, he could not promiſe. He would inform himſelf of Singleton's and my brother's motions; and if on his return he found no reaſon for apprehenſion, he would go directly for Berks, and endeavour to bring up with him his couſin Charlotte, who, he hoped, would induce me to give him an earlier day, than at preſent I ſeemed to think of.—I ſeemed to think of, my dear! Very acquieſcent, as I ſhould imagine!

I told him that I ſhould take that young lady's company for a great favour.

I was the more pleaſed with this motion, as it came from himſelf, and with no ill grace.

He earneſtly preſſed me to accept of a Bank note: but I declined it. And then he offered me his ſervant William for my attendant in his abſence; who, he ſaid, might be diſpatched to him, if anything extraordinary fell out. I conſented to that.

He took his leave of me in the moſt reſpectful manner, only kiſſing my hand. He left the Bank note, unobſerved by me, upon the table. You may be ſure, I ſhall give it him back at his return.

I am in a much better humour with him than I was.

Where doubts of any perſon are removed, a mind not ungenerous is willing, by way of amends for having conceived thoſe doubts, to conſtrue everything that happens capable of a good conſtruction, in that perſon's favour. Particularly, I cannot but be pleaſed to obſerve, that although he ſpeaks of the ladies of his family with the freedom of relationſhip, yet it is always with tenderneſs. And from a man's kindneſs to his relations of the ſex, a woman has ſome reaſon to expect his good behaviour to herſelf, when married, if ſhe be willing to deſerve it from him.

And thus, my dear, am I brought to ſit down ſatisfied with this man, where I find room to infer that he is not by nature a ſavage. But how could a creature, who (treating herſelf unpolitely) gave a man an opportunity to run away with her, expect to be treated by that man with a very high degree of politeneſs?

'But why, now, when fairer proſpects 'ſeem to open, why theſe melancholy 'reflections?' will my beloved friend aſk of her Clariſſa.

Why? Can you aſk why, my deareſt Miſs Howe, of a creature, who, in the world's eye, has enrolled her name among the giddy and the inconſiderate; who labours under a parent's curſe, and the cruel uncertainties, which muſt ariſe from reflecting, that, equally againſt duty and principle, ſhe has thrown herſelf into the power of a man, and that man an immoral one?—Muſt not the ſenſe ſhe has of her inconſideration darken her moſt hopeful proſpects? Muſt it not even riſe ſtrongeſt upon a thoughtful mind, when her hopes are the faireſt? Even her pleaſures, were the man to prove better than ſhe expects, coming to her with an abatement, like that which perſons who are in poſſeſſion of ill-gotten wealth muſt then moſt poignantly experience, (if they have reflecting and unſeared minds) when, all their wiſhes anſwered, (if the wiſhes of ſuch perſons can ever be wholly answered) they ſit down in hopes to enjoy what they have unjuſtly obtained, and find their own reflections their greateſt torment.

May you, my dear friend, be always happy in your reflections, prays your ever-affectionate CL. HARLOWE.

Mr. Lovelace, in his next letter, triumphs on his having carried his two great points of making the lady yield to paſs for his wife to the people of the houſe, and to his taking up his lodgings in it, though but for one night. He is now, he ſays, in a fair way, and doubts not but that he ſhall ſoon prevail, if not by perſuaſion, by ſurprize. Yet he pretends to have ſome little remorſe, and cenſures himſelf as acting the part of the grand tempter. But having ſucceeded thus far, he cannot, he ſays, forbear trying, according to the reſolution he had before made, whether he cannot go farther.

He gives the particulars of their debates on the above-mentioned ſubjects, to the ſame effect as in the lady's laſt letters.

It will by this time be ſeen, that his whole merit, with regard to this lady, lies in doing juſtice to her excellences both of mind and perſon, though to his own condemnation. Thus he begins his ſucceeding letter:

'And now, Belford, will I give thee 'an account of our firſt breakfaſt-converſation.

'All ſweetly ſerene and eaſy was the 'lovely brow and charming aſpect of 'my goddeſs, on her deſcending among 'us; commanding reverence from every 'eye; a curtſey from every knee; and 'ſilence, awful ſilence, from every quivering lip: while ſhe, armed with conſcious worthineſs and ſuperiority, looked and behaved, as an empreſs would look and behave among her vaſſals; yet with a freedom from pride and haughtineſs, as if born to dignity, and to a behaviour habitually gracious.'

He takes notice of the jealouſy, pride, and vanity, of Sally Martin and Polly Horton, on his reſpectful behaviour to the lady: creatures who, brought up too high for their fortunes, and to a taſte of pleaſure, and the publick diverſions, had fallen an eaſy prey to his ſeducing arts, (as will be ſeen in the concluſion of this work:) and who, as he obſerves, had not yet got over that diſtinction in their love, which makes a woman prefer one man to another,

'How difficult is it,' ſays he, 'to make 'a woman ſubſcribe to a preference 'againſt herſelf, though ever ſo viſible; 'eſpecially where love is concerned! This 'violent, this partial little devil, Sally, 'has the inſolence to compare herſelf 'with my angel—yet owns her to be an 'angel. "I charge you, Mr. Lovelace," 'ſays ſhe, "ſhew none of your extrava-"gant acts of kindneſs before me to this "ſullen, this gloomy beauty—I cannot "bear it." Then was I reminded of 'her firſt ſacrifice.

'What a rout do theſe women make 'about nothing at all! Were it not for 'what the learned biſhop, in his letter 'from Italy, calls the Entanglements of 'Amour, and I the Delicacies of Intrigue, what is there, Belford, in all 'they can do for us?

'How do theſe creatures endeavour to 'ſtimulate me! A fallen woman is a 'worſe devil than even a profligate man. 'The former is incapable of remorſe: 'that am not I—Nor ever ſhall they prevail upon me, though aided by all the 'powers of darkneſs, to treat this admirable creature with indignity.—So far, 'I mean, as indignity can be ſeparated 'from the trials which will prove her to 'be either woman or angel.

'Yet with them, I am a craven. I 'might have had her before now, if I 'would. If I would treat her as fleſh 'and blood, I ſhould find her ſuch. They 'thought I knew, if any man living did, 'that if a man made a goddeſs of a woman, ſhe would aſſume the goddeſs; 'that if power were given her, ſhe would 'exert that power to the giver, if to nobody elſe—And D—r's wife is thrown 'into my diſh, who, thou knoweſt, kept 'her ceremonious huſband at haughty 'diſtance, and whined in private to her 'inſulting footman. O how I curſed the 'blaſpheming wretches! They will make 'me, as I tell them, hate their houſe, and 'remove from it. And by my ſoul, 'Jack, I am ready at times to think that 'I ſhould not have brought her hither, 'were it but on Sally's account. And 'yet, without knowing either Sally's 'heart, or Polly's, the dear creature reſolves againſt having any converſation 'with them but ſuch as ſhe cannot avoid. 'I am not ſorry for this, thou mayeſt 'think; ſince jealouſy in woman is not 'to be concealed from woman. And 'Sally has no command of herſelf.

'What doſt think!—Here this little 'devil Sally, not being able, as ſhe told 'me, to ſupport life under my diſpleaſure, was going into a fit: but when I 'ſaw her preparing for it, I went out of 'the room; and ſo ſhe thought it would 'not be worth her while to ſhew away.' In this manner he mentions what his meaning was in making the lady the compliment of his abſence:

'As to leaving her; if I go but for one 'night, I have fulfilled my promiſe: and 'if ſhe think not, I can mutter and 'grumble, and yield again, and make a 'merit of it; and then unable to live out 'of her preſence, ſoon return. Nor are 'women ever angry at bottom for being 'diſobeyed through exceſs of love. They 'like an uncontroulable paſſion. They 'like to have every favour raviſhed from 'them; and to be eaten and drunk quite 'up by a voracious lover. Don't I know 'the ſex!—Not ſo, indeed, as yet, my 'Clariſſa: but, however, with her my 'frequent egreſſes will make me look 'new to her, and create little buſy ſcenes 'between us. At the leaſt, I may ſurely, 'without exception, ſalute her at part-'ing, and at return; and will not thoſe 'occaſional freedoms, (which civility 'will warrant) by degrees, familiarize 'my charmer to them?

'But here, Jack, what ſhall I do with 'my uncle and aunts, and all my lov-'ing couſins? For I underſtand, that 'they are more in haſte to have me 'married than I am myſelf.'

LETTER LXII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

FRIDAY, APRIL 28.

MR. Lovelace is returned already. My brother's projects were his pretence. I could not but look upon this ſhort abſence as an evaſion of his promiſe; eſpecially as he had taken ſuch precautions with the people below; and as he knew that I propoſed to keep cloſe within doors. I cannot bear to be dealt meanly with; and angrily inſiſted, that he ſhould directly ſet out for Berkſhire, in order to engage his couſin, as he had promiſed.

'O my deareſt life!' ſaid he, 'why 'will you baniſh me from your preſence? 'I cannot leave you for ſo long a time, 'as you ſeem to expect I ſhould. I have 'been hovering about the town ever 'ſince I left you. Edgware was the far-'theſt place I went to; and there I was 'not able to ſtay two hours, for fear, at 'this criſis, any-thing ſhould happen. 'Who can account for the workings of 'an apprehenſive mind, when all that 'is dear and valuable to it is at ſtake? 'You may ſpare yourſelf the trouble of 'writing to any of your friends, till the 'ſolemnity has paſſed that ſhall entitle 'me to give weight to your application. 'When they know we are married, your 'brother's plots will be at an end; and 'your father, and mother, and uncles, 'muſt be reconciled to you. Why then 'ſhould you heſitate a moment to con-'firm my happineſs? Why, once more, 'would you baniſh me from you? Why 'will you not give the man, who has 'brought you into difficulties, and who 'ſo honourably wiſhes to extricate you 'from them, the happineſs of doing ſo?'

He was ſilent. My voice failed to ſe-cond the inclination I had to ſay ſome-thing not wholly diſcouraging to a point ſo warmly preſſed.

'I'll tell you, my angel,' reſumed he, 'what I propoſe to do, if you approve 'of it. I will inſtantly go out to view 'ſome of the handſome new ſquares, or 'fine ſtreets round them, and make a 'report to you of any ſuitable houſe I 'find to be lett. I will take ſuch a one 'as you ſhall chuſe, and ſet up an equi-'page befitting our condition. You 'ſhall direct the whole. And on ſome 'early day, either before or after we 'fix, [It muſt be at your own choice] be 'pleaſed to make me the happieſt of 'men. And then will every-thing be 'in a deſirable train. You ſhall receive 'in your own houſe (if it can be ſo ſoon 'furniſhed as I wiſh) the compliments 'of all my relations. Charlotte ſhall 'viſit you in the interim: and if it take 'up time, you ſhall chuſe whom you 'will honour with your company, firſt, 'ſecond, or third, in the ſummer-'months; and on your return you ſhall 'find all that was wanting in your new 'habitation ſupplied; and pleaſures in 'a conſtant round ſhall attend us. O 'my angel, take me to you, inſtead of 'baniſhing me from you, and make me 'yours for ever!'

You ſee, my dear, that here was no day preſſed for; I was not uneaſy about that; and the ſooner recovered myſelf, as there was not. But, however, I gave him no reaſon to upbraid me for refu-ſing his offer of going in ſearch of a houſe.

He is accordingly gone out for this purpoſe. But I find, that he intends to take up his lodging here to-night; and if to-night, no doubt on other nights, while he is in town. As the doors and windows of my apartment have good faſtenings; as he has not, in all this time, given me cauſe for apprehenſion; as he has the pretence of my brother's ſchemes to plead; as the people below are very courteous and obliging; Miſs Horton eſpecially, who ſeems to have taken a great liking to me, and to be of a gentler temper and manners, than Miſs Martin; and, as we are now in a tolerable way—I imagine, it would look particular to them all, and bring me into a debate with a man, who (let him be ſet upon what he will) has always a great deal to ſay for himſelf, if I were to inſiſt upon his promiſe: on all theſe accounts, I think, I will take no notice of his lodging here, if he don't.—Let me know, my dear, your thoughts of every-thing.

You may believe I gave him back his Bank note the moment I ſaw him.

FRIDAY EVENING.

MR. LOVELACE has ſeen two or three houſes; but none to his mind. But he has heard of one which looks promiſing, he ſays, and which he is to enquire about in the morning.

SATURDAY MORNING.

HE has made his enquiries, and actually ſeen the houſe he was told of laſt night. The owner of it is a young widow lady; who is inconſolable for the death of her huſband; Fretchville her name. It is furniſhed quite in taſte, every-thing being new within theſe ſix months. He believes, if I like not the furniture, the uſe of it may be agreed for, with the houſe, for a time certain: but if I like it, he will endeavour to take the one, and purchaſe the other, directly.

The lady ſees nobody; nor are the beſt apartments above-ſtairs to be viewed till ſhe is either abſent, or gone into the country; which ſhe talks of doing in a fortnight, or three weeks, at fartheſt; and to live there retired.

What Mr. Lovelace ſaw of the houſe (which were the ſaloon and two parlours) was perfectly elegant; and he was aſſured, all is of a piece. The offices are alſo very convenient; coach-houſe and ſtables at hand.

He ſhall be very impatient, he ſays, till I ſee the whole; nor will he, if he finds he can have it, look farther till I have ſeen it, except any-thing elſe offer to my liking. The price he values not.

He now does nothing but talk of the ceremony; but not indeed of the day. I don't want him to urge that—But I wonder he does not.

He has juſt now received a letter from Lady Betty Lawrance, by a particular hand; the contents principally relating to an affair ſhe has in Chancery. But in the poſtſcript ſhe is pleaſed to ſay very reſpectful things of me.

They are all impatient, ſhe ſays, for the happy day being over; which they flatter themſelves will enſure his reformation.

He hoped, he told me, that I would ſoon enable him to anſwer their wiſhes and his own.

But, my dear, although the opportunity was ſo inviting, he urged not for the day. Which is the more extraordinary, as he was ſo preſſing for marriage before we came to town.

He was very earneſt with me to give him, and four of his friends, my company on Monday evening, at a little collation. Miſs Martin and Miſs Horton cannot, he ſays, be there, being engaged in a party of their own with two daughters of Colonel Solcombe, and two nieces of Sir Antony Holmes, upon an annual occaſion. But Mrs. Sinclair will be preſent, and ſhe gave him hope of the company of a young lady of very great fortune and merit, (Miſs Partington) an heireſs, to whom Colonel Sinclair, it ſeems, in his life-time, was guardian, and who therefore calls Mrs. Sinclair 'Mamma.'

I deſired to be excuſed. He had laid me, I ſaid, under a moſt diſagreeable neceſſity of appearing as a married perſon; and I would ſee as few people as poſſible who were to think me ſo.

He would not urge it, he ſaid, if I were much averſe: but they were his ſelect friends; men of birth and fortune; who longed to ſee me. It was true, he added, that they, as well as his friend Doleman, believed we were married: but they thought him under the reſtrictions that he had mentioned to the people below. I might be aſſured, he told me, that his politeneſs before them ſhould be carried into the higheſt degree of reverence.

When he is ſet upon any-thing, there is no knowing, as I have ſaid heretofore, what one can do. But I will not, if I can help it, be made a ſhow of; eſpecially to men of whoſe characters and principles I have no good opinion. I am, my deareſt friend, your ever-affectionate

CL. HARLOWE.

Mr. Lovelace in his next letter gives an account of his quick return: of his reaſons to the lady for it: of her diſpleaſure upon it: and of her urging his abſence from the ſafety ſhe was in from the ſituation of the houſe, houſe, except ſhe were to be traced out by his viſits.

'I was confoundedly puzzled,' ſays he, 'on this occaſion, and on her inſiſting 'upon the execution of a too-ready offer which I made her to go down to 'Berks, to bring up my couſin Charlotte 'to viſit and attend her. I made miſerable excuſes; and, fearing that they 'would be mortally reſented, as her paſſion began to riſe upon my ſaying 'Charlotte was delicate, which ſhe took 'ſtrangely wrong, I was obliged to 'ſcreen myſelf behind the moſt ſolemn 'and explicit declarations.'

He then repeats thoſe declarations, to the ſame effect with the account ſhe gives of them.

'I began,' ſays he, 'with an intention 'to keep my life of honour in view, in 'the declarations I made her; but, as it 'has been ſaid of a certain orator in the 'Houſe of Commons, who more than 'once, in a long ſpeech, convinced himſelf as he went along, and concluded 'againſt the ſide he ſet out intending to 'favour, ſo I in earneſt preſſed without 'reſerve for matrimony in the progreſs 'of my harangue, which ſtate I little 'thought of urging upon her with ſo 'much ſtrength and explicitneſs.'

He then values himſelf upon the delay that his propoſal of taking and furniſhing a houſe muſt occaſion.

He wavers in his reſolutions whether to act honourable or not by a merit ſo exalted.

He values himſelf upon his own delicacy, in expreſſing his indignation againſt her friends, for ſuppoſing what he pretends his heart riſes againſt them for preſuming to ſuppoſe.

'But have I not reaſon,' ſays he, 'to 'be angry with her, for not praiſing me 'for this my delicacy, when ſhe is ſo 'ready to call me to account for the leaſt 'failure in punctilio?—However, I believe I can excuſe her too, upon this 'generous conſideration, [For generous 'I am ſure it is, becauſe it is againſt myſelf;] that her mind being the eſſence 'of delicacy, the leaſt want of it ſhocks 'her; while the meeting with what is 'ſo very extraordinary to me, is too familiar to her to obtain her notice, as an 'extraordinary.'

He glories in the ſtory of the houſe, and of the young widow-poſſeſſor of it, Mrs. Fretchville he calls her; and leaves it doubtful to Mr. Belford, whether it be a real or a fictitious ſtory.

He mentions his different propoſals in relation to the ceremony, which he ſo earneſtly preſſed for; and owns his artful intention in avoiding to name the day.

'And now,' ſays he, 'I hope ſoon to 'have an opportunity to begin my operations; ſince all is Halcyon and ſecurity.

'It is impoſſible to deſcribe the dear 'creature's ſweet and ſilent confuſion, 'when I touched upon the matrimonial 'topicks.

'She may doubt. She may fear. The 'wiſe in all important caſes will doubt, 'and will fear, till they are ſure. But 'her apparent willingneſs to think well 'of a ſpirit ſo inventive, and ſo machinating, is a happy prognoſtick for me. 'O theſe reaſoning ladies!—How I love 'theſe reaſoning ladies!—'Tis all over 'with them, when once love has crept 'into their hearts: for then will they 'employ all their reaſoning powers to 'excuſe rather than to blame the conduct 'of the doubted lover, let appearances 'againſt him be ever ſo ſtrong.

'Mowbray, Belton, and Tourville, 'long to ſee my angel, and will be there. 'She has refuſed me; but muſt be preſent 'notwithſtanding. So generous a ſpirit 'as mine is, cannot enjoy it's happineſs 'without communication. If I raiſe 'not your envy and admiration both at 'once, but half-joy will be the joy of 'having ſuch a charming fly entangled 'in my web. She therefore muſt comply. And thou muſt come. And then 'I will ſhew thee the pride and glory of 'the Harlowe-family, my implacable 'enemies; and thou ſhalt join with me 'in my triumph over them all.

'I know not what may ſtill be the 'perverſe beauty's fate: I want thee, 'therefore, to ſee and admire her, while 'ſhe is ſerene and full of hope: before 'her apprehenſions are realized, if realized they are to be; and if evil apprehenſions of me ſhe really has: before her beamy eyes have loſt their luſtre: while yet her charming face is 'ſurrounded with all it's virgin glories; 'and before the plough of diſappointment has thrown up furrows of diſtreſs 'upon every lovely feature.

'If I can procure you this honour, 'you will be ready to laugh out, as I 'have often much ado to forbear, at 'the puritanical behaviour of the mother before this lady. Not an oath, 'not a curſe, nor the leaſt free word 'eſcapes her lips. She minces in her 'gaite. She prims up her horſe-mouth. 'Her voice, which, when ſhe pleaſes, 'is the voice of thunder, is ſunk into an 'humble whine. Her ſtiff hams, that 'have

'have not been bent to a civility for ten 'years past, are now limbered into curt-'seys three deep at every word. Her 'fat arms are croſſed before her; and 'ſhe can hardly be prevailed upon to ſit 'in the preſence of my goddeſs.

'I am drawing up inſtructions for ye 'all to obſerve on Monday night.

'SATURDAY NIGHT.'

'MOST confoundedly alarmed!—"Lord Sir, what do you think?" cried 'Dorcas—"My lady is reſolved to go "to church to-morrow!" I was at qua-'drille with the women below.—"To "church!" ſaid I; and down I laid my 'cards. "To church!" repeated they, 'each looking upon the other. We had 'done playing for that night.

'Who could have dreamt of ſuch a 'whim as this?—Without notice, with-'out queſtions! Her cloaths not come! 'No leave aſked!—Impoſſible ſhe ſhould 'think of being my wife!—Beſides, ſhe 'don't conſider, if ſhe go to church, I 'muſt go too!—Yet not to aſk for my 'company! Her brother and Singleton 'ready to ſnap her up, as far as ſhe 'knows!—Known by her cloaths—Her 'perſon, her features, ſo diſtinguiſhed! '—Not ſuch another woman in Eng-'land!—"To church, of all places! "is the devil in the girl?" ſaid I, as 'ſoon as I could ſpeak.

'Well, but to leave this ſubject till 'to-morrow morning, I will now give 'you the inſtructions I have drawn up 'for yours and your companions beha-'viour on Monday night.

'Inſtructions to be obſerved by John Bel-'ford, Richard Mowbray, Thomas Belton, 'and James Tourville, Eſquires of the Body 'to General Robert Lovelace, on their admiſ-'ſion to the preſence of his goddeſs.

'YE muſt be ſure to let it ſink deep 'into your heavy heads, that there is no 'ſuch lady in the world as Miſs Clariſſa 'Harlowe; and that ſhe is neither more 'nor leſs than Mrs. Lovelace, though 'at preſent, to my ſhame be it ſpoken, 'a virgin.

'Be mindful alſo, that your old mo-'ther's name, after that of her mother 'when a maid, is Sinclair; that her 'huſband was a lieutenant-colonel; and 'all that ye, Belford, know from honeſt 'Doleman's letter of her, that let your 'brethren know.

'Mowbray and Tourville, the two 'greateſt blunderers of the four, I al-'low be acquainted with the widow and 'nieces, from the knowledge they had 'of the colonel. They will not forbear 'familiarities of ſpeech to the mother, 'as of longer acquaintance than a day. 'So I have ſuited their parts to their 'capacities.

'They may praiſe the widow and the 'colonel for people of great honour—'But not too groſsly; not to labour the 'point ſo as to render themſelves ſuſ-'pected.

'The mother will lead ye into her 'own and the colonel's praiſes; and 'Tourville and Mowbray may be both 'her vouchers—I, and you, and Bel'on, 'muſt be only hearſay confirmers.

'As poverty is generally ſuſpectible, 'the widow muſt be got handſomely 'aforehand; and no doubt but ſhe is. 'The elegance of her houſe and furni-'ture, and her readineſs to diſcharge all 'demands upon her, which ſhe does 'with oſtentation enough, and which 'makes her neighbours, I ſuppoſe, like 'her the better, demonſtrate this. She 'will propoſe to do handſome things by 'her two nieces. Sally is near mar-'riage—with an eminent woollen-draper 'in the Strand, if ye have a mind to it; 'for there are five or ſix of them there.

'The nieces may be enquired after, 'ſince they will be abſent, as perſons 'reſpected by Mowbray and Tourville, 'for their late worthy uncle's ſake.

'Watch ye diligently every turn of 'my countenance—every motion of my 'eye; for in my eye, and in my coun-'tenance, will ye find a ſovereign re-'gulator. I need not bid you reſpect 'me mightily: your allegiance obliges 'you to that: and who that ſees me, 'reſpects me not?

'Priſcilla Partington (for her looks 'ſo innocent, and diſcretion ſo deep, 'yet ſeeming ſo ſoftly) may be greatly 'relied upon. She will accompany the 'mother, gorgeouſly dreſſed, with all 'her Jew's extravagance flaming out 'upon her; and firſt indiwe, then counte-'nance, the lady. She has her cue, and 'I hope will make her acquaintance co-'veted by my charmer.

'Miſs Partington's hiſtory is this: 'The daughter of Colonel Sinclair's 'brother-in-law: that brother-in-law 'may have been a Turky merchant, 'or any merchant, who died confound-'edly rich: the colonel one of her guardi-'ans. [Collateral credit in that to the old 'one:] whence ſhe always calls Mrs. Sin-'clair Mamma; though not ſucceeding to 'the truſt.

'She

'She is just come to pass a day or two, 'and then to return to her surviving 'guardian's at Barnet.

'Miss Partington has suitors a little 'hundred; (her grandmother, an alder- 'man's dowager, having left her a great 'additional fortune) and is not trusted 'out of her guardian's house, without 'an old governante noted for discretion, 'except to her mamma Sinclair; with 'whom now-and-then she is permitted 'to be for a week together.

'Prif. will mamma up Mrs. Sinclair, 'and will undertake to court her guar- 'dian to let her pass a delightful week 'with her—Sir Edward Holden, he may 'as well be, if your shallow pates will 'not be clogged with too many circum- 'stantials. Lady Holden perhaps will 'come with her; for she always delighted 'in her mamma Sinclair's company: and 'talks of her, and her good manage- 'ment, twenty times a day.

'Be it principally thy part, Jack, who 'art a parading fellow, and aimest at 'wisdom, to keep thy brother-varlets 'from blundering; for, as thou must 'have observed from what I have writ- 'ten, we have the most watchful and 'most penetrating lady in the world to 'deal with: a lady worth deceiving! But 'whose eyes will pierce to the bottom of 'your shallow souls the moment she hears 'you open. Do thou therefore place 'thyself between Mowbray and Tour- 'ville: their toes to be played upon and 'commanded by thine, if they go wrong; 'thy elbows to be the ministers of ap- 'probation.

'As to your general behaviour; no 'hypocrisy!—I hate it: so does my 'charmer. If I had studied for it, I be- 'lieve I could have been an hypocrite: 'but my general character is so well 'known, that I should have been sus- 'pected at once, had I aimed at making 'myself too white. But what necessity 'can there be for hypocrisy, unless the 'generality of the sex were to refuse us 'for our immoralities? The best of them 'love to have the credit of reforming us. 'Let the sweet souls try for it: if they 'fail, their intent was good. That will 'be a consolation to them. And as to 'us, our work will be the easier; our sins 'the fewer: since they will draw them- 'selves in with a very little of our help; 'and we shall save a parcel of cursed 'falsehoods, and appear to be what we 'are both to angels and men.—Mean 'time their very grandmothers will ac- 'quit us, and reproach them with their 'self-do, self-have; and as having erred 'against knowledge, and ventured against 'manifest appearances. What folly there- 'fore for men of our character to be 'hypocrites!

'Be sure to instruct the rest, and do 'thou thyself remember, not to talk ob- 'scenely. You know I never permitted 'any of you to talk obscenely. Time 'enough for that, when ye grow old, 'and can ONLY talk. Besides, ye must 'consider Prisc.'s affected character, my 'goddess's real one. Far from obsce- 'nity therefore, do not so much as touch 'upon the double entendre. What! 'as I have often said, cannot you touch 'a lady's heart, without wounding her 'ear?

'It is necessary, that ye should appear 'worse men than myself. You cannot 'help appearing so, you'll say. Well 'then, there will be the less restraint up- 'on you—The less restraint, the less af- 'fectation.—And if Belton begins his 'favourite subject in behalf of keeping, 'it may make me take upon myself to 'oppose him: but fear not; I shall not 'give the argument all my force.

'She must have some curiosity, I think, 'to see what sort of men my companions 'are: she will not expect any of you to 'be saints. Are ye not men born to 'considerable fortunes, although ye are 'not all of ye men of parts? Who is it 'in this mortal life, that wealth does not 'mislead? And as it gives people the 'power of being mischievous, does it not 'require great virtue to forbear the use 'of that power? Is not the devil said to 'be the god of this world? Are we not 'children of this world? Well then! 'Let me tell thee my opinion—It is this, 'that were it not for the poor and the 'middling, the world would probably, 'long ago, have been destroyed by fire 'from Heaven. Ingrateful wretches the 'rest, thou wilt be apt to say, to make 'such sorry returns, as they generally 'do make, to the poor and the middling!

'This dear lady is prodigiously learn- 'ed in theories. But as to practics, as to 'experimentals, must be, as you know 'from her tender years, a mere novice. 'Till she knew me, I dare say, she did 'not believe, whatever she had read, 'that there were such fellows in the 'world, as she will see in you four. I 'shall have much pleasure in observing 'how she'll stare at her company, when 'she finds me the politest man of the five.

'And so much for instructions gene- 'ral and particular for your behaviour 'on Monday night.

'And let me add, that you must at- 'tend

'tend to every minute circumſtance, 'whether you think there be reaſon in 'it, or not. Deep, like golden ore, 'frequently lies my meaning, and richly 'worth digging for. The hint of leaſt 'moment, as you may imagine it, is 'often pregnant with events of the great-eſt. Be implicit. Am not I your ge-'neral? Did I ever lead you on that I 'brought you not off with ſafety and 'ſucceſs, ſometimes to your own ſtupid 'aſtoniſhment?

'And now, methinks, thou art cu-'rious to know, what can be my view 'in riſquing the diſpleaſure of my fair-'one, and alarming her fears, after four 'or five halcyon days have gone over 'our heads? I'll ſatisfy thee.

'The viſitors of the two nieces will 'croud the houſe. Beds will be ſcarce. 'Miſs Partington, a ſweet modeſt gen-'teel girl, will be prodigiouſly taken 'with my charmer; will want to begin 'a friendſhip with her. A ſhare in her 'bed, for one night only, will be re-'queſted. Who knows, but on that 'very Monday night I may be ſo unhap-'py as to give mortal offence to my be-'loved? The ſlyeſt birds may be caught 'napping. Should ſhe attempt to fly me 'upon it, cannot I detain her? Should 'ſhe actually fly, cannot I bring her back 'by authority civil or uncivil, if I have 'evidence upon evidence that ſhe ac-'knowledged, though but tacitly, her 'marriage?—And ſhould I, or ſhould I 'not ſucceed, and ſhe forgive me, or if 'ſhe but deſcend to expoſtulate, or if ſhe 'bear me in her ſight; then will ſhe be all 'my own. All delicacy is my charmer. 'I long to ſee how ſuch a delicacy, on 'any of theſe occaſions, will behave, and 'in my ſituation it behoves me to pro-'vide againſt every accident.

'I muſt take care, knowing what an 'eel I have to do with, that the little 'riggling rogue does not ſlip through 'my fingers. How ſilly ſhould I look 'ſtaring after her, when ſhe had ſhot 'from me into the muddy river, her fa-'mily, from which with ſo much diffi-'culty I have taken her!

'Well then; here are—Let me ſee—'How many perſons are there who, after 'Monday night, will be able to ſwear, 'that ſhe has gone by my name, anſwer-'ed to my name, had no other view in 'leaving her friends, but to go by my 'name? her own relations neither able 'nor willing to deny it.—Firſt, here are 'my ſervants; her ſervant Dorcas; Mrs. 'Sinclair; Mrs. Sinclair's two nieces; 'and Miſs Partington.

'But for fear theſe evidences ſhould 'be ſuſpected, here comes the jet of the 'buſineſs—No leſs than four worthy 'gentlemen of fortune and family, who 'were all in company ſuch a night par-'ticularly, at a collation to which they 'were invited by Robert Lovelace, of 'Sandoun Hall in the county of Lancaſ-'ter, Eſquire, in company with Magda-'len Sinclair widow, and Priſcilla Par-'tington ſpinſter, and the lady com-'plainant; when the ſaid Robert Love-'lace addreſſed himſelf to the ſaid lady, 'on a multitude of occaſions, as his wife; 'as they and others did, as Mrs. Love-'lace; every-one complimenting and 'congratulating her upon her nuptials; 'and that ſhe received ſuch their com-'pliments and congratulations with no 'other viſible diſpleaſure or repug-'nance, than ſuch as a young bride, full 'of bluſhes and pretty confuſion, might 'be ſuppoſed to expreſs upon ſuch con-'templative revolvings as thoſe compli-'ments would naturally inſpire. Nor do 'thou rave at me, Jack, nor rebel—Doſt 'think I brought the dear creature hi-'ther for nothing?

'And here's a faint ſketch of my plot. '—Stand by, varlets—Tanta-ra-ra-ra! '—Veil your bonnets, and confeſs your 'maſter!'

LETTER LXIII.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BEL-FORD, ESQ.

SUNDAY.

HAVE been at church, Jack—Be-haved admirably well too! My charmer is pleaſed with me now: for I was exceedingly attentive to the diſ-courſe, and very ready in the auditor's part of the ſervice.—Eyes did not much wander. How could they, when the loveliеſt object, infinitely the loveliеſt in the whole church, was in my view!

Dear creature! how fervent, how amiable, in her devotions! I have got her to own that ſhe prayed for me. I hope a prayer from ſo excellent a mind will not be made in vain.

There is, after all, ſomething beau-tifully ſolemn in devotion. The Sabbath is a charming inſtitution to keep the heart right, when it is right. One day in ſeven, how reaſonable!—I think I'll go to church once a day often. I fancy it will go a great way towards making me a reformed man. To ſee multitudes of well-appearing people all joining in one reverend act: an exerciſe how worthy of a rational being! Yet it adds a ſting or two to my former ſtings, when I think of my projects with regard to this charming creature. In my conſcience, I believe if I were to go conſtantly to church, I could not purſue them.

I had a ſcheme come into my head while there: but I will renounce it, becauſe it obtruded itſelf upon me in ſo good a place. Excellent creature! How many ruins has ſhe prevented by attaching me to herſelf! by engroſſing my whole attention!

But let me tell thee what paſſed between us in my firſt viſit of this morning; and then I will acquaint thee more largely with my good behaviour at church.

I could not be admitted till after eight. I found her ready prepared to go out. I pretended to be ignorant of her intention, having charged Dorcas not to own that ſhe had told me of it.

'Going abroad, Madam?'—with an air of indifference.

'Yes, Sir; I intend to go to church.'

'I hope, Madam, I ſhall have the 'honour to attend you.'

No: ſhe deſigned to take a chair, and go to the next church.

This ſtartled me: a chair to carry her to the next church from Mrs. Sinclair's, her right name not Sinclair, and to bring her back hither in the face of people who might not think well of the houſe! —There was no permitting that. Yet I was to appear indifferent. But ſaid, I ſhould take it for a favour, if ſhe would permit me to attend her in her coach, as there was time for it, to St. Paul's.

She made objections to the gaiety of my dreſs; and told me, that if ſhe went to St. Paul's, ſhe could go in a coach without me.

I objected Singleton and her brother, and offered to dreſs in the plaineſt ſuit I had.

'I beg the favour of attending you, 'dear Madam,' ſaid I. 'I have not 'been at church a great while. We ſhall 'ſit in different ſtalls. And the next 'time I go, I hope it will be to give my-'ſelf a title to the greateſt bleſſing I can 'receive.

She made ſome further objections: but at laſt permitted me the honour of attending her.

I got myſelf placed in her eye, that the time might not ſeem tedious to me; for we were there early. And I gained her good opinion, as I mentioned above, by my behaviour.

The ſubject of the diſcourſe was particular enough: it was about a prophet's ſtory or parable of an ewe-lamb taken by a rich man from a poor one, who dearly loved it, and whoſe only comfort it was. Deſigned to ſtrike remorſe into David, on his adultery with Uriah's wife Bathſheba, and his murder of the huſband. Theſe women, Jack, have been the occaſion of all manner of miſchief from the beginning! Now, when David, full of indignation, ſwore [King David would ſwear, Jack: but how ſhouldſt thou know who King David was? The ſtory is in the Bible] that the rich man ſhould ſurely die; Nathan, which was the prophet's name, and a good ingenious fellow, cried out, (which were the words of the text) 'Thou art the man!'— By my ſoul I thought the parſon looked directly at me: and at that moment I caſt my eye full on my ewe-lamb. But I muſt tell thee too, that I thought a good deal of my roſe-bud.—'A better 'man than King David, in that point, 'however!' thought I.

When we came home, we talked upon the ſubject; and I ſhewed my charmer my attention to the diſcourſe, by letting her know where the doctor made the moſt of his ſubject, and where it might have been touched to greater advantage: for it is really a very affecting ſtory, and has as pretty a contrivance in it as ever I read. And this I did in ſuch a grave way, that ſhe ſeemed more and more pleaſed with me; and I have no doubt, that I ſhall get her to favour me to-morrow night with her company at my collation.

SUNDAY EVENING.

We all dined together in Mrs. Sinclair's parlour. All exceſſively right! The two nieces have topp'd their parts; Mrs. Sinclair hers. Never ſo eaſy as now!—She really thought a little oddly of theſe people at firſt, ſhe ſaid: Mrs. Sinclair ſeemed very forbidding! Her nieces were perſons with whom ſhe could not wiſh to be acquainted. 'But 'really we ſhould not be too haſty in 'our cenſures. Some people improve 'upon us. The widow ſeems tolerable.' She went no farther than tolerable. Miſs Martin and Miſs Horton are young people of good ſenſe, and have read a great deal. What Miſs Martin particularly ſaid of marriage, and of her humble ſervant, was very ſolid. She believes, with ſuch notions ſhe cannot make a bad wife. I have ſaid, Sally's humble ſervant is a woollen-draper of great reputation; and ſhe is ſoon to be married.

I have been letting her into thy character, and into the characters of my other three eſquires, in hopes to excite her curioſity to ſee you to-morrow night. I have told her ſome of the worſt, as well as beſt parts of your characters, in order to exalt myſelf, and to obviate any ſudden ſurprizes, as well as to teach her, what ſort of men ſhe may expect to ſee, if ſhe will oblige me with her company.

By her after-obſervations upon each of you, I ſhall judge what I may or may not do to obtain or keep her good opinion; what ſhe will like, what not; and ſo purſue the one, or avoid the other, as I ſee proper.—So, while ſhe is penetrating into your ſhallow heads, I ſhall enter her heart, and know what to bid my own to hope for.

The houſe is to be taken in three weeks: all will be over in three weeks, or bad will be my luck!—Who knows but in three days?—Have I not carried that great point of making her paſs for my wife to the people below? And that other great one, of fixing myſelf here night and day?—What woman ever eſcaped me, who lodged under one roof with me?—The houſe too, THE houſe; the people, people after my own heart: her ſervants, Will, and Dorcas, both my ſervants—Three days did I ſay! Pho! pho! pho!—Three hours!

I HAVE carried my third point; but ſo extremely to the diſlike of my charmer, that I have been threatened, for ſuffering Miſs Partington to be introduced to her without her leave. Which laid her under a neceſſity to deny or comply with the urgent requeſt of ſo fine a young lady; who had engaged to honour me at my collation, on condition that my beloved would be preſent at it.

To be obliged to appear before my friends as what ſhe was not! She was for inſiſting, that I ſhould acquaint the women here with the truth of the matter; and not to go on propagating ſtories for her to countenance; making her a ſharer in my guilt.

But what points will not perſeverance carry? eſpecially when it is covered over with the face of yielding now, and, Parthian-like, returning to the charge anon. Do not the ſex carry all their points with their men by the ſame methods? Have I converſed with them ſo freely as I have done, and learnt nothing of them? Didſt thou ever know that a woman's denial of any favour, whether the leaſt or the greateſt, that my heart was ſet upon, ſtood her in any ſtead? The more perverſe ſhe, the more ſteady I; that is my rule.

But the point thus ſo much againſt her will carried, I doubt thou wilt ſee in her more of a ſullen than of an obliging charmer. For when Miſs Partington was withdrawn, What was Miſs Partington to her? In her ſituation ſhe wanted no new acquaintance. And what were my four friends to her in her preſent circumſtances? She would aſſure me, if ever again—And there ſhe ſtopt, with a twirl of her hand.

When we meet, I will, in her preſence, tipping thee a wink, ſhew thee the motion, for it was a very pretty one. Quite new. Yet have I ſeen an hundred pretty paſſionate twirls too, in my time, from other fair-ones. How univerſally engaging is it to put a woman of ſenſe, to whom a man is not married, in a paſſion, let the reception given to every ranting ſcene in our plays teſtify. Take care, my charmer, now thou art come to delight me with thy angry twirls, that thou tempteſt me not to provoke a variety of them from one, whoſe every motion, whoſe every air, carries in it ſo much ſenſe and ſoul.

But, angry or pleaſed, this charming creature muſt be all lovelineſs. Her features are all harmony, and made for one another. No other feature could be ſubſtituted in the place of any one of hers, but muſt abate of her perfection: and think you that I do not long to have your opinion of my fair prize?

If you love to ſee features that glow, though the heart is frozen, and never yet was thawed; if you love fine ſenſe, and adages flowing through teeth of ivory, and lips of coral; an eye that penetrates all things: a voice that is harmony itſelf; an air of grandeur, mingled with ſweetneſs that cannot be deſcribed; a politeneſs that, if ever equalled, was never excelled—You'll ſee all theſe excellences, and ten times more, in this my GLORIANA.

Mark her majeſtick fabrick!—She's a temple
Sacred by birth, and built by hands divine;
Her ſoul the deity that lodges there:
Nor is the pile unworthy of the god.

Or, to deſcribe her in a ſofter ſtyle with Rowe—

'The bloom of op'ning flow'rs, unſully'd beauty,
'Softneſs, and ſweeteſt innocence ſhe wears.
'And looks like nature in the world's firſt ſpring.'

Adieu,

Adieu, varlets four!—At ſix on Monday evening, I expect ye all.

LETTER LXIV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SUNDAY, APRIL 30.

MR. Lovelace in his laſt letters having taken notice of the moſt material paſſages contained in this letter, the following extracts from it are only inſerted.

She gives pretty near the ſame account that he does of what paſſed between them, on her reſolution to go to church; and of his propoſal of St. Paul's, and deſire of attending her. She praiſes his good behaviour there; as alſo the diſcourſe, and the preacher: is pleaſed with it's ſeaſonableneſs. Gives particulars of the converſation between them afterwards, and commends the good obſervations he makes upon the ſermon.

'I AM willing,' ſays ſhe 'to have 'hopes of him: but am ſo unable to 'know how to depend upon his ſerioufneſs for an hour together, that all my 'favourable accounts of him in this 'reſpect muſt be taken with allowance.

'Being very much preſſed, I could 'not tell how to refuſe dining with the 'widow and her nieces this day. I am 'better pleaſed with them, than I ever 'thought I ſhould be. I cannot help 'blaming myſelf for my readineſs to 'give ſevere cenſures, where reputation 'is concerned. Peoples ways, humours, conſtitutions, education, and 'opportunities allowed for, my dear, 'many perſons, as far as I know, may 'appear blameleſs, whom others of 'different humours and educations are 'too apt to blame; and who, from the 'ſame fault, may be as ready to blame 'them. I will therefore make it a rule 'to myſelf for the future, never to 'judge peremptorily on firſt appearances: but yet I muſt obſerve that 'theſe are not people I ſhould chuſe to 'be intimate with, or whoſe ways I can 'like. Although, for the ſtations they 'are in, they may go through the world 'with tolerable credit.

'Mr. Lovelace's behaviour has been 'ſuch, as makes me calls this, ſo far as 'it is paſſed, an agreeable day. Yet, 'when eaſieſt as to him, my ſituation 'with my friends takes place in my 'thoughts, and cauſes me many a tear.

'I am the more pleaſed with the people of the houſe, becauſe of the perſons of rank they are acquainted with, 'and who viſit them.'

'SUNDAY EVENING.

'I AM ſtill well pleaſed with Mr. 'Lovelace's behaviour. We have had 'a good deal of ſerious diſcourſe together. The man has really juſt and 'good notions. He confeſſes how much 'he is pleaſed with this day, and hopes 'for many ſuch. Nevertheleſs, he ingenuouſly warned me, that his unlucky 'vivacity might return: but he doubted not, that he ſhould be fixed at laſt 'by my example and converſation.

'He has given me an entertaining 'account of the four gentlemen he is to 'meet to-morrow night: entertaining, 'I mean, for his humorous deſcription of their perſons, manners, &c. 'but ſuch a deſcription as is far from 'being to their praiſe. Yet he ſeemed 'rather to deſign to divert my melancholy by it, than to degrade them. 'I think at bottom, my dear, that he 'muſt be a good-natured man; but that 'he was ſpoiled young for want of check 'or controul.

'I cannot but call this, my circumſtances conſidered, an happy day to 'the end of it. Indeed, my dear, I 'think I could prefer him to all the 'men I ever knew, were he but to be 'always what he has been this day. 'You ſee how ready I am to own all 'you have charged me with, when I 'find myſelf out. It is a difficult thing, 'I believe, ſometimes, for a young 'creature that is able to deliberate with 'herſelf, to know when ſhe loves, or 'when ſhe hates: but I am reſolved, 'as much as poſſible, to be determined 'both in my hatred and love by actions, 'as they make the man worthy or unworthy.'

She dates again on Monday, and declares herſelf highly diſpleaſed at Miſs Partington's being introduced to her: and ſtill more for being obliged to promiſe to be preſent at Mr. Lovelace's collation. She foreſees, ſhe ſays, a murdered evening.

LETTER LXV.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

MONDAY NIGHT, MAY 1.

I Have juſt eſcaped from the very diſagreeable company I was obliged,

ſo

ſo much againſt my will, to be in. As a very particular relation of this even-ing's converſation would be painful to me, you muſt content yourſelf with what you ſhall be able to collect from the outlines, as I may call them, of the characters of the perſons; aſſiſted by the little hiſtories Mr. Lovelace gave me of each yeſterday.

The names of the gentlemen are Belton, Mowbray, Tourville, and Belford. Theſe four, with Mrs. Sinclair, Miſs Partington, the great heireſs mentioned in my laſt, Mr. Lovelace, and myſelf, made up the company.

I gave you before the favourable ſide of Miſs Partington's character, ſuch as it was given me by Mrs. Sinclair, and her nieces. I will now add a few words from my own obſervation upon her behaviour in this company.

In better company perhaps ſhe would have appeared to leſs advantage: but, notwithſtanding her innocent looks, which Mr. Lovelace alſo highly praiſed, he is the laſt perſon whoſe judgment I would take upon real modeſty. For I obſerved, that, upon ſome talk from the gentlemen, not free enough to be openly cenſured, yet too indecent in it's implication to come from well-bred perſons, in the company of virtuous people, this young lady was very ready to apprehend; and yet, by ſmiles and ſimperings, to encourage, rather than diſcourage, the culpable freedoms of perſons, who, in what they went out of their way to ſay, muſt either be guilty of abſurdity, meaning nothing; or meaning ſomething, of rudeneſs.

But indeed I have ſeen women, of whom I had a better opinion, than I can ſay I have of Mrs. Sinclair, who have allowed gentlemen, and themſelves too, in greater liberties of this ſort, than I have thought conſiſtent with that purity of manners which ought to be the diſtinguiſhing characteriſtick of our ſex: for what are words, but the body and dreſs of thought? And is not the mind of a perſon ſtrongly indicated by outward dreſs?

But to the gentlemen; as they muſt be called in right of their anceſtors, it ſeems; for no other do they appear to have.

Mr. BELTON has had univerſity-education, and was deſigned for the gown; but that not ſuiting with the gaiety of his temper, and an uncle dying, who devi-ſed to him a good eſtate, he quitted the college, came up to town, and commenced fine gentleman. He is ſaid to be a man of ſenſe.—Mr. Belton dreſſes gaily, but not quite foppiſhly; drinks hard; keeps all hours, and glories in doing ſo; games, and has been hurt by that pernicious diverſion: he is about thirty years of age; his face is of a fiery red, ſomewhat bloated and pimply; and his irregularities threaten a brief duration to the ſenſual dream he is in. For he has a ſhort conſumptive cough, which ſeems to denote bad lungs; yet makes himſelf and his friends merry by his ſtupid and inconſiderate jeſts upon very threatening ſymptoms which ought to make him more ſerious.

Mr. MOWBRAY has been a great traveller; ſpeaks as many languages as Mr. Lovelace himſelf, but not ſo fluently: is of a good family; ſeems to be about thirty-three or thirty-four: tall and comely in his perſon; bold and daring in his look: is a large-boned ſtrong man; has a great ſcar in his forehead, with a dent, as if his ſkull had been beaten in there; and a ſeamed ſcar in his right-cheek. He dreſſes likewiſe very gaily: has his ſervants always about him, whom he is continually calling upon, and ſending on the moſt trifling meſſages; half a dozen inſtances of which we had in the little time I was among them; while they ſeem to watch the turn of his fierce eye, to be ready to run, before they have half his meſſage, and ſerve him with fear and trembling. Yet to his equals the man ſeems tolerable: he talks not amiſs upon publick entertainments and diverſions; eſpecially upon thoſe abroad. Yet has a romancing air; and avers things ſtrongly, which ſeem quite improbable. Indeed, he doubts nothing, but what he ought to believe: for he jeſts upon ſacred things; and profeſſes to hate the clergy of all religions. He has high notions of honour, a word hardly ever out of his mouth; but ſeems to have no great regard to morals.

Mr. TOURVILLE occaſionally told his age; juſt turned of thirty one. He is alſo of an ancient family; but in his perſon and manners, more of what I call the coxcomb, than any of his companions. He dreſſes richly; would be thought elegant in the choice and faſhion of what he wears; yet, after all, appears rather tawdry than fine. One ſees, by the care he takes of his outſide, and the notice he beſpeaks from every-one by his own notice of himſelf, that the inſide takes up the leaſt of his attention. He dances finely, Mr. Lovelace ſays: is a maſter of muſick; and ſinging is one of his principal excellences. They prevailed upon him to ſing; and he obliged them both in Italian and French; and, to do him juſtice, his ſongs in both were decent. They were all highly delighted with his performance; but his greateſt admirers were Mrs. Sinclair, Miſs Partington, and himſelf. To me he appeared to have a great deal of affectation.

Mr. Tourville's converſation and addreſs are inſufferably full of thoſe really groſs affronts upon the underſtanding of our ſex, which the moderns call compliments, and are intended to paſs for ſo many inſtances of good breeding, though the moſt hyperbolical, unnatural ſtuff that can be conceived, and which can only ſerve to ſhew the inſincerity of the complimenter; and the ridiculous light in which the complimented appears in his eyes, if he ſuppoſes a woman capable of reliſhing the romantick abſurdities of his ſpeeches.

He affects to introduce into his common talk Italian and French words; and often anſwers an Engliſh queſtion in French, which language he greatly prefers to the barbarouſly hiſſing Engliſh. But then he never fails to tranſlate into this his odious native tongue the words and the ſentences he ſpeaks in the other two—Leſt, perhaps, it ſhould be queſtioned whether he underſtands what he ſays.

He loves to tell ſtories: always calls them merry, facetious, good, or excellent, before he begins, in order to beſpeak the attention of the hearers; but never gives himſelf concern in the progreſs or concluſion of them, to make good what he promiſes in his preface. Indeed he ſeldom brings any of them to a concluſion; for if his company have patience to hear him out, he breaks in upon himſelf by ſo many parenthetical intruſions, as one may call them, and has ſo many incidents ſpringing in upon him, that he frequently drops his own thread, and ſometimes ſits down ſatisfied halfway; or, if at other times he would reſume it, he applies to his company to help him in again, with a devil fetch him if he remembers what he was driving at — But enough, and too much of Mr. Tourville.

Mr. BELFORD is the fourth gentleman, and one of whom Mr. Lovelace ſeems more fond than any of the reſt; for he is a man of tried bravery, it ſeems; and this pair of friends came acquainted upon occaſion of a quarrel (poſſibly about a woman) which brought on a challenge, and a meeting at Kenſington Gravel-pits; which ended without unhappy conſequences, by the mediation of three gentlemen ſtrangers, juſt as each had made a paſs at the other.

Mr. Belford it ſeems is about ſeven or eight-and-twenty. He is the youngeſt of the five, except Mr. Lovelace: and they are perhaps the wickedeſt; for they ſeem to lead the other three as they pleaſe. Mr. Belford, as the others, dreſſes gaily. But has not thoſe advantages of perſon, not from his dreſs, which Mr. Lovelace is too proud of. He has, however, the appearance and air of a gentleman. He is well read in claſſical authors, and in the beſt Engliſh poets and writers: and, by his means, the converſation took now-and-then a more agreeable turn: and I, who endeavoured to put the beſt face I could upon my ſituation, as I paſſed for Mrs. Lovelace with them, made ſhift to join in it, at ſuch times, and received abundance of compliments from all the company, on the obſervations I made.

Mr. Belford ſeems good-natured and obliging; and, although very complaiſant, not ſo fulſomely ſo, as Mr. Tourville; and has a polite and eaſy manner of expreſſing his ſentiments on all occaſions. He ſeems to delight in a logical way of argumentation, as alſo does Mr. Belton. Theſe two attacked each other in this way; and both looked at us women, as if to obſerve whether we did not admire their learning, or, when they had ſaid a ſmart thing, their wit. But Mr. Belford had viſibly the advantage of the other, having quicker parts, and by taking the worſt ſide of the argument, ſeemed to think he had. Upon the whole of his behaviour and converſation, he put me in mind of that character in Milton—

——— 'His tongue
'Dropt manna, and could make the worſe
'appear
'The better reaſon, to perplex and daſh
'Matureſt counſels; for his thoughts were
'low;
'To vice induſtrious: but to nobler deeds
'Tim'rous and ſlothful:—yet he pleas'd the 'ear.'

How little ſoever matters in general may be to our liking, we are apt, when hope is ſtrong enough to permit it, to endeavour to make the beſt we can of the lot we have drawn; and I could not but obſerve often, how much Mr. Lovelace excelled all his four friends in everything thing they ſeemed deſirous to excel in. But, as to wit and vivacity, he had no equal there. All the others gave up to him, when his lips began to open. The haughty Mowbray would call upon the prating Tourville for ſilence, and would elbow the ſupercilious Belton into attention, when Lovelace was going to ſpeak. And when he had ſpoken, the words, 'Charming fellow!' with a free word of admiration or envy, fell from every mouth.

He has indeed ſo many advantages in his perſon and manner, that what would be inexcuſable in another, would, if one watched not over one's ſelf, and did not endeavour to diſtinguiſh what is the eſſence of right and wrong, look becoming in him.

Mr. Belford, to my no ſmall vexation and confuſion, with the forwardneſs of a favoured and intruſted friend, ſneaked me out, on Mr. Lovelace's being ſent for down, to make me congratulatory compliments on my ſuppoſed nuptials; which he did with a caution, not to inſiſt too long on the rigorous vow I had impoſed upon a man ſo univerſally admired—

'See him among twenty men,' ſaid he, 'all of diſtinction, and nobody is 'regarded but Mr. Lovelace.'

It muſt, indeed, be confeſſed, that there is in his whole deportment a natural dignity, which renders all inſolent or imperative demeanor as unneceſſary as inexcuſable. Then that deceiving ſweetneſs which appears in his ſmiles, in his accent, in his whole aſpect, and addreſs, when he thinks it worth his while to oblige, or endeavour to attract, how does this ſhew, that he was born innocent, as I may ſay; that he was not naturally the cruel, the boiſterous, the impetuous creature, which the wicked company he may have fallen into have made him! For he has, beſides, an open, and, I think, an honeſt countenance. Don't you think ſo, my dear?—On all theſe ſpecious appearances, have I founded my hopes of ſeeing him a reformed man.

But it is amazing to me, I own, that with ſo much of the gentleman, ſuch a general knowledge of books and men, ſuch a ſkill in the learned as well as modern languages, he can take ſo much delight as he does in the company of ſuch perſons as I have deſcribed, and in ſubjects of frothy impertinence, unworthy of his talents, and of his natural and acquired advantages. I can think but of one reaſon for it, and that muſt argue a very low mind, his VANITY; which makes him deſirous of being conſidered as the head of the people he conforts with. A man to love praiſe, yet to be content to draw it from ſuch contaminated ſprings!

One compliment paſſed from Mr. Belford to Mr. Lovelace, which haſtened my quitting the ſhocking company—'You are a happy man, Mr. Lovelace,' ſaid he, upon ſome fine ſpeeches made him by Mrs. Sinclair, and aſſented to by Miſs Partington: 'you have ſo much 'courage and ſo much wit, that neither 'man nor woman can ſtand before you.'

Mr. Belford looked at me, when he ſpoke: yes, my dear, he ſmilingly looked at me: and he looked upon his complimented friend: and all their aſſenting, and therefore affronting eyes, both mens and womens, were turned upon your Clariſſa: at leaſt, my ſelf-reproaching heart made me think ſo; for that would hardly permit my eye to look up.

Oh! my dear, were but a woman, who gives reaſon to the world to think her to be in love with a man, [and this muſt be believed to be my caſe: or to what can my ſuppoſed voluntary going off with Mr. Lovelace be imputed?] to reflect one moment on the exaltation ſhe gives him, and the diſgrace ſhe brings upon herſelf; the low pity, the ſilent contempt, the inſolent ſneers and whiſpers, to which ſhe makes herſelf obnoxious from a cenſuring world of both ſexes; how would ſhe deſpiſe herſelf! and how much more eligible would ſhe think death itſelf than ſuch diſcovered debaſement!

What I have thus in general touched upon, will account to you, why I could not more particularly relate what paſſed in this evening's converſation: which, as may be gathered from what I have written, abounded with approbatory accuſations, and ſuppoſed witty retorts.

LETTER LXVI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

MONDAY MIDNIGHT.

I AM very much vexed and diſturbed at an odd incident. Mrs. Sinclair has juſt now left me; I believe in diſpleaſure, on my declining to comply with a requeſt ſhe made me: which was, to admit Miſs Partington to a ſhare in my my bed; her houſe being crouded by her nieces gueſts and by their attendants, as well as by thoſe of Miſs Partington.

There might be nothing in it; and my denial carried a ſtiff and ill-natured appearance. But inſtantly, upon her making the requeſt, it came into my thought, that I was in a manner a ſtranger to every-body in the houſe: not ſo much as a ſervant I could call my own, or of whom I had any great opinion: that there were four men of free manners in the houſe, avowed ſupporters of Mr. Lovelace in matters of offence; himſelf a man of enterprize; all, as far as I knew, (and as I had reaſon to think by their noiſy mirth after I left them) drinking deeply: that Miſs Partington herſelf is not ſo bathful a perſon as ſhe was repreſented to me to be: that officious pains were taken to give me a good opinion of her: and that Mrs. Sinclair made a greater parade in prefacing the requeſt, than ſuch a requeſt needed. 'To deny,' thought I, 'can carry only 'an appearance of ſingularity to people 'who already think me ſingular. To 'conſent, may poſſibly, if not probably, 'be attended with inconveniences.' The conſequences of the alternative ſo very diſproportionate, I thought it more prudent to incur the cenſure, than to riſque the inconvenience.

I told her, that I was writing a long letter: that I ſhould chuſe to write till I were ſleepy: and that a companion would be a reſtraint upon me, and I upon her.

She was loth, ſhe ſaid, that ſo delicate a young creature, and ſo great a fortune as Miſs Partington, ſhould be put to lie with Dorcas in a preſs-bed. She ſhould be very ſorry, if ſhe had aſked an improper thing. She had never been ſo put to it before. And Miſs would ſtay up with her till I had done writing.

Alarmed at this urgency, and it being eaſier to perſiſt in a denial given, than to give it at firſt, I ſaid Miſs Partington ſhould be welcome to my whole bed, and I would retire into the dining-room, and there, locking myſelf in, write all the night.

The poor thing, ſhe ſaid, was afraid to lie alone. To be ſure Miſs Partington would not put me to ſuch an inconvenience.

She then withdrew: but returned; begged my pardon for returning: but the poor child, ſhe ſaid, was in tears. Miſs Partington had never ſeen a young lady ſhe ſo much admired, and ſo much wiſhed to imitate, as me. The dear girl hoped that nothing had paſſed in her behaviour to give me diſlike to her.—Should ſhe bring her to me?

I was very buſy, I ſaid. The letter I was writing was upon a very important ſubject. I hoped to ſee the young lady in the morning; when I would apologize to her for my particularity. And then Mrs. Sinclair heſitating and moving towards the door, (though ſhe turned round to me again) I deſired her (lighting her) to take care how ſhe went down.

'Pray, Madam,' ſaid ſhe, on the ſtairs head, 'don't give yourſelf all this trou-'ble. God knows my heart, I meant 'no affront; but ſince you ſeem to take 'my freedom amiſs, I beg you will not 'acquaint Mr. Lovelace with it; for he, 'perhaps will think me bold and impertinent.'

Now, my dear, is not this a particular incident: either as I have made it, or as it was deſigned? I don't love to do an uncivil thing. And if nothing were meant by the requeſt, my refuſal deſerves to be called uncivil. Then I have ſhewn a ſuſpicion of foul uſage by it, which ſurely dare not be meant. If juſt, I ought to apprehend every-thing, and fly the houſe and man as I would an infection. If not juſt, and if I cannot contrive to clear myſelf of having entertained ſuſpicions, by aſſigning ſome other plauſible reaſon for my denial, the very ſtaying here will have an appearance not at all reputable to myſelf.

I am now out of humour with him, with myſelf, with all the world, but you. His companions are ſhocking creatures. Why, again I repeat, ſhould he have been deſirous to bring me into ſuch company? Once more, I like him not. Indeed I do not like him!

LETTER LXVII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

TUESDAY, MAY 2.

WITH infinite regret I am obliged to tell you, that I can no longer write to you, or receive letters from you. Your mother has ſent me a letter incloſed in a cover to Mr. Lovelace, directed for him at Lord M.'s, (and which was brought him juſt now) reproaching me on this ſubject in very angry terms, and forbidding me, as I would not be thought to intend to make her and you unhappy, to write to you without her leave.

This, therefore, is the laſt you will receive from me, till happier days: and as my proſpects are not very bad, I preſume we ſhall ſoon have leave to write again; and even to ſee each other: ſince an alliance with a family ſo honourable as Mr. Lovelace's is, will not be a diſgrace.

She is pleaſed to write, that if I would wiſh to inflame you, I ſhould let you know her written prohibition: but if otherwiſe, find ſome way of my own accord (without bringing her into the queſtion) to decline a correſpondence, which I muſt know ſhe has for ſome time paſt forbidden. But all I can ſay is, to beg of you not to be inflamed;—to beg of you not to let her know, or even by your behaviour to her, on this occaſion, gueſs, that I have acquainted you with my reaſon for declining to write to you. For how elſe, after the ſcruples I have heretofore made on this very ſubject, yet proceeding to correſpond, can I honeſtly ſatisfy you about my motives for this ſudden ſtop? So, my dear, I chuſe, you ſee, rather to rely upon your diſcretion, than to feign reaſons with which you would not be ſatisfied, but, with your uſual active penetration, ſift to the bottom, and at laſt find me to be a mean and low qualifier; and that with an implication injurious to you, that I ſuppoſed you had not prudence enough to be truſted with the naked truth.

I repeat, that my proſpects are not bad. The houſe, I preſume, will ſoon be taken. The people are very reſpectful, notwithſtanding my nicety about Miſs Partington. Miſs Martin, who is near marriage with an eminent tradeſman in the Strand, juſt now in a very reſpectful manner, aſked my opinion of ſome patterns of rich ſilks for the occaſion. The widow has a leſs forbidding appearance than at firſt. Mr. Lovelace, on my declared diſlike of his four friends, aſſured me, that neither they nor any-body elſe ſhall be introduced to me, without my leave.

Theſe circumſtances I mention, (as you will ſuppoſe) that your kind heart may be at eaſe about me; that you may be induced by them to acquieſce with your mother's commands, (cheerfully acquieſce) and that for my ſake, leſt I ſhould be thought an inflamer; who am, with very contrary intentions, my deareſt and beſt beloved friend, your ever-obliged and affectionate

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XLVIII.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 3.

I Am aſtoniſhed that my mother ſhould take ſuch a ſtep—purely to exerciſe an unreaſonable act of authority; and to oblige the moſt remorſeleſs hearts in the world. If I find, that I can be of uſe to you either by advice or information, do you think I will not give it? —Were it to any other perſon, much leſs dear to me than you are, do you think, in ſuch a caſe, I would forbear giving it?

Mr. Hickman, who pretends to a little caſuiſtry in ſuch a nice matter, is of opinion, that I ought not to decline a correſpondence thus circumſtanced. And 'tis well he is: for my mother having ſet me up, I muſt have ſomebody to quarrel with.

This I will come into, if it will make you eaſy—I will forbear to write to you for a few days, if nothing extraordinary happen, and till the rigour of her prohibition is abated. But be aſſured, that I will not diſpenſe with your writing to me. My heart, my conſcience, my honour will not permit it.

But how will I help myſelf?—How—eaſily enough. For I do aſſure you that I want but very little further provocation to fly privately to London. And if I do, I will not leave you till I ſee you either honourably married, or abſolutely quit of the wretch: and in this laſt caſe I will take you down with me, in defiance of the whole world: or, if you refuſe to go with me, ſtay with you, and accompany you as your ſhadow whitherſoever you go.

Don't be frightened at this declaration. There is but one conſideration, and but one hope, that withold me, watched as I am in all my retirements; obliged to read to her without a voice; to work in her preſence without fingers; and to lie with her every night againſt my will. The conſideration is, Leſt you ſhould apprehend that a ſtep of this nature would look like a doubling of your fault, in the eyes of ſuch as think your going away a fault. The hope is, That things will ſtill end happily, and that ſome people people will have reaſon to take ſhame to themſelves for the ſorry parts they have acted. Nevertheleſs I am often balancing—But your reſolving to give up the correſpondence at this criſis, will turn the ſcale. Write therefore, or take the conſequence.

A few words upon the ſubject of your laſt letters—I know not whether your brother's wife project be given up or not. A dead ſilence reigns in your family. Your brother was abſent three days; then at home one; and is now abſent: but whether with Singleton or not, I cannot find out.

By your account of your wretch's companions, I ſee not but they are a ſet of infernals, and he the Beelzebub. What could he mean, as you ſay, by his earneſtneſs to bring you into ſuch company, and to give you ſuch an opportunity to make him and them reflecting-glaſſes to one another? The man's a fool to be ſure, my dear—A filly fellow, at leaſt—The wretches muſt put on their beſt before you, no doubt—Lords of the creation!—Noble fellows theſe!—Yet who knows how many poor deſpicable ſouls of our ſex the worſt of them has had to whine after him!

You have brought an inconvenience upon yourſelf, as you obſerve, by your refuſal of Miſs Partington for your bedfellow. Pity you had not admitted her! Watchful as you are, what could have happened? If violence were intended, he would not ſtay for the night. You might have ſat up after her, or not gone to bed. Mrs. Sinclair preſſed it too far. You was over-ſcrupulous.

If any-thing happen to delay your nuptials, I would adviſe you to remove: but if you marry, perhaps you may think it no great matter to ſtay where you are, till you take poſſeſſion of your own eſtate. The knot once tied, and with ſo reſolute a man, it is my opinion, your relations will ſoon reſign what they cannot legally hold: and, were even a litigation to follow, you will not be able, nor ought you to be willing, to help it; for your eſtate will then be his right; and it will be unjuſt to wiſh it to be witheld from him.

One thing I would adviſe you to think of; and that is, of proper ſettlements: it will be to the credit of your prudence and of his juſtice, (and the more as matters ſtand) that ſomething of this ſhould be done before you marry. Bad as he is, nobody accounts him a ſordid man. And I wonder he has been hitherto ſilent on that ſubject.

I am not diſpleaſed with his propoſal about the widow-lady's houſe. I think it will do very well. But if it muſt be three weeks before you can be certain about it, ſurely you need not put off his day for that ſpace: and he may beſpeak his equipages. Surprizing to me as well as you, that he could be ſo acquieſcent!

I repeat—Continue to write to me. I inſiſt upon it; and that as minutely as poſſible: or, take the conſequence. I ſend this by a particular hand. I am, and ever will be, your moſt affectionate

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER LXIX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE TO MISS HOWE.

THURSDAY, MAY 4.

I Forego every other engagement, I ſuſpend every wiſh, I baniſh every other fear, to take up my pen, to beg of you, that you will not think of being guilty of ſuch an act of love as I can never thank you for; but muſt for ever regret. If I muſt continue to write to you, I muſt. I know full well your impatience of controul, when you have the leaſt imagination that your generoſity or friendſhip is likely to be wounded by it.

My deareſt, deareſt creature, would you incur a maternal, as I have a paternal, malediction? Would not the world think there was an infection in my fault, if it were followed by Miſs Howe? There are ſome points ſo flagrantly wrong, that they will not bear to be argued upon. This is one of them. I need not give reaſons againſt ſuch a raſhneſs. Heaven forbid that it ſhould be known that you had it but once in your thought, be your motives ever ſo noble and generous, to follow ſo bad an example; the rather as that you would, in ſuch a caſe, want the extenuations that might be pleaded in my favour; and particularly that one of being ſurprized into the unhappy ſtep!

The reſtraint your mother lays you under, would not have appeared heavy to you, but on my account. Would you have once thought it a hardſhip to be admitted to a part of her bed?—How did I uſe to be delighted with ſuch a favour from my mother!—How did I love to work in her preſence!—So did you in the preſence of yours once. And to read to her in winter evenings I know was one of your joys.—Do not give me cauſe to reproach myſelf on the reaſon that may be aſſigned for the change in you.

Learn, my dear, I beſeech you learn, to ſubdue you own paſſions. Be the motives what they will, exceſs is exceſs. Thoſe paſſions in our ſex, which we take no pains to ſubdue, may have one and the ſame ſource with thoſe infinitely blacker paſſions, which we uſed ſo often to condemn in the violent and headſtrong of the other ſex; and which may be only heightened in them by cuſtom, and their freer education. Let us both, my dear, ponder well this thought; look into ourſelves, and fear.

If I write, as I find I muſt, I inſiſt upon your forbearing to write. Your ſilence to this ſhall be the ſign to me, that you will not think of the raſhneſs you threaten me with; and that you will obey your mother as to your own part of the correſpondence, however: eſpecially as you can inform or adviſe me in every weighty caſe by Mr. Hickman's pen.

My trembling writing will ſhew you, my dear impetuous creature, what a trembling heart you have given to your ever obliged, or, if you take ſo raſh a ſtep, your for-ever diſobliged

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

My cloaths were brought to me juſt now. But you have ſo much diſcompoſed me; that I have no heart to look into the trunks. Why, why, my dear, will you fright me with your flaming love? Diſcompoſure gives diſtreſs to a weak heart, whether it ariſe from friendſhip or enmity.

A ſervant of Mr. Lovelace carries this to Mr. Hickman for diſpatch ſake. Let that worthy man's pen relieve my heart from this new uneaſineſs.

LETTER LXX.

MR. HICKMAN, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

[SENT TO WILSON'S BY A PARTICULAR HAND.]

FRIDAY, MAY 5.

MADAM,

I Have the honour of dear Miſs Howe's commands, to acquaint you, without knowing the occaſion, That ſhe is exceſſively concerned for the concern ſhe has given you in her laſt letter: and that, if you will but write to her, under cover as before, ſhe will have no thoughts of what you are ſo very apprehenſive about.—Yet ſhe bid me write, That if ſhe has but the leaſt imagination that ſhe can ſerve you, and ſave you, thoſe are her words, all the cenſures of the world will be but of ſecond conſideration with her. I have great temptations, on this occaſion, to expreſs my own reſentments upon your preſent ſtate; but not being fully apprized of what that is—only conjecturing from the diſturbance upon the mind of the deareſt lady in the world to me, and the moſt ſincere of friends to you, that that is not altogether ſo happy as were to be wiſhed; and being, moreover, forbid to enter into the cruel ſubject; I can only offer, as I do, my beſt and faithfulleſt ſervices! and wiſh you a happy deliverance from all your troubles. For I am, moſt excellent young lady, your faithful and moſt obedient ſervant,

CH. HICKMAN.

VOLUME THE FOURTH.

LETTER I.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

TUESDAY, MAY 2.

MERCURY, as the fabuliſt tells us, having the curioſity to know the eſtimation he ſtood in among mortals, deſcended in diſguiſe, and in a ſtatuary's ſhop cheapened a Jupiter, then a Juno, then one, then another, of the Dii majores; and, at laſt, aſked, What price that fame ſtatue of Mercury bore? 'O 'Sir,' ſays the artiſt, 'buy one of the 'others, and I'll throw you in that for 'nothing.'

How ſheepiſh muſt the god of thieves look upon this rebuff to his vanity!

So thou! a thouſand pounds wouldſt thou give for the good opinion of this ſingle lady—To be only thought tolerably of, and not quite unworthy of her converſation, would make thee happy. And at parting laſt night, or rather this morning, thou madeſt me promiſe a few lines to Edgware, to let thee know what ſhe thinks of thee, and of thy brethren.

Thy thouſand pounds, Jack, is all thy own: for moſt heartily does ſhe diſlike ye all —Thee as much as any of the reſt.

I am ſorry for it too, as to thy part, for two reaſons—One, that I think thy motive for thy curioſity was fear or conſciouſneſs: whereas that of the arch-thief was vanity, intolerable vanity. And he was therefore juſtly ſent away with a bluſh upon his cheeks to Heaven, and could not brag—The other, that I am afraid, if ſhe diſlike thee, ſhe diſlikes me; for are we not birds of a feather?

I muſt never talk of reformation, ſhe told me, having ſuch companions, and taking ſuch delight, as I ſeemed to take, in their frothy converſation.

I, no more than you, Jack, imagined ſhe could poſſibly like ye: but then, as my friends, I thought a perſon of her education would have been more ſparing of her cenſures.

I don't know how it is, Belford; but women think themſelves entitled to take any freedoms with us, while we are unpolite, forſooth, and I can't tell what, if we don't tell a pack of curſed lies, and make black white, in their favour—teaching us to be hypocrites, yet ſtigmatizing us, at other times, for deceivers.

I defended ye all as well as I could: but you know there was no attempting ought but a palliative defence, to one of her principles.

I will ſummarily give thee a few of my pleas.

To the pure, every little deviation ſeemed offenſive: yet I ſaw not, that there was any-thing amiſs the whole evening, either in the words or behaviour of any of my friends. Some people could talk but upon one or two ſubjects: ſhe upon every one. No wonder, therefore, they talked to what they underſtood beſt: and to mere objects of ſenſe. Had ſhe honoured us with more of her converſation, ſhe would have been leſs diſguſted with ours; for ſhe ſaw how every-one was prepared to admire her, whenever ſhe opened her lips. You, in particular, had ſaid, when ſhe retired, that virtue itſelf ſpoke when ſhe ſpoke: but that you had ſuch an awe upon you, after ſhe had favoured us with an obſervation or two on a ſubject ſtarted, that you ſhould ever be afraid in her company, to be found moſt ex-ceptionable, when you intended to be leſs ſo.

Plainly, ſhe ſaid, ſhe neither liked my companions, nor the houſe ſhe was in.

I liked not the houſe any more than ſhe: though the people were very obliging, and ſhe had owned they were leſs exceptionable to herſelf, than at firſt. And were we not about another of our own?

She did not like Miſs Partington—Let her fortune be what it would, and ſhe had heard a great deal ſaid of her fortune, ſhe ſhould not chuſe an intimacy with her. She thought it was a hardſhip to be put upon ſuch a difficulty as ſhe was put upon the preceding night, when there were lodgers in the front-houſe whom they had reaſon to be freer with, than, upon ſo ſhort an acquaintance, with her.

I pretended to be an utter ſtranger as to this particular; and, when ſhe explained herſelf upon it, condemned Mrs. Sinclair's requeſt, and called it a confident one.

She, artfully, made lighter of her denial of the girl for a bed-fellow, than ſhe thought of it, I could ſee that; for it was plain, ſhe ſuppoſed there was room for me to think ſhe had been either over-nice, or over-cautious.

I offered to reſent Mrs. Sinclair's freedom.

No; there was no great matter in it. It was beſt to let it paſs. It might be thought more particular in her to deny ſuch a requeſt, than in Mrs. Sinclair to make it, or in Miſs Partington to expect it to be complied with. But as the people below had a large acquaintance, ſhe did not know how often ſhe might have her retirements invaded, if ſhe gave way. And indeed, there were levities in the behaviour of that young lady, which ſhe could not ſo far paſs over as to wiſh an intimacy with her.

I ſaid, I liked Miſs Partington as little as ſhe could. Miſs Partington was a ſilly young creature; who ſeemed too likely to juſtify the watchfulneſs of her guardians over her.—But, nevertheleſs, as to her general converſation and behaviour laſt night, I muſt own, that I thought the girl (for girl ſhe was, as to diſcretion) not exceptionable; only carrying herſelf like a free good natured creature who believed herſelf ſecure in the honour of her company.

It was very well ſaid of me, ſhe replied: but, if that young lady were ſo well ſatisfied with her company, ſhe muſt needs ſay, that I was very kind to ſuppoſe her ſuch an innocent—For her own part, ſhe had ſeen nothing of the London world: but thought, ſhe muſt tell me plainly, that ſhe never was in ſuch company in her life; nor ever again wiſhed to be in ſuch.

There, Belford!—Worſe off than Mercury!—Art thou not?

I was nettled. Hard would be the lot of more diſcreet women, as far as I knew, than Miſs Partington, were they to be judged by ſo rigid a virtue as hers.

Not ſo, ſhe ſaid: but if I really ſaw nothing exceptionable to a virtuous mind, in that young perſon's behaviour, my ignorance of better behaviour was, ſhe muſt needs tell me, as pitiable as hers. And it were to be wiſhed, that minds ſo paired, for their own ſakes, ſhould never be ſeparated.

See, Jack, what I get by my charity!

I thanked her heartily. But ſaid, that I muſt take the liberty to obſerve, that good folks were generally ſo uncharitable, that, devil take me, if I would chuſe to be good, were the conſequence to be, that I muſt think hardly of the whole world beſides.

She congratulated me upon my charity; but told me, that to enlarge her own, ſhe hoped it would not be expected of her to approve of the low company I had brought her into laſt night.

No exception for thee, Belford!—Safe is thy thouſand pounds.

I ſaw not, I ſaid, begging her pardon, that ſhe liked any-body. [Plain-dealing for plain-dealing, Jack!—Why then did ſhe abuſe my friends?] However, let me but know whom and what ſhe did or did not like; and, if poſſible, I would like and diſlike the very ſame perſons and things.

She bid me then, in a pet, diſlike myſelf.

Curſed ſevere!—Does ſhe think ſhe muſt not pay for it one day, or one night?—And if one, many: that's my comfort.

I was in ſuch a train of being happy, I ſaid, before my earneſtneſs to procure her to favour my friends with her company, that I wiſhed the devil had had as well my friends as Miſs Partington—And yet I muſt ſay, that I ſaw not how good people could anſwer half their end, which is to reform the wicked by precept as well as example, were they to accompany only with the good.

I had like to have been blaſted by two or three flaſhes of lightning from her indignant eyes; and ſhe turned ſcornfully from me, and retired to her own apartment.

Once more, Jack, ſafe, as thou ſeeſt, is thy thouſand pounds.

She ſays, I am not a polite man: but is the, in the inſtance before us, more polite for a woman?

And now, doſt thou not think, that I owe my charmer ſome revenge for her cruelty in obliging ſuch a fine young creature, and ſo vaſt a fortune, as Miſs Partington, to croud into a preſs-bed with Dorcas the maid-ſervant of the proud refuſer?—Miſs Partington too (with tears) declared by Mrs. Sinclair, that would Mrs. Lovelace do her the honour of a viſit at Barnet, the beſt bed and beſt room in her guardian's houſe ſhould be at her ſervice. Thinkeſt thou, that I could not gueſs at her diſhonourable fears of me?—That ſhe apprehended, that the ſuppoſed huſband would endeavour to take poſſeſſion of his own?—And that Miſs Partington would be willing to contribute to ſuch a piece of juſtice?

Thus, then, thou both remindeſt, and defieſt me, charmer!—And ſince thou reliеſt more on thy own precaution than upon my honour; be it unto thee, fair-one, as thou apprehendeſt!

And now, Jack, let me know, what thy opinion, and the opinions of thy brother varlets, are of my Gloriana.

I have juſt now heard, that Hannah hopes to be ſoon well enough to attend her young lady, when in London. It ſeems the girl has had no phyſician. I muſt ſend her one, out of pure love and reſpect to her miſtreſs. Who knows but medicine may weaken nature, and ſtrengthen the diſeaſe?—As her malady is not a fever, very likely it may do ſo.—But perhaps the wench's hopes are too forward. Bluſtering weather in this month yet.—And that is bad for rheumatick complaints.

LETTER II.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

TUESDAY MAY 2.

JUST as I had ſealed up the incloſed, comes a letter to my beloved, in a cover to me, directed to Lord M.'s. From whom, thinkeſt thou?—From Mrs. Howe!

'And what the contents?'

How ſhould I know, unleſs the dear creature had communicated them to me? But a very cruel letter I believe it is, by the effect it had upon her. The tears ran down her cheeks as ſhe read it; and her colour changed ſeveral times. No end of her perſecutions, I think!

'What a cruelty in my fate!' ſaid the ſweet lamenter.—'Now the only comfort 'of my life muſt be given up!'

Miſs Howe's correſpondence, no doubt.

But ſhould ſhe be ſo much grieved at this? This correſpondence was prohibited before, and that, to the daughter, in the ſtrongeſt terms: but yet carried on by both; although a brace of impeccables, an't pleaſe ye. Could they expect, that a mother would not vindicate her authority?—and finding her prohibition ineffectual with her perverſe daughter, was it not reaſonable to ſuppoſe ſhe would try what effect it would have upon her daughter's friend?—And now I believe the end will be effectually anſwered: for my beloved, I dare ſay, will make a point of conſcience of it.

I hate cruelty, eſpecially in women; and ſhould have been more concerned for this inſtance of it in Mrs. Howe, had I not had a ſtronger inſtance of the ſame in my beloved to Miſs Partington; for how did ſhe know, ſince ſhe was ſo much afraid for herſelf, whom Dorcas might let in to that innocent and leſs watchful young lady? But nevertheleſs I muſt needs own, that I am not very ſorry for this prohibition, let it originally come from the Harlowes, or from whom it will; becauſe I make no doubt, that it is owing to Miſs Howe, in a great meaſure, that my beloved is ſo much upon her guard, and thinks ſo hardly of me. And who can tell, as characters here are ſo tender, and ſome diſguiſes ſo ſlimſy, what conſequences might follow this undutiful correſpondence?—I ſay, therefore, I am not ſorry for it: now will ſhe not have any-body to compare notes with; any-body to alarm her; and I may be ſaved the guilt and diſobligation of inſpecting into a correſpondence that has long made me uneaſy.

How every-thing works for me!—Why will this charming creature make ſuch contrivances neceſſary, as will increaſe my trouble, and my guilt too, as ſome will account it? But why, rather I ſhould aſk, will ſhe fight againſt her ſtars?

LETTER III.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

EDGWARE, TUES. NIGHT, MAY 2.

WITHOUT ſtaying for the promiſed letter from you to inform us what the lady ſays of us, I write to tell you, that we are all of one opinion with regard to her; which is, that there is not of her age a finer woman in the world, world, as to her underſtanding. As for her perſon, ſhe is at the age of bloom, and an admirable creature; a perfect beauty: but this poorer praiſe, a man, who has been honoured with her converſation, can hardly deſcend to give; and yet ſhe was brought amongſt us contrary to her will.

Permit me, dear Lovelace, to be a means of ſaving this excellent creature from the dangers ſhe hourly runs from the moſt plotting heart in the world. In a former, I pleaded your own family, Lord M.'s wiſhes particularly; and then I had not ſeen her: but now, I join her ſake, honour's ſake, motives of juſtice, generoſity, gratitude, and humanity, which are all concerned in the preſervation of ſo fine a woman. Thou knoweſt not the anguiſh I ſhould have had (whence ariſing, I cannot deviſe) had I not known before I ſet out this morning, that the incomparable creature had diſappointed thee in thy curſed view of getting her to admit the ſpecious Partington for a bedfellow.

I have done nothing but talk of this lady ever ſince I ſaw her. There is ſomething ſo awful, and yet ſo ſweet, in her aſpect, that were I to have the virtues and the graces all drawn in one piece, they ſhould be taken, every one of them, from different airs and attributes in her. She was born to adorn the age ſhe was given to, and would be an ornament to the firſt dignity. What a piercing, yet gentle eye; every glance, I thought, mingled with love and fear of you! What a ſweet ſmile darting through the cloud that overſpread her fair face, demonſtrating that ſhe had more apprehenſions and grief at her heart, than ſhe cared to expreſs!

You may think what I am going to write too flighty; but, by my faith, I have conceived ſuch a profound reverence for her ſenſe and judgment, that, far from thinking the man excuſable who ſhould treat her baſely, I am ready to regret that ſuch an angel of a woman ſhould even marry. She is in my eye all mind: and were ſhe to meet with a man all mind likewiſe, why ſhould the charming qualities ſhe is miſtreſs of, be endangered? Why ſhould ſuch an angel be plunged ſo low as into the vulgar offices of domeſtick life? Were ſhe mine, I ſhould hardly wiſh to ſee her a mother, unleſs there were a kind of moral certainty, that minds like hers could be propagated. For why, in ſhort, ſhould not the work of bodies be left to mere bodies? I know, that you yourſelf have an opinion of her little leſs exalted. Belton, Mowbray, Tourville, are all of my mind; are full of her praiſes; and ſwear, it would be a million of pities to ruin a woman in whoſe fall none but devils can rejoice.

What muſt that merit and excellence be which can extort this from us, free livers, like yourſelf, and all of us your partial friends, who have joined with you in your juſt reſentments againſt the reſt of her family, and offered our aſſiſtance to execute your vengeance on them? But we cannot think it reaſonable, that you ſhould puniſh an innocent creature, who loves you ſo well, and who is in your protection, and has ſuffered ſo much for you, for the faults of her relations.

And here let me put a ſerious queſtion or two. Thinkeſt thou, truly admirable as this lady is, that the end thou propoſeſt to thyſelf, if obtained, is anſwerable to the means, to the trouble thou giveſt thyſelf, and to the perfidies, tricks, ſtratagems, and contrivances, thou haſt already been guilty of, and ſtill meditateſt? In every real excellence ſhe ſurpaſſes all her ſex. But in the article thou ſeekeſt to ſubdue her for, a mere ſenſualiſt, a Partington, a Horton, a Martin, would make a ſenſualiſt a thouſand times happier than ſhe either will or can.

'Sweet are the joys that come with willing-
'neſs.'

And wouldſt thou make her unhappy for her whole life, and thyſelf not happy for a ſingle moment?

Hitherto, it is not too late; and that perhaps is as much as can be ſaid, if thou meaneſt to preſerve her eſteem and good opinion, as well as perſon; for I think it is impoſſible ſhe can get out of thy hands now ſhe is in this curſed houſe. O that damned hypocritical Sinclair, as thou calleſt her! How was it poſſible ſhe ſhould behave ſo ſpeciouſly as ſhe did all the time the lady ſtaid with us! Be honeſt, and marry; and be thankful that ſhe will condeſcend to have thee. If thou doſt not, thou wilt be the worſt of men; and wilt be condemned in this world and the next: as I am ſure thou oughteſt, and ſhouldeſt too, wert thou to be judged by one, who never before was ſo much touched in a woman's favour; and whom thou knoweſt to be thy partial friend,

J. BELFORD.

Our companions conſented, that I ſhould withdraw to write to the above effect.

They

They can make nothing of the characters we write in; ſo I read this to them. They approve of it; and of their own motion each man would ſet his name to it. I would not delay ſending it, for fear of ſome deteſtable ſcheme taking place.

THOMAS BELTON,
RICHARD MOWBRAY,
JAMES TOURVILLE.

Juſt now are brought me both yours. I vary not my opinion, nor forbear my earneſt prayers to you in her behalf, notwithſtanding her diſlike of me.

LETTER IV.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BELFORD, ESQ.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 3.

WHEN I have already taken pains to acquaint thee in full with regard to my views, deſigns, and reſolutions, with regard to this admirable woman, it is very extraordinary, that thou ſhouldſt vapour as thou doſt in her behalf, when I have made no trial, no attempt: and yet, giveſt it as thy opinion in a former letter, that advantage may be taken of the ſituation ſhe is in; and that ſhe may be overcome.

Moſt of thy reflections, particularly that which reſpects the difference as to the joys to be given by the virtuous and the libertine of her ſex, are fitter to come in as after-reflections, than as antecedencies.

I own with thee, and with the poet, That ſweet are the joys that come with willingneſs—But is it to be expected, that a woman of education, and a lover of forms, will yield before ſhe is attacked? And have I ſo much as ſummoned this to ſurrender? I doubt not but I ſhall meet with difficulty. I muſt therefore make my firſt effort by ſurprize. There may poſſibly be ſome cruelty neceſſary: but there may be conſent in ſtruggle; there may be yielding in reſiſtance. But the firſt conflict over, whether the following may not be weaker and weaker, till willingneſs enſue, is the point to be tried. I will illuſtrate what I have ſaid by the ſimile of a bird new-caught. We begin, when boys, with birds; and when grown up, go on to women; and both perhaps, in turn, experience our ſportive cruelty.

Haſt thou not obſerved the charming gradations by which the enſnared volatile has been brought to bear with it's new condition? How, at firſt, refuſing all ſuſtenance, it beats and bruiſes itſelf againſt it's wires, till it makes it's gay plumage fly about, and overſpread it's well-ſecured cage. Now it gets out it's head; ſticking only at it's beautiful ſhoulders: then, with difficulty, drawing back it's head, it gaſps for breath, and erectly perched, with meditating eyes, firſt ſurveys, and then attempts, it's wired canopy. As it gets breath, with renewed rage, it beats and bruiſes again it's pretty head and ſides, bites the wires, and pecks at the fingers of it's delighted tamer. Till at laſt, finding it's efforts ineffectual, quite tired and breathleſs, it lays itſelf down, and pants at the bottom of the cage, ſeeming to bemoan it's cruel fate and forfeited liberty. And after a few days it's ſtruggles to eſcape ſtill diminiſhing as it finds it to no purpoſe to attempt it, it's new habitation becomes familiar; and it hops about from perch to perch, reſumes it's wonted cheerfulneſs, and every day ſings a ſong to amuſe itſelf, and reward it's keeper.

Now, let me tell thee, that I have known a bird actually ſtarve itſelf, and die with grief, at it's being caught and caged. But never did I meet with a woman, who was ſo ſilly.—Yet I have heard the dear ſouls moſt vehemently threaten their own lives on ſuch an occaſion. But it is ſaying nothing in a woman's favour, if we do not allow her to have more ſenſe than a bird. And yet we muſt all own, that it is more difficult to catch a bird than a lady.

To purſue the compariſon—If the diſappointment of the captivated lady be very great, ſhe will threaten, indeed, as I ſaid: ſhe will even refuſe her ſuſtenance for ſome time, eſpecially if you entreat her much, and ſhe thinks ſhe gives you concern by her refuſal. But then the ſtomach of the dear ſullen one will ſoon return. 'Tis pretty to ſee how ſhe comes to by degrees: preſſed by appetite, ſhe will firſt ſteal, perhaps, a weeping morſel by herſelf; then be brought to piddle and ſigh, and ſigh and piddle, before you; now-and-then, if her viands be unſavoury, ſwallowing with them a reliſhing tear or two: then ſhe comes to eat and drink, to oblige you: then reſolves to live for your ſake: her exclamations will, in the next place, be turned into blandiſhments; her vehement upbraidings into gentle murmuring—'How dare you, traitor!'—into 'How could you, deareſt!' She will draw you to her, inſtead of puſhing you from her: no longer, with unſheathed claws, will ſhe reſiſt you; but, like a pretty, playful, wanton kitten, with gentle paws, and concealed talons, tap your cheek, and with intermingled ſmiles, and tears, and careſſes, implore your conſideration for her, and your conſtancy: all the favour ſhe then has toask of you!—And this is the time, were it given to man to confine himſelf to one object, to be happier every day than another.

Now, Belford, were I to go no farther than I have gone with my beloved Miſs Harlowe, how ſhall I know the difference between her and another bird? To let her fly now, what a pretty jeſt would that be!—How do I know, except I try, whether ſhe may not be brought to ſing me a fine ſong, and to be as well contented as I have brought other birds to be, and very ſhy ones too?

But now let us reflect a little upon the confounded partiality of us human creatures. I can give two or three familiar, and if they were not familiar, they would be ſhocking, inſtances of the cruelty both of men and women, with reſpect to other creatures, perhaps as worthy as (at leaſt more innocent than) themſelves. By my ſoul, Jack, there is more of the ſavage in human nature than we are commonly aware of. Nor is it, after all, ſo much amiſs, that we ſometimes avenge the more innocent animals upon our own ſpecies.

To particulars:

How uſual a thing is it for women, as well as men, without the leaſt remorſe, to enſnare, to cage, and torment, and even with burning knitting-needles to put out the eyes of the poor feathered ſongſter, [Thou ſeeſt I have not yet done with birds;] which, however, in proportion to it's bulk, has more life than themſelves, (for a bird is all ſoul;) and of conſequence has as much feeling as the human creature! When at the ſame time, if an honeſt fellow, by the gentleſt perſuaſion, and the ſofteſt arts, has the good luck to prevail upon a mewed-up lady, to countenance her own eſcape, and ſhe conſents to break cage, and be ſet a flying into the all-cheering air of liberty, mercy on us! what an outcry is generally raiſed againſt him!

Juſt like what you and I once ſaw raiſed in a paltry village near Cheimsford, after a poor hungry fox, who, watching his opportunity, had ſeized by the neck, and ſhouldered, a ſleek-feathered gooſe: at what time we beheld the whole vicinage of boys and girls, old men, and old women, all the furrows and wrinkles of the latter filled up with malice for the time; the old men armed with prongs, pitchforks, clubs, and cat-ſticks; the old women with mops, brooms, fire-ſhovels, tongs, and pokers; and the younger fry with dirt, ſtones, and brick-bats, gathering as they ran like a ſnow-ball, in purſuit of the wind-out-ſtripping prowler; all the mongrel curs of the circumjacencies yelp, yelp, yelp, at their heels, compleating the horrid chorus.

Remembereſt thou not this ſcene? Surely thou muſt. My imagination, inflamed by a tender ſympathy for the danger of the adventurous marauder, repreſents it to my eye, as if it were but yeſterday. And doſt thou not recollect how generouſly glad we were, as if our own caſe, that honeſt Reynard, by the help of a lucky ſtyle, over which both old and young tumbled upon one another, and a winding courſe, eſcaped their brutal fury, and flying cat-ſticks; and how, in fancy, we followed him to his undiſcovered retreat; and imagined we beheld the intrepid thief enjoying his dear-earned purchaſe with a delight proportioned to his paſt danger?

I once made a charming little ſavage ſeverely repent the delight ſhe took in ſeeing her tabby favourite make cruel ſport with a pretty ſleek bead-eyed mouſe, before ſhe devoured it. 'Egad, 'my love,' ſaid I to myſelf, as I ſat meditating the ſcene, 'I am determined to 'lie in wait for a fit opportunity to try 'how thou wilt like to be toſt over my 'head, and be caught again: how thou 'wilt like to be parted from me, and 'pulled to me. Yet will I rather give 'life than take it away, as this barba-'rous quadrupede has at laſt done by 'her prey.' And after all was over between my girl and me, I reminded her of the incident to which my reſolution was owing.

Nor had I at another time any mercy upon the daughter of an old epicure, who had taught the girl, without the leaſt remorſe, to roaſt lobſters alive; to cauſe a poor pig to be whipped to death; to ſcrape carp the contrary way of the ſcales, making them leap into the ſtew-pan, and dreſſing them in their own blood for ſauce. And this for luxury-ſake, and to provoke an appetite; which I had without ſtimulation, in my way, and that I can tell thee a very ravenous one.

Many more inſtances of the like nature could I give, were I to leave nothing to thyſelf, to ſhew that the beſt take the ſame liberties, and perhaps worſe, with ſome ſort of creatures, that we take with others; and creatures ſtill! and creatures too, as I have obſerved above, replete with ſtrong life, and ſenſible feeling!—If, therefore, people pretend to mercy, let mercy go through all their actions. I have read ſomewhere, That a merciful man is merciful to his beaſt.

So much at preſent for thoſe parts of thy letter in which thou urgeſt to me motives of compaſſion for the lady.

But I gueſs at thy principal motive in this thy earneſtneſs in behalf of this charming creature. I know that thou correſpondeſt with Lord M. who is impatient, and has long been deſirous, to ſee me ſhackled. And thou wanteſt to make a merit with the uncle, with a view to one of his nieces. But knoweſt thou not, that my conſent will be wanting to complete thy wiſhes?—And what a commendation will it be of thee to ſuch a girl as Charlotte, when I ſhall acquaint her with the affront thou putteſt upon the whole ſex, by aſking, Whether I think my reward, when I have ſubdued the moſt charming woman in the world, will be equal to my trouble?—Which, thinkeſt thou, will a woman of ſpirit ſooneſt forgive; the undervaluing varlet who can put ſuch a queſtion; or him, who prefers the purſuit and conqueſt of a fine woman to all the joys of life? Have I not known even a virtuous woman, as ſhe would be thought, vow everlaſting antipathy to a man who gave out, that ſhe was too old for him to attempt? And did not Eſſex's perſonal reflection on Queen Elizabeth, that ſhe was old and crooked, contribute more to his ruin, than his treaſon?

But another word or two, as to thy objection relating to my trouble and reward.

Does not the keen fox-hunter endanger his neck and his bones in purſuit of a vermin, which, when killed, is neither fit food for men nor dogs?

Do not the hunters of the noble game value the veniſon leſs than the ſport?

Why then ſhould I be reflected upon, and the ſex affronted, for my patience and perſeverance in the moſt noble of all chaces; and for not being a poacher in love, as thy queſtion may be made to imply?

Learn of thy maſter, for the future, to treat more reſpectfully a ſex that yields us our principal diverſions and delights.

Proceed anon.

LETTER V.

MR. LOVELACE. IN CONTINUATION.

WELL ſayeſt thou, that mine is the moſt plotting heart in the world. Thou doſt me honour; and I thank thee heartily. Thou art no bad judge. How like Boileau's parſon, I ſtrut behind my double chin! Am I not obliged to deſerve thy compliment? And wouldſt thou have me repent of a murder before I have committed it?

'The Virtues and the Graces are this 'lady's handmaids. She was certainly 'born to adorn the age ſhe was given to.' —Well ſaid, Jack—'And would be an 'ornament to the firſt dignity.' But what praiſe is that, unleſs the firſt dignity were adorned with the firſt merit? —Dignity! gewgaw!—Firſt dignity! thou ideot!—Art thou, who knoweſt me, ſo taken with ermine and tinſel?—I, who have won the gold, am only fit to wear it. For the future, therefore, correct thy ſtile, and proclaim her the ornament of the happieſt man, and (reſpecting herſelf and ſex) the greateſt conqueror in the world.

Then, that ſhe loves me, as thou imagineſt, by no means appears clear to me. Her conditional offers to renounce me; the little confidence ſhe places in me; entitle me to aſk, What merit can ſhe have with a man, who won her in ſpite of herſelf; and who fairly, in ſet and obſtinate battle, took her priſoner?

As to what thou inferreſt from her eye when with us, thou knoweſt nothing of her heart from that, if thou imagineſt there was one glance of love ſhot from it. Well did I note her eye, and plainly did I ſee, that it was all but juſt civil diſguſt to me and to the company I had brought her into. Her early retiring that night, againſt all entreaty, might have convinced thee, that there was very little of the gentle in her heart for me. And her eye never knew what it was to contradict her heart.

She is, thou ſayeſt, all mind. So ſay I. But why ſhouldſt thou imagine, that ſuch a mind as hers, meeting with ſuch a one as mine; and, to dwell upon the word, meeting with an inclination in hers; ſhould not propagate minds like her own?

Were I to take thy ſtupid advice, and marry; what a figure ſhould I make in rakiſh annals! The lady in my power: yet not having intended to put herſelf in my power: declaring againſt love, and a rebel to it: ſo much open-eyed caution: no confidence in my honour: her family expecting the worſt hath paſſed; herſelf ſeeming to expect, that the worſt will be attempted: [Priſcila Partington for that!] What! wouldſt thou not have me act in character?

But why calleſt thou the lady in- nocent? And why ſayeſt thou ſhe loves me?

By innocent, with regard to me, and not taken as a general character, I muſt inſiſt upon it, ſhe is not innocent. Can ſhe be innocent, who, by wiſhing to ſhackle me in the prime and glory of my youth, with ſuch a capacity as I have for noble miſchief, would make my perdition more certain, were I to break, as I doubt I ſhould, the moſt ſolemn vow I could make? I ſay no man ought to take even a common oath, who thinks he cannot keep it. This is conſcience! This is honour!—And when I think I can keep the marriage-vow, then will it be time to marry.

No doubt of it, as thou ſayeſt, the devils would rejoice in the fall of ſuch a woman. But this is my confidence, that I ſhall have it in my power to marry when I will. And if I do her this juſtice, ſhall I not have a claim to her gratitude? And will ſhe not think herſelf the obliged, rather than the obliger? Then let me tell thee, Belford, it is impoſſible ſo far to hurt the morals of this lady, as thou and thy brother-varlets have hurt others of the ſex, who now are caſting about the town fire-brands and double death. Take ye that thiſtle to mumble upon.

A SHORT interruption. I now reſume.

That the morals of this lady cannot fail, is a conſideration that will leſſen the guilt on both ſides. And if, when ſubdued, ſhe knows but how to middle the matter between virtue and love, then will ſhe be a wife for me: for already I am convinced, that there is not a woman in the world that is love-proof and plot-proof, if ſhe be not the perſon.

And now imagine (the charmer overcome) thou ſeeſt me ſitting ſupinely croſs-kneed, reclining on my ſofa, the God of Love dancing in my eyes, and rejoicing in every mantling feature; the ſweet rogue, late ſuch a proud rogue, wholly in my power, moving up ſlowly to me, at my beck, with heaving ſighs, half-pronounced upbraidings from murmuring lips, her finger in her eye, and quickening her pace at my 'Come hither, 'deareſt!'

One hand ſtuck in my ſide, the other extended to encourage her baſhful approach—'Kiſs me, love!—"Sweet," as Jack Belford ſays, "are the joys that come "with willingneſs."

She tenders her purple mouth, [Her coral lips will be purple then, Jack!] 'Sigh not ſo deeply, my beloved!—'Happier hours await thy humble love, 'than did thy proud reſiſtance.'

Once more bent to my ardent lips the ſwanny gloſſineſs of a neck late ſo ſtately—

'There's my precious!

'Again!

'Obliging lovelineſs!

'O my ever-blooming glory! I 'have tried thee enough. To-morrow's 'ſun——'

Then I riſe, and fold to my almoſt-talking heart the throbbing-boſomed charmer.

'And now ſhall thy humble pride 'confeſs it's obligation to me!'

'To-morrow's ſun——' And then I diſengage myſelf from the baſhful paſſive, and ſtalk about the room—'To-'morrow's ſun ſhall gild the altar at 'which my vows ſhall be paid thee!'

Then, Jack, the rapture! then the darted ſun-beams from her gladdened eye, drinking up, at one ſip, the precious diſtillation from the pearl-dropped cheek! Then hands ardently folded, eyes ſeeming to pronounce, 'God bleſs 'my Lovelace!' to ſupply the joy-locked tongue: her tranſports too ſtrong, and expreſſion too weak, to give utterance to her grateful meanings;—All—All the ſtudies—All the ſtudies of her future life vowed and devoted (when ſhe can ſpeak) to acknowledge and return the perpetuated obligation!

If I could bring my charmer to this, would it not be the eligible of eligibles?—Is it not worth trying for?—As I ſaid, I can marry her when I will. She can be nobody's but mine, neither for ſhame, nor by choice, nor yet by addreſs: for who, that knows my character, believes that the worſt ſhe dreads, is now to be dreaded?

I have the higheſt opinion that man can have (thou knoweſt I have) of the merit and perfections of this admirable woman; of her virtue and honour too, although thou, in a former, art of opinion, that ſhe may be overcome. Am I not, therefore, obliged to go further, in order to contradict thee, and, as I have often urged, to be ſure, that ſhe is what I really think her to be, and, if I am ever to marry her, hope to find her?

Then this lady is a miſtreſs of our paſſions: no one ever had to ſo much perfection the art of moving. This all her family know, and have equally feared and revered her for it. This I know too; and doubt not more and more to experience. How charmingly muſt this divine creature warble forth (if a proper occaſion be given) her melodious elegiacks!—

acks!—Infinite beauties are there in a weeping eye. I firſt taught the two nymphs below to diſtinguiſh the ſeveral accents of the lamentable in a new ſubject, and how admirably ſome, more than others, become their diſtreſſes!

But to return to thy objections—Thou wilt perhaps tell me, in the names of thy brethren, as well as in thy own name, That among all the objects of your reſpective attempts, there was not one of the rank and merit of my charming Miſs Harlowe.

But let me aſk, Has it not been a conſtant maxim with us, that the greater the merit on the woman's ſide, the nobler the victory on the man's? And as to rank, ſenſe of honour, ſenſe of ſhame, pride of family, may make rifled rank get up, and ſhake itſelf to rights: and if any-thing come of it, ſuch a one may ſuffer only in her pride, by being obliged to take up with a ſecond-rate match inſtead of a firſt; and, as it may fall out, be the happier, as well as the more uſeful, for the miſadventure; ſince (taken off of her publick gaddings, and domeſticated by her diſgrace) ſhe will have reaſon to think herſelf obliged to the man who has ſaved her from further reproach; while her fortune and alliance will lay an obligation upon him; and her paſt fall, if ſhe have prudence and conſciouſneſs, will be his preſent and future ſecurity.

But a poor girl, [ſuch a one as my Roſebud, for inſtance] having no recals from education; being driven out of every family that pretends to reputation; perſecuted moſt perhaps by ſuch as have only kept their ſecret better; and having no refuge to fly to—The common, the ſtews, the ſtreet, is the fate of ſuch a poor wretch; penury, want, and diſeaſe, her ſure attendants; and an untimely end, perhaps, cloſes the miſerable ſcene.

And will you not now all join to ſay, that it is more manly to attack a lion than a ſheep?—Thou knoweſt, that I always illuſtrated my eagleſhip, by aiming at the nobleſt quarries; and by diſdaining to make a ſtoop at wrens, phyltits, and wag-tails.

The worſt reſpecting myſelf, in the caſe before me, is that my triumph, when compleated, will be ſo glorious a one, that I ſhall never be able to keep up to it. All my future attempts muſt be poor to this. I ſhall be as unhappy, after a while, from my reflections upon this conqueſt, as Don John of Auſtria was, in his, on the renowned victory of Lepanto, when he found that none of his future atchievements could keep pace with his early glory.

I am ſenſible that my pleas and my reaſoning may be eaſily anſwered, and perhaps juſtly cenſured; but by whom cenſured? Not by any of the confraternity, whoſe conſtant courſe of life, even long before I became your general, to this hour, has juſtified what ye now in a fit of ſqueamiſhneſs, and through envy, condemn. Having therefore vindicated myſelf and my intentions to YOU, that is all I am at preſent concerned for.

Be convinced then, that I (according to our principles) am right, thou wrong; or, at leaſt, be ſilent. But I command thee to be convinced. And in thy next, be ſure to tell me that thou art.

LETTER VI.

MR. BELFORD, TO ROBERT LOVELACE, ESQ.

EDGWARE, THURSDAY, MAY 4.

I Know that thou art ſo abandoned a man, that to give thee the beſt reaſons in the world againſt what thou haſt once reſolved upon, will be but acting the madman whom once we ſaw trying to buffet down a hurricane with his hat. I hope, however, that the lady's merit will ſtill avail her with thee. But if thou perſiſteſt; if thou wilt avenge thyſelf on this ſweet lamb which thou haſt ſingled out from a flock thou hateſt, for the faults of the dogs who kept it; if thou art not to be moved by beauty, by learning, by prudence, by innocence, all ſhining out in one charming object; but ſhe muſt fall, fall by the man whom ſhe has choſen for her protector; I would not for a thouſand worlds have thy crime to anſwer for.

Upon my faith, Lovelace, the ſubject ſticks with me, notwithſtanding I find I have not the honour of the lady's good opinion. And the more, when I reflect upon the father's brutal curſe, and the villainous hard-heartedneſs of all her family. But, nevertheleſs, I ſhould be deſirous to know, (if thou wilt proceed) by what gradations, arts, and contrivances, thou effecteſt thy ingrateful purpoſe. And, O Lovelace! I conjure thee, if thou art a man, let not the ſpecious devils thou haſt brought her among, be ſuffered to triumph over her; nor make her the victim of unmanly artifices. If ſhe yield to fair ſeductions, if I may ſo expreſs myſelf; if thou canſt raiſe a weakneſs in her by love, or by arts not inhuman; I ſhall the leſs pity her: and ſhall then conclude, that there is not a woman in the world who can reſiſt a bold and reſolute lover.

A meſſenger is juſt now arrived from my uncle. The mortification, it ſeems, is got to his knee; and the ſurgeons declare, that he cannot live many days. He therefore ſends for me directly, with theſe ſhocking words, That I will come and cloſe his eyes. My ſervant or his muſt of neceſſity be in town every day on his caſe, or on other affairs; and one of them ſhall regularly attend you for any letter or commands. It will be charity to write to me as often as you can. For although I am likely to be a conſiderable gainer by the poor man's death, yet I cannot ſay, that I at all love theſe ſcenes of death and the doctor ſo near me. The doctor and death I ſhould have ſaid; for that's the natural order, and, generally ſpeaking, the one is but the harbinger to the other.

If, therefore, you decline to oblige me, I ſhall think you are diſpleaſed with my freedom. But let me tell you at the ſame time, that no man has a right to be diſpleaſed at freedoms taken with him for faults he is not aſhamed to be guilty of.

J. BELFORD.

LETTER VII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

I Thank you and Mr. Hickman for his letter, ſent me with ſuch kind expedition; and proceed to obey my dear menacing tyranneſs.

She then gives the particulars of what paſſed between herſelf and Mr. Lovelace on Tueſday morning, in relation to his four friends, and to Miſs Partington, pretty much to the ſame effect as in Mr. Lovelace's Letter, No. I. And then proceeds:

He is conſtantly accuſing me of over-ſcrupulouſneſs. He ſays, I am always out of humour with him: that I could not have behaved more reſervedly to Mr. Solmes: and that it is contrary to all his hopes and notions, that he ſhould not, in ſo long a time, find himſelf able to inſpire the perſon whom he hoped ſo ſoon to have the honour to call his, with the leaſt diſtinguiſhing tenderneſs for him before hand.

Silly and partial encroacher! not to know to what to attribute the reſerve I am forced to treat him with! But his pride has eaten up his prudence. It is indeed a dirty low pride, that has ſwallowed up the true pride, which ſhould have ſet him above the vanity that has overrun him.

Yet he pretends, that he has no pride but in obliging me; and is always talking of his reverence and humility, and ſuch ſort of ſtuff: but of this I am ſure, that he has, as I obſerved the firſt time I ſaw him, too much regard to his own perſon, greatly to value that of his wife, marry he whom he will: and I muſt be blind, if I did not ſee, that he is exceedingly vain of his external advantages, and of that addreſs, which, if it has any merit in it to an outward eye, is perhaps owing more to his confidence, than to any-thing elſe.

Have you not beheld the man, when I was your happy gueſt, as he walked to his chariot, looking about him, as if to obſerve what eyes his ſpecious perſon and air had attracted?

But, indeed, we had ſome homely coxcombs as proud as if they had perſons to be proud of; at the ſame time that it was apparent, that the pains they took about themſelves but the more expoſed their defects.

The man who is fond of being thought more or better than he is, as I have often obſerved, but provokes a ſcrutiny into his pretenſions; and that generally produces contempt. For pride, as I believe I have heretofore ſaid, is an infallible ſign of weakeneſs; of ſomething wrong in the head or heart, or in both. He that exalts himſelf, inſults his neighbour; who is provoked to queſtion in him even that merit, which, were he modeſt, would perhaps be allowed to be his due.

You will ſay, that I am very grave: and ſo I am. Mr. Lovelace is extremely ſunk in my opinion ſince Monday night: nor ſee I before me any-thing that can afford me a pleaſing hope. For what, with a mind ſo unequal as his can be my beſt hope?

I think I mentioned to you, in my former, that my cloaths were brought me. You fluttered me ſo, that I am not ſure I did. But I know I deſigned to mention that they were. They were brought me on Thurſday; but neither my few guineas with them, nor any of my books, except a Drexelius on Eternity, the good old Practice of Piety, and a Francis Spira. My brother's wit, I ſuppoſe. He thinks he does well to point out death and deſpair to me. I wiſh for the one, and every now-and-then am on the brink of the other.

You will the leſs wonder at my being

ſo very ſolemn, when added to the above, and to my uncertain ſituation, I tell you, that they have ſent me with theſe books a letter from my couſin Morden. It has ſet my heart againſt Mr. Lovelace. Againſt myſelf too. I ſend it incloſed. If you pleaſe, my dear, you may read it here.

'COLONEL MORDEN, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

'FLORENCE, APRIL 13.

'I AM extremely concerned to hear 'of a difference betwixt the reſt of a 'family ſo near and dear to me, and 'you ſtill dearer to me than any of the 'reſt.

'My couſin James has acquainted me 'with the offers you have had, and with 'your refuſals. I wonder not at either. 'Such charming promiſes at ſo early an 'age as when I left England; and thoſe 'promiſes, as I have often heard, ſo 'greatly exceeded, as well in your perſon as mind; how much muſt you be 'admired! How few muſt there be 'worthy of you!

'Your parents, the moſt indulgent in 'the world, to a child the moſt deſerving, 'have given way, it ſeems, to your refuſal of ſeveral gentlemen. They have 'contented themſelves at laſt to name 'one with earneſtneſs to you, becauſe of 'the addreſs of another whom they cannot approve.

'They had not reaſon, it ſeems, from 'your behaviour, to think you greatly 'averſe: ſo they proceeded: perhaps 'too haſtily for a delicacy like yours. 'But when all was fixed on their parts, 'and moſt extraordinary terms concluded in your favour; terms, which abundantly ſhew the gentleman's juſt 'value for you: you flew off with a 'warmth and vehemence little ſuited to 'that ſweetneſs which gave grace to all 'your actions.

'I know very little of either of the 'gentlemen: but of Mr. Lovelace I 'know more than of Mr. Solmes. I 'wiſh I could ſay more to his advantage 'than I can. As to every qualification 'but one, your brother owns there is no 'compariſon. But that one outweighs 'all the reſt together. It cannot be 'thought, that Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe 'will diſpenſe with MORALS in a huſband.

'What, my deareſt couſin, ſhall I 'plead firſt to you on this occaſion? 'Your duty, your intereſt, your temporal, and your eternal welfare, do, 'and may all, depend upon this ſingle 'point, The morality of a huſband. A 'woman who hath a wicked huſband, 'may find it difficult to be good, and out 'of her power to do good; and is therefore in a worſe ſituation than the man 'can be in, who hath a bad wife. You 'preſerve all your religious regards, I 'underſtand. I wonder not that you do. 'I ſhould have wondered had you not. 'But what can you promiſe yourſelf, as to 'perſeverance in them with an immoral 'huſband?

'If your parents and you differ in 'ſentiment on this important occaſion, 'let me aſk you, my dear couſin, who 'ought to give way? I own to you, that 'I ſhould have thought there could not 'any-where have been a more ſuitable 'match for you, than with Mr. Lovelace, had he been a moral man. I 'ſhould have little to ſay againſt a man, 'of whoſe actions I am not to ſet up myſelf as a judge, did he not addreſs my 'couſin. But, on this occaſion, let me 'tell you, my dear Clariſſa, that Mr. 'Lovelace cannot poſſibly deſerve you. 'He may reform, you'll ſay: but he 'may not. Habit is not ſoon or eaſily 'ſhaken off. Libertines, who are libertines in defiance of talents, of ſuperior lights, of conviction, hardly 'ever reform but by miracle, or by incapacity. Well do I know mine own 'ſex. Well am I able to judge of the 'probability of the reformation of a licentious young man, who has not been 'faſtened upon by ſickneſs, by affliction, 'by calamity: who has a proſperous 'run of fortune before him: his ſpirits 'high: his will uncontroulable: the 'company he keeps, perhaps ſuch as 'himſelf, confirming him in all his 'courſes, aſſiſting him in all his enterprizes.

'As to the other gentleman, ſuppoſe, 'my dear couſin, you do not like him at 'preſent, it is far from being unlikely, 'that you will hereafter: perhaps the 'more, for not liking him now. He 'can hardly ſink lower in your opinion: 'he may riſe. Very ſeldom is it, that 'high expectations are ſo much as tolerably anſwered. How, indeed, can they, 'when a fine and extenſive imagination 'carries it's expectation infinitely beyond reality, in the higheſt of our 'ſublunary enjoyments? A woman adorned with ſuch an imagination ſees 'no defect in a favoured object, (the 'leſs, if ſhe be not conſcious of any wilful fault in herſelf) till it is too late to 'rectify the miſtakes occaſioned by her 'generous credulity.

'But

'But suppose a person of your talents were to marry a man of inferior talents; who, in this case, can be so happy in herself, as Miss Clarissa Harlowe? What delight do you take in doing good! How happily do you devote the several portions of the day to your own improvement, and to the advantage of all that move within your sphere!—And thus such is your taste, such are your acquirements in politer studies, and in the politer amusements; such your excellence in all the different parts of œconomy fit for a young lady's inspection and practice; that your friends would wish you to be taken off as little as possible by regards that may be called merely personal.

'But as to what may be the consequence respecting yourself, respecting a young lady of your talents, from the preference you are suspected to give to a libertine, I would have you, my dear cousin, consider what that may be. A mind so pure, to mingle with a mind impure! And will not such a man as this engross all your solitudes! Will he not perpetually fill you with anxieties for him and for yourself!—The divine and civil powers defied, and their sanctions broken through by him, on every not merely accidental, but meditated occasion. To be agreeable to him, and to hope to preserve an interest in his affections, you must probably be obliged to abandon all your laudable pursuits. You must enter into his pleasures and distastes. You must give up your own virtuous companions for his profligate ones—Perhaps be forsaken by yours, because of the scandal he daily gives. Can you hope, cousin, with such a man as this, to be long so good as you now are? If not, consider which of your present laudable delights you would chuse to give up? Which of his culpable ones to follow him in? How could you brook to go backward, instead of forward, in those duties which you now so exemplarily perform? And how do you know, if you once give way, where you shall be suffered, where you shall be able, to stop?

'Your brother acknowledges, that Mr. Solmes is not near so agreeable in person as Mr. Lovelace. But what is person, with such a lady as I have the honour to be now writing to? He owns likewise that he has not the address of Mr. Lovelace: but what a more personal advantage is a plausible address, without morals? A woman had better take a husband whose manners she were to fashion, than to find them ready-fashioned to her hand, at the price of his morality? a price that is often paid for travelling accomplishments. O my dear cousin, were you but with us here at Florence, or at Rome, or at Paris, (where also I resided for many months) to see the gentlemen whose supposed rough English manners at setting out are to be polished, and what their improvements are in their return through the same places, you would infinitely prefer the man in his first stage to the same man in his last. You find the difference on their return—A fondness for foreign fashions, an attachment to foreign vices, and a supercilious contempt of his own country and countrymen; (himself more despicable than the most despicable of those he despises) these, with an unblushing effrontery, are too generally the attainments that concur to finish the travelled gentleman!

'Mr. Lovelace, I know, deserves to have an exception made in his favour; for he is really a man of parts and learning: he was esteemed so both here and at Rome; and a fine person and a generous turn of mind, gave him great advantages. But you need not be told, that a libertine man of sense does infinitely more mischief, than a libertine of weak parts is able to do. And this I will tell you farther, that it was Mr. Lovelace's own fault that he was not still more respected than he was, among the literati here. There were, in short, some liberties in which he indulged himself, that endangered his person and his liberty; and made the best and most worthy of those who honoured him with their notice, give him up; and his stay both at Florence and at Rome shorter than he designed.

'This is all I chuse to say of Mr. Lovelace. I had much rather have had reason to give him a quite contrary character. But as to rakes or libertines in general, I, who know them well, must be allowed, because of the mischiefs they have always in their hearts, and too often in their power, to do your sex, to add still a few more words upon this topick.

'A libertine, my dear cousin, a plotting, an intriguing libertine, must be generally remorseless—Unjust he must always be. The noble rule of doing to others what he would have done to himself, is the first rule he breaks, and every day he breaks it; the oftener,

'the

'the greater his triumph. He has great 'contempt for your ſex. He believes 'no woman chaſte, becauſe he is a pro- 'fligate. Every woman who favours him, 'confirms him in his wicked incredulity. 'He is always plotting to extend the 'miſchiefs he delights in. If a woman 'loves ſuch a man, how can ſhe bear the 'thought of dividing her intereſts in 'his affections, with half the town, and 'that perhaps the dregs of it? Then ſo 'ſenſual!—How will a young lady of 'your delicacy bear with ſo ſenſual a 'man? A man who makes a jeſt of his 'vows; and who perhaps will break 'your ſpirits by the moſt unmanly in- 'ſults. To be a libertine, at ſetting out, 'all compulſion, all humanity, muſt be 'overcome. To continue to be a liber- 'tine, is to continue to be every-thing 'vile and inhuman. Prayers, tears, and 'the moſt abject ſubmiſſion, are but fuel 'to his pride: wagering perhaps with 'lewd companions, and, not impro- 'bably, with lewder women, upon in- 'ſtances which he boaſts of to them of 'your patient ſufferings, and broken 'ſpirit, and bringing them home to wit- 'neſs both.

'I write what I know has been.

'I mention not fortunes ſquandered, 'eſtates mortgaged or ſold, and poſte- 'rity robbed—Nor yet a multitude of 'other evils, too groſs, too ſhocking to 'your delicacy.

'All theſe, my dear couſin, to be 'ſhunned, all the evils I have named to 'be avoided; the power of doing all the 'good you have been accuſtomed to do, 'preſerved, nay, increaſed by the ſepa- 'rate proviſion that will be made for 'you: your charming diverſions, and 'exemplary employments, all maintain- 'ed; and every good habit perpetuated: 'and all by one ſacrifice, the fading plea- 'ſure of the eye! Who would not, (ſince 'every-thing is not to be met with in 'one man; who would not) to preſerve 'ſo many eſſentials, give up ſo light, ſo 'unpermanent a pleaſure!

'Weigh all theſe things, which I might 'inſiſt upon to more advantage, did I 'think it needful to one of your pru- 'dence—Weigh them well, my belov- 'ed couſin; and if it be not the will of 'your parents that you ſhould continue 'ſingle, reſolve to oblige them; and 'let it not be ſaid, that the powers of 'fancy ſhall (as in many others of your 'ſex) be too hard for your duty and 'your prudence. The leſs agreeable 'the man, the more obliging the com- 'pliance. Remember that he is a ſober 'man—A man who has reputation to loſe, 'and whoſe reputation therefore is a ſe- 'curity for his good behaviour to you.

'You have an opportunity offered 'you to give the higheſt inſtance, that 'can be given of filial duty. Embrace 'it. It is worthy of you. It is ex- 'pected from you; however, for your 'inclination ſake, we may be ſorry that 'you are called upon to give it. Let 'it be ſaid, that you have been able to 'lay an obligation upon your parents, '(a proud word, my couſin!) which you 'could not do, were it not laid againſt 'your inclination!—Upon parents who 'have laid a thouſand upon you: who 'are ſet upon this point: who will not 'give it up: who have given up many 'points to you, even of this very na- 'ture: and in their turn, for the ſake 'of their own authority, as well as judg- 'ment, expect to be obliged.

'I hope I ſhall ſoon, in perſon, con- 'gratulate you upon this your merito- 'rious compliance. To ſettle and give 'up my truſteeſhip, is one of the prin- 'cipal motives of leaving theſe parts. 'I ſhall be glad to ſettle it to every one's 'ſatisfaction; to yours particularly.

'If on my arrival I find a happy uni- 'on, as formerly, reign in a family ſo 'dear to me, it will be an unſpeakable 'pleaſure to me; and I ſhall perhaps ſo 'diſpoſe my affairs, as to be near you 'for ever.

'I have written a very long letter, and 'will add no more, than that I am, with 'the greateſt reſpect, my deareſt couſin, 'your moſt affectionate and faithful ſervant,

'WM. MORDEN.'

I will ſuppoſe, my dear Miſs Howe, that you have read my couſin's letter. It is now in vain to wiſh it had come ſooner. But if it had, I might perhaps have been ſo raſh as to give Mr. Lovelace the fatal meeting, as I little thought of going away with him.

But I ſhould hardly have given him the expectation of ſo doing, previous to the meeting, which made him come prepared; and the revocation of which he ſo artfully made ineffectual.

Perſecuted as I was, and little expecting ſo much condeſcenſion, as my aunt, to my great mortification, has told me (and you confirm) I ſhould have met with, it is however hard to ſay, what I ſhould or ſhould not have done as to meeting him, had it come in time: but this effect I verily believe it would have had—To have made me inſiſt with all my might, on going over, out of all their ways, to the kind writer of the inſtructive letter, and on making a father (a protector, as well as a friend) of a kinſman, who is one of my truſtees. This, circumſtanced as I was, would have been a natural, at leaſt an unexceptionable protection.—But I was to be unhappy! And how it cuts me to the heart to think that I can already ſubſcribe to my couſin's character of a libertine, ſo well drawn in the letter which I ſuppoſe you now to have read!

That a man of a character, which ever was my abhorrence, ſhould fall to my lot!—But depending on my own ſtrength; having no reaſon to apprehend danger from headſtrong and diſgraceful impulſes; I too little perhaps caſt up my eyes to the Supreme Director: in whom, miſtruſting myſelf, I ought to have placed my whole confidence—And the more, when I ſaw myſelf ſo perſeveringly addreſſed by a man of this character.

Inexperience and preſumption, with the help of a brother and ſiſter who have low ends to anſwer in my diſgrace, have been my ruin!—A hard word, my dear. But I repeat it upon deliberation: ſince, let the beſt happen which now can happen, my reputation is deſtroyed; a rake is my portion: and what that portion is, my couſin Morden's letter has acquainted you.

Pray keep it by you till called for. I ſaw it not myſelf (having not the heart to inſpect my trunk-) till this morning. I would not for the world this man ſhould ſee it; becauſe it might occaſion miſchief between the moſt violent ſpirit, and the moſt ſettled brave one in the world, as my couſin's is ſaid to be.

This letter was incloſed (opened) in a blank cover. Scorn and deteſt me as they will, I wonder that one line was not ſent with it—were it but to have more particularly pointed the deſign of it, in the ſame generous ſpirit, that ſent me the Spira.

The ſealing of the cover was with black-wax. I hope there is no new occaſion in the family to give reaſon for black-wax. But if there were, it would, to be ſure, have been mentioned, and laid at my door—perhaps too juſtly!

I had begun a letter to my couſin; but laid it by, becauſe of the uncertainty of my ſituation, and expecting every day for ſeveral days paſt to be at a greater certainty. You bid me write to him ſome time ago, you know. Then it was I began it: for I have great pleaſure in obeying you in all I may. So I ought to have; for you are the only friend left me. And moreover, you generally honour me with your own obſervance of the advice I take the liberty to offer you: for I pretend to ſay, I give better advice than I have taken. And ſo I had need. For I know not how it comes about, but I am in my own opinion, a poor loſt creature: and yet cannot charge myſelf with one criminal or faulty inclination. Do you know, my dear, how this can be?

Yet I can tell you how, I believe—One devious ſtep at ſetting out!—That muſt be it:—which purſued, has led me ſo far out of my path, that I am in a wilderneſs of doubt and error; and never, never, ſhall find my way out of it: for, although but one pace awry at firſt, it has led me hundreds and hundreds of miles out of my path: and the poor eſtray has not one kind friend, nor has met with one directing paſſenger, to direct her to recover it.

But I, preſumptuous creature! muſt rely ſo much upon my own knowledge of the right path!—little apprehending that an ignis fatuus with it's falſe fires (and yet I had heard enough of ſuch) would ariſe to miſlead me! And now, in the midſt of fens and quagmires, it plays around me, and around me, throwing me back again, whenever I think myſelf in the right track. But there is one common point, in which all ſhall meet, err widely as they may. In that I ſhall be laid quietly down at laſt: and then will all my calamities be at an end.

But how I ſtray again; ſtray from my intention! I would have ſaid, that I had begun a letter to my couſin Morden ſome time ago: but that now I can never end it. You will believe I cannot: for how ſhall I tell him, that all his compliments are miſbeſtowed? That all his advice is thrown away? All his warnings vain? And that even my higheſt expectation is to be the wife of that free liver, whom he ſo pathetically warns me to ſhun?

Let me, however, have your prayers joined with my own, (my fate depending, as it ſeems, upon the lips of ſuch a man,) That whatever ſhall be my deſtiny, that dreadful part of my father's malediction, that I may be puniſhed by the man in whom he ſuppoſes I put my confidence, may not take place! That this for Mr. Lovelace's own ſake, and for the ſake of human nature, may not be! or, if it be neceſſary, in ſupport of the parental authority, that I ſhould be puniſhed by him, that it may not be by his premeditated or wilful baſeneſs; but that I may be able to acquit his intention, if not his action! Otherwiſe my fault will appear to be doubled in the eye of the event-judging world. And yet, methinks, I would be glad, that the unkindneſs of my father and uncles, whoſe hearts have already been too much wounded by my error, may be juſtified in every article, excepting in this heavy curſe: that my father will be pleaſed to withdraw that before it be generally known; at leaſt that moſt dreadful part of it which regards futurity!

I muſt lay down my pen. I muſt brood over theſe reflections. Once more, before I cloſe my couſin's letter, I will peruſe it. And then I ſhall have it by heart.

LETTER VIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

SUNDAY NIGHT, MAY 1.

WHEN you reflect upon my unhappy ſituation, which is attended with ſo many indelicate and even ſhocking circumſtances, ſome of which my pride will not let me think of with patience; all aggravated by the contents of my couſin's affecting letter; you will not wonder that the vapouriſhneſs which has laid hold of my heart, ſhould riſe to my pen. And yet it would be more kind, more friendly in me, to conceal from you, who take ſuch a generous intereſt in my concerns, that worſt part of my griefs, which communication and complaint cannot relieve.

But to whom can I unboſom myſelf but to you? When the man who ought to be my protector, as he has brought upon me all my diſtreſſes, adds to my apprehenſions; when I have not even a ſervant on whoſe fidelity I can rely, or to whom I can break my griefs as they ariſe; and when his bountiful temper and gay heart attach every-one to him; and I am but a cypher, to give him ſignificance, and myſelf pain?—Theſe griefs, therefore, do what I can, will ſometimes burſt into tears; and theſe mingling with my ink, will blot my paper. And I know you will not grudge me the temporary relief.

But I ſhall go on in the ſtrain I left off with in my laſt; when I intended rather to apologize for my melancholy. But let what I have above written, once for all be my apology. My misfortunes have given you a call to diſcharge the nobleſt offices of the friendſhip we have vowed to each other, in advice and conſolation; and it would be an injury to it, and to you, to ſuppoſe it needed even that call.

She then tells Miſs Howe, that now her cloaths are come, Mr. Lovelace is continually teazing her to go abroad with him in a coach, attended by whom ſhe pleaſes of her own ſex, either for the air, or to the publick diverſions.

She gives the particulars of a converſation that has paſſed between them on that ſubject, and his ſeveral propoſals. But takes notice, that he ſays not the leaſt word of the ſolemnity which he ſo much preſſed for before they came to town; and which, as ſhe obſerves, was neceſſary to give propriety to his propoſals.

Now, my dear, ſays ſhe, I cannot bear the life I live. I would be glad at my heart to be out of his reach. If I were, he ſhould ſoon find the difference. If I muſt be humbled, it had better be by thoſe to whom I owe duty, than by him. My aunt writes in her letter, that ſhe dare not propoſe any-thing in my favour. You tell me, that upon enquiry, you find, that, had I not been unhappily ſeduced away, a change of meaſures was actually reſolved upon; and that my mother, particularly, was determined to exert herſelf for the reſtoration of the family peace; and, in order to ſucceed the better, had thoughts of trying to engage my uncle Harlowe in her party.

Let me build on theſe foundations. I can but try, my dear. It is my duty to try all probable methods to reſtore the poor outcaſt to favour. And who knows but that once indulgent uncle, who has very great weight in the family, may be induced to interpoſe in my behalf? I will give up all right and title to my grandfather's deviſes and bequeſts, with all my heart and ſoul, to whom they pleaſe, in order to make my propoſal palatable to my brother. And that my ſurrender may be effectual, I will engage never to marry.

What think you, my dear, of this expedient? Surely they cannot reſolve to renounce me for ever. If they look with impartial eyes upon what has happened, they will have ſomething to blame themſelves for, as well as me.

I preſume, that you will be of opinion, that this expedient is worth trying. But here is my difficulty: if I ſhould write, my hard-hearted brother has ſo ſtrongly confederated them all againſt me, that my letter would be handed about from one to another, till he had hardened every-one to refuse my request; whereas could my uncle be engaged to espouse my cause, as from himself, I should have some hope; as I presume to think he would soon have my mother and my aunt of his party.

What therefore I am thinking of, is this—Suppose Mr. Hickman, whose good character has gained him everybody's respect, should put himself in my uncle Harlowe's way? And (as if from your knowledge of the state of things between Mr. Lovelace and me) assure him not only of the above particulars, but that I am under no obligations that shall hinder me from taking his directions?

I submit the whole to your discretion, whether to pursue it at all, or in what manner. But if it be pursued, and if my uncle refuses to interest himself in my favour upon Mr. Hickman's application as from you, (for so, for obvious reasons, it must be put) I can then have no hope; and my next step in the mind that I am in, shall be to throw myself into the protection of the ladies of his family.

It were an impiety to adopt the following lines, because it would be throwing upon the decrees of Providence a fault too much my own. But often do I revolve them, for the sake of the general similitude which they bear to my unhappy, yet undesigned error.

'To you, great gods! I make my last appeal:
'Or clear my virtues, or my crimes reveal.
'If wand'ring in the maze of life I run,
'And backward tread the steps I sought to 'shun,
'Impute my error to your own decree:
'My FEET are guilty; but my HEART is 'free.'

The lady dates again on Monday, to let Miss Howe know, that Mr. Lovelace, on observing her uneasiness, had introduced to her Mr. Mennell, Mrs. Fretchville's kinsman, who managed all her affairs. She calls him a young officer of sense and politeness, who gave her an account of the house and furniture, to the same effect that Mr. Lovelace had done before; as also of the melancholy way Mrs Fretchville is in.

She tells Miss Howe, how extremely urgent Mr. Lovelace was with the gentleman to get his spouse (as he now always calls her before company) a sight of the house: and that Mr. Mennell undertook that very afternoon to shew her all of it, except the apartment Mrs. Fretchville should be in when she went. But that she chused not to take another step till she knew how she approved of her scheme to have her uncle sounded; and with what success, if tried, it would be attended.

Mr. Lovelace, in his humorous way, gives his friend an account of the lady's peevishness and dejection, on receiving a letter with her cloaths. He regrets that he has lost her confidence; which he attributes to his bringing her into the company of his four companions. Yet he thinks he must excuse them, and censure her for over-niceness; for that he never saw men behave better, at least not them.

Mentioning his introducing Mr. Mennell to her—

'Now, Jack,' says he, 'was it not very 'kind of Mr. Mennell [Captain Mennell 'I sometimes call him; for among the 'military men there is no such officer, 'thou knowest, as a lieutenant, or an en-'sign—Was it not very kind in him] to 'come with me so readily as he did to 'satisfy my beloved about the vapour-'ish lady and the house?

"But who is Captain Mennell?" 'methinks thou askest: "I never heard "of such a man as Captain Mennell."

'Very likely. But knowest thou not 'young Newcomb, honest Doleman's 'nephew?'

"O-ho! Is it he?"

'It is. And I have changed his name 'by virtue of my own single authority. 'Knowest thou not, that I am a great 'name-father? Preferments! bestow both 'military and civil. I give estates, and 'take them away at my pleasure. Qua-'lity too I create. And by a still more 'valuable prerogative, I degrade by vir-'tue of my own imperial will, without 'any other act of forfeiture than for my 'own convenience. What a poor thing 'is a monarch to me!

'But Mennell, now he has seen this 'angel of a woman, has qualms; that's 'the devil!—I shall have enough to do 'to keep him right. But it is the less 'wonder, that he should stagger, when 'a few hours conversation with the same 'lady could make four much more 'hardened varlets find hearts—Only, 'that I am confident, that I shall at last 'reward her virtue, if her virtue over-'come me, or I should find it impossible to 'persevere—For at times I have con-'founded qualms myself. But say not a 'word of them to the confraternity: 'nor laugh at me for them thyself.'

In another letter, dated Monday night, he writes as follows:

'This perverse lady keeps me at such 'distance, that I am sure something is 'going,

'going on between her and Miſs Howe, 'notwithſtanding the prohibition from 'Mrs. Howe to both: and as I have 'thought it ſome degree of merit in my-'ſelf to puniſh others for their tranſ-'greſſions, I am of opinion that both 'theſe girls are puniſhable for their 'breach of parental injunctions. And 'as to their letter-carrier, I have been 'enquiring into his way of living; and 'finding him to be a common poacher, 'deer-ſtealer, and warren-robber, who, 'under pretence of higgling, deals with 'a ſet of cuſtomers, who conſtantly take 'all he brings, whether fiſh, fowl, or 'veniſon, I hold myſelf juſtified (ſince 'Wilſon's conveyance muſt at preſent 'be ſacred) to have him ſtripped and 'robbed, and what money he has about 'him given to the poor; ſince if I take 'not money as well as letters, I ſhall be 'ſuſpected.

'To ſerve one's ſelf and puniſh a vil-'lain at the ſame time, is ſerving publick 'and private. The law was not made 'for ſuch a man as me. And I muſt 'come at correſpondences ſo diſobedi-'ently carried on.

'But, on ſecond thoughts, if I could 'find out that the dear creature carried 'any of her letters in her pockets, I can 'get her to a play or to a concert, and 'ſhe may have the misfortune to loſe 'her pockets.

'But how ſhall I find this out; ſince 'her Dorcas knows no more of her 'dreſſing and undreſſing, than her Love-'lace? For ſhe is dreſſed for the day, 'before ſhe appears even to her ſervant. 'Vilely ſuſpicious! Upon my ſoul, Jack, 'a ſuſpicious temper is a puniſhable 'temper. If a woman ſuſpects a rogue 'in an honeſt man, is it not enough to 'make the honeſt man who knows it a 'rogue?

'But as to her pockets, I think my 'mind hankers after them, as the leſs 'miſchievous attempt. But they cannot 'hold all the letters that I ſhould wiſh 'to ſee. And yet a woman's pockets 'are half as deep as ſhe is high. Tied 'round the ſweet lavities, I preſume, as 'ballaſt bags, leſt the wind, as they move 'with full ſail, from whale ribbed can-'vas, ſhould blow away the gypſies.'

He then, in apprehenſion that ſomething is meditating between the two ladies, or that ſomething may be ſet on foot to get Miſs Harlowe out of his hands, relates ſeveral of his contrivances, and bouſts of his inſtructions given in writing to Dorcas and to his ſervant William Summers, and ſays, that he has provided againſt every poſſible accident, even to bring her back if ſhe ſhould eſcape, or in caſe ſhe ſhould go abroad, and then refuſe to return; and hopes ſo to manage, as that, ſhould he make an attempt, whether he ſucceeded in it or not, he may have a pretence to detain her.

He then proceeds as follows:

'I have ordered Dorcas to cultivate 'by all means her lady's favour; to la-'ment her incapacity as to writing and 'reading; to ſhew letters to her lady, 'as from pretended country relations; 'to beg her advice how to anſwer them, 'and to get them anſwered; and to be 'always aiming at ſcrawling with a pen, 'leſt inky fingers ſhould give ſuſpicion. 'I have moreover given the wench an 'ivory-leafed pocket-book, with a ſil-'ver pencil, that ſhe may make memo-'randa on occaſion.

'And let me tell thee that the lady 'has already (at Mrs. Sinclair's motion) 'removed her cloaths out of the trunks 'they came in, into an ample mahogany 'repoſitory, where they will lie at full 'length, and which has drawers in it 'for linen. A repoſitory, that uſed to 'hold the richeſt ſuits which ſome of the 'nymphs put on, when they are to be 'dreſſed out to captivate, or to ape 'quality. For many a counteſs, thou 'knoweſt, has our mother equipped; 'nay, two or three dutcheſſes, who live 'upon quality-terms with their lords. 'But this to ſuch as will come up to her 'price, and can make an appearance 'like quality themſelves on the occaſion: 'for the reputation of perſons of birth 'muſt not lie at the mercy of every un-'der-degreed ſinner.

'A maſter-key which will open every 'lock in this cheſt, is put into Dorcas's 'hands; and ſhe is to take care, when 'ſhe ſearches for papers, before ſhe re-'moves any-thing, to obſerve how it 'lies, that ſhe may replace all to a hair. 'Sally and Polly can occaſionally help 'to tranſcribe. Slow and ſure with ſuch 'an Argus-eyed charmer muſt be all 'my movements.

'It is impoſſible that one ſo young 'and ſo inexperienced as ſhe is, can 'have all her caution from herſelf; the 'behaviour of the women ſo unexcep-'tionable; no revellings, no company 'ever admitted into this inner-houſe; 'all genteel, quiet, and eaſy, in it; the 'nymphs well-bred, and well-read; her 'firſt diſguſts to the old one got over.— 'It muſt be Miſs Howe therefore [Who 'once was in danger of being taken in

'by

'by one of our clafs, by honeft Sir 'George Colmar, as thou haft heard] 'that makes my progrefs difficult.

'Thou feeft, Belford, by the above 'precautionaries, that I forget nothing. 'As the fong fays, it is not to be ima-'gined—

"On what flight ftrings
"Depend thofe things
"On which men build their glory!"

'So far, fo good. I fhall never reft 'till I have difcovered in the firft place, 'where the dear creature puts her let-'ters; and in the next till I have got 'her to a play, to a concert, or to take 'an airing with me out of town for a 'day or two.'

'I GAVE thee juft now fome of my 'contrivances. Dorcas, who is ever 'attentive to all her lady's motions, 'has given me fome inftances of her 'miftrefs's precautions. She wafers her 'letters, it feems, in two places; pricks 'the wafers; and then feals upon them. 'No doubt but the fame care is taken 'with regard to thofe brought to her; 'for fhe always examines the feals of the 'latter before fhe opens them.

'I muft, I muft come at them. This 'difficulty augments my curiofity. 'Strange, fo much as fhe writes, and at 'all hours, that not one fleepy or for-'getful moment has offered in our fa-'vour!

'A fair contention, thou feeft: nor 'plead thou in her favour her youth, her 'beauty, her family, her fortune. CREDU-'LITY, fhe has none; and with regard 'to her TENDER YEARS, Am I not a 'young fellow myfelf? As to BEAUTY; 'pr'ythee, Jack, do thou, to fpare my 'modefty, make a comparifon between 'my Clariffa for a woman, and thy Love-'lace for a man. For her FAMILY, that 'was not known to it's country a cen-'tury ago? and I hate them all but her. 'Have I not caufe?—For her FOR-'TUNE; fortune, thou knoweft, was 'ever a ftimulus with me; and this for 'reafons not ignoble. Do not girls of 'fortune adorn themfelves on purpofe 'to engage our attention? Seek they 'not to draw us into their fnares? De-'pend they not, generally, on their for-'tunes, in the views they have upon us, 'more than on their merits? Shall we 'deprive them of the benefit of their 'principal dependence?—Can I, in par-'ticular, marry every girl who wifhes to 'obtain my notice? If therefore, in fup-'the port of libertine principles for 'which none of the fweet rogues hate 'us, a woman of fortune is brought to 'yield homage to her emperor, and any 'confequences attend the fubjugation, is 'not fuch a one fhielded by her fortune, 'as well from infult and contempt, as 'from indigence?—All, then, that ad-'mits of debate between my beloved 'and me, is only this—Which of the 'two has more wit, more circumfpection '—And that remains to be tried.

'A fad life however, this life of doubt 'and fufpence, for the poor lady to live, 'as well as for me; that is to fay, if fhe 'be not naturally jealous—If fhe be, her 'uneafinefs is conftitutional, and fhe 'cannot help it; nor will it in that cafe 'hurt her. For a fufpicious temper 'will make occafions for doubt, if none 'were to offer to it's hand. My fair-'one therefore, if naturally fufpicious, 'is obliged to me for faving her the 'trouble of ftudying for thefe occafions '—But after all, the plaineft paths in 'our journies through life are the fafeft 'and beft I believe, although it is not 'given me to chufe them. I am not, 'however, fingular in the purfuit of the 'more intricate paths; fince there are 'thoufands and ten thoufands who had 'rather fifh in troubled waters than in 'fmooth.'

LETTER IX.

MR. LOVELACE, TO JOHN BEL-FORD, ESQ.

TUESDAY, MAY 9.

I Am a very unhappy man. This la-dy is faid to be one of the fweeteft-tempered creatures in the world: and fo I thought her. But to me, fhe is one of the moft perverfe. I never was fup-pofed to be an ill-natured mortal nei-ther. How can it be? I imagined for a long while, that we were born to make each other happy: but quite the contrary; we really feem to be fent to plague each other.

I will write a comedy, I think. I have a title ready; and that's half the work. The Quarrelfome Lovers. 'Twill do. There's fomething new and ftrik-ing in it. Yet, more or lefs, all lovers quarrel. Old Terence has taken notice of that; and obferves upon it, That lovers falling-out occafions lovers falling-in; and a better underftanding of courfe. 'Tis natural that it fhould be fo. But with us, we fall-out fo often, without falling-in once; and a fecond quarrel fo generally happens before a firft is made up; that it is hard to gueſs what event event our loves will be attended with. But perſeverance is my glory, and patience my handmaid, when I have in view an object worthy of my attempts. What is there in an eaſy conqueſt? Hudibras queſtions well—

'——What mad lover ever dy'd
'To gain a ſoft and eaſy bride?
'Or, for a lady tender-hearted,
'In purling ſtreams, or hemp, departed?'

But I will lead to the occaſion of this preamble.

I had been out. On my return, meeting Dorcas on the ſtairs—'Your lady in 'her chamber, Dorcas?'—'In the din-'ing-room, Sir: and if ever you hope 'for an opportunity to come at a letter, 'it muſt be now. For at her feet I ſaw 'one lie, which, as may be ſeen by it's 'open folds, ſhe has been reading, with 'a little parcel of others ſhe is now buſi-'ed with—All pulled out of her pocket, 'as I believe. So, Sir, you'll know where 'to find them another time.'

I was ready to leap for joy, and inſtantly reſolved to bring forward an expedient which I had held in petto; and entering into the dining-room with an air of tranſport, I boldly claſped my arms about her, as ſhe ſat; ſhe huddling up her papers in her handkerchief all the time; the dropt paper unſeen. 'O 'my deareſt life, a lucky expedient have 'Mr. Mennell and I hit upon, juſt now. 'In order to haſten Mrs. Fretchville to 'quit the houſe, I have agreed, if you 'approve of it, to entertain her cook, 'her houſe-maid, and two men-ſervants, '(about whom ſhe was very ſolicitous) 'till you are provided to your mind. 'And that no accommodations may be 'wanted, I have conſented to take the 'houſhold linen at an appraiſement.

'I am to pay down five hundred 'pounds, and the remainder as ſoon as 'the bills can be looked up, and the 'amount of them adjuſted. Thus will 'you have a charming houſe entirely 'ready to receive you. Some of the ladies 'of my family will ſoon be with you: 'they will not permit you long to ſuſ-'pend my happy day. And that nothing 'may be wanting to gratify your utmoſt 'punctilio, I will till then conſent to 'ſtay here at Mrs. Sinclair's, while you 'reſide at your new houſe; and leave 'the reſt to your own generoſity. O my 'beloved creature, will not this be a-'greeable to you? I am ſure it will—'It muſt—' And claſping her cloſer to me, I gave her a more fervent kiſs than ever I had dared to give her before. I permitted not my ardour to overcome my diſcretion however; for I took care to ſet my foot upon the letter, and ſcrap-ed it farther from her, as it were behind her chair.

She was in a paſſion at the liberty I took. Bowing low, I begged her pardon; and ſtooping ſtill lower, in the ſame motion, took up the letter, and whipt it into my boſom.

Pox on me for a puppy, a fool, a blockhead, a clumſy varlet, a mere Jack Belford!—I thought myſelf a much cleverer fellow than I am!—Why could I not have been followed in by Dorcas, who might have taken it up, while I addreſſed her lady?

For here, the letter being unfolded, I could not put it into my boſom, without alarming her ears, as my ſudden motion did her eyes.—Up ſhe flew in a moment: 'Traitor! Judas!' her eyes flaſhing lightening, and a perturbation in her eager countenance, ſo charming! —'What have you taken up?'—And then, what for both my ears I durſt not have done to her, ſhe made no ſcruple to ſeize the ſtolen letter, though in my boſom.

What was to be done on ſo palpable a detection?—I claſped her hand, which had hold of the raviſhed paper, between mine: 'O my beloved creature!' ſaid I, 'can you think I have not ſome curi-'oſity? Is it poſſible you can be thus for 'ever employed; and I, loving narra-'tive letter-writing above every other 'ſpecies of writing, and admiring your 'talent that way, ſhould not (thus upon 'the dawn of my happineſs, as I pre-'ſume to hope) burn with a deſire to 'be admitted into ſo ſweet a correſpon-'dence?'

'Let go my hand!'—ſtamping with her pretty foot: 'how dare you, Sir!— 'At this rate, I ſee—Too plainly I 'ſee—' And more ſhe could not ſay: but, gaſping, was ready to faint with paſſion and affright: the devil a bit of her accuſtomed gentleneſs to be ſeen in her charming face, or to be heard in her muſical voice.

Having gone thus far, loth, very loth was I to loſe my prize—Once more I got hold of the rumpled up letter!—'Impu-'dent man!' were her words: ſtamping again. 'For God's ſake,' then it was. I let go my prize, leſt ſhe ſhould faint away: but had the pleaſure firſt to find my hand within both hers, the trying to open my reluctant fingers. How near was my heart at that moment to my hand, throbbing to my fingers ends, to be thus familiarly, although angrily, treated by the charmer of my ſoul!

When ſhe had got it in her poſſeſſion, ſhe flew to the door. I threw myſelf in her way, ſhut it, and, in the humbleſt manner, beſought her to forgive me. And yet do you think the Harlowe-hearted charmer (notwithſtanding the agreeable annunciation I came in with) would forgive me?—No truly; but puſhing me rudely from the door, as if I had been nothing, [Yet do I love to try, ſo innocently to try, her ſtrength too!] ſhe gaining that force through paſſion, which I had loſt through fear, out ſhe ſhot to her own apartment; [Thank my ſtars ſhe could fly no further!] and as ſoon as ſhe entered it, in a paſſion ſtill, ſhe double-bolted herſelf in. This my comfort, on reflection, that, upon a greater offence, it cannot be worſe.

I retreated to my own apartment, with my heart full: and, my man Will not being near me, gave myſelf a plaguy knock on the forehead with my double fiſt.

And now is my charmer ſhut up from me: refuſing to ſee me; refuſing her meals. She reſolves not to ſee me; that's more:—never again, if ſhe can help it; and in the mind ſhe is in—I hope ſhe has ſaid.

The dear creatures, whenever they quarrel with their humble ſervants, ſhould always remember this ſaving clauſe, that they may not be forſworn.

But thinkeſt thou that I will not make it the ſubject of one of my firſt plots, to inform myſelf of the reaſon why all this commotion was neceſſary on ſo ſlight an occaſion as this would have been, were not the letters that paſs between theſe ladies of a treaſonable nature?

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

No admiſſion to breakfaſt, any more than to ſupper. I wiſh this lady is not a ſimpleton, after all.

I have ſent up in Capt. Mennell's name.

'A meſſage from Capt. Mennell, 'Madam.'

It won't do. She is of baby age. She cannot be—a Solomon, I was going to ſay, in every-thing. Solomon, Jack, was the wiſeſt man. But didſt ever hear who was the wiſeſt woman? I want a compariſon for this lady. Cunning women and witches we read of without number. But I fancy wiſdom never entered into the character of a woman. It is not a requiſite of the ſex. Women, indeed, make better ſovereigns than men: but why is that?—Becauſe the women-ſovereigns are governed by men; the men-ſovereigns by women.—Charming, by my ſoul! For hence we gueſs at the rudder by which both are ſteered.

But to putting wiſdom out of the queſtion, and to take cunning in; that is to ſay, to conſider woman as a woman; what ſhall we do, if this lady has ſomething extraordinary in her head? Repeated charges has ſhe given to Wilſon, by a particular meſſenger, to ſend any letter directed for her the moment it comes.

I muſt keep a good look-out. She is not now afraid of her brother's-plot. I ſhan't be at all ſurprized, if Singleton calls upon Miſs Howe, as the only perſon who knows, or is likely to know, where Miſs Harlowe is; pretending to have affairs of importance, and of particular ſervice to her, if he can but be admitted to her ſpeech—Of compromiſe, who knows, from her brother?

Then will Miſs Howe warn her to keep cloſe. Then will my protection be again neceſſary. This will do, I believe. Any-thing from Miſs Howe muſt.

Joſeph Leman is a vile fellow with her, and my implement. Joſeph, honeſt Joſeph, as I call him, may hang himſelf. I have played him off enough, and have very little farther uſe for him. No need to wear one plot to the ſtumps, when I can find new ones every hour.

Nor blame me for the uſe I make of my talents. Who, that hath ſuch, will let 'em be idle?

Well then, I will find a Singleton; that's all I have to do.

Inſtantly find one!—'Will!'

'Sir.'

'This moment call me hither thy cou-'ſin Paul Wheatly, juſt come from ſea, 'whom thou wert recommending to my 'ſervice, if I were to marry, and keep 'a pleaſure-boat.'

Preſto—Will's gone—Paul will be here preſently. Preſently will he be gone to Mrs. Howe's. If Paul be Singleton's mate, coming from his captain, it will do as well as if it were Singleton himſelf.

Sally, a little devil, often reproaches me with the ſlowneſs of my proceedings. But in a play does not the principal entertainment lie in the firſt four acts? Is not all in a manner over when you come to the fifth? And what a vulture of a man a man muſt he be, who ſowſes upon his prey, and in the ſame moment truſſes and devours?

But to own the truth. I have overplotted myſelf. To make my work ſecure, as I thought, I have frighted the dear creature with the ſight of my four Hottentots, and I ſhall be a long time, I doubt, before I can recover my loſt ground. And then this curſed family at Harlowe Place have made her out of humour with me, with herſelf, and with all the world, but Miſs Howe, who no doubt, is continually adding difficulties to my other difficulties.

I am very unwilling to have recourſe to meaſures which theſe dæmons below are continually urging me to take; becauſe I am ſure, that, at laſt, I ſhall be brought to make her legally mine.

One complete trial over, and I think I will do her noble juſtice.

Well, Paul's gone—Gone already—Has all his leſſons. A notable fellow!—Lord W.'s neceſſary-man was Paul before he went to ſea. A more ſenſible rogue Paul than Joſeph! Not ſuch a pretender to piety neither, as the other. At what a price have I bought that Joſeph! I believe I muſt puniſh the raſcal at laſt: but muſt let him marry firſt: then (though that may be puniſhment enough) I ſhall punith two at once in the man and his wife. And how richly does Betty deſerve puniſhment for her behaviour to my goddeſs?

But now I hear the ruſty hinges of my beloved's door give me creaking invitation. My heart creaks and throbs with reſpondent trepidations: whimſical enough though! For what relation has a lover's heart to a ruſty pair of hinges? but they are the hinges that open and ſhut the door of my beloved's bedchamber. Relation enough in that.

I hear not the door ſhut again. I ſhall receive her commands I hope anon. What ſignifies her keeping me thus at a diſtance? She muſt be mine, let me do or offer what I will. Courage whenever I aſſume, all is over: for ſhould ſhe think of eſcaping from hence, whither can ſhe fly to avoid me? Her parents will not receive her. Her uncles will not entertain her. Her beloved Norton is in their direction, and cannot. Miſs Howe dare not. She has not one friend in town but me—Is entirely a ſtranger to the town. And what then is the matter with me, that I ſhould be thus unaccountably over-awed and tyrannized over by a dear creature who wants only to know how impoſſible it is that ſhe ſhould eſcape me, in order to be as humble to me, as ſhe is to her perſecuting relations!

Should I even make the grand attempt, and fail, and ſhould ſhe hate me for it, her hatred can be but temporary. She has already incurred the cenſure of the world. She muſt therefore chuſe to be mine, for the ſake of ſoldering up her reputation in the eye of that impudent world. For, who that knows me, and knows that ſhe has been in my power, though but for twenty-four hours, will think her ſpotleſs as to fact, let her inclination be what it will? And then human nature is ſuch a well known rogue, that every man and woman judges by what each knows of him or herſelf, that inclination is no more to be truſted, where an opportunity is given, than I am; eſpecially where a woman young and blooming loves a man well enough to go off with him; for ſuch will be the world's conſtruction in the preſent caſe.

She calls her maid Dorcas. No doubt, that I may hear her harmonious voice, and to give me an opportunity to pour out my ſoul at her feet; to renew all my vows; and to receive her pardon for the paſt offence: and then, with what pleaſure ſhall I begin upon a new ſcore, and afterwards wipe out that; and begin another, and another, till the laſt offence paſſes; and there can be no other! And once, after that, to be forgiven, will be to be forgiven for ever.

The door is again ſhut. Dorcas tells me, that her lady denies to admit me to dine with her; a favour I had ordered the wench to beſeech her to grant me, the next time ſhe ſaw her—Not uncivilly, however, denies—Coming to by degrees! Nothing but the laſt offence, the honeſt wench tells me, in the language of her principals below, will do with her. The laſt offence is meditating. Yet this vile recreant heart of mine plays me booty.

But here I conclude; though the tyranneſs leaves me nothing to do, but to read, write, and fret.

Subſcription is formal between us. Beſides, I am ſo much hers, that I cannot ſay how much I am thine or any other perſon's.

LETTER X.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

TUESDAY, MAY 9.

IF, my dear, you approve of the application to my uncle Harlowe, I wiſh with it may be made as ſoon as poſſible. We are quite out again. I have ſhut myſelf up from him. The offence indeed not very great—And yet it is too. He had like to have got a letter. One of yours. But never will I write again, or re-peruſe my papers, in an apartment where he thinks himſelf entitled to come. He did not read a line of it. Indeed he did not. So don't be uneaſy. And depend upon future caution.

Thus it was. The ſun being upon my cloſet, and Mr. Lovelace abroad—

She then gives Miſs Howe an account of his coming by ſurprize upon her: of his fluttering ſpeech; of his bold addreſs; of her ſtruggle with him for the letter, &c.

And now, my dear, proceeds ſhe, I am more and more convinced, that I am too much in his power to make it prudent to ſtay with him. And if my friends will but give me hope, I will reſolve to abandon him for ever.

O my dear! he is a fierce, a fooliſh, an inſolent creature!—And in truth, I hardly expect, that we can accommodate. How much unhappier am I already with him, than my mother ever was with my father after marriage! Since (and that without any reaſon, any pretence in the world for it) he is for breaking my ſpirit before I am his; and while I am, or ought to be [O my folly, that I am not!] in my own power.

Till I can know whether my friends will give me hope or not, I muſt do what I never ſtudied to do before in any caſe; that is, try to keep this difference open: and yet it will make me look little in my own eyes; becauſe I ſhall mean by it more than I can own. But this is one of the conſequences of a ſtep I ſhall ever deplore! The natural fruits of all engagements, where the minds are unpaired—diſ-paired, in my caſe may I ſay.

Let this evermore be my caution to individuals of my ſex—Guard your eye: 'twill ever be in a combination againſt your judgment. If there are two parts to be taken, it will for ever, traitor as it is, take the wrong one.

If you aſk me, my dear, how this caution befits me? let me tell you a ſecret which I have but very lately found out upon ſelf-examination, although you ſeem to have made the diſcovery long ago; that had not my fooliſh eye been too much attached, I had not taken the pains to attempt, ſo officiouſly as I did, the prevention of miſchief between him and ſome of my family, which firſt induced the correſpondence between us, and was the occaſion of bringing the apprehended miſchief with double weight upon myſelf. My vanity and conceit, as far as I know, might have part in the inconſiderate meaſure: for does it not look as if I thought myſelf more capable of obviating difficulties, than any-body elſe of my family?

But you muſt not, my dear, ſuppoſe my heart to be ſtill a confederate with my eye. That deluded eye now clearly ſees it's fault, and the miſled heart deſpiſes it for it. Hence the application I am making to my uncle: hence it is, that I can ſay, (I think truly) that I would atone for my fault at any rate, even by the ſacrifice of a limb or two, if that would do.

Adieu, my deareſt friend!—May your heart never know the hundredth part of the pain mine at preſent feels! prays your CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XI.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

I Will write! No man ſhall write for me. No woman ſhall hinder me from writing. Surely I am of age to diſtinguiſh between reaſon and caprice. I am not writing to a man, am I?—If I were carrying on a correſpondence with a fellow, of whom my mother diſapproved, and whom it might be improper for me to encourage, my own honour and my duty would engage my obedience. But as the caſe is ſo widely different, not a word more on this ſubject, I beſeech you!

I much approve of your reſolution to leave this wretch, if you can make up with your uncle.

I hate the man—Moſt heartily do I hate him, for his teazing ways. The very reading of your account of them teazes me almoſt as much as they can you. May you have encouragement to fly the fooliſh wretch!

I have other reaſons to wiſh you may: for I have juſt made an acquaintance with one who knows a vaſt deal of his private hiſtory. The man is really a villain, my dear! an execrable one! if all be true that I have heard: and yet I am promiſed other particulars. I do aſſure you, my dear friend, that had he a dozen lives, he might have forfeited all, and been dead twenty crimes ago.

If ever you condeſcend to talk familiarly with him again, aſk him after Miſs Betterton, and what became of her. And if he ſhuffle and prevari-cate as to her, queſtion him about Miſs Lockyer.—O my dear, the man's a villain!

I will have your uncle ſounded, as you deſire, and that out of hand. But yet I am afraid of the ſucceſs; and this for ſeveral reaſons. 'Tis hard to ſay what the ſacrifice of your eſtate would do with ſome people: and yet I muſt not, when it comes to the teſt, permit you to make it.

As your Hannah continues ill, I would adviſe you to try to attach Dorcas to your intereſt. Have you not been impolitickly ſhy of her?

I wiſh you could come at ſome of his letters. Surely a man of his negligent character cannot be always guarded. If he be, and if you cannot engage your ſervant, I ſhall ſuſpect them both. Let him be called upon at a ſhort warning when he is writing, or when he has papers lying about, and ſo ſurprize him into negligence.

Such enquiries, I know, are of the ſame nature with thoſe we make at an inn in travelling, when we look into every corner and cloſet for fear of a villain; yet ſhould be frighted out of our wits, were we to find one. But 'tis better to detect ſuch a one when awake and up, than to be attacked by him when in bed and aſleep.

I am glad you have your cloaths. But no money! No books, but a Spira, a Drexelius, and a Practice of Piety! Thoſe who ſent the latter, ought to have kept it for themſelves—But I muſt hurry myſelf from this ſubject.

You have exceedingly alarmed me by what you hint of his attempt to get one of my letters. I am aſſured by my new informant, that he is the head of a gang of wretches, (thoſe he brought you among, no doubt, were ſome of them) who join together to betray innocent creatures, and to ſupport one another afterwards by violence; and were he to come at the knowledge of the freedoms I take with him, I ſhould be afraid to ſtir out without a guard.

I am ſorry to tell you, that I have reaſon to think, that your brother has not laid aſide his fooliſh plot. A ſun-burnt, ſailor-looking fellow was with me juſt now, pretending great ſervice to you from Captain Singleton, could he be admitted to your ſpeech. I pleaded ignorance as to the place of your abode. The fellow was too well inſtructed for me to get any-thing out of him.

I wept for two hours inceſſantly on reading yours, which incloſed that from your couſin Morden. My deareſt creature, do not deſert yourſelf. Let your Anna Howe obey the call of that friendſhip which has united us as one ſoul, and endeavour to give you conſolation.

I wonder not at the melancholy reflections you ſo often caſt upon yourſelf in your letters for the ſtep you have been forced upon on one hand, and tricked into on the other. A ſtrange fatality! As if it were deſigned to ſhew the vanity of all human prudence. I wiſh, my dear, as you hint, that both you and I have not too much prided ourſelves in a perhaps too conſcious ſuperiority over others. But I will ſtop—How apt are weak minds to look out for judgments in any extraordinary event! 'Tis ſo far right that it is better, and ſafer, and juſter, to arraign ourſelves, or our deareſt friends, than Providence; which muſt always have wiſe ends to anſwer in it's diſpenſations.

But do not talk, as in one of your former, of being a warning only—You will be as excellent an example, as ever you hoped to be, as well as a warning: and that will make your ſtory, to all that ſhall come to know it, of double efficacy. For were it that ſuch a merit as yours could not enſure to herſelf noble and generous uſage from a libertine heart, who will expect any tolerable behaviour from men of his character?

If you think yourſelf inexcuſable for taking a ſtep that put you into the way of deluſion, without any intention to go off with him, what muſt thoſe giddy creatures think of themſelves, who, without half your provocations and inducements, and without any regard to decorum, leap walls, drop from windows, and ſteal away from their parents houſe, to the ſeducer's bed, in the ſame day?

Again, if you are ſo ready to accuſe yourſelf for diſpenſing with the prohibitions of the moſt unreaſonable parents, which yet were but half-prohibitions at firſt; what ought thoſe to do, who wilfully ſhut their ears to the advice of the moſt reaſonable; and that, perhaps, where apparent ruin, or undoubted inconvenience, is the conſequence of the predetermined raſhneſs?

And laſtly, to all who will know your ſtory, you will be an excellent example of watchfulneſs, and of that caution and reſerve by which a prudent perſon who has been ſuppoſed to be a little miſled, endeavours to mend her error; and, never once loſing ſight of her duty, does all in her power to recover the path ſhe has been rather driven out of, than choſen to ſwerve from.

Come, come, my deareſt friend, conſider but theſe things; and ſteadily, without deſponding, purſue your earneſt purpoſes to amend what you think has been amiſs; and it may not be a misfortune in the end, that you have erred; eſpecially as ſo little of your will was in your error.

And indeed I muſt ſay that I uſed the words miſled, and error, and ſuch-like, only in compliment to your own too ready ſelf-accuſations, and to the opinion of one to whom I owe duty: for I think in my conſcience, that every part of your conduct is defenſible; and that thoſe only are blameable who have no other way to clear themſelves but by condemning you.

I expect, however, that ſuch melancholy reflections as drop from your pen but too often, will mingle with all your future pleaſures, were you to marry Lovelace, and were he to make the beſt of huſbands.

You was immenſely happy, above the happineſs of a mortal creature, before you knew him: every-body almoſt worſhipped you: envy itſelf, which has of late reared up it's venomous head againſt you, was awed by your ſuperior worthineſs, into ſilence and admiration. You was the ſoul of every company where you viſited. Your elders have I ſeen declining to offer their opinions upon a ſubject till you had delivered yours; often to ſave themſelves the mortification of retracting theirs, when they heard yours. Yet, in all this, your ſweetneſs of manners, your humility and affability, cauſed the ſubſcription every-one made to your ſentiments, and to your ſuperiority, to be equally unfeigned and unheſitating; for they ſaw that their applauſe, and the preference they gave you to themſelves, ſubjected not themſelves to inſults, nor exalted you into any viſible triumph over them; for you had always ſomething to ſay on every point you carried that raiſed the yielding heart, and left every-one pleaſed and ſatisfied with themſelves, though they carried not off the palm.

Your works were ſhewed or referred to wherever fine works were talked of. Nobody had any but an inferior and ſecond-hand praiſe for diligence, for œconomy, for reading, for writing, for memory, for facility in learning every-thing laudable, and even for the more envied graces of perſon and dreſs, and an all-ſurpaſſing elegance in both, where you were known, and thoſe ſubject talked of.

The poor bleſſed you every ſtep you trod: the rich thought you their honour, and took a pride that they were not obliged to deſcend from their own claſs for an example that did credit to it.

Though all men wiſhed for you, and ſought you, young as you were; yet, had not thoſe who were brought to addreſs you, been encouraged out of ſordid and ſpiteful views, not one of them would have dared to lift up his eyes to you.

Thus happy in all about you, thus making happy all within your circle, could you think that nothing would happen to you, to convince you, that you were not to be exempted from the common lot?—To convince you, that you were not abſolutely perfect; and that you muſt not expect to paſs through life without trial, temptation, and misfortune?

Indeed it muſt be owned that no trial, no temptation, worthy of your virtue, and of your prudence, could well have attacked you ſooner, becauſe of your tender years, nor more effectually than thoſe heavy ones, under which you ſtruggle; ſince it muſt be allowed, that your equanimity and foreſight made you ſuperior to common accidents; for are not moſt of the troubles that fall to the lot of common mortals brought upon themſelves either by their too large deſires, or too little deſerts?—Caſes, both, from which you ſtood exempt.—It was therefore to be ſome man, or ſome worſe ſpirit in the ſhape of one, that, formed on purpoſe, was to be ſent to invade you; while as many other ſuch ſpirits as there are perſons in your family, were permitted to take poſſeſſion, ſeverally, in one dark hour, of the heart of every one of it, there to ſit perching, perhaps, and directing every motion to the motions of the ſeducer without, in order to irritate, to provoke, to puſh you forward to meet him.

Upon the whole, there ſeems, as I have often ſaid, to have been a kind of fate in your error, if it were an error; and this perhaps admitted for the ſake of a better example to be collected from your SUFFERINGS, than could have been given, had you never erred: for, my dear, the time of ADVERSITY is your SHINING-TIME. I ſee it evidently, that adverſity muſt call forth graces and beauties which could not have been brought to light in a run of that proſperous fortune, which attended you from your cradle till now; admirably as you became, and as we all thought, greatly as you deſerved that proſperity.

All the matter is, the trial muſt be grievous to you. It is to me: it is to all who love you, and looked upon you as one ſet aloft to be admired and imitated, and not as a mark, as you have lately found, for Envy to ſhoot it's ſhafts at.

Let what I have written above have it's due weight with you, my dear; and then, as warm imaginations are not without a mixture of enthuſiaſm, your Anna Howe, who, on re-peruſal of it, imagines it to be in a ſtyle ſuperior to her uſual ſtyle, will be ready to flatter herſelf that ſhe has been in a manner inſpired with the hints that have comforted and raiſed the dejected heart of her ſuffering friend; who, from ſuch hard trials, in a bloom ſo tender, may find at times her ſpirits ſunk too low to enable her to pervade the ſurrounding darkneſs, which conceals from her the hopeful dawning of the better day which awaits her.

I will add no more at preſent, than that I am your ever-faithful and affectionate

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

FRIDAY, MAY 12.

I Muſt be ſilent, my exalted friend, under praiſes that oppreſs my heart with a conſciouſneſs of not deſerving them; at the ſame time that the generous deſign of thoſe praiſes raiſes and comforts it: for it is a charming thing to ſtand high in the opinion of thoſe we love; and to find that there are ſouls that can carry their friendſhips beyond accidents, beyond body, and ties of blood. Whatever, my deareſt creature, is my ſhining-time, the time of a friend's adverſity is yours. And it would be almoſt a fault in me to regret thoſe afflictions, which give you an opportunity ſo glorioufly to exert thoſe qualities, which not only ennoble our ſex, but dignify human nature.

But let me proceed to ſubjects leſs agreeable.

I am ſorry you have reaſon to think Singleton's projects are not at an end. But who knows what the ſailor had to propoſe?—Yet had any good been intended me, this method would hardly have been fallen upon.

Depend upon it, my dear, your letters ſhall be ſafe.

I have made a handle of Mr. Lovelace's bold attempt and freedom, as I told you I would, to keep him ever ſince at a diſtance, that I may have an opportunity to ſee the ſucceſs of the application to my uncles, and to be at liberty to embrace any favourable overtures that may ariſe from it. Yet he has been very importunate, and twice brought Mr. Mennel from Mrs. Fretchville to talk about the houſe.—If I ſhould be obliged to make up with him again, I ſhall think I am always doing myſelf a ſpite.

As to what you mention of his newly-detected crimes; and your advice to attach Dorcas to my intereſt; and to come at ſome of his letters; theſe things will require more or leſs of my attention, as I may hope favour or not from my uncle Harlowe.

I am ſorry that my poor Hannah continues ill. Pray, my dear, inform yourſelf, and let me know, whether ſhe wants any-thing that befits her caſe.

I will not cloſe this letter till to-morrow is over; for I am reſolved to go to church; and this as well for the ſake of my duty, as to ſee, if I am at liberty to go out when I pleaſe without being attended or accompanied.

SUNDAY, MAY 14.

I HAVE not been able to avoid a ſhort debate with Mr. Lovelace. I had ordered a coach to the door. When I had notice that it was come, I went out of my chamber to go to it; but met him dreſſed on the ſtairs-head with a book in his hand, but without his hat and ſword. He aſked with an air very ſolemn, yet reſpectful, if I were going abroad. I told him, I was. He deſired leave to attend me, if I were going to church. I refuſed him. And then he complained heavily of my treatment of him; and declared, that he would not live ſuch another week as the paſt, for the world.

I owned to him very frankly, that I had made an application to my friends; and that I was reſolved to keep myſelf to myſelf till I knew the iſſue of it.

He coloured, and ſeemed ſurprized. But checking himſelf in ſomething he was going to ſay, he pleaded my danger from Singleton, and again deſired to attend me.

And then he told me, that Mrs. Fretchville

Fretchville had desired to continue a fortnight longer in the house. 'She 'found,' said he, 'that I was unable 'to determine about entering upon it; 'and now who knows when such a va- 'pourish creature will come to a reso- 'lution? This, Madam, has been an un- 'happy week; for had I not stood upon 'such bad terms with you, you might have 'been mistress of that house; and probably 'had my cousin Montague, if not Lady 'Betty, actually with you.'

'And so, Sir, taking all you say for 'granted, your cousin Montague can- 'not come to Mrs. Sinclair's? What, 'pray, is her objection to Mrs. Sin- 'clairs? Is this house fit for me to live 'in a month or two, and not fit for any 'of your relations for a few days?—And 'Mrs Fretchville has taken more time too!' —Then, pushing by him, I hurried down stairs.

He called to Dorcas to bring him his sword and hat; and following me down into the passage, placed himself between me and the door; and again desired leave to attend me.

Mrs. Sinclair came out at that instant, and asked me, if I did not chuse a dish of chocolate?

'I wish, Mrs. Sinclair,' said I, 'you 'would take this man in with you to 'your chocolate. I don't know whe- 'ther I am at liberty to stir out without 'his leave or not.'

Then turning to him, I asked, If he kept me there his prisoner?

Dorcas just then bringing him his sword and hat, he opened the street-door, and taking my reluctant hand, led me, in a very obsequious manner, to the coach. People passing by, stopt, stared, and whispered—But he is so graceful in his person and dress, that he generally takes every eye.

I was uneasy to be so gazed at; and he stepped in after me, and the coach-man drove to St. Paul's.

He was very full of assiduities all the way; while I was as reserved as possible: and when I returned, dined, as I had done the greatest part of the week, by myself.

He told me, upon my resolving to do so, that although he would continue his passive observance till I knew the issue of my application; yet I must expect, that then I should not rest one moment till I had fixed his happy day: for that his very soul was fretted with my slights, resentments, and delays.

A wretch! when I can say, to my infinite regret, on a double account, that all he complains of is owing to himself!

O that I may have good tidings from my uncle!

Adieu, my dearest friend!—This shall lie ready for an exchange, (as I hope for one to-morrow from you) that will decide, as I may say, the destiny of your

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XIII.

MISS HOWE, TO MRS. JUDITH NORTON.

THURSDAY, MAY 11.

GOOD MRS. NORTON,

CANNOT you, without naming me as an adviser, who am hated by the family, contrive a way to let Mrs. Harlowe know, that in an accidental conversation with me, you had been assured, that my beloved friend pines after a reconciliation with her relations? That she has hitherto, in hopes of it, refused to enter into any obligation that shall be in the least an hindrance to it: that she would fain avoid giving Mr. Lovelace a right to make her family uneasy in relation to her grandfather's estate: that all she wishes for still is to be indulged in her choice of a single life, and, on that condition, would make her father's pleasure hers with regard to that estate: that Mr. Lovelace is continually pressing her to marry him; and all his friends likewise: but that I am sure, she has so little liking to the man, because of his faulty morals, and of the antipathy of her relations to him, that if she had any hope given her of a reconciliation, she would forego all thoughts of him, and put herself into her father's protection. But that their resolution must be speedy; for otherwise she would find herself obliged to give way to his pressing entreaties; and it might then be out of her power to prevent disagreeable litigations.

I do assure you, Mrs. Norton, upon my honour, that our dearest friend knows nothing of this procedure of mine: and therefore it is proper to acquaint you, in confidence, with my grounds for it. —These are they.

She had desired me to let Mr. Hickman drop hints to the above effect to her uncle Harlowe; but indirectly as from himself, lest, if the application should not be attended with success, and Mr. Lovelace, (who already takes it ill, that he has so little of her favour) come to know it, she may be deprived of every protection, and be perhaps subjected to great inconveniences from so haughty a spirit.

Having this authority from her, and being being very ſolicitous about the ſucceſs of the application, I thought, that if the weight of ſo good a wife, mother, and ſiſter, as Mrs. Harlowe is known to be, were thrown into the ſame ſcale with that of Mr. John Harlowe, (ſuppoſing he could be engaged) it could hardly fail of making a due impreſſion.

Mr. Hickman will ſee Mr. John Harlowe to-morrow: by that time you may ſee Mrs. Harlowe. If Mr. Hickman finds the old gentleman favourable, he will tell him, that you will have ſeen Mrs. Harlowe upon the ſame account; and will adviſe him to join in conſultation with her how beſt to proceed to melt the moſt obdurate hearts in the world.

This is the fair ſtate of the matter, and my true motive for writing to you. I leave all therefore to your diſcretion; and moſt heartily wiſh ſucceſs to it; being of opinion that Mr. Lovelace cannot poſſibly deſerve our admirable friend: nor indeed know I the man who does.

Pray acquaint me by a line of the reſult of your interpoſition. If it prove not ſuch as may be reaſonably hoped for, our dear friend ſhall know nothing of this ſtep from me; and pray let her not from you. For, in that caſe, it would only give deeper grief to a heart already too much afflicted. I am, dear and worthy Mrs. Norton, your true friend,

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XIV.

MRS. NORTON, TO MISS HOWE.

SATURDAY, MAY 13.

DEAR MADAM,

MY heart is almoſt broken to be obliged to let you know, that ſuch is the ſituation of things in the family of my ever-dear Miſs Harlowe, that there can be at preſent no ſucceſs expected from any application in her favour. Her poor mother is to be pitied. I have a moſt affecting letter from her; but muſt not communicate it to you; and ſhe forbids me to let it be known that ſhe writes upon the ſubject; although ſhe is compelled, as it were, to do it, for the eaſe of her own heart. I mention it therefore in confidence.

I hope in God that my beloved young lady has preſerved her honour inviolate. I hope there is not a man breathing, who could attempt a ſacrilege ſo deteſtable. I have no apprehenſion of a failure in a virtue ſo eſtabliſhed. God for ever keep ſo pure a heart out of the reach of ſurprizes and violence! Eaſe, dear Madam, I beſeech you, my over-anxious heart, by one line, by the bearer, although but by one line, to acquaint me, (as ſurely you can) that her honour is unſullied.—If it be not, adieu to all the comforts this life can give: ſince none will it be able to afford to the poor

JUDITH NORTON.

LETTER XV.

MISS HOWE, TO MRS. JUDITH NORTON.

SATURDAY EVENING, MAY 13.

DEAR GOOD WOMAN,

YOUR beloved's honour is inviolate! —Muſt be inviolate! And will be ſo, in ſpite of men and devils. Could I have had hope of a reconciliation, all my view was, that ſhe ſhould not have had this man.—All that can be ſaid now, is, ſhe muſt run the riſque of a bad huſband: ſhe, of whom no man living is worthy!

You pity her mother—So do not I! I pity no mother, that puts it out of her power to ſhew maternal love, and humanity, in order to patch up for herſelf a precarious and ſorry quiet, which every blaſt of wind ſhall diſturb.

I hate tyrants in every form and ſhape: but paternal and maternal tyrants are the worſt of all; for they can have no bowels.

I repeat, that I pity none of them. Our beloved friend only deſerves pity. She had never been in the hands of this man, but for them. She is quite blameleſs. You don't know all her ſtory. Were I to tell you that ſhe had no intention to go off with this man, it would avail her nothing. It would only ſerve to condemn, with thoſe who drove her to extremities, him, who now muſt be her refuge. I am your ſincere friend and ſervant,

ANNA HOWE.

LETTER XVI.

MRS. HARLOWE TO MRS. NORTON.

[NOT COMMUNICATED TILL THE LETTERS CAME TO BE COLLECTED.]

SATURDAY, MAY 13.

I Return an anſwer in writing, as I promiſed, to your communication. But take no notice either to my Bella's Betty, (who I underſtand ſometimes viſits you) or to the poor wretch herſelf, nor to any-body, that I do write. I charge you don't. My heart is full: writing may give ſome vent to my griefs, and perhaps I may write what lies moſt upon my heart, without confining myſelf ſtrictly to the preſent ſubject.

You

You know how dear this ungrateful creature was to us all. You know how ſincerely we joined with every one of thoſe who ever had ſeen her, or converſed with her, to praiſe and admire her; and exceeded in our praiſe even the bounds of that modeſty, which, becauſe ſhe was our own, ſhould have reſtrained us; being of opinion, that to have been ſilent in the praiſe of ſo apparent a merit, muſt rather have argued blindneſs or affectation in us, than that we ſhould incur the cenſure of vain partiality to our own.

When, therefore, any body congratulated us on ſuch a daughter, we received their congratulations without any diminution. If it was ſaid, 'You are 'happy in this child,' we owned, that no parents ever were happier in a child. If more particularly, they praiſed her dutiful behaviour to us, we ſaid, She knew not how to offend. If it was ſaid, 'Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe has a wit and pe'netration beyond her years;' we, inſtead of diſallowing it, would add—'And a judgment no leſs extraordinary 'than her wit.' If her prudence was praiſed, and a forethought, which everyone ſaw ſupplied what only years and experience gave to others; 'Nobody need 'to ſcruple taking leſſons from Clariſſa 'Harlowe,' was our proud anſwer.

Forgive me, O forgive me, my dear Norton—But I know you will; for yours, when good, was this child, and your glory as well as mine.

But have you not heard ſtrangers, as ſhe paſſed to and from church, ſtop to praiſe the angel of a creature, as they called her; when it was enough for thoſe who knew who ſhe was to cry, 'Why, 'it is Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe!'—As if every-body were obliged to know, or to have heard of Clariſſa Harlowe, and of her excellences. While, accuſtomed to praiſe, it was too familiar to her to cauſe her to alter either her look or her pace.

For my own part, I could not ſtifle a pleaſure, that had perhaps a faulty vanity for it's foundation, whenever I was ſpoken of, or addreſſed to, as the mother of ſo ſweet a child: Mr. Harlowe and I, all the time, loving each other the better for the ſhare each had in ſuch a daughter.

Still, ſtill indulge the fond, the overflowing heart of a mother! I could dwell for ever upon the remembrance of what ſhe was, would but that remembrance baniſh from my mind what ſhe is!

In her boſom, young as ſhe was, could I repoſe all my griefs—Sure of receiving from her prudence advice as well as comfort; and both inſinuated in ſo humble, in ſo dutiful a manner, that it was impoſſible to take thoſe exceptions which the diſtance of years and character between a mother and a daughter would have made one apprehenſive of from any other daughter. She was our glory when abroad, our delight when at home. Every body was even covetous of her company; and we grudged her to our brothers Harlowe, and to our ſiſter and brother Hervey. No other contention among us, then, but who ſhould be next favoured by her. No chiding ever knew ſhe from us, but the chiding of lovers, when ſhe was for ſhutting herſelf up too long together from us, in purſuit of thoſe charming amuſements and uſeful employments for which however the whole family was the better.

Our other children had reaſon (good children as they always were) to think themſelves neglected. But they likewiſe were ſo ſenſible of their ſiſter's ſuperiority, and of the honour ſhe reflected upon the whole family, that they confeſſed themſelves eclipſed, without envying the eclipſer. Indeed there was not any-body ſo equal with her, in their own opinions, as to envy what all aſpired but to emulate. The dear creature, you know, my Norton, gave an eminence to us all!

Then her acquirements. Her ſkill in muſick, her fine needleworks, her elegance in dreſs; for which ſhe was ſo much admired, that the neighbouring ladies uſed to ſay, that they need not fetch faſhions from London; ſince whatever Miſs Clariſſa Harlowe wore, was the beſt faſhion, becauſe her choice of natural beauties ſet thoſe of art far behind them. Her genteel eaſe, and fine turn of perſon; her deep reading, and theſe joined to her open manners, and her cheerful modeſty—O my good Norton, what a ſweet child was once my Clary Harlowe!

This, and more, you knew her to be: for many of her excellences were owing to yourſelf; and with the milk you gave her, you gave her what no other nurſe in the world could give her.

And do you think, my worthy woman, do you think, that the wilful lapſe of ſuch a child is to be forgiven? Can ſhe herſelf think, that ſhe deſerves not the ſevereſt puniſhment for the abuſe of ſuch talents as were entruſted to her?

Her fault was a fault of premeditation, of cunning, of contrivance. She has deceived every-body's expectations. Her whole whole ſex, as well as the family ſhe ſprung from, is diſgraced by it.

Would any-body ever have believed, that ſuch a young creature as this, who had by her advice ſaved even her overlively friend from marrying a fop, and a libertine, would herſelf have gone off with one of the vileſt and moſt notorious of libertines? A man whoſe character ſhe knew; and knew it to be worſe than the character of him from whom ſhe ſaved her friend; and againſt whom ſhe was warned: one who had had her brother's life in his hands; and who conſtantly ſet our whole family at defiance.

Think for me, my good Norton: think what my unhappineſs muſt be, both as a wife and a mother. What reſtleſs days, what ſleepleſs nights; yet my own rankling anguiſh endeavoured to be ſmoothed over, to ſoften the anguiſh of fiercer ſpirits, and to keep them from blazing out to further miſchief! O this naughty, naughty girl! who knew ſo well what ſhe did; and who could look ſo far into the conſequences, that we thought ſhe would have died, rather than have done as ſhe has done!

Her known character for prudence leaves her abſolutely without excuſe. How then can I offer to plead for her. if, through motherly indulgence, I would forgive her myſelf?—And have we not, moreover, ſuffered all the diſgrace that can befal us? Has not ſhe?

If now ſhe has ſo little liking to his morals, had ſhe not reaſon before to have as little? Or has ſhe ſuffered by them in her own perſon?—O my good woman! I doubt—I doubt—Will not the character of the man make one doubt an angel, if once in his power? The world will think the worſt. I am told it does. So likewiſe her father fears; her brother hears; and what can I do?

Our antipathy to him ſhe knew before, as well as his character. Theſe, therefore, cannot be new motives without a new reaſon.—O my dear Mrs. Norton, how ſhall I, how can you, ſupport ourſelves under the apprehenſions to which theſe thoughts lead?

He continually preſſing her, you ſay, to marry him; his friends likewiſe. She has reaſon, no doubt ſhe has reaſon, for this application to us: and her crime is gloſſed over, to bring her to us with new diſgrace! Whither, whither does one guilty ſtep lead the miſguided heart!—And now, truly, to have a ſtubborn ſpirit, we are only to be ſounded, that the application may be occaſionally retracted or denied!

Upon the whole: were I inclined to plead for her, it is now the moſt improper of all times. Now that my brother Harlowe has diſcouraged (as he laſt night came hither on purpoſe to tell us) Mr. Hickman's inſinuated application; and been applauded for it. Now, that my brother Antony is intending to carry his great fortune, through her fault, into another family—She expecting, no doubt, herſelf to be put into her grandfather's eſtate, in conſequence of a reconciliation, and as a reward for her fault: and inſiſting ſtill upon the ſame terms which ſhe offered before, and which were rejected—Not through my fault, I am ſure, rejected!

From all theſe things, you will return ſuch an anſwer as the caſe requires. It might coſt me the peace of my whole life, at this time, to move for her. God forgive her! If I do, nobody elſe will. And let it, for your own ſake, as well as mine, be a ſecret that you and I have entered upon this ſubject. And I deſire you not to touch upon it again but by particular permiſſion: for, O my dear good woman, it ſets my heart a bleeding in as many ſtreams as there are veins in it!

Yet think me not impenetrable by a proper contrition and remorſe—But what a torment is it to have a will without a power!

Adieu! adieu! God give us both comfort: and to the once dear—the ever-dear creature, (for can a mother forget her child?) repentance, deep repentance! And as little ſuffering as may befit his bleſſed will, and her grievous fault, prays your real friend,

CHARLOTTE HARLOWE.

LETTER XVII.

MISS HOWE, TO MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE.

SUNDAY, MAY 14.

HOW it is now, my dear, between you and Mr. Lovelace, I cannot tell. But wicked as the man is, I am afraid he muſt be your lord and maſter.

I called him by ſeveral very hard names in my laſt. I had but juſt heard of ſome of his vileneſſes, when I ſat down to write; ſo my indignation was raiſed. But on enquiry, and recollection, I find that the facts laid to his charge were all of them committed ſome time ago—not ſince he has had ſtrong hopes of your favour.

This is ſaying ſomething for him. His generous behaviour to the innkeeper's daughter, is a more recent inſtance ſtance to his credit; to ſay nothing of the univerſal good character he has as a kind landlord. And then I approve much of the motion he made to put you in poſſeſſion of Mrs. Frentchville's houſe, while he continues at the other widow's, till you agree that one houſe ſhould hold you. I wiſh this were done. Be ſure you embrace this offer, (if you do not ſoon meet at the altar) and get one of his couſins with you.

Were you once married, I ſhould think you cannot be very unhappy, though you may not be ſo happy with him as you deſerve to be. The ſtake he has in his country, and his reverſions; the care he takes of his affairs, his freedom from obligation; nay, his pride with your merit, muſt be a tolerable ſecurity for you, I ſhould think. Though particulars of his wickedneſs, as they come to my knowledge, hurt and incenſe me; yet, after all, when I give myſelf time to reflect, all that I have heard of him to his advantage was comprehended in the general character given of him long ago, by Lord M.'s and his own diſmiſſed bailiff, and which was confirmed to me by Mrs. Forteſcue, as I heretofore told you, and to you by Mrs. Greme.

You can have nothing, therefore, I think, to be deeply concerned about, but his future good, and the bad example he may hereafter ſet to his own family. Theſe, indeed, are very juſt concerns: but were you to leave him now, either with or without his conſent, his fortune and alliances ſo conſiderable, his perſon and addreſs ſo engaging, (every-one excuſing you now on thoſe accounts, and becauſe of your relations follies) it would have a very ill appearance for your reputation. I cannot, therefore, on the moſt deliberate conſideration, adviſe you to think of that, while you have no reaſon to doubt his honour. May eternal vengeance purſue the villain, if he give room for an apprehenſion of this nature!

Yet his teazing ways are intolerable: his acquieſcence with your ſlight delays, and his reſignation to the diſtance you now keep him at, (for a fault ſo much ſlighter as he muſt think, than the puniſhment) are unaccountable: he doubts your love of him, that is very probable; but you have reaſon to be ſurprized at his want of ardour; a bleſſing ſo great within his reach, as I may ſay.

By the time you have read to this place, you will have no doubt of what has been the iſſue of the conference between the two gentlemen. I am equally ſhocked, and enraged againſt them all. Againſt them all, I ſay; for I have tried your good Norton's weight with your mother, (though at firſt I did not intend to tell you ſo) to the ſame purpoſe as the gentleman ſounded your uncle. Never were there ſuch determined brutes in the world! Why ſhould I mince the matter? Yet would I fain, methinks, make an exception for your mother.

Your uncle will have it, that you are ruined. He can believe every-thing bad of a creature, he ſays, who could run away with a man; with ſuch a one eſpecially as Lovelace. They expected applications from you, when ſome heavy diſtreſs had fallen upon you. But they are all reſolved not to ſtir an inch in your favour; no, not to ſave your life!

My deareſt ſoul, reſolve to aſſert your right. Claim your own, and go and live upon it, as you ought. Then, if you marry not, how will the wretches creep to you, for your reverſionary diſpoſitions!

You were accuſed (as in your aunt's letter) of premeditation and contrivance in your eſcape. Inſtead of pitying you, the mediating perſon was called upon to pity them; who once, your uncle ſaid, doated upon you: who took no joy but in your preſence: who devoured your words as you ſpoke them: who trod over again your footſteps, as you walked before them.—And I know not what of this ſort.

Upon the whole, it is now evident to me, and ſo it muſt be to you, when you read this letter, that you muſt be his. And the ſooner you are ſo, the better. Shall we ſuppoſe that marriage is not in your power?—I cannot have patience to ſuppoſe that.

I am concerned, methinks, to know how you will do to condeſcend, (now you ſee you muſt be his) after you have kept him at ſuch a diſtance; and for the revenge his pride may put him upon taking for it. But let me tell you, that if my going up, and ſharing fortunes with you, will prevent ſuch a noble creature from ſtooping too low; much more, were it likely to prevent your ruin; I would not heſitate a moment about it. What is the whole world to me, weighed againſt ſuch a friend as you are? Think you, that any of the enjoyments of this life could be enjoyments to me, were you involved in calamities, from which I could either alleviate or relieve you, by giving up thoſe enjoyments? And what in ſaying this, and acting up to it, do I offer you, but the fruits of a friendſhip your worth has created?

Excuſe my warmth of expreſſion. The warmth of my heart wants none. I am enraged at your relations; for, bad as what I have mentioned is, I have not told you all; nor now, perhaps, ever will. I am angry at my own mother's narrowneſs of mind, and at her indiſcriminate adherence to old notions. And I am exaſperated againſt your fooliſh, your low-vanity'd Lovelace. But let us ſtoop to take the wretch as he is, and make the beſt of him, ſince you are deſtined to ſtoop, to keep grovellers and worldlings in countenance. He has not been guilty of direct indecency to you. Nor dare he—Not ſo much of a devil as that comes to neither. Had he ſuch villainous intentions, ſo much in his power as you are, they would have ſhewn themſelves before now to ſuch a penetrating and vigilant eye, and to ſuch a pure heart as yours. Let us ſave the wretch then, if we can, though we ſoil our fingers in lifting him up from his dirt.

There is yet, to a perſon of your fortune and independence, a good deal to do, if you enter upon thoſe terms which ought to be entered upon. I don't find, that he has once talked of ſettlements; nor yet of the licence. A fooliſh wretch! —But as your evil deſtiny has thrown you out of all other protection and mediation, you muſt be father, mother, uncle, to yourſelf; and enter upon the requiſite points for yourſelf. It is hard upon you; but indeed you muſt. Your ſituation requires it. What room for delicacy now?—Or would you have me write to him? Yet that would be the ſame thing, as if you were to write yourſelf. Yet write you ſhould, I think, if you cannot ſpeak. But ſpeaking is certainly beſt: for words leave no traces; they paſs as breath; and mingle with air; and may be explained with latitude. But the pen is a witneſs on record.

I know the gentleneſs of your ſpirit; I know the laudable pride of your heart; and the juſt notion you have of the dignity of our ſex, in theſe delicate points. But once more, all this is nothing now: your honour is concerned that the dignity I ſpeak of, ſhould not be ſtood upon.

'Mr. Lovelace,' would I ſay; yet hate the fooliſh fellow for his low, his ſtupid pride, in wiſhing to triumph over the dignity of his own wife—'I am by 'your means deprived of every friend I 'have in the world. In what light am I 'to look upon you? I have well conſider-'ed every-thing. You have made ſome 'people, much againſt my liking, think 'me a wife: others know I am not mar-'ried; nor do I deſire any-body ſhould 'believe I am. Do you think your being 'here in the ſame houſe with me can be 'to my reputation? You talked to me 'of Mrs. Fretchville's houſe.'—This will bring him to renew his laſt diſcourſe on that ſubject, if he does not revive it of himſelf.—'If Mrs. Fretchville knows 'not her own mind, what is her houſe 'to me? You talked of bringing up your 'couſin Montague to bear me company: 'if my brother's ſchemes be your pre-'tence for not going yourſelf to fetch her, 'you can write to her. I inſiſt upon 'bringing theſe two points to an iſſue: 'off or on, ought to be indifferent to 'me, if ſo to them.'

Such a declaration muſt bring all forward. There are twenty ways, my dear, that you would find out for another in your circumſtances. He will diſdain, from his native inſolence, to have it thought he has any-body to conſult. Well, then, will he not be obliged to declare himſelf? And if he does, no delays on your ſide, I beſeech you. Give him the day. Let it be a ſhort one. It would be derogating from your own merit, and honour too, let me tell you, even although he ſhould not be ſo explicit as he ought to be, to ſeem but to doubt his meaning; and to wait for that explanation for which I ſhould for ever deſpiſe him, if he makes it neceſſary. Twice already have you, my dear, if not oftener, modeſty'd away ſuch opportunities as you ought not to have ſlipt. As to ſettlements, if they come not in naturally, e'en leave them to his own juſtice, and to the juſtice of his family. And there's an end of the matter.

This is my advice: mend it as circumſtances offer, and follow your own. But, indeed, my dear, this, or ſomething like it, would I do. And let him tell me afterwards, if he dared or would, that he humbled down to his ſhoe-buckles the perſon it would have been his glory to exalt.

Support yourſelf, mean time, with reflections worthy of yourſelf. Though tricked into this man's power, you are not meanly ſubjugated to it. All his reverence you command, or rather, as I may ſay, inſpire; ſince it was never known, that he had any reverence for aught that was good, till you was with him: and he profeſſes now-and-then to be ſo awed and charmed by your example, as that the force of it ſhall reclaim him.

I believe you will have a difficult taſk to keep him to it: but the more will be your honour, if you effect his reformation: and it is my belief, that if you can reclaim this great, this ſpecious deceiver, who has, morally ſpeaking, ſuch a number of years before him, you will ſave from ruin a multitude of innocents; for thoſe ſeem to me to have been the prey for which he has ſpread his wicked ſnares. And who knows but, for this very purpoſe, principally, a perſon may have been permitted to ſwerve, whoſe heart or will never was in her error, and who has ſo much remorſe upon her for having, as ſhe thinks, erred at all?—Adieu, my deareſt friend.

ANNA HOWE.

INCLOSED IN THE ABOVE.

I MUST trouble you with my concerns, though your own are ſo heavy upon you. A piece of news I have to tell you. Your uncle Antony is diſpoſed to marry. With whom, think you? With my mother. True, indeed. Your family know it. All is laid with redoubled malice at your door. And there the old ſoul himſelf lays it.

Take no notice of this intelligence, not ſo much as in your letters to me, for fear of accidents.

I think it can't do. But were I to provoke my mother, that might afford a pretence. Elſe, I ſhould have been with you before now, I fancy.

The firſt likelihood that appears to me of encouragement, I diſmiſs Hickman, that's certain. If my mother diſoblige me in ſo important an article, I ſhan't think of obliging her in ſuch another. It is impoſſible, ſurely, that the deſire of popping me off to that honeſt man can be with ſuch a view.

I repeat, that it cannot come to anything. But theſe widows—Then ſuch a love in us all, both old and young, of being courted and admired!—And ſo irreſiſtible to their elderſhips to be flattered, that all power is not over with them; but that they may ſtill claſs and prank it with their daughters.—It vexed me heartily to have her tell me of this propoſal with ſelf-complaiſant ſimperings; and yet ſhe affected to ſpeak of it, as if ſhe had no intention to encourage it.

Theſe antiquated batchelors (old before they believe themſelves to be ſo) imagine, that when they have once perſuaded themſelves to think of the ſtate, they have nothing more to do than to make their minds known to the woman.

Your uncle's overgrown fortune is, indeed, a bait; a tempting one. A ſaucy daughter to be got rid of! The memory of the father of that daughter not precious enough to weigh much!—But let him advance if he dare—Let her encourage—But I hope ſhe won't.

Excuſe me, my dear. I am nettled. They have fearfully rumpled my gorget. You'll think me faulty. So I won't put my name to this ſeparate paper. Other hands may reſemble mine. You did not ſee me write it.

LETTER XVIII.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

MONDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 15.

NOW, indeed, it is evident, my beſt, my only friend, that I have but one choice to make. And now I do find, that I have carried my reſentment againſt this man too far; ſince now I am to appear as if under an obligation to his patience with me for a conduct, which perhaps he will think (if not humourſome and childiſh) plainly demonſtrative of my little eſteem of him; but a ſecondary eſteem at leaſt, where before, his pride rather than his merit, had made him expect a firſt. O my dear! to be caſt upon a man, that is not a generous man; that is, indeed, a cruel man! A man that is capable of creating a diſtreſs to a young creature, who by her evil deſtiny is thrown into his power; and then of enjoying it, as I may ſay! [I verily think I may ſay ſo of this ſavage!]—What a fate is mine!

You give me, my dear, good advice, as to the peremptory manner in which I ought to treat him: but do you conſider to whom it is that you give it?—And then ſhould I take it, and ſhould he be capable of delay, I unprotected, deſolate, nobody to fly to, in what a wretched light muſt I ſtand in his eyes; and, what is ſtill as bad, in my own! O my dear, ſee you not, as I do, that the occaſion for this my indelicate, my ſhocking ſituation, ſhould never have been given by me, of all creatures; ſince I am unequal to the circumſtances to which my inconſideration has reduced me!—What, I to challenge a man for a huſband!—I to exert myſelf to quicken the delayer in his reſolutions! And having, as you think, loſt an opportunity, to begin to try to recal recal it, as from myſelf, and for myſelf! To threaten him, as I may ſay, into the marriage-ſtate!—O my dear! if this be right to be done, how difficult is it, where modeſty and ſelf (or where pride, if you pleaſe) is concerned, to do that right? Or, to expreſs myſelf in your words, to be father, mother, uncle, to myſelf!—Eſpecially where one thinks a triumph over one is intended.

You ſay, you have tried Mrs. Norton's weight with my mother—Bad as the returns are which my application by Mr. Hickman has met with, you tell me, That you have not acquainted me with all the bad, nor now, perhaps, ever will. But why ſo, my dear? What is the bad, what can be the bad, which now you will never tell me of?—What worſe, than renounce me! and for ever! My uncle, you ſay, believes me ruined: he declares, that he can believe every-thing bad of a creature who could run away with a man: and they have all made a reſolution, not to ſtir an inch in my favour; no, not to ſave my life.—Have you worſe than this, my dear, behind?—Surely my father has not renewed his dreadful malediction!—Surely, if ſo, my mother has not joined in it! Have my uncles given it their ſanction, and made it a family-act? And themſelves thereby more really faulty, than even THEY ſuppoſe me to be, though I the cauſe of that greater fault in them?—What, my dear, is this worſt, that you will leave for ever unrevealed?

O Lovelace! why comeſt thou not juſt now, while theſe black proſpects are before me? For now, couldſt thou look into my heart, wouldſt thou ſee a diſtreſs worthy of thy barbarous triumph!

I WAS forced to quit my pen. And you ſay you have tried Mrs. Norton's weight with my mother?

What is done cannot be remedied. but I wiſh you had not taken a ſtep of this importance to me without firſt conſulting me. Forgive me, my dear, but I muſt tell you that that high-ſouled and noble friendſhip which you have ever avowed with ſo obliging and ſo uncommon a warmth, although it has been always the ſubject of my grateful admiration, has been often the ground of my apprehenſion, becauſe of it's unbridled fervour.

Well, but now to look forward, you are of opinion that I muſt be his: and that I cannot leave him with reputation to myſelf, whether with or without his conſent. I muſt, if ſo, make the beſt of the bad matter.

He went out in the morning; intending not to return to dinner, unleſs (as he ſent me word) I would admit him to dine with me.

I excuſed myſelf. The man, whoſe anger is now to be of ſuch high importance to me, was, it ſeems, diſpleaſed.

As he (as well as I) expected, that I ſhould receive a letter from you this day by Collins, I ſuppoſe he will not be long before he returns; and then, poſſibly, he is to be mighty ſtately, mighty mannish, mighty coy, if you pleaſe! And then muſt I be very humble, very ſubmiſſive, and try to inſinuate myſelf into his good graces: with downcaſt eye, if not by ſpeech, beg his forgiveneſs for the diſtance I have ſo perverſely kept him at!—Yes, I warrant!—But I ſhall ſee how this behaviour will fit upon me!—You have always rallied me upon my meekneſs, I think: well, then, I will try, if I can be ſtill meeker, ſhall I!—O my dear!

But let me ſit with my hands before me, all patience, all reſignation; for I think I hear him coming up. Or ſhall I roundly accoſt him, in the words, in the form, which you, my dear, preſcribed?

He is come in. He has ſent to me, all impatience, as Dorcas ſays, by his aſpect.—But I cannot, cannot ſee him!

MONDAY NIGHT.

THE contents of your letter, and my own heavy reflections, rendered me incapable of ſeeing this expecting man. The firſt word he aſked Dorcas, was, If I had received a letter ſince he had been out? She told me this; and her anſwer, that I had; and was faſting, and had been in tears ever ſince.

He ſent to deſire an interview with me.

I anſwered by her, That I was not very well. In the morning, if better, I would ſee him as ſoon as he pleaſed.

Very humble! was it not, my dear? Yet he was too royal to take it for humility; for Dorcas told me, he rubbed one ſide of his face impatiently; and ſaid a raſh word, and was out of humour; ſtalking about the room.

Half an hour after, he ſent again; deſiring very earneſtly, that I would admit him to ſupper with me. He would enter upon no ſubjects of converſation, but what I ſhould lead to.

So I ſhould have been at liberty, you ſee, to court him!

I again

I again desired to be excused.

Indeed, my dear, my eyes were swelled: I was very low-spirited; and could not think of entering all at once, after the distance I had kept him at for several days, into the freedom of conversation which the utter rejection I have met with from my relations, as well as your advice, has made necessary.

He sent up to tell me, that as he heard I was fasting, if I would promise to eat some chicken which Mrs. Sinclair had ordered for supper, he would acquiesce —Very kind in his anger! Is he not?

I promised that I would. Can I be more preparatively condescending?—How happy, I'll warrant, if I may meet him in a kind and forgiving humour!

I hate myself! But I won't be insulted. Indeed I won't for all this.

LETTER XIX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

TUESDAY, MAY 16.

I Think once more, we seem to be in a kind of train; but through a storm. I will give you the particulars.

I heard him in the dining-room at five in the morning. I had rested very ill, and was up too. But opened not my door till six: when Dorcas brought me his request for my company.

He approached me, and taking my hand, as I entered the dining-room, 'I 'went not to bed, Madam, till two,' said he; 'yet slept not a wink. For God's 'sake, torment me not, as you have 'done for a week past.'

He paused. I was silent.

'At first,' proceeded he, 'I thought 'your resentment of a curiosity, in 'which I had been disappointed, could 'not be deep; and that it would go off 'of itself: but when I found, it was to 'be kept up till you knew the success of 'some new overtures which you had 'made, and which, complied with, 'might have deprived me of you for 'ever; how, Madam, could I support 'myself under the thoughts of having, 'with such an union of interests, made 'so little impression upon your mind in 'my favour?'

He paused again. I was still silent. He went on.

'I acknowledge that I have a proud 'heart, Madam. I cannot but hope for 'some instances of previous and pre-'ferable favour, from the lady I am 'ambitious to call mine; and that her 'choice of me should not appear, not 'flagrantly appear, directly by the per-'verseness of her selfish persecutors, who 'are my irreconcileable enemies.'

More to the same purpose he said. You know, my dear, the room he had given me to recriminate upon him in twenty instances. I did not spare him.

'Every one of these instances,' said I, (after I had enumerated them) 'convinces me of your pride, indeed, Sir, but 'not of your merit. I confess, that I have 'as much pride as you can have, although 'I hope it is of another kind than that 'you so readily avow. But if, Sir, you 'have the least mixture in yours, of that 'pride which may be expected, and 'thought laudable, in a man of your 'birth, alliances, and fortune, you should 'rather wish, I will presume to say, to 'promote what you call my pride, than 'either to suppress it, or to regret that 'I have it. It is this my acknowledged pride,' proceeded I, 'that induces me 'to tell you, Sir, that I think it beneath 'me to disown what have been my motives for declining, for some days past, 'any conversation with you, or visit 'from Mr. Mennell, that might lead to 'points out of my power to determine 'upon, until I heard from my uncle 'Harlowe; whom, I confess, I have caused to be sounded, whether I might be 'favoured with his interest to obtain for 'me a reconciliation with my friends, 'upon terms which I had caused to be 'proposed.'

'I know not,' said he, 'and suppose 'must not presume to ask, what these 'terms were. But I can but too well 'guess at them; and that I was to have 'been the preliminary sacrifice. But 'you must allow me, Madam, to say, 'that as much as I admire the nobleness 'of your sentiments in general, and in 'particular that laudable pride which you 'have spoken of; I wish that I could 'compliment you with such an uniformity 'in it, as had set you as much above all 'submission to minds implacable and unreasonable, (I hope I may, without offence, say, that your brother's and sister's are such) as it has above all favour and condescension to me.'

'Duty and nature, Sir, call upon me 'to make the submissions you speak of: 'there is a father, there is a mother, there 'are uncles in the one case, to justify and 'demand those submissions. What, pray, 'Sir, can be pleaded for the condescension, 'as you call it? Will you say, your merits, either with regard to them, or to 'myself, may?'

'This, Madam, to be said, after the 'persecutions

'perſecutions of thoſe relations! After 'what you have ſuffered! After what 'you have made me hope! Let me, my 'deareſt creature, aſk you, (we have 'been talking of pride) What ſort of 'pride muſt his be, which can diſpenſe 'with inclination and preference in the 'lady whom he adores?—What muſt be 'that love——'

'Love, Sir! who talks of love?—Was 'not merit the thing we were talking of? '—Have I ever profeſſed, have I ever 'required of you profeſſions of a paſſion 'of that nature!—But there is no end 'of theſe debatings; each ſo faultleſs, 'each ſo full of ſelf——'

'I do not think myſelf faultleſs, Ma'dam—But——'

'But what, Sir!—Would you ever'more argue with me, as if you were a 'child?—Seeking palliations, and mak'ing promiſes?—Promiſes of what, Sir? 'Of being in future the man it is a 'ſhame a gentleman is not?—Of being 'the man——'

'Good God!' interrupted he, with eyes lifted up, 'if thou wert to be thus 'ſevere——'

'Well, well, Sir,' [impatiently] 'I 'need only to obſerve, that all this vaſt 'difference in ſentiment ſhews how un'paired our minds are—So let us——'

'Let us what, Madam!—My ſoul is 'riſing into tumults!' And he looked ſo wildly, that I was a good deal terrified—'Let us what, Madam!'

I was, however, reſolved not to deſert myſelf—'Why, Sir, let us reſolve 'to quit every regard for each other—'Nay, flame not out—I am a poor weak'minded creature in ſome things: but 'where what I ſhould be, or not deſerve 'to live if I am not, is in the queſtion, I 'have a great and invincible ſpirit, or 'my own conceit betrays me—Let us 'reſolve to quit every regard for each 'other that is more than civil. This you 'may depend upon; I will never marry 'any other man. I have ſeen enough 'of your ſex; at leaſt of you.—A ſingle 'life ſhall ever be my choice: while I 'will leave you at liberty to purſue your 'own.'

'Indifference—worſe than indifference!' ſaid he, in a paſſion.

Interrupting him—'Indifference let 'it be—You have not (in my opinon at 'leaſt) deſerved that it ſhould be other: 'if you have in your own, you have cauſe '(at leaſt your pride has) to hate me for 'miſ-judging you.'

'Deareſt, deareſt creature!' ſnatching my hand with fierceneſs, 'let me be'ſeech you to be uniformly noble!—Civil 'regards, Madam!—Civil regards!—Can 'you ſo expect to narrow and confine 'ſuch a paſſion as mine!'

'Such a paſſion as yours, Mr. Love'lace, deſerves to be narrowed and con'fined. It is either the paſſion you do 'not think it, or I do not. I queſtion 'whether your mind is capable of being 'ſo narrowed and ſo widened, as is neceſ'ſary to make it be what I wiſh it to be. 'Lift up your hands and your eyes, Sir, 'in ſilent wonder, if you pleaſe; but 'what does that wonder expreſs, what 'does it convince me of, but that we 'are not born for one another?'

'By my ſoul,' ſaid he, and graſped my hand with an eagerneſs that hurt it, 'we were born for one another: you 'muſt be mine—You ſhall be mine,' [and put his other arm round me] 'although 'my damnation were to be the pur'chaſe!'

I was ſtill more terrified—'Let me 'leave you, Mr. Lovelace,' ſaid I; 'or 'do you be gone from me. Is the paſ'ſion you boaſt of to be thus ſhockingly 'demonſtrated?'

'You muſt not go, Madam!—You 'muſt not leave me in anger.'

'I will return—I will return—When 'you can be leſs violent—leſs ſhocking!' And he let me go.

The man quite frightened me; inſomuch that when I got into my chamber, I found a ſudden flow of tears a great relief to me.

In half an hour, he ſent a little billet, expreſſing his concern for the vehemence of his behaviour, and prayed to ſee me.

I went. Becauſe I could not help myſelf, I went.

He was full of his excuſes—O my dear! what would you, even you, do with ſuch a man as this; and in my ſituation?

It was very poſſible for him now, he ſaid, to account for the workings of a beginning phrenzy. For his part, he was near diſtraction. All laſt week to ſuffer as he had ſuffered; and now to talk of civil regards only, when he had hoped from the nobleneſs of my mind—

'Hope what you will,' interrupted I; 'I muſt inſiſt upon it, that our minds 'are by no means ſuited to each other. 'You have brought me into difficulties. 'I am deſerted by every friend but Miſs 'Howe. My true ſentiments I will not 'conceal—It is againſt my will, that I 'muſt ſubmit to owe protection from a 'brother's projects, which Miſs Howe 'thinks 'thinks are not given over, to you, who 'have brought me into these streights: 'not with my own concurrence brought 'me into them; remember that—'

'I do remember that, Madam!—So 'often reminded, how can I forget it?'

'Yet I will owe to you this protection, 'if it be necessary, in the earnest hope, 'that you will shun, rather than seek mis-'chief, if any further enquiry after me 'be made. But what hinders you from 'leaving me?—Cannot I send to you? 'The widow Fretchville, it is plain, 'knows not her own mind: the people 'here indeed are more civil to me every 'day than other: but I had rather have 'lodgings more agreeable to my circum-'stances. I best know what will suit 'them; and am resolved not to be ob-'liged to any-body. If you leave me, 'I will privately retire to some one of 'the neighbouring villages, and there 'wait my cousin Morden's arrival with 'patience.'

'I presume, Madam,' replied he, 'from what you have said, that your 'application to Harlowe Place has prov-'ed unsuccessful: I therefore hope, that 'you will now give me leave to mention 'the terms in the nature of settlements, 'which I have long intended to propose 'to you; and which having till now de-'layed to do, through accidents not pro-'ceeding from myself; I had thoughts 'of urging to you the moment you entered 'upon your new house; and upon your find-'ing yourself as independent in appear-'ance as you are in fact. Permit me, 'Madam, to propose these matters to 'you—Not with an expectation of your 'immediate answer; but for your consider-'ation.'

Were not hesitation, a self-felt glow, a downcast eye, encouragement more than enough? And yet you will observe (as I now do on recollection) that he was in no great hurry to solicit for a day; since he had no thoughts of proposing settlements, till I had got into my new house; and now, in his great complaisance to me, he desired leave to propose his terms, not with an expectation of my immediate answer; but for my consideration only—Yet, my dear, your advice was too much in my head at this time. I hesitated.

He urged on upon my silence: he would call God to witness to the justice, nay to the generosity of his intentions to me, if I would be so good as to hear what he had to propose to me, as to settlements.

Could not the man have fallen into the subject without this parade? Many a point, you know, is refused, and ought to be refused, if leave be asked to introduce it; and when once refused, the refusal must in honour be adhered to—Whereas, had it been slid in upon one, as I may say, it might have merited further consideration. If such a man as Mr. Lovelace knows not this, who should?

But he seemed to think it enough that he had asked my leave to propose his sentiments. He took no advantage of my silence, as I presume men as modest as Mr. Lovelace would have done, in a like case: yet gazing in my face very confidently, and seeming to expect my answer, I thought myself obliged to give the subject a more diffuse turn, in order to save myself the mortification of appearing too ready in my compliance, after such a distance as had been between us; and yet (in pursuance of your advice) I was willing to avoid the necessity of giving him such a repulse, as might again throw us out of the course—A cruel alternative to be reduced to!

'You talk of generosity, Mr. Lovelace,' said I; 'and you talk of justice; per-'haps, without having considered the 'force of the words, in the sense you 'use them on this occasion—Let me tell 'you what generosity is, in my sense of 'the word—TRUE GENEROSITY is 'not confined to pecuniary instances: it 'is more than politeness: it is more than 'good faith: it is more than justice: since 'all these are but duties, and what a 'worthy mind cannot dispense with. 'But TRUE GENEROSITY is greatness 'of soul. It incites us to do more by 'a fellow-creature, than can be strictly 'required of us. It obliges us to hasten 'to the relief of an object that wants re-'lief; anticipating even such a one's 'hopes or expectation. Generosity, Sir, 'will not surely permit a worthy mind 'to doubt of its honourable and be-'neficent intentions; much less will it 'allow itself to shock, to offend any one, 'and, least of all, a person thrown by 'adversity, mishap, or accident, into it's 'protection.'

What an opportunity had he to clear his intentions had he been so disposed, from the latter part of this home observation!—But he ran away with the first, and kept to that.

'Admirably defined!' he said—'But 'who at this rate, Madam, can be said 'to be generous to you?—Your generosity 'I implore; while justice, as it must be 'my sole merit, shall be my aim. Never 'was

'was there a woman of such nice and 'delicate sentiments!'

'It is a reflection upon yourself, Sir, 'and upon the company you have kept, 'if you think these notions either nice 'or delicate. Thousands of my sex are 'more nice than I; for they would have 'avoided the devious path I have been 'surprized into: the consequences of 'which surprize have laid me under the 'necessity of telling a man, who has not 'delicacy enough to enter into those parts of 'the female character which are it's glory 'and distinction, what true generosity is.'

His divine monitress, he called me. He would endeavour to form his manners (as he had often promised) by my example. But he hoped I would now permit him to mention briefly the justice he proposed to do me, in the terms of the settlements; a subject so proper, before now, to have been entered upon; and which would have been entered upon long ago, had not my frequent displeasure [I am ever in fault, my dear!] taken from him the opportunity he had often wished for: but now having ventured to lay hold of this, nothing should divert him from improving it.

'I have no spirits, just now, Sir, to at-'tend to such weighty points. What 'you have a mind to propose, write to 'me, and I shall know what answer to 'return. Only one thing let me re-'mind you of, that if you touch upon 'any subject, in which my father has a 'concern, I shall judge by your treat-'ment of the father, what value you 'have for the daughter.'

He looked as if he would chuse rather to speak than write: but had he said so, I had a severe return to have made upon him; as possibly he might see by my looks.

In this way are we now: a sort of calm, as I said, succeeding a storm. What may happen next, whether a storm or a calm, with such a spirit as I have to deal with, who can tell?

But be that as it will, I think, my dear, I am not meanly off: and this is a great point with me, and which I know you will be glad to hear: if it were only, that I can see this man without losing any of that dignity [What other word can I use, speaking of myself, that betokens decency, and not arrogance?] which is so necessary to enable me to look up, or rather with the mind's eye, I may say, to look down upon a man of this man's cast.

Although circumstances have so offered that I could not take your advice as to the manner of dealing with him; yet you gave me so much courage by it, as has enabled me to conduct things to this issue; as well as determined me against leaving him: which before, I was thinking to do, at all adventures. Whether, when it came to the point, I should have done so or not, I cannot say, because it would have depended upon his behaviour at the time.

But, let his behaviour be what it will, I am afraid, (with you) that should anything offer at last to oblige me to leave him, I shall not mend my situation in the world's eye; but the contrary. And yet I will not be treated by him with indignity while I have any power to help myself.

You, my dear, have accused me of having modestly'd away, as you phrase it, several opportunities of being—Being what, my dear?—Why, the wife of a libertine: and what a libertine and his wife are, my cousin Morden's letter tells us.—Let me here once for all, endeavour to account for the motives of my behaviour to this man, and for the principles I have proceeded upon, as they appear to me upon a close self-examination.

Be pleased then to allow me to think, that my motives on this occasion, arise not altogether from maidenly niceness; nor yet from the apprehension of what my present tormentor, and future husband, may think of a precipitate compliance, on such a disagreeable behaviour as his: but they arise principally from what offers to my own heart; respecting, as I may say, it's own rectitude, it's own judgment of the fit and the unfit; as I would, without study, answer for myself to myself, in the first place;—to him, and to the world, in the second only. Principles that are in my mind; that I found there; implanted, no doubt, by the first Gracious Planter; which therefore impel me, as I may say, to act up to them, that thereby I may, to the best of my judgment, be enabled to comport myself worthily in both states, (the single and the married) let others act as they will by me.

I hope, my dear, I do not deceive myself, and, instead of setting about rectifying what is amiss in my heart, endeavour to find excuses for habits and peculiarities, which I am unwilling to cast off or overcome. The heart is very deceitful: do you, my dear friend, lay mine open, [But surely it is always open before you!] and spare me not, if you think it culpable.

This obſervation, once for all, as I ſaid, I thought proper to make, to convince you, that to the beſt of my judgment, my errors in matters as well of leſſer moment, as of greater, ſhall rather be the fault of my judgment than of my will.

I am, my deareſt friend, your ever obliged CLARISSA HARLOWE.

LETTER XX.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

TUESDAY NIGHT, MAY 16.

MR. Lovelace has ſent me by Dorcas, his propoſals, as follow—

'To ſpare a delicacy ſo extreme, and 'to obey you, I write: and the rather, 'that you may communicate this paper 'to Miſs Howe, who may conſult any of 'her friends you ſhall think proper to 'have intruſted on this occaſion. I ſay, 'intruſted; becauſe, as you know, I have 'given it out to ſeveral perſons, that we 'are actually married.

'In the firſt place, Madam, I offer to 'ſettle upon you, by way of jointure, 'your whole eſtate: and moreover to 'veſt in truſtees ſuch a part of mine in 'Lancaſhire, as ſhall produce a clear 'four hundred pounds a year, to be 'paid to your ſole and ſeparate uſe 'quarterly.

'My own eſtate is a clear, not nominal, 2000*l. per annum*. Lord M. propoſes to give me poſſeſſion either of 'that which he has in Lancaſhire, [to 'which, by the way, I think I have a 'better title than he has himſelf] or 'that we call The Lawn in Hertfordſhire, upon my nuptials with a lady 'whom he ſo greatly admires; and to 'make that I ſhall chuſe a clear 1000*l*. 'per annum.

'My too great contempt of cenſure 'has ſubjected me to much ſlander. It 'may not therefore be improper to aſſure 'you, on the word of a gentleman, that 'no part of my eſtate was ever mortgaged: and that although I lived very 'expenſively abroad, and made large 'draughts, yet that Midſummer Day 'next will diſcharge all that I owe in the 'world. My notions are not all bad 'ones. I have been thought, in pecuniary caſes, generous. It would have 'deſerved another name, had I not firſt 'been juſt.

'If, as your own eſtate is at preſent in 'your father's hands, you rather chuſe 'that I ſhould make a jointure out of 'mine, tantamount to yours, be it what 'it will, it ſhall be done. I will engage 'Lord M. to write you, what he propoſes 'to do on the happy occaſion: not as 'your deſire or expectation, but to demonſtrate, that no advantage is intended to be taken of the ſituation you are 'in with your own family.

'To ſhew the beloved daughter the 'conſideration I have for her, I will conſent, that ſhe ſhall preſcribe the terms 'of agreement in relation to the large 'ſums which muſt be in her father's 'hands, ariſing from her grandfather's eſtate. I have no doubt, but he 'will be put upon making large demands upon you. All thoſe it ſhall be 'in your power to comply with, for the 'ſake of your own peace. And the remainder ſhall be paid into your hands, 'and be entirely at your diſpoſal, as a 'fund to ſupport thoſe charitable donations, which I have heard you ſo 'famed for out of your family, and for 'which you have been ſo greatly reflected upon in it.

'As to cloaths, jewels, and the like, 'againſt the time you ſhall chuſe to make 'your appearance, it will be my pride 'that you ſhall not be beholden for ſuch 'of theſe as ſhall be anſwerable to the 'rank of both, to thoſe who have had 'the ſtupid folly to renounce a daughter 'they deſerved not. You muſt excuſe 'me, Madam: you would miſtruſt my 'ſincerity in the reſt, could I ſpeak of 'theſe people without aſperity, though 'ſo nearly related to you.

'Theſe, Madam, are my propoſals. 'They are ſuch as I always deſigned to 'make, whenever you would permit me 'to enter into the delightful ſubject. 'But you have been ſo determined 'to try every method for reconciling 'yourſelf to your relations, even by 'giving me abſolutely up for ever, that 'you have ſeemed to think it but juſtice 'to keep me at a diſtance, till the event 'of that your predominant hope could be 'ſeen. It is now ſeen! And although I 'have been, and perhaps ſtill am, ready 'to regret the want of that preference I 'wiſhed for from you as Miſs Clariſſa 'Harlowe; yet I am ſure, as the huſband of Mrs. Lovelace, I ſhall be more 'ready to adore than to blame you for 'the pangs you have given to a heart, 'the generoſity, or rather juſtice of which, 'my implacable enemies have taught you 'to doubt: and this ſtill the readier, as 'I am perſuaded, that thoſe pangs never 'would have been given by a mind ſo 'noble, had not the doubt been entertained, (perhaps with too great an ap'pearance of reaſon;) and as I hope I 'ſhall have it to reflect, that the mo-'ment the doubt ſhall be overcome, the 'indifference will ceaſe.

'I will only add, that if I have omit-'ted any-thing, that would have given 'you farther ſatisfaction; or if the a-'bove terms be ſhort of what you would 'wiſh; you will be pleaſed to ſupply 'them as you think fit. And when I 'know your pleaſure, I will inſtantly 'order articles to be drawn up conform-'ably; that nothing in my power may 'be wanting to make you happy.

'You will now, deareſt Madam, 'judge, how far all the reſt depends 'upon yourſelf.'

You ſee, my dear, what he offers. You ſee it is all my fault, that he has not made theſe offers before. I am a ſtrange creature!—To be to blame in every-thing, and to every-body; yet neither intend the ill at the time, nor know it to be the ill till too late, or ſo nearly too late, that I muſt give up all the delicacy he talks of, to compound for my fault!

I ſhall now judge how far the reſt depends upon myſelf! So coldly concludes he ſuch warm, and, in the main, un-objectible propoſals: would you not, as you read, have ſuppoſed, that the paper would conclude with the moſt earneſt demand of a day?—I own, I had that expectation ſo ſtrong, reſulting naturally, as I may ſay, from the premiſes, that without ſtudying for diſſatisfaction, I could not help being diſſatisfied when I came to the concluſion.

But you ſay there is no help. I muſt perhaps make further ſacrifices. All delicacy it ſeems is to be at an end with me!—But if ſo, this man knows not what every wiſe man knows, that prudence, and virtue, and delicacy of mind in a wife, do the huſband more real honour in the eye of the world, than the ſame qualities (were ſhe deſtitute of them) in himſelf, do him: as the want of them in her does him more diſ-honour: for are not the wife's errors the huſband's reproach? How juſtly his reproach, is another thing.

I will conſider this paper; and write to it, if I am able: for it ſeems now, all the reſt depends upon myſelf.

LETTER XXI.

MISS CLARISSA HARLOWE, TO MISS HOWE.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, MAY 17.

MR. Lovelace would fain have engaged me laſt night. But as I was not prepared to enter upon the ſubject of his propoſals, (intending to conſider them maturely) and was not highly pleaſed with his concluſion, I deſired to be excuſed ſeeing him till morning; and the rather, as there is hardly any getting from him in tolerable time over-night.

Accordingly, about ſeven o'clock we met in the dining-room.

I find, he was full of expectation that I ſhould meet him with a very favourable, who knows but with a thankful aſpect? And I immediately found by his ſullen countenance, that he was under no ſmall diſappointment that I did not.

'My deareſt love, are you well? Why 'look you ſo ſolemn upon me? Will 'your indifference never be over? If I 'have propoſed terms in any reſpect ſhort 'of your expectation—'

I told him that he had very conſiderately mentioned my ſhewing his propoſals to Miſs Howe; and as I ſhould have a ſpeedy opportunity to ſend them to her by Collins, I deſired to ſuſpend any talk upon that ſubject till I had her opinion upon them.

Good God!—If there were but the leaſt loop-hole! the leaſt room for delay!—But he was writing a letter to Lord M. to give him an account of his ſituation with me, and could not finiſh it ſo ſatisfactorily, either to my lord or to himſelf, as if I would condeſcend to ſay, whether the terms he had propoſed were acceptable or not.

Thus far, I told him, I could ſay, That my principal point was peace and reconciliation with my relations. As to other matters, the genteelneſs of his own ſpirit would put him upon doing more for me than I ſhould aſk, or expect. Wherefore, if all he had to write about was to know what Lord M. would do on my account, he might ſpare himſelf the trouble; for that my utmoſt wiſhes, as to myſelf, were much more eaſily gratified than he perhaps imagined.

He aſked me then, If I would ſo far permit him to touch upon the happy day, as to requeſt the preſence of Lord M. on the occaſion, and to be my father?

Father had a ſweet and venerable ſound with it, I ſaid. I ſhould be glad to have a father who would own me!

Was not this plain ſpeaking, think you, my dear? Yet it rather, I muſt own, appears ſo to me on reflection, than was deſigned freely at the time. For I then, with a ſigh from the bottom of my heart, thought of my own father; bitterly regretting getting that I am an outcaſt from him and from my mother.

Mr. Lovelace I thought ſeemed a little affected; at the manner of my ſpeaking, and perhaps at the ſad reflection.

'I am but a very young creature, 'Mr. Lovelace,' ſaid I, [and wiped my eyes as I turned away my face] 'although you have kindly, and in love 'to me, introduced ſo much ſorrow to 'me already: ſo you muſt not wonder, 'that the word father ſtrikes ſo ſenſibly upon the heart of a child ever 'dutiful till ſhe knew you, and whoſe 'tender years ſtill require the paternal 'wing.'

He turned towards the window: [Rejoice with me, my dear, ſince I ſeem to be devoted to him, that the man is not abſolutely impenetrable!] his emotion was viſible; yet he endeavoured to ſuppreſs it. Approaching me again; again he was obliged to turn from me; angelick ſomething, he ſaid: but then, obtaining a heart more ſuitable to his wiſh, he once more approached me—For his own part, he ſaid, as Lord M. was ſo ſubject to the gout, he was afraid, that the compliment he had juſt propoſed to make him, might, if made, occaſion a longer ſuſpenſion than he could bear to think of: and if it did, it would vex him to the heart that he had made it.

I could not ſay a ſingle word to this, you know, my dear. But you will gueſs at my thoughts of what he ſaid—So much paſſionate love, lip-deep! So prudent, and ſo dutifully patient at heart to a relation he had till now ſo undutifully deſpiſed!—'Why, why, 'am I thrown upon ſuch a man!' thought I.

He heſitated, as if contending with himſelf; and after taking a turn or two about the room, He was at a great loſs what to determine upon, he ſaid, becauſe he had not the honour of knowing when he was to be made the happieſt of men—Would to God it might that very inſtant be reſolved upon!

He ſtopped a moment or two, ſtaring in his uſual confident way, in my downcaſt face. [Did I not, O my beloved friend, think you, want a father or a mother juſt then!] But if he could not, ſo ſoon as he wiſhed, procure my conſent to a day; in that caſe, he thought the compliment might as well be made to Lord M. as not—[See my dear!] Since the ſettlements might be drawn and engroſſed in the intervenient time, which would pacify his impatience, as no time would be loſt.

You will ſuppoſe how I was affected by this ſpeech, by repeating the ſubſtance of what he ſaid upon it; as follows.

--But, by his ſoul, he knew not, ſo much was I upon the reſerve, and ſo much latent meaning did my eye import, whether, when he moſt hoped to pleaſe me, he was not fartheſt from doing ſo. Would I vouchſafe to ſay, Whether I approved of his compliment to Lord M. or not?

To leave it to me, to chuſe whether the ſpeedy day he ought to have urged for with earneſtneſs, ſhould be accelerated or ſuſpended!—'Miſs Howe,' thought I, at that moment, 'ſays, I muſt not run 'away from this man?'

'To be ſure, Mr. Lovelace, if this 'matter be ever to be, it muſt be agree-'able to me to have the full approbation 'of one ſide, ſince I cannot have that of 'the other.'

'If this matter be ever to be! Good God! 'what words are theſe at this time of 'day! And full approbation of one ſide! 'Why that word approbation? When the 'greateſt pride of all my family is, that 'of having the honour of ſo dear a crea-'ture for their relation? Would to Hea-'ven, my deareſt life,' added he, 'that, 'without complimenting any body, to-'morrow might be the happieſt day of 'my life!—What ſay you, my angel?' With a trembling impatience, that ſeemed not affected—'What ſay you for to-mor-'row?'
